In fact, Lord Chancellors are politicians, and most people outside the House have spotted it—they know that Lord Chancellors are members of political parties—and it is time that we recognised that, but let us not worry too much about whether they sit in the Lords or the Commons. Certainly, let us not worry too much about whether they are lawyers. I agree that they must be able to speak up effectively for the independence of the law, but they do not have to sit in the Lords.

Mr. Hogg: One could make the same comments about the office of the Speaker.

Mr. Soley: One could, but that is a much easier matter to deal with. The House of Commons and the House of Lords can deal with those matters themselves and come up with a system that works. We are talking about something that has an impact on the vast bulk of the population, and those in the legal profession must answer the question why so many people see them as being very expensive and largely inefficient. That is not a good image, and they need to think about it.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): One of the advantages that the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley) has over me is that he was able to make a speech wholly uninfluenced by most of the contributions made earlier in the debate. That may be something that the House will value. It is a pity that he was unable to be here to listen to the entirety of the debate, as I have done—no doubt he was absent for very good reasons—because he would have realised from the outset that he did not need to speak the first sentence of his speech, given that the Opposition Members who have spoken do not take the antediluvian attitude that he ascribes to us.

Many Opposition Members have spoken not in support of the Bill, but in support of some of its aspects, particularly in relation to the judicial appointments commission. There is much to be criticised in the detail relating to the judicial appointments commission, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) set out those criticisms very clearly. When the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush has a moment, perhaps tomorrow, I suggest that he read the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend, because, clearly, he did not have the advantage of listening to it this afternoon.

A number of hon. Members have criticised the Prime Minister for making these constitutional reforms, particularly in relation to the Lord Chancellor's office, on the back of an envelope, as part of a Cabinet reshuffle. Those criticisms are well made. That is not to decry all things that have been written on the back of an envelope. As I understand it, Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg address was written on the back of an envelope, and it was none the worse for that. However, we are not here presented with some Leonardo-style doodle by a perceptive intellect on the constitution; we are hearing about what is effectively a mediaeval assassination note written by a contemporary Henry II to rid himself of a turbulent Lord Chancellor, Lord Irvine of Lairg. To do that, the Prime Minister had to invent a system that required the abolition of the office, without thinking of the consequences.

Most acts have consequences, and this act by the Prime Minister had profound consequences. It led to an embarrassing start for the office of the current Lord Chancellor, Lord Falconer, who is in every respect a perfectly likeable person, but who does not, I am afraid, carry either the political or the legal authority of many of his predecessors.

The Lord Chancellor is not always a politician. Lord Mackay of Clashfern was primarily a huge legal intellect, who reached the very highest office as a Scottish judge and as a Law Lord. He was translated into the office of Lord Chancellor, and I am not even sure that he was a member of the Conservative party until he became Lord Chancellor. The hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush was wrong about that too.

Irrespective of whether a Lord Chancellor was a former party politician, it was assuredly true that once he became Lord Chancellor, he gave up any form of party political ambition and concentrated on doing what he was employed to do by the state: to defend to his last breath—to quote Lord Hailsham—the independence of the judiciary. It takes someone of intellect and authority, and someone who is respected by the judiciary, no matter whether they are appointed by a judicial appointments commission or under the old system, to command not only the respect of the judiciary and the legal profession—one can be as rude as one likes about either of those institutions—but of Cabinet colleagues and the Prime Minister.

It is no good critics of the old system saying that the Lord Chancellor was no more than a jobbing politician, the protector of a vested interest and not a serious modern part of a modern constitution. It seems to me, at least—I leave it to others to make up their minds whether they agree with me—that the reason that the office of the Lord Chancellor is old is because it is good and has served a useful constitutional purpose. However, the Prime Minister, his friends and those who like to write constitutional reforms on the backs of envelopes now come and tell us that the Lord Chancellor's office is bad, because it is old and needs to be modernised. As many Conservative Members have demonstrated all too well in the debate, the Government's arguments are ill thought out and have not been properly assessed.

One of the arguments put forward by the Government is that the office of Lord Chancellor is now out of date, so we should have a modern Secretary of State in the House who can secure the interests of that spending Department. If one changes the nature of the office or of the job—the "post", as the Prime Minister prefers to call it—it becomes increasingly ridiculous to call that office holder the Lord Chancellor.

The Lord Chancellor whom the Government would like to see is no more than a junior or middling rank Cabinet Minister. Indeed, we see the genesis of that in the current pecking order in the Cabinet list. Whereas the Lord Chancellor used to be No. 2 or 3 on the list—immediately after the Prime Minister—he is now second or third bottom in the Cabinet pecking order. That might be of no importance whatever, but it just so happens that the Government intend to fillet out the Lord Chancellor's functions and turn him into no more than the presiding officer over a spending Department. They will then say to the public, "How ridiculous to have a man who is the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, the Speaker of the House of Lords, and a member of the other arm of the constitution. It is quite improper nowadays for this person to have a limb in each of the three parts of the constitution." The Government are performing a great con trick, and it is contemptible for them to try to persuade us that the changes that they are bringing forward are based on any thoughtful appreciation of what the constitution has stood for, and what the office of Lord Chancellor means.

The Minister who opened the debate said that it was right for the person who administers the courts to be a full-time Minister in this House—but that argument is not especially useful when talking about the role of the Lord Chancellor. The Lord Chancellor's role is something else. We could have a courts Department, but if we go back only 20, 30 or 40 years—before the Lord Chancellor's Department, or, now, the Department for Constitutional Affairs, became such a spending leviathan—all the arguments that the Minister put forward at 3.30 pm fall to bits. [Interruption.] I can hear my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt), but I have something to say.

The Minister said that changing the present situation would settle and clarify the relationship between the courts, the Executive and Parliament and make it easier to understand. If there were any logic behind the Government's arguments, they would remove the Executive from the legislature. If they wish to be purists in the misunderstood sense of Montesquieu, as the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) said, they would clearly separate all three limbs of the constitution, but they will not do so.

It is a pity that I have so little time, because although my views are no better than those of any other hon. Member, I would at least like the occasional opportunity to express them in the House. I would have liked to criticise the Government's proposals on the supreme court and criticise, yet support in part, their measures concerning the judicial appointments commission. Others have said a great deal about that, and no doubt hon. Members who could not attend the debate will be able to read what was said tomorrow.

The Bill is by and large regrettable. Its conception was ill advised, and its nurture has not been improved by the arguments put forward by the Government.

9.37 pm

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): I declare my interest as a practising solicitor. It is good that a fair balance of lawyers and non-lawyers have spoken. We have had an interesting debate, but given the Government's proposals, it has not been satisfactory.

[Mr. Jonathan Djanogly]

As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) and other colleagues made clear, the constitutional proposals in the Bill began life as a slapdash press release from Downing street. One and a half years later, the Government's proposals remain as ill conceived as ever and insult has been added to injury because they have refused to allow such serious constitutional issues to be considered fully in Committee on the Floor of the House, as my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) powerfully explained. My hon. Friends the Members for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) supported that point.

The official Opposition will not oppose constitutional reforms that genuinely benefit this country, even when they are contained in such an unfortunate Bill. We accept the premise of the concordat and the redefining of the relationship between the judiciary and the Government for the reasons succinctly expressed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg), my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells and others. We thus do not object to the judicial appointments commission as long as merit, rather than a candidate's political views or crony potential, remains the sole criterion for the selection of judges.

The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) and the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) broadened the argument about the commission by suggesting that there should be a greater mix of gender and ethnicity and more solicitor judges. The hon. Member for Stafford supported a more evolutionary approach, whereas the hon. and learned Member for Redcar was slightly more revolutionary.

We will not, however, support the acts of constitutional vandalism proposed in the Bill. What my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield called the unedifying spectacle of the undermining of the historical office of Lord Chancellor and the creation of an unnecessary new supreme court are not changes that we believe the House ought to accept. Concerns about the Government's plans have been eloquently expressed, both in this place and throughout the Bill's passage in the other place.

I should like to address some of the interesting, and sometimes persuasive, arguments that we have heard today. Various hon. Members have considered the office of the Lord Chancellor. The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) explained the importance with which different groups view the role and its independence. We are still shocked by the Government's determination to mount an assault on this long-standing and constitutionally vital position. Indeed, it is only as a result of an Opposition amendment in another place that the Lord Chancellor has not been wiped clean off the face of the Bill.

In supporting the Bill for the Liberal Democrats, the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) made a wide-ranging speech, which included his views on banning all Ministers in the other place and developing the role of the Attorney-General. I do not agree with him that a Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs will have a stronger position in Cabinet than an unelected Lord Chancellor. We believe that the Lord Chancellor has, and should have, a vital role in upholding the rule of law and as the guardian of judicial independence. He should continue to act as the key link between the judiciary and the Executive, and his influence over constitutional matters should be maintained through the tenure of a senior Cabinet post.

Their lordships took a further opportunity to defeat the Government in the other place. In doing so, they secured an amendment to the effect that the Lord Chancellor must always be a member of the other place, as is the convention at present. That requirement would underline his ongoing constitutional role. He would also continue to assist in placing at least some distance between him and the political pressures of this place. Another Opposition amendment ensured that the Lord Chancellor will also need to have gained experience as a senior lawyer or judge. To undertake their delicate role, future Lord Chancellors must continue to be equipped with experience of interpreting the law.

The Minister today announced the Government's intention to reverse those improvements to the Bill. After the significant work in the other place, that is regrettable. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham said, both the requirement for membership of another place and that for senior legal experience will help to attract individuals who should be less susceptible to any political influence. As he eloquently put it, they will not give two hoots for preferment or patronage. We welcome that.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire that the Lord Chancellor has the inherent power to stand up to Prime Ministers. He and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) also made the important point that, had we not had the Law Lords in the upper Chamber, the content of the Bill, as it was delivered to this House, would be much worse.

My right hon. Friends the Members for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) and for Wells, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham spoke of how style and convention is vital to the work of the Lord Chancellor and effective in practice. That includes the power of advice and influence, which needs professional expertise. A system that has taken 1,000 years to build is now, it is said, to be sacked in two years. The hon. and learned Member for Redcar said that it was unacceptable that members of the Executive should be able to appoint the judiciary, but spoke in rather absolute terms that do not always reflect the subtlety of our constitutional process.

Many hon. Members spoke of the Government's proposal to create a supreme court, which is also the focus of our reasoned amendment. In creating such a court, the only outcomes that appear guaranteed are unnecessary upheaval and unwarranted cost. The Government's starting estimate is for £30 million of set-up costs, but we all know how good they are at building estimates. Furthermore, an estimated £8.8 million of annual running costs for the new court stands in marked contrast to current running costs of a little over £168,000 a year. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wells mentioned how the situation is being exacerbated by proposals to increase court fees to litigants.

What do we stand to gain in return for that hefty investment? The Appellate Committee of the House of Lords is admired at home and abroad for the quality of its rulings, as hon. Members have said. The work of the Law Lords would not change in a new supreme court, as was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills and my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal. How would rehousing the Law Lords add anything to the excellence for which they are so rightly renowned? There may be some practical difficulties with the present arrangements, but why not explore further the suggestions made in another place for improving the facilities available to the Appellate Committee at Westminster?

The Government seem to think that the public are in total confusion over the role of the Appellate Committee and, worse still, they question the Committee's independence. I concede that a Lord of Appeal in Ordinary may not be a household name, but the role of the Law Lords as final arbiters of British justice is widely recognised in this country. We think that the public see clearly how well the country's highest court works and see no need to change it. A change of name would not produce some sudden breakthrough in public understanding. If anything, new questions would be thrown up. If a shiny new supreme court would prove so independent of Parliament, why would Parliament continue to be supreme over it?

The hon. Member for Perth (Annabelle Ewing) and the Scottish National party seem to be jumping on the bandwagon and want to use the proposals as an opportunity for the repatriation of jurisdiction to Scottish courts. As to the public's opinion, how would the court command more respect by moving from the nation's seat of power to less prestigious surroundings? The Law Lords might instead be perceived as ensconced in some ivory tower, delivering judgments detached from the real decision making in Parliament.

The hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) made a serious and measured speech on access to justice, but his comparison with Zimbabwe reinforced our contention that what we have in this country works pretty well. Separation of powers does not require the Law Lords to be evicted from Parliament, just as the Government are not proposing that the Executive need to be prised from the legislature.

In noting the disagreement between the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed and Lord Bingham, I add that the functions of the Appellate Committee would not change with a new building, nor would the impartiality with which the Law Lords undertake their work. The Government's arguments on the point seem theoretical at best and, at worst, represent a failure to recognise the overall constitutional balance that works in this country.

The integrity and independence of the Appellate Committee are not in question. As many hon. Members have attested, the scrupulous conduct of the Law Lords in another place already bears witness to their independence. Even the introduction of the Human Rights Act 1998 has not challenged that legitimacy. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham and others have noted, removing the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary from Parliament would only impoverish the quality of debates and legislation arising in the other place. The Law Lords would likewise stand to lose something: the benefit of their proximity to the heart of government. In short, our present arrangements are effective and respected. The Government's demand for a supreme court risks damaging that position, at significant financial cost and for few if any tangible benefits.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal warned, showing his experience of government and, incidentally, of a happy marriage, this is a Government of words, not action. He showed how we have not been given details of how the plans will work, while we know that what we have works now. He powerfully called for a return to courtesy being shown towards this place.

We must resist any further attempts by this Government to modernise purely for the sake of ticking another box in Labour's modernisation agenda. Enough parliamentary time has already been spent on measures that are not a priority for the British public. Like us, they will not understand why millions of pounds should be spent needlessly on a supreme court given that the Law Lords have proved so adept at their work. Similarly, they will not comprehend a Government who seek to abolish in the Lord Chancellor a Minister who for hundreds of years has helped to ensure that the rule of law is respected by the Executive. The Government are forcing through their constitutional hobby-horses with inadequate justification.

In those circumstances and for the reasons that I have set out, I ask the House to vote against the Second Reading of this Bill and in favour of the reasoned amendment tabled by my hon. Friends and me.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): Throughout today's debate, Opposition Members have repeatedly expressed their dissatisfaction with the terms of the programme motion before the House. I inform the House that it is the Government's intention to move the programme motion this evening, but following discussions between the usual channels, it has been decided that a supplementary motion will be tabled. An additional day on the Floor of the House will be provided for and I am sure that the usual channels will continue to discuss how best to divide consideration in Committee and on Report and Third Reading. There are principled disagreements between the Government and the Opposition on this issue and we still believe that the terms of the programme motion before the House are correct, but we hope that the compromise in response to the issues that have been raised is satisfactory.

Mr. Grieve: I welcome the fact that there is to be a further day of debate on the Floor, but I shall still vote against the programme motion, because until we have a proper programme motion, we have only the one on the Table.

Mr. Lammy: Today's debate has been characterised by the spectre of the Opposition trying to find their feet—at least on finances—and falling over themselves in the process. The reasoned amendment is one of enervating insularity. They would deny the people of this country a supreme court that is absolutely free of the taint of political process—and for what? For nothing more than grubby opportunism. Today, we have heard the dinosaurs and continued to watch the process of their extinction with interest.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) sums up the position nicely and in so doing demonstrates that he and his party have become the Alf Garnett of British politics. It would be amusing if they were not so deadly serious. Theirs is the same patrician view that voted against devolution in Scotland and Wales, the Human Rights Act 1998 and the Freedom of Information Act 2000. Every time the Government attempt to reconnect our public institutions with the people they serve, the Opposition oppose us.

Mr. Grieve: I assume, therefore, that the attack on trial by jury and the decision to oust the right of asylum seekers to seek redress in the courts were examples of the hon. Gentleman's demotic tendencies.

Mr. Lammy: We are debating the Constitutional Reform Bill. Happily, other hon. Members have been more resolute in their values and contributions today. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) offered a concise and considered endorsement of the rule of law and the proposals as framed. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) voiced the Liberal Democrats' support for the Bill and disagreed with the official Opposition's suggestions regarding the enormity of the consequences. We heard outstanding contributions from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), not only in her main speech, but in her interventions. We also heard a powerful speech—albeit one with which I disagreed—from the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory)—and a thoughtful one from my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney).

The Bill is not constitutionally disastrous, as the hon. Member for Beaconsfield suggested, nor is it about change for change's sake amounting to a white elephant. It is about the relationship between people and the institutions that govern them, which is critical to a liberal democracy, as he knows. Yes, of course we should take pride in our constitutional heritage as the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) and the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) suggested. Our institutions are respected and renowned throughout the world, but a strong reputation should not prevent us from looking at how those arrangements are working in the 21st century. We must be informed by our history, not dazzled or paralysed by it.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield said that a body that exercises the same functions as the House of Lords is a waste of money. He knows that that argument is based on a false premise. The Government are not saying that the new supreme court would exercise different functions from the Appellate Committee of the House of Lords; we are saying that, at the turn of the 21st century, the time has come to ensure that the highest appeal court is separate from the legislature. As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North said, quoting Lord Bingham, that separation is a badge of judicial independence.

The time has come. It is unacceptable in the 21st century for the judges who are charged with deciding whether the detention of 12 suspected terrorists in Belmarsh is lawful also to sit in Parliament. It is unacceptable that judges sitting in the Lords must decide whether a Bill passed by the very House of which they are Members is compatible with the Human Rights Act 1998. It is unacceptable in the 21st century for us to tell emerging democracies that it is fundamental that they have a separation of powers but not to have the same ourselves.

The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal said that that the judiciary is not biased. Of course, Members of Parliament know that there is no political bias in the decisions reached by the judges, but that is not enough. Our commitment to judicial independence must be public and demonstrably clear. Our new supreme court will deliver that. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield was one of a number of Opposition Members who raised the issue of costs. The cost of locating the court at Middlesex Guildhall, as hon. Members will be aware following discussion, is £30 million. That cost is effectively for the refurbishment of the existing building, and I am pleased that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North and the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome supported the Government by saying that the building is desirable. In Lord Bingham's words, the cost reflects

"the importance which a liberal society attaches to the rule of law."

Mr. Garnier: In his speech, the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie), had to admit that rooms to replace the eight or nine Crown court rooms in the Guildhall must be found elsewhere in London. Where is that building to be found, when will it be completed and what will it cost?

Mr. Lammy: We are still consulting on that, as the hon. and learned Gentleman knows as a court recorder.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield said that the establishment of a supreme court would deny Parliament the experience and expertise that the Law Lords bring to debates and legislation. It is axiomatic that, in any policy to separate the supreme court from the House of Lords, the supreme court judges should cease to have a direct role in the work of the House. Law Lords are judges, not legislators, and are specifically appointed to act as the UK's supreme court. Half the Law Lords are reported to be uncomfortable with the present arrangements. Some of them observe a self-denying ordinance and do not participate in debates on political matters on which they may have to adjudicate. It is clearly time to sort out that confusing situation.

It specious to suggest that the House of Lords will lose expertise. Retired Law Lords can remain in the House and contribute if they wish. There has been discussion about the location of the new court, as I said. Lord Millett said:

"The fact is that this House can no longer provide the accommodation, resources and facilities which a properly serviced Supreme Court requires".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 12 November 2004; Vol. 425, c. 1293.]

There are certainly compelling grounds to change that arrangement.

The hon. Member for Perth (Annabelle Ewing) raised the failure of the supreme court to repatriate final appellate jurisdiction of civil cases to Scotland. That is not the case. The Scottish Executive and the Scottish Law Society were consulted and favour our proposals. There is not a break with the treaty of Union. There has been considerable agreement today that the office of Lord Chancellor should be reformed to meet the demands of modern and complex government. The hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) said that we have been defeated on this issue. However, it is not about the title but the responsibilities of that office. The relationship between the citizen and the state is too important to be left unchecked, unreformed and out of touch. Following a long period of political stagnation until 1997, the legislation is important, and I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM BILL [LORDS] (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6) (Programme motions),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Constitutional Reform Bill [Lords]:

Committal

1. The following shall be committed to a Committee of the whole House—

(a) Clauses 1 to 7, 20, 21, 37, 94, 95 and 105 to 109;

(b) Schedule 8;

(c) any new Clauses amending section 12 of the Justice (Northern Ireland) Act 2002;

(d) any new Clauses relating to matters connected with the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom as reserved or excepted matters under the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

2. The remainder of the Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Committee

3. (1) Proceedings in Committee of the whole House shall be completed in two days.

(2) Those proceedings shall be taken on each of those days as shown in the following table and shall be taken in the order shown there.

(3) Proceedings on each of those days shall (as far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the time specified in the second column of the Table.

(4) Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings in Committee of the whole House.

TABLE

Proceedings	Time for conclusion of proceedings
First day
Clauses 1, 4, 6 and 7	Three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the Bill
Clause 5, any new Clauses amending section 12 of the Justice (Northern Ireland) Act 2002, Clauses 2 and 3	The moment of interruption or three hours after the commencement of proceedings on Clause 5, whichever is the later
Second day
Clauses 20 and 21, any new Clauses relating to matters connected with the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom as reserved or excepted matters under the Northern Ireland Act 1998, Clause 37, Schedule 8, Clause 109	Three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the Bill
Clauses 105 to 108, 94 and 95	The moment of interruption or three hours after the commencement of proceedings on Clause 105, whichever is the later

4. (1) Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Thursday 24th February 2005.

(2) The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

5. When the provisions of the Bill considered, respectively, by the Committee of the whole House and by the Standing Committee have been reported to the House, the Bill shall be proceeded with as if it had been reported as a whole to the House from the Standing Committee.

Consideration and Third Reading

6. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

7. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

8. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Violent Video Games

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise in the House the important issue of controlling the sale of violent video games. I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts is on the Front Bench.

Hon. Members may recall that I raised at Prime Minister's questions on 15 September 2004 the case of Stefan Pakeerah, a 14-year-old Leicester schoolboy who was brutally murdered. Stefan's parents believe that the perpetrator of that savage attack was influenced by the video game "Manhunt". Stefan's mother, Giselle Pakeerah, has been campaigning to ban the sale of the PlayStation2 game. Stefan's father, Patrick Pakeerah, said:

"The game was like an instruction manual".

Seventeen-year-old Warren Le Blanc pleaded guilty to Stefan's murder and will serve at least 13 years in prison before being considered for release.

Since the tragic attack, I have been sharing the concerns of the Pakeerah family and have received a growing number of letters from concerned parents on the issue. I am grateful for the support of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my right hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Ann Taylor) and other parliamentary colleagues.

The intense worry about video and computer games is based on the belief that the violent games are totally inappropriate for all children. Video games have come a long way since the creation of Pong in the early 1970s. Nowadays, there are thousands of games to choose from, and the technology becomes more and more sophisticated every day. In a little more than two years, video game consoles have gone from processing 350,000 polygons per second—a measure of graphic and action quality—to 125 million polygons per second. The increasingly realistic and exciting nature of electronic games has helped to make them immensely popular with children and youths. According to David Walsh, a researcher with the National Institute on Media and the Family, 79 per cent. of American children now play computer or video games on a regular basis. Children between the ages of seven and 17 play for an average of eight hours a week. I am the father of two children—Luke, aged nine, and Anjali, aged seven. They, too, play these games.

For the video games industry, 2004 was one of the most successful gaming years ever. Sales totalled £1.34 billion in the UK last year, a rise of 6.6 per cent. on 2003, according to the European Leisure Software Publishers Association. The game most anticipated for 2004 was "Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas", and it has sold an astonishing 1.75 million copies since its release at the end of October 2004. Without a doubt, we are in the midst of a gaming explosion. According to Deloitte and Touche, the worldwide number of game-compliant devices other than personal computers—mobile phones, consoles and hand-held computers, for example—will see a sixfold rise by 2010, from 415 million now to 2.6 billion.

Most of the games on the market are appropriate for young players, and the best of them can bring a lot of benefits. Besides being fun, some of the games provide practice in problem solving and logic, as well as in strategising. However, the few games that feature violence, gore and antisocial behaviour have raised concerns. The virtual reality aspect of games has entered a new phase of reviving history by replaying it. The recent launch of JFK Reloaded, which allows players to simulate the shooting of former American President John F. Kennedy, can be easily downloaded from the internet without any control measures, and be played by children younger than the recommended age limit. This disgusting game, with its appalling content, should not be allowed on the market.

The case of Stefan Pakeerah shocked the city of Leicester. Warren Le Blanc lured Stefan from Glenfield into the woodlands near his home at Stokes Wood Park, New Parks, Leicester, then chillingly inflicted more than 50 injuries with a claw hammer and a kitchen knife. He initially intended robbing Stefan of drugs and cash to raise money to pay off a debt. Mrs. Pakeerah, a senior nurse, remembers her only son as an intelligent, handsome, courteous and amazingly popular young man with an excellent sense of humour and a real zest for life. More than 350 people attended Stefan's funeral, and there are more than 1,200 entries on a memorial website set up in memory of Stefan by one of his friends. It is obvious that Stefan was loved by many people and held in very high regard. Passing sentence, Judge Michael Stokes QC said to Le Blanc:

"You've committed a truly appalling crime and have taken the life of a 14-year-old boy in the most brutal fashion. You and you alone carried out a prolonged murderous vicious attack with weapons upon someone who thought you were a friend."

Stefan's parents believe that their son's killer mimicked a game called Manhunt, in which players score points for brutal killings. The game has been banned in Australia and New Zealand. New Zealand's chief censor, Bill Hastings, has cited the game as the most violent ever made. I pay tribute to Mrs. Pakeerah, a brave and courageous mother, who in her grief could easily have let matters pass, but who has started an impressive campaign on this issue. She will not give up until something is done.

Violence is a recurring theme in the media, and the two combined have often been linked with aggressive behaviour in young people. The current trend in video games is for the players to be the bad guys, acting out criminal fantasies and earning points for attacking and killing innocent bystanders. Although the games are rated 18 for adult audiences, it is common knowledge that they are popular among young people. Nine out of 10 children have a computer or games console. A quarter play video games every day.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I well remember the ghastly case that the hon. Gentleman raises well, and it was a clear example of virtual reality spilling out into violent real life. Does he agree that there are two main problems? The first is the apparent reluctance of the British Board of Film Classification, which has been responsible for such games since 1984, to act to ban them or give them a serious classification unless there is clear evidence of a link, which it is difficult to prove scientifically. The second is that too many of the games that are rated as being for adults only are sold to under-age children through high street retailers who do not realise—as they do when it comes to selling cigarettes or alcohol to young people—the damage that such games can do. Parents do not know what they are letting their children get into.

Keith Vaz: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. He is right and I agree with everything that he said. I hope later in my speech to point out what can be done.

Most games are harmless entertainment, but in many amazingly lifelike popular titles, children are acting out violent experiences on their screens. According to the Video Standards Council, 97 per cent. of all games are suitable for everyone. The few that qualify for careful scrutiny contain the following material. Players in "Grand Theft Auto 3" earn points by carjacking and stealing drugs from street people and pushers. In "Carmageddon", players are rewarded for mowing down pedestrians—sounds of cracking bones add to the realistic effect. The first-person shooter in "Duke Nukem" hones his skills by using pornographic posters of women for target practice, and earns bonus points for shooting naked and bound prostitutes and strippers who beg, "Kill me." In the game "Postal", players act out the part of the postal dude, who earns points by randomly shooting everyone who appears, including people walking out of church and members of a high school band. Postal dude is programmed to say, "Only my gun understands me."

Unlike films and television, which are passively watched, the game lets the player feel the sensation of committing violent acts. Those playing the game are in the game, but there is no pain or aftermath, so children never learn the real-life consequences. The main concern is that children, unlike adults—and rightly so—have a problem in separating fantasy from reality. When young children play those violent video games, they are becoming more and more vulnerable to those violent messages.

Following a public outcry, I convened a meeting with a few parliamentarians and the members of the video games industry to highlight the ambiguities in the current system. Towards the end of last year, in a meeting with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at the House, Mrs. Pakeerah and I urged him to tackle the menace of violent video games by examining the existing law governing the classification of video games—in particular, their labelling—and requesting the governing board to take a more cautious approach. My right hon. Friend made it clear at the meeting that he was looking at ways to strengthen legislation in the area to protect children. He listened with great care and attention to Mrs. Pakeerah and I am most grateful to him for his real concern about the issue.

I wish to make it clear that the campaign is not about stopping adults doing anything: it is about protecting our children. Following the firm commitment by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to protect children and to review the law governing video games, I value the opportunity to debate the issue in this House.

Over the years, there have been more than 3,000 research studies into the effects of screen violence, encompassing film, television, video and, more recently, computer and video games. However, little research has been carried out on interactive entertainment as it was originally perceived as a harmless and enjoyable pastime. Nevertheless, with the ever-increasing interest and participation of young children in that activity, much concern has been expressed about the effects of such games on them. At the centre of the debate is the question of whether they are detrimental to a young person's healthy development. There are specific concerns about the implications for aggression, addiction, criminal activity and reduced academic achievement.

I understand that the Department for Culture, Media and Sport is commissioning a review of existing research to determine whether there is a link between playing violent video games and real-world behaviour. The last such Government study was carried out by the Home Office in 2001, and the results were inconclusive. Research into the effects of long-term exposure to computer games on subsequent behaviour is noticeably lacking and at present remains speculative. Studies to examine the effects of computer games on children's aggressive behaviour and self-esteem only involve measurement of the possible short-term aggressive consequences, so I urge my right hon. Friend the Minister to fill that question vacuum and commission new research into the long-term effects of playing such interactive games.

Last week, accompanied by Mrs. Pakeerah, I visited the third largest interactive publisher in the UK, Activision based in Slough, to see how publishers classify video games. Activision is a leading international publisher of video games, with 6 per cent. of the market share; its European headquarters is in the United Kingdom. Its profits for last year are estimated at just over £100 million. Some of its games include "Doom 3", "X-Men" and "Spider-Man". From my visit, I learned that violence in over-18 video games is a staple of the video game industry. It takes between 20 and 60 people to develop an idea for a game and between 12 and 18 months to create it. The entire investment period can take up to three years. During that time, the board responsible for classifying the video game is called in to give expertise about the rating to be given to the game and about its target audience.

At the early stages in the creation of the video, the publisher foresees, using guidelines set out by the video games classification board, which rating the game should receive. Once the creation of the game is complete, using the pan-European game information system, the ratings are carried out by members of the games industry using a self-assessment form. After examining a game, the in-house coder uses an existing set of answers and the game is rated automatically on that basis. An age is established for each content category, based on the answers on the assessment form.

The method may sound fair but in action, as I witnessed when I visited Activision, the game does not end up with the British Board of Film Classification until after it has been produced. Thus, using the Video Standards Council and PEGI guidelines, the publisher will resort to reviewing the game again if it has been rejected. I urge the British Board of Film Classification to take a much more cautious approach in reviewing those games, and also to provide publishers with much more stringent and unambiguous guidelines and detailed feedback about why a video game has failed to qualify for a particular rating. With advances in the technology to create those games, it is only sensible that the guidelines for publishers be updated.

Ten years ago, the average game cost £200,000 to develop, whereas now the average budget is more than £1 million. The level of violence in the gaming habits of young people is disturbingly high, and 65 per cent. of the market is made up of boys aged between 13 and 16 years. On 1 November, the ITV programme "Tonight with Trevor McDonald" revealed from a nationwide survey of 223 children aged between 11 and 14 that computer games featuring drugs, sex and violence are being bought by boys as young as 12 in supermarkets and high street shops. More than two thirds of young people aged between 11 and 14 admitted that they had played games certified 18 plus. Boys aged 12 to 14 were seen in the programme buying adult games from Tesco, Virgin, Dixons, John Lewis, Sainsbury and Asda. The programme highlighted the problem that it is so easy for children to get hold of those games. Something needs to change.

Any shopkeeper who supplies a game in breach of the law can be sent to jail for six months, fined £5,000, or both. The law needs to be better enforced. To date, the retailers caught on the Trevor McDonald programme have not been prosecuted. According to the Video Standards Council, which also represents a large number of the UK retailers shown in the film, because the action was recorded for television, people should not be liable to prosecution. I therefore urge Minister to ask the Attorney-General to review that absurdity and prosecute those retailers for their actions, so that, in future, retailers can fully appreciate the consequence of selling adult-rating video games to children. We need to make an example of one to make the rest take this seriously.

Parents are becoming very concerned about the messages that their children are receiving while playing such games. Parents need to be made more aware that video games are much more difficult and more ingenious than ping-pong and that they contain such violent activity. An interesting approach was launched in Canada last year, ahead of the Christmas shopping period, entitled "Commitment to Parents". A voluntary code was provided whereby parents entered into a dialogue with the retailers, thus enabling progress to be made to the benefit of parents and young children.

Video and computer games will continue to be an exciting and growing part of children's media diets. As long as children have easy access to those games, policy debates will continue. There is much that is pernicious, banal and crude in popular culture. We must question what kind of society allows, if not encourages, youngsters to immerse themselves in such brutal fantasy games. Makers of the more violent games are pushing the outer limits of savagery and depravity, and current provisions have been widely criticised as ineffectual and confusing, so they need to be changed.

I urge the Minister to do a number of things, and I seek her commitment on them. More research is needed into the long-term effects of playing such interactive games and their effect on children. Better regulation is needed, with much more clear and stringent guidelines, including transparent responsibility between the BBFC, the Entertainment and Leisure Software Publishers Association and PEGI. The current voluntary arrangements are too cosy. A more instructive and uniform labelling system is needed for parents to comprehend. Parents need to be educated, so that they become more aware of the content of games. The law must be better enforced. Retailers must be made aware of their responsibilities and prosecuted when they break the law.

The tragic death of Stefan Pakeerah will be with his parents, family and friends for ever. I hope that this debate can shed light into the current ambiguities and prevent further callous attacks from happening again.

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) not only on securing this Adjournment debate but on the campaign that he has waged relentlessly on behalf of his constituents and, in doing so, on behalf of many parents and many citizens of this country. I acknowledge that the debate follows a meeting with the Prime Minister, questions asked in the House and, as he informed us today, a visit to the industry itself. I thank him for raising these difficult issues, which we ought to address.

I also acknowledge the intervention made by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton). The fact that he stayed for a short Adjournment debate shows his commitment, and I thank him for his interest. If he wishes, we will keep him informed of what we are able to do.

I wish to put the issue into a wider context. We are all struck by the fact that this fast-growing, fast-moving industry uses technology that was not around when we were children and parents must become involved in something that is more unfamiliar to them than it is to their children. There is a danger that regulation enforcement follows the trend. As regulation catches up with a new invention, another new invention comes along. I make no criticism of anyone, but bureaucracy and government, both locally and nationally, can be slow and cumbersome in trying to ensure that it catches up.

It is important to recognise that the games industry is a huge British success story. It earns money for us, and it earns us standing in the European and worldwide community. It is a good thing, and we are good at it. Most of the games, not those that have been mentioned this evening, add to the education, entertainment and cultural well-being of our nation—I would not want to suggest anything else—but, clearly, there is an issue with those that are violent or teach people how to commit crimes, and I would not want to pretend for a minute that such games do not exist.

There might be an element of repetition, but I want to go over where we are, what has happened since my hon. Friend met the Prime Minister and where we might go in the future.

The current position on classifying video games is important and it comes in two parts. First, under section 2 of the Video Recordings Act 1984, computer games are exempt from statutory classification unless they depict gross violence, human sexual activity or techniques likely to be useful in the commission of offences. As my hon. Friend said, about 30 games—about 2 per cent.—are referred each year to the British Board of Film Classification and they can be given an age rating that can be over 18. I do not have a feel for whether that figure is an indication that an insufficient number of games are being referred and that the relationship is too cosy. I do not have the evidence to go on, but I take the point that it could become too cosy. I want to give more thought to whether the statistic of 30, or 2 per cent. a year, is what one might expect to be referred to the BBFC given the nature of the industry.

As my hon. Friend said, the United Kingdom has been involved in a pan-European system since 2003. It is a voluntary age-related classification system—the PEGI—that the Video Standards Council administers. As we know, these games cross national boundaries and we could find ourselves in the position in which an excellent UK classification and enforcement system went out of the window because games were being downloaded in the UK. As much cross-nation work as we can possibly do is important. That is why I welcome the Video Standards Council's administration of the PEGI system in the UK. As my hon. Friend, said it is an offence to sell video games to someone not of the age to buy them.

Since my hon. Friend met the Prime Minister and representatives of our Department in early December, we have done what we can to improve the system. First, we held a meeting with all the representatives of the trade association, and that was a direct consequence of the meeting that my hon. Friend had. It involved the trade associations for the computer games and video games industries, the BBFC, video games retailers, the Video Standards Council and local government enforcement agencies.

A number of things have emerged from that voluntary meeting. First, those at the meeting agreed that they would consider a new code of practice for retailers selling the games. That will be drawn up together with training and regulation of sales. That sounds good, and it is a voluntary code. That is where we are at the moment, and we need to see how it goes. It is important because the people selling the games will be personally liable for the consequences of any offence if they should be found guilty.

I take the point made by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham about parents understanding their responsibilities. Many parents who would not dream of letting their child see an X-rated film are less understanding of the need to monitor their child's behaviour and activity with video games. They did not play such games when they were children and they have to rush to catch up with what is happening. My hon. Friend will know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who shares Government responsibility with my Department for this issue, reminded parents of that before Christmas. Much more needs to be done, and the Government and the industry have to take responsibility to make sure that we inform more parents about what is happening.

Tim Loughton: Places such as Dixons—to cite just one—are seen as fairly child friendly. Will the Minister support the sort of sting operations that the police and trading standards use for the under-age selling of drink and tobacco? Should they not also be applied to the under-age selling of video games to make sure that the issue is taken seriously?

Estelle Morris: I would support that. It is an enforcement issue and I shall come to that shortly. However, I accept that there is an issue about priorities and resources, but I will come back to that point.

Some 85 per cent. of the games that the BBFC classifies carry an age warning. It and the Entertainment and Leisure Software Publishers Association are now working to make sure that all games carry an age warning and hope to have that in place by the middle of this year. We are also discussing with the industry the possibility of voluntarily increasing the size of the symbol that indicates the age under which children should not purchase the games so that it is more obvious to parents as well as to young people. If the voluntary agreement is not forthcoming, it will be open to us to examine the regulations because the size of the symbol is set out in regulations. We would not need primary legislation because the regulations could be changed if necessary.

The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham made an important point about enforcement. We have met the Local Government Association and the Trading Standards Institute to ensure that they consider enforcement. It is the easiest thing in the world to have legislation, but unless trading standards people treat the matter as a priority, nothing will change. Trading standards enforcement agencies have probably not caught up with the extent of the new crime of online piracy, so that will need to form part of our ongoing negotiations.

Research is important, but it is not easy to separate the effect of a game on children from the influence of many other aspects of society, such as what they read, what they watch at the cinema and what they see on the street. My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East will know that, following his meeting with the Prime Minister, we have commissioned independent research from the university of Stirling. We think that that will be with us by February and we will let him know when we receive it. All the research that has been done so far has been inconclusive, but we will work to find out what we can do.

My hon. Friend did not mention the online downloading of games, which is a matter for my colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry. I assure him that the Government will address that issue.

I conclude by saying that an industry that is as successful and growing as this country's video games industry—we have every right to be justifiably proud of it—has just as much of an obligation as the House and the Government to do what it can to ensure that our children are protected without fettering the freedom of adults. I thank my hon. Friend for bringing the matter to the attention of the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes to Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Tuesday 18 January 2005

The House met at half-past Eleven o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

CONTINGENCIES FUND 2003–2004

Ordered,

That there be laid before this House Accounts of the Contingencies Fund, 2003–2004, showing—

(1) the receipts and payments in connection with the Fund in the year ended 31st March 2004,

(2) the Distribution of the capital of the Fund at the commencement and close of the year; together with the Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General thereon.—[Joan Ryan.]

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Dentistry

1. Mr. Anthony D. Wright (Great Yarmouth) (Lab): What steps are being taken to increase the number of dentists in areas of deprivation. [208901]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): We are radically reforming national health service dentistry, with £368 million of extra investment from April. We have also allocated another £59 million to help primary care trusts with the most severe access problems and we are recruiting the equivalent of 1,000 additional dentists by October 2005.

Mr. Wright: I thank my hon. Friend for that response. The closure of one of the dental schools under the previous Administration created this long-term problem. However, we have a positive message to send from my Great Yarmouth constituency, where one of the dentists, John G. Plummer, has recruited 14 new dentists, but is still awaiting approval from the Department of Health for the issue of a new contract under the personal dental services system. Can my hon. Friend tell us when we may expect a favourable reply on that submission?

Ms Winterton: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend: it was in fact the closure of two dental schools that led to some of the shortages in dentistry, and that is why we announced earlier this year that we would be training another 170 dentists a year from April next year.

On my hon. Friend's point about his constituency, I understand from discussions with him that the application has been approved in principle and that some final details are awaited. I hope those will follow before the end of the week. I am pleased that dentists in his constituency are showing enthusiasm for the new system, which is of course backed up by about £74,000 allocated from central Government to assist in dealing with access problems, which means that about another 22,000 patient registrations will become available in his constituency.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): It is fairly well known that I have an interest in this matter. I assume that the Minister agrees with many of us on both sides of the House that the best improvement for dental health in deprived areas would be fluoridation. Given that assumption, can she tell me, at the second time of asking, when the long-awaited appropriate regulations will land on the desk of the House?

Ms Winterton: I certainly agree with the hon. Gentleman about the benefits of fluoridation. The regulations are in draft and they will be published soon.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): The real way forward for improving the amount of dentistry in areas of deprivation is to have more training places for dentists. Will my hon. Friend note that consultation on a new dental school in Coventry and Stoke-on-Trent has just finished? Will she give me an assurance that she will look carefully at representations from north Staffordshire and give some indication that there will be ministerial approval for a school of dentistry, as a satellite in Stoke-on-Trent?

Ms Winterton: I agree that where undergraduates train is important, as they often congregate in their own area. Through a working group with the Department for Education and Skills, chaired by the chief dental officer, we have been looking at how we can expand the number of places. Building completely new dental schools is not necessarily the answer because of timing, but we are considering satellite schools from existing dentistry schools so that where there are access problems we can work with the existing schools to ensure that there is proper training and people can stay in the area once they have graduated.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Is the hon. Lady aware that although the Louth and Horncastle constituency is not an area of deprivation, it is seriously deprived of dentists? There is not a single NHS dentist in my constituency who is prepared to accept a new patient on his list, and as many elderly people constantly move into my constituency to retire that is creating a real crisis.

Ms Winterton: I am aware of the problems that the hon. Gentleman has outlined. Indeed, I visited the area a few months ago. We are asking each PCT, through the strategic health authority, to produce plans to increase the provision of NHS dentistry. As I said, we have backed that up with £59 million of investment to tackle severe access problems. I know that plans are being drawn up in his area and that international recruitment is also being considered to ease some of the problems. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman contact his PCT to ask for the plans and to ask about the additional resources that it will have been allocated to deal with the current access problems.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): Further to that reply, is my hon. Friend aware of the exciting and innovative plans that Blackpool PCT has recently announced to recruit more dentists? What advice and support can she give the PCT to ensure that those plans come to fruition?

Ms Winterton: I am certainly aware of the plans proposed by Blackpool PCT. We have already allocated £192,000 to the PCT in my hon. Friend's constituency to ease the problems there. The PCT is considering not only bursary schemes for new students, but making funding available to dentists to expand their premises, for example, or to buy new equipment. It has set up a very good helpline locally to ensure that people have proper information about what is available. Already, that has meant that 4,000 new registrations are available to local people. We will continue to do all that we can to assist her local PCT, and if we can give assistance in terms of international recruitment, we will certainly do so.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): When the Minister was replying to the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright), she neglected to tell him about the situation in Great Yarmouth—there are fewer dentists today than in 1997, 10 per cent. less of the adult population is registered with an NHS dentist, and if people who live in Great Yarmouth wish to register with an NHS dentist they must go to Lowestoft to do so. Will the hon. Lady simply tell the House whether, when the Prime Minister said in 1999 that within two years everyone would be able to see an NHS dentist, he meant that, five and a half years on, 39 per cent. of the British public would be registered with an NHS dentist? Dentistry is simply disappearing throughout the country, as we are hearing from hon. Members.

Ms Winterton: It is bit rich of the hon. Gentleman to wash his hands of responsibility. The Conservative party closed two dental schools and introduced the deeply unpopular contract in the 1990s that led to dentists walking away from the NHS. We are trying to reform the system of dentistry and we are backing that up with extra investment. I am very well aware of the problems that my hon. Friend's constituency has faced. That is exactly why we have taken the measures that we proposed and exactly why those involved are now looking to recruit 14 new dentists for his constituency.

We will take no lecture from the Opposition about NHS dentistry. We are trying to clear up the mess that they left behind, and we are making good progress in doing so. There is further to go, but we have made clear commitments through extra investment, local access plans and ensuring that there will be local commissioning of NHS dentistry in future.

Mr. Lansley: The hon. Lady and her friends will have to take a lecture from the British electorate before too long. On 7 December, on the last occasion that we were present for Health questions, she said that the general dental services contract was on course. Within a month, the Government had to abandon that, so it has been delayed further. She said that dentists were voting with their feet, but I do not think that she meant that, three hours after Ministers came to the House, the British Dental Association would walk out of negotiations on the contract with the Government.

It is fine for the Minister to talk about the contract in the last century, but what about the contract for the 21st century? When the BDA walked away, it said:

"This was a decision we never wished to make and it is a highly regrettable position to find ourselves in. We have been proactive in our discussions with the Department of Health but the traffic has almost been entirely one way. To continue would be to devalue NHS dentistry and to let down the dentists we represent."

Under this Government, NHS dentistry is devalued and dentists are let down—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are still on Question 1. I appeal for brief questions and brief answers.

Ms Winterton: We do not deny that problems remain with NHS dentistry, but we are taking radical steps to reform it and to introduce local commissioning. We have responded to the points made by the National Audit Office report and said that we will delay the implementation of the new contract until April 2006. That does not mean that dentists are not already moving over because some 3,500 have taken up the new contract. We have 500 applications in the pipeline and want to ensure that they are processed before we move to general commissioning. After our announcement last week, John Renshaw, the chair of the BDA, said:

"This is a sensible move by the Department of Health, which could provide breathing space to allow us to sit down again and resolve outstanding issues."

I do not think that that sounds like a vote of no confidence.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): My hon. Friend knows that Burnley is an area of deprivation. It also has a big shortage of NHS dentists and a record of poor dental health. She has visited east Lancashire and knows that its primary care trusts are working with the Government to try to address those problems. However, I am sure that she will be dismayed to hear that last week the Taylor dental practice on Colne road in Burnley decided to leave the NHS. Will she check with the PCT about why things are working in the opposite direction to what it and she are trying to achieve?

Ms Winterton: I will certainly check on that. When I visited my hon. Friend's area, it was obvious that the PCT had good plans that were backed up with extra resources. I think that some 40,000 extra registrations are planned throughout east Lancashire. I know that the plans are there, but I shall certainly examine his point about a specific dentist moving out of the NHS and find out whether we can do anything to rectify that situation.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): The number of children registered with NHS dentists has fallen every year since the last general election. Today, little more than a half of children are registered with an NHS dentist—the number is lower still in some of the poorest areas. Does the Minister agree that given that the BDA walked out of the contract negotiations and that primary care trusts are not up to the job of delivering dental services, the Government's approach is not radical, as the Minister would like the House to believe, but ramshackle and it is not delivering good dental services? The approach is complacent, which is consequently doing harm to the nation's teeth.

Ms Winterton: The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong to say that local PCTs are not getting on with the job of moving people on to the new contract because they are already doing that. It does him no credit to decry local efforts that are backed up by extra funding. People are working extremely hard to draw up local plans, which are backed by funding. There are more dentists than ever before—and although there is a problem with some moving away from the NHS, we are undertaking reform so that funds and powers exist locally to ensure that there is proper NHS dentistry provision.

Chiropody Services

2. Dame Marion Roe (Broxbourne) (Con): What assessment he has made of the availability of chiropody services for senior citizens. [208902]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): There are 3,807 chiropodists employed in the NHS, which is a 15.9 per cent. increase since 1997. It is for local primary care trusts to determine local priorities for access to chiropody.

Dame Marion Roe: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply, but will he give the House his estimate of the number of patients with foot problems who have been deemed to be low risk and thus discharged from NHS care and forced to look in the voluntary and private sectors to find the specialist chiropody services that they need? What plans does he have to draw up guidelines on the management and treatment of foot problems to lay down a patient's minimum entitlement to NHS care and remove the current postcode lottery of entitlement to foot care?

Dr. Ladyman: Once upon a time there was such guidance on who should have access to chiropody services, but it was scrapped in 1994 under the previous Government. We have simply moved to a situation in which local primary care trusts are responsible for ensuring that everyone in their areas has access to the foot care that they need. Most PCTs are concentrating specialist problems on specialist chiropodists and thus leaving other organisations, such as those in the voluntary sector, to deal with less specialist needs, but each PCT has the responsibility to ensure that everyone in its area has access to the appropriate foot care.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): A number of senior citizens go to private chiropodists for their care. Has my hon. Friend assessed how many of those chiropodists will fail to register with the new Health Professions Council? One chiropodist in my constituency said that the process is very bureaucratic and expensive. My constituent would like to see automatic registration for anyone who has three years' experience. He thinks that the number of practising chiropodists will fall because they will no longer be able to practise under that title. That might cause a crisis and, obviously, difficulties for those who are receiving treatment under the NHS as well.

Dr. Ladyman: I understand the issue that my hon. Friend raises. These are matters, first, for the Health Professions Council. More importantly, they are negotiated closely with the professional bodies representing chiropodists and podiatrists. We try to meet their registration needs. Although individual chiropodists may have views about the democratic nature of the requirements for registration, I can assure my hon. Friend that the professional bodies that represent podiatrists are having their views closely adhered to by those who have to implement these arrangements.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): Can the Minister explain why over the years since Labour came to power fewer people have had access to NHS chiropody services?

Dr. Ladyman: I can certainly do that. The figures are roughly similar to the number of new starts in each year since we came to power. The total number of procedures carried out each year is roughly the same. There is a slight decrease, and that entirely reflects the fact that more specialist podiatrists are concentrating on specialist processes that take longer than the old, simple foot care procedures that are now being undertaken by people who are not specialists. That is good value for money. The assertions of Opposition Members that there is a massive removal of people from NHS podiatry services is simply not true. Like the Opposition's announcements yesterday from the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer, their figures just do not add up.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Can my hon. Friend assure me that we have enough training places for chiropodists and podiatrists?

Dr. Ladyman: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. Since 1997, there has been a 33 per cent. increase in the number of people training for this speciality.

Hospitals (Gloucestershire)

3. Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): If he will make a statement on progress with hospital new build projects in Gloucestershire. [208903]

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): The new Gloucestershire Royal hospital became operational two months ago. A final phase of works of this £32 million investment is due for completion this year.

Mr. Dhanda: I thank my right hon. Friend for his response. He is aware that the new hospital is a £32 million redevelopment project and consists of 17,000 sq m, something that we are understandably proud of in Gloucester. It has enabled me to become the first local Member in Gloucester in a generation to preside over hospital ward openings rather than closures. Would my hon. Friend take up an invitation from me to see the hospital for himself? I think that it would be the right thing to do. It would pay testament to a Labour Government and their priorities if a Labour Secretary of State opened the new hospital. Will he consider coming to Gloucester to do that?

Dr. Reid: I would be delighted to visit once again my hon. Friend's constituency, as I did in June last year. Before I get any other requests, it will not be possible for me to open all the hospitals commissioned by the Government. There are not enough weeks in the year as we have now commissioned 132 new hospital projects—the biggest building programme ever in the history of the NHS. That is one of the reasons why we are slashing waiting lists and waiting times and providing better quality care than ever before. We have a long way to go, but my hon. Friend's constituency exhibits, I think, the transformation that is now taking place in the NHS.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): If the Secretary of State visits Gloucester Royal hospital, will he also visit Cheltenham hospital, which is facing the closure of the children's ward in terms of 24-hour clinical care? I do not rise to make a political point, but I think that it is worth mentioning that closure in view of the previous question. The primary care trust is pushing the transfer of the ward to Gloucester on a clinical basis, and recently there have been clinical questions raised about that transfer. I do not expect an immediate answer from the Secretary of State, but will he look into that matter? Will he satisfy himself that it would be in the wider interests of all the children in Gloucestershire for that move to take place, and will he endeavour to write to me about it?

Dr. Reid: May I make two general remarks to the hon. Gentleman? First, it would have been a little fairer if he had announced that, quite apart from any changes in his constituency, there is an unprecedented increase in the finance going into the national health service there. Secondly, on the decision and the proposed changes, the constant refrain, quite correctly, from the Opposition and their Front-Bench team is that we should stop micro-managing the NHS and let local people make local decisions—except when Conservative MPs do not agree with those decisions, when they ask us to intervene in every case.

I will take a look at this case, but my general predisposition is that, as far as possible, front-line staff should be allowed to get on with making those decisions in consultation with local people, which is why we now allocate 80 per cent. of the money going into the NHS to front-line staff. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues, who are always asking for that, would support it when it is put into practice.

Alcohol Misuse

4. Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): If he will make a statement on the Government's policies to tackle alcohol misuse. [208904]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): On 15 March 2004, the Government published the alcohol harm reduction strategy for England. The Department of Health and the Home Office are the joint owners of that strategy. The White Paper, "Choosing Health", which was published on 16 November 2004, highlighted additional commitments that build on the strategy.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): We are all aware that the Government have sexed down the alcohol reduction strategy, but could she explain a serious omission, as there is no mention of older people, among whom there is a growing problem of alcohol misuse? Is that yet another example of NHS ageism, or is it because older people do not present such a high profile problem on a Saturday evening at club and pub chucking-out time?

Miss Johnson: What we are doing, both through the alcohol harm reduction strategy and the White Paper, is to concentrate on finding out how much more treatment needs to be provided, and an audit is under way. We are also making interventions in primary and hospital settings to work out how we can better target people of all ages with alcohol problems who are using those services. Much of the improvement across the board in health services has helped elderly people as much as, if not more than, the rest of the population.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that a recent report showed that one in four emergency hospital admissions for men is alcohol related? Alcohol plays a part in about half the number of serious road crashes and half of domestic violence incidents. In view of all that, does she agree that the Department of Health should be concerned about plans significantly to extend pub opening hours, which could lead to some pubs being open both day and night for 20 or 24 hours?

Miss Johnson: I am sure that my hon. Friend has seen an article in one of today's newspaper suggesting that we suppressed a report about the number of accident and emergency attendances that are alcohol related. In fact, it is completely untrue. [Interruption.] I am coming on to the related point that my hon. Friend made. Page 36 of the alcohol harm reduction strategy identifies the problem with reference to research commissioned by the strategy unit, and page 149 of the White Paper puts the same information into the public domain. I can reassure my hon. Friend that we are well aware of the problems in A and E departments resulting from alcohol, which is why we are looking at targeted interventions. We are working with the chief medical officer and the chief nursing officer on the curriculum, guidance and training for health service professionals so that we can deal better with people who come to the NHS the worse for alcohol.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): May I press the Minister to pick up on the question from the hon. Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick), which she singularly failed to answer? Given the problems facing the health service because of alcohol-fuelled abuses and, in addition, attacks on NHS staff, particularly in accident and emergency departments, will the Minister share with the House the information or advice that the Department of Health gave the Home Office when it was considering relaxing the laws on licensing to allow 24-hour drinking? Does the Minister agree with her right hon. Friend the former Home Secretary who, it now transpires, did not agree with that legislation, even though his Department was responsible for it?

Miss Johnson: I agree with the Government. We are all aware that there are problems arising from binge drinking. That is why we are the first Government to set out a harm reduction strategy, and the first Government to produce a comprehensive White Paper—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. Members should be quiet.

Miss Johnson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

We are the first Government to produce a White Paper that examines the problems arising from alcohol. My right hon. and hon. Friends in the Home Office have been tackling the disorder consequences of binge drinking with measures such as fixed-penalty fines, additional fixed-penalty fines, enforcement campaigns and new laws to close down premises if under-age sales occur. That is on top of the measures that we are taking in the health service. We all accept that more work is needed to clamp down on binge drinking. The problem is already with us and it has a long history. We have instituted the measures that will tackle the problem.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for meeting me and one of the leading consultants from the Great Western hospital who deals with the results of alcohol misuse and sees patients dying on our wards each day because of alcohol misuse.

Does my hon. Friend support the measures that doctors are pushing for—alcohol warnings on bottles so that people know how much alcohol they are consuming; alcohol specialist nurses in our acute hospitals so that they can tackle people at the point at which they are potentially willing to change their mind, following an acute admission; and more education in schools about the damage that alcohol can cause to a person, their whole family and their friends?

Miss Johnson: We support a range of measures that my hon. Friend is probably aware of, including a new sensible drinking message based on research into how we change behaviour, targeting the interventions that I mentioned a moment ago in primary and hospital settings, and better advice and training for professionals. We also recognise that we need to do more about education on alcohol. All these topics form the basis of the alcohol harm reduction strategy that I mentioned.

Foundation Hospitals

5. Mr. Piara S. Khabra (Ealing, Southall) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the number of hospitals that have obtained foundation status; and how many applications are pending. [208905]

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): I have today announced that 32 more trusts, which for the first time include mental health trusts, have been successful in their preliminary application for NHS foundation trust status. Decisions on the next phase of the applications are scheduled for the autumn of this year, after I have had the opportunity fully to consider the outcome of the review of the policy by the Healthcare Commission. Twenty-five acute and specialist NHS trusts have so far been awarded NHS foundation trust status. A further group of 10 trusts are seeking authorisation this April.

Mr. Khabra: Has there been any measurable improvement in the waiting lists for hospitals already granted foundation status, and is there any hope of improvement in the future?

Dr. Reid: Indeed, in many cases foundation status has meant a dramatic reduction in waiting lists and waiting times. Of course, it is true that right across the national health service there has been a significant reduction in any case, as a result of, first, decentralising decision-making to the front line and, secondly, introducing the prospect of more patient power and choice of provider, allied with the investment that the Government have put in. So the capacity and the reform, including NHS foundation trusts, have resulted in more, quicker and better quality health care for most people. I recognise that there is still a long way to go, but I promise that this Government, God and the electorate willing, will continue to improve—[Laughter.] It appears that Conservative Front Benchers believe in neither of those two personages, but I assure them that both will sit in judgment on the Conservative party in due course.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): May I seek a point of clarification? Are the Government willing in principle, subject, obviously, to all the quality issues that arise, to consider an application for a foundation trust that wraps together secondary and acute care, with some primary care services, too?

Dr. Reid: At this stage, we have extended just from acute secondary care to mental health trusts. The hon. Gentleman might know that we have commissioned a review of the early experience of foundation trust status, which will be carried out by the Healthcare Commission and will, no doubt, examine extending such opportunities further. In general, however, the principles of a diversity of providers, decentralising power to the front line as far as possible and, crucially, giving patients more information and power in relation to which provider they choose, whether in the secondary or primary sector, are an integral part of our reform programme.

Most Members on both sides of the House share the principles that I have outlined, but there is one other principle that, I am afraid, divides us—that people in this country, in line with the founding principle of the national health service, which they still support, should continue to have equal access to health care, free at the point of need. We are absolutely committed to that, and we absolutely refute charging for any operations through the national health service, which is the proposal—[Interruption.] As Conservative Members are trying to intervene, let me read from their document on the right to choose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield) (Lab): One of the positive aspects of foundation status was the devolving of local decision making to local people, enabling local people democratically to elect those who run foundation trusts. What steps have the Government taken to analyse what happened in Bradford, where the locally elected chairman, a popular local figure, has been removed by the regulator, and people have come in from New York—some distance from Bradford—to run the foundation trust?

Dr. Reid: The matter is being investigated by Monitor, the organisation that was established precisely to ensure that foundation trusts—we hope that all hospitals will obtain foundation status in future—comply with rigorous financial inspections. I would therefore prefer to leave it to that organisation, and to say only that this is not an aberration—Monitor was set up to discover exactly where hospitals are running huge financial risk. In previous decades, before we set up the organisation, that could have gone on for some considerable time. The expectation then was that the rest of the system would bail out those who found themselves in that position. I am afraid that we can no longer tolerate that. Along with the rights to make decisions at the front line, people must accept the responsibility to run a rigorous, financially viable organisation. We expect that of all, not just Bradford.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Does the Secretary of State intend to add to the number that he has quoted by the designation of foundation status to the new hospital that he plans to build in the Paddington basin, combining the Royal Brompton, the Harefield and St. Mary's hospital, at a cost of more than £1 billion, without planning permission, and for which the outline business case required by the National Audit Office seems to indicate that it will not be in service until 2013?

Dr. Reid: To suggest that the NHS would plough ahead with any project, whether it costs £1 or £1 billion, without planning permission is to stretch the credulity of the House. As far as foundation status is concerned, I can confirm two things: first, we intend all NHS trusts to get foundation status; secondly, the services that NHS trusts provide will be free at the point of need. We do not intend to allow 50 per cent. of the NHS tariff to be used where hospitals charge patients—those are the words of the Conservative party, which I was trying to quote earlier.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): I welcome the announcement that another hospital in Birmingham has been granted foundation status. The hospital in my constituency was granted foundation status last year, and patient services have improved. Will the Secretary of State ensure that the hospitals in the new round use the financial freedoms that they have been granted to benefit patients in their localities and to build on services? They have been given the power and should use those freedoms.

Dr. Reid: I hope that that will increasingly be the case. Seven of the 20 NHS foundation trusts are already using their borrowing freedoms to fast-track capital projects, and seven of the 20 are already using non-capital freedoms to extend patient choice projects. The proof of the pudding is in the eating: we now have 450,000 more operations every year; we have halved the maximum waiting time for operations and will halve it again over the next three years; and we have taken 314,000 people off the waiting list that we inherited from the Conservative party. Let us not pretend that everything is perfect, but let us not pretend that substantial and significant progress has not been made in the NHS.

Patient Choice

6. Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): If he will make a statement on recent guidelines issued to primary care trusts on patient choice. [208906]

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): Recent guidelines have set out a framework that gives patients greater choice of where to have their treatment. Patients will be able to choose to go to hospitals offering faster access to treatment, offering a fairer system to everyone.

Mr. O'Brien: I have been asked to bring this case to the House on behalf of Mrs. Mayfield, who has been denied choice. She had the choice between a hospital in Wakefield or a hospital in Leeds, and the PCT directed that she should be treated in Leeds, which meant a 36-mile round trip in the ambulance provided by the PCT. Mrs. Mayfield has recently undergone tests at Clayton hospital in Wakefield and is now waiting for further treatment. If that treatment can be provided at Pinderfields hospital, will my right hon. Friend assure me that Mrs. Mayfield will be able to choose the hospital in Wakefield rather than the hospital in Leeds?

Dr. Reid: I thank my hon. Friend for giving me notice of his question through one of my hon. Friends. For obvious reasons, I am reluctant to discuss individual cases by name on the Floor of the House, but I shall make a general point and go as far as I can on the individual case. Although we want to give greater power and choice to the patient, it must be in the context of national standards and best medical practice. For example, a local constituent who is receiving treatment for rheumatoid arthritis must be offered treatment within the guidelines outlined by the best clinical advice. West Yorkshire PCTs have decided to commission that particular service from Leeds Teaching Hospitals NHS trust because they want to meet the guidelines issued by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence, which has a worldwide reputation for guidance on best treatment. The NICE guidelines state that the prescription of the agents that some patients with rheumatoid arthritis have to receive

"should be undertaken by a consultant rheumatologist specialising in their use".

In my hon. Friend's local area, the consultant who specialises in their use is currently situated at Leeds hospital. This is being done with the best of intentions, best practice and best medical guidelines. My comments will be noticed, and I am sure that the local authorities will consider whether there is any way of making the service even more convenient.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): May I congratulate the Secretary of State on his U-turn on patient choice in the health service? Does he regret that the initial policy of the Labour party was to remove patient choice, to stop money following patient choice and to abolish what it derided as the internal market? Is it not a shame that for seven years we have had no patient choice—and consequently nothing driving up efficiency and improvements—and hence there has been so much money spent and so much waste? I welcome the Secretary of State's belated, inadequate and over-bureaucratic conversion to patient choice.

Dr. Reid: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his congratulations and wish him a happy new year, along with everybody else on the Opposition Benches.

It is certainly true that when one introduces real choice, as opposed to the theoretical choice that we all possess to buy a Rolls-Royce or dine at the Ritz, it has to be made real by increasing capacity and investment. The right hon. Gentleman is right that for the first two years of our Government, from 1997 to around 1999, we did not increase that investment and stuck to the Tory spending plans, for the very good strategic reasons that we wanted to create a stable economy, reduce unemployment and so on. In that context, we did not introduce a great deal of reform. Obviously, I would have liked to do it earlier.

Nevertheless, I welcome the fact that the right hon. Gentleman welcomes the fact that we are now doing this and doing it robustly. I only hope that he also welcomes the fact that we are doing it within a context in which we are retaining the founding principle of the national health service—that all care will be free at the point of need. Would he and his colleagues concur with me on that important principle?

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): I recall that at the time when I became a Member of Parliament, my local paper carried a front-page headline saying that a man had remortgaged his house in order to be able to afford a heart bypass operation. Today, we are discussing patient choice: what progress we have made. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that when people make such choices they do it in consultation with their GPs and medical practitioners, who can give them guidance on the most appropriate course rather than allowing them to make a misinformed choice?

Dr. Reid: Choice is never an absolute—it is always subject to best medical standards and is only made real if the capacity is put into the system to allow people to compensate for any lack of money in their own pockets. I never again want us to go back to the days when people were forced to spend between £10,000 and £20,000 to get heart bypass operations in a speedy fashion. That is why I am so absolutely opposed to the so-called patient passport plans, which would force people who want a speedy operation to take half the money out of their own pocket. It is an absolute disgrace to undermine the national health service with such charges.

Hospital Wards

7. Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): What his policy is towards the provision of mixed wards in hospitals. [208907]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Our policy is that the NHS should provide single-sex accommodation for hospital in-patients, and 97 per cent. of NHS trusts now meet single-sex accommodation standards.

Mr. Chapman: I welcome the figure of 97 per cent. None the less, a survey by the National Consumer Council found that shared wards remain a major concern for patients, because they can cause stress and embarrassment to people who are already in a vulnerable situation, whether they be in general wards, emergency wards, short-stay wards or even general wards that have single-sex space. While I recognise that it would cause a loss of flexibility and perhaps a loss of beds, will my hon. Friend ensure that we move from 97 per cent. to 100 per cent. as soon as humanly possible?

Ms Winterton: Certainly. We are obviously delighted that we exceeded the target for December 2002 for 97 per cent. of in-patient stays in single-sex accommodation. I assure my hon. Friend that we are working towards 100 per cent. In the remaining areas of non-compliance with the guidance, new hospitals and new accommodation are being built. That should overcome the problems and allow us to reach 100 per cent.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): Back in the heady days of 1996 when the Prime Minister was Leader of the Opposition, he asked,

"Is it beyond the collective wit of the Government and the health administrators to deal with that problem"—[Official Report, 19 November 1996; Vol. 285, c. 832.]

of mixed-sex wards?

Since then, the target for 95 per cent. of single-sex wards by 2002 was missed by an unspecified figure. Subsequently, a new target for April 2004 was not met and the Health Service Journal reported that at least 84 mixed-sex wards still existed and a quarter of mental health patients were in mixed-sex accommodation. The targets do not apply to teenagers. Why does the Minister refuse to name the hospitals that continue to have mixed-sex wards? Eight years after the Prime Minister's initial indignation, will the target turn out to be simply another failed Labour promise from a Minister who is becoming the Minister for failed promises?

Ms Winterton: The guidance that we use for single-sex accommodation is the same as the guidance that the Conservative Government distributed. That is how we analyse the compliance. We have been unwilling to publish the details of hospitals where there is non-compliance because it does not necessarily mean that the whole hospital is not meeting the required standards. In some areas, hospitals are not reaching the target but there are plans in place to do so. However, I shall consider whether we can publish the information in the near future.

National Programme for IT

8. Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): If he will make a statement on the national programme for IT in the NHS. [208908]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): Last year, contracts were let within budget and on time for all the major components of the national programme for information technology. The Department of Health is working with local NHS organisations to ensure the effective implementation of those new systems.

Mr. Bacon: Why were there only 63 bookings under the choose and book service by the end of December, when the Government, even under the slowed-down timetable, had been expecting 200,000?

Mr. Hutton: There has clearly been a delay in the implementation of choose and book. However, it is important to bear it in mind that we are considering probably the biggest civil IT programme anywhere in the world. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman, who is an expert on such matters, knows that. It is fanciful to suggest that we could implement it with no hiccups and no technical problems. We have never made that claim. The progress on choose and book is slower than I would have preferred but I am confident that, with the other measures that we have recently announced on ensuring that all first out-patient appointments can be booked at a time and place that is convenient to the patient, we can meet our objectives by December 2005.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): The director general of the national programme for IT in the NHS is reported as saying that the Government's blueprint for NPfIT had no engineering basis and had to be reverse engineered. Given that NPfIT will cost £300,000 per doctor over 10 years, can the Minister justify the appalling progress on electronic booking? Why is there so much residual concern about the security of electronically held medical records? In retrospect, would not it have been wiser, in all candour, to engage GPs fully from the start in the process? Would not it have been better to utilise existing processes such as EMIS, in which doctors truly have confidence?

Mr. Hutton: I take issue with the hon. Gentleman about his figures. They do not represent the cost of the national programme for IT. Perhaps we can revert to that at a later date. Of course we all agree that engaging front-line clinicians is an important objective. That is why we are working closely with GPs, many of whom have been involved in helping us to design and shape the national programme for IT to serve the purpose that we want it to provide: a more modern, more convenient, more accessible and more error-free NHS. Rather than moan and groan, as the hon. Gentleman always does, I would have hoped that he and his hon. Friends would at least acknowledge that we are establishing a programme that is the right way forward for the NHS and is fundamental to delivering patient choice and improvements in quality. I hope that, at some point, the hon. Gentleman will get on board and support the national programme for IT because it is right for the NHS. It is a difficult programme to get right, but his negative approach is out of place.

NHS Trust Deficits

9. Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): What steps he is taking to address financial deficits in NHS trusts. [208909]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): Strategic health authorities have responsibility for managing the financial performance of NHS trusts in their area. Additional financial support is provided, where necessary, to NHS trusts and primary care trusts through the NHS bank, strategic health authorities and, in exceptional circumstances, the Department of Health.

Mr. Norman: Is the Minister aware of the claim in the Health Service Journal that the NHS is deep in the red to the tune of £500 million, and that the usual claim that this will sort itself out by the end of the financial year will no longer wash? Will he acknowledge that, this year, a large proportion of the deficits have been caused by unbudgeted cost overruns on centrally driven initiatives such as the new consultants' contract—which could cost an extra £200 million—the GP contract and the working time directive? Does he also recognise that the British Medical Association is saying that 25 per cent. of NHS trusts have already frozen vacant positions? Does he acknowledge that, this year, there is a real case for funding those deficits directly, where merit-worthy cases can be presented to demonstrate that the fault lies with central Government rather than with faulty planning or budgeting by the trust?

Mr. Hutton: I am certainly aware of the Health Service Journal's predictions about the financial state of the national health service this year. I know that the hon. Gentleman is a strong supporter of the NHS, and

I appreciate that. I would like to remind him that the Health Service Journal, Conservative Front Benchers and Liberal Democrat Front Benchers have made predictions about deficits every year, but none has ever proved to be accurate or well founded. Last year, the Lib Dems predicted a £400 million deficit; we actually had a £73 million surplus.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Is it possible to track and address deficits in an NHS devoid of accountants, administrators and strategic health authorities? If not, would it be fair to dismiss these dedicated civil servants as pointless and unnecessary bureaucrats at the stroke of a pen, or would that be to perpetrate a deliberate falsehood on the British public?

Mr. Hutton: I strongly agree with my hon. Friend. When we look at the proposals that are eventually emerging from those on the Conservative Front Bench, we see how utterly threadbare, incredible and ludicrous their arithmetic is. The NHS needs good management; it does not need slash and burn, which is what the Tories are proposing.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Will the Minister tell me whether NHS deficits have anything to do with the fact that Ebixa, a drug used to treat Alzheimer's disease, is available in Ashfield but not in Ashbourne?

Mr. Hutton: I accept that there are issues there, and it is perfectly fair of the hon. Gentleman to raise them, although we have taken concrete, specific and successful measures to deal with the lottery of care that we inherited in 1997. We shall need to wait and see what the true position on NHS deficits is at the year end, but it will bear no resemblance to the figures that the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) has just quoted.

Waiting Lists

10. Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): What progress has been made since 1997 on reducing waiting lists for hospital treatment. [208910]

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): Since 1997, we have cut waiting lists by 314,000, or 27.1 per cent. This is the lowest level since comparable data were first collected in September 1987.

Dr. Palmer: I thank my right hon. Friend for his response. I welcome that progress, and today's announcement that two of the Nottingham trusts, including one mental health care trust, have been given foundation status will further accelerate that progress. Does my right hon. Friend agree, however, that although health care professionals are virtually unanimous in saying that there has been enormous progress, the public are still unsure? We really need to focus on the total waiting time from the patient's first contact with their GP to the time at which they get their treatment. Only then will we really make a breakthrough in regard to public confidence.

Dr. Reid: I agree with my hon. Friend. Substantial progress has been made. In 1997, 284,000 patients were waiting more than six months for operations; that number has been slashed to 62,000, and over the year it will be reduced to zero. For 60 years, however, we have measured the six months as starting from the time of diagnosis, not from the time when a GP was first consulted. The Labour Government will get rid of those hidden waits. I have pledged that by 2008 we will measure the time from the GP's door to the door of the operating theatre, and that it will be a maximum not of years, as it was under the last Government, but of 18 weeks. That, I think, will show a truly transformed NHS.

Orders of the Day

Drugs Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

12.30 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time. It gives me great pleasure to do so.

This is an important opportunity to consider a Bill in the context of our overall drugs strategy. I am delighted to say that during the Queen's Speech debate there was broad cross-party support for it, and many of the provisions were discussed following consultation on police powers and publication of a progress update in November. I am sure that that discussion will continue in Committee, and the Government will welcome constructive proposals from members of all parties in that same spirit of broad cross-party support.

We have welcomed the feedback from our consultation, and we have worked closely with the police to develop the powers that are needed and for which the police themselves have asked. Those powers are designed to increase the ability of the police and the courts to tackle drug dealers, and to secure a measured and proportionate response in the tackling of harm caused by class A drugs that complements the drugs strategy that has operated since 1998. The strategy has focused on a number of key targets. It aims to reduce the harm that drugs cause to communities, individuals and families, on the basis of what actually works, and to tackle problems from every possible angle, involving all public services and voluntary and community activity. I think that we are starting to see positive results.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): The price of drugs has fallen dramatically. That disincentive seems to have been removed. Meanwhile, the reclassification of cannabis, the entry drug of choice, has left consumers—if we can call them that—with a mixed message: that they will not be prosecuted for holding supplies for their own consumption, but that the supply remains entirely in criminal hands. Is that not the worst of all possible worlds?

Mr. Clarke: I do not think that there is a mixed message. On the contrary, the message is very clear. People should not consume drugs, and we as a Government will work with all the agencies to try to ensure that they do not. It is true that the price is too low in some cases, which is to do with the balance between supply and demand. I shall say something about that in a moment. The hon. Gentleman has raised an important issue, on which we are focusing strongly.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): During a debate in the Chamber in 1998, all parties agreed on a 10-year strategy whose main aim was to reduce the consumption of all illegal drugs. Will the Home Secretary tell me by how much consumption has been reduced in the seven years that have elapsed since then?

Mr. Clarke: Cannabis use among 16 to 24-year-olds is down from 28.2 per cent. in 1998 to 24.8 per cent. Amphetamine use has fallen by 60 per cent. in the last five years. Ecstasy use has also fallen over the last two years. We are making progress, and I think that that is a result of our policies.

Paul Flynn: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Clarke: I will in a moment.

The hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) mentioned drugs gangs, of which more than 330 were disrupted in the 18 months to December 2003, since the updated drugs strategy. Some 150 crack houses were closed between January and September under the new powers that this Parliament has given to police forces. Some 8,000 misusing offenders entered treatment through the drugs intervention programme between April 2003 and September 2004. Nearly 26,000 drug treatment and testing orders have been issued since their introduction. On average, offenders committed 75 per cent. fewer offences while on such orders, and they reduced their spend on drugs—this point also relates to the intervention by the hon. Member for New Forest, West—by more than 90 per cent. Fifty-four per cent. more users are in treatment compared with 1998 and waiting times for treatment are down by 71 per cent. compared with the 2001 figure. Drug-related deaths are at their lowest level since 1998 and for every pound spent on treatment, £3 is saved on criminal justice costs.

The extremely important point that I am seeking to make is that none of us in this House should regard the fight against drug use as a hopeless struggle. We have made significant progress as a result of putting our strategy in place. There is, as both interventions have acknowledged, a need to make a great deal more progress and I believe that the Bill will help us to achieve that end.

I turn to the Bill's key points, which I shall go through steadily. By way of general introduction, I should mention the concerns that have been expressed about civil liberties. I want to make unequivocally clear the Government's view that it is the drug abuser who threatens the civil liberties of the law-abiding citizen, rather than the reverse, which is why we need to take legal powers to ensure that the state can prevent and inhibit drug abuse. That requires the kind of measures contained in the Bill, in order to ensure that the immense damage that drug abusers do not only to themselves but to society as a whole is prevented and driven out. We are building on a foundation of steady progress, but we need to go still further.

What does the Bill seek to do? Clause 1 puts in place aggravating factors in respect of supply of a controlled drug by a person aged over 18. For example, where supply takes place within the vicinity of a school and during the relevant time, or where a dealer uses a person aged under 18 as a courier for drugs or for drugs money, the penalties for such an offence will increase very substantially, for reasons that I hope are obvious to the House.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): How many recorded incidents are there of drug arrests in the vicinity of schools, and of subsequent convictions, in the past few years?

Mr. Clarke: We do not have the detailed information that my hon. Friend seeks, but anecdotal evidence and comments from many of the agencies concerned suggest that this is an issue that we have to address. Indeed, it would be absolutely wrong of this House not to acknowledge that the supply of drugs in and around schools in some parts of the country is a serious issue. My hon. Friend has rightly developed a strong reputation for his work on this problem and taking the necessary powers through this Bill will enable us to attack it even more strongly.

John Mann: A slight amendment to the wording of the relevant provision might solve the Home Secretary's problem. Several hundred of the 3,000 constituents who wrote to me in response to my heroin inquiry suggested that drug dealing was taking place in the vicinity of local schools. We investigated every single complaint, but we could find evidence of only one such incident throughout the preceding 10 years. The reason was explained by the school pupils. Many of them said, "Why would we be so stupid as to buy drugs in or around the school and use them there, when we can buy and use them in social settings at will?"

Mr. Clarke: I understand the point that my hon. Friend makes, but his survey illustrates that this is a real issue. Let me give another example. A couple of years ago, an Opposition Member asked me to meet the head of a big secondary school in his rural constituency. That head said that he shared precisely these concerns about drug dealers operating in school environs. We must be very clear that that is not an acceptable way to behave. Similarly, where a dealer uses a person under the age of 18 as a courier for drugs or drugs money, that should also be regarded as an aggravation of the offence.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): I understand that aggravated supply is covered by the current arrangements in the courts, in that the judge can already take aggravated circumstances into consideration, so why does my right hon. Friend believe that clause 1 is so necessary?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is right that a judge can take aggravated circumstances into account, but they do not include the particular aggravations dealt with in the Bill. That is why it is so important for us to set out the provision in the Bill.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that the best way to reduce demand for drugs among school-age children is to change the style and content of education in schools away from the provision of information and harm reduction to drug prevention?

Mr. Clarke: I agree, but I can say, on the basis of my experience, that the work done in schools on personal and health education, which includes sex and drug education, is outstanding and it works in precisely the way that the hon. Lady highlighted. One of my aims in our drugs strategy, working in collaboration with the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, is precisely to develop and enhance the sort of work that will inhibit drug abuse by young people. I believe that that is one of the main reasons why the incidence of drug abuse among young people has gone down.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): To follow up some of the points made by Labour Members, if we accept that we are dealing with a mischief that requires solution and that a statement of aggravation will be relevant to the determination of a sentence, would it not be sensible to make it mandatory for the sentencing judge to specify that portion of the sentence that is attributable to the aggravation?

Mr. Clarke: That is the sort of detail that we can consider further in Committee and I can give a commitment that we will consider that point. However, I do not immediately see the benefit that would arise from that approach. What we are trying to establish is that aspects of drug dealing and drug activity—for example, carrying out such activities in the vicinity of a school—will aggravate the offence, thereby inviting a larger penalty for so doing. If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that a particular judicial device may be appropriate, we can certainly debate it in Committee and take the matter forward.

Clause 2 establishes a presumption of intent to supply where the defendant is in possession of a particular amount of a controlled drug. Where the presumption applies, a court or jury must assume that the defendant intended to supply the drug. That is to say, it is not a matter of so-called personal use. The particular level will vary from drug to drug and will be prescribed in regulations, which will need to be approved by a resolution of both Houses, based on the advice of the Advisory Committee on the Misuse of Drugs. The purpose of the clause is self-evident—that it is important to clarify the point at which the quantity of drugs in a person's possession becomes above and beyond that reasonably held for personal use.

Clauses 3 to 6 and 8 give the police and the courts powers to tackle drug dealers who swallow or conceal drugs on their bodies to evade arrest. Once again, the provision deals with a straightforward and clear point. Some people such as drug dealers seek, for obvious reasons, to conceal the evidence of their crimes and they take a number of steps to do that. The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 allows for intimate search, and the consent of the detainee is not required under the Act. Intimate searches must be undertaken by a registered medical practitioner or nurse and will not normally be undertaken without the suspect's consent. Some suspects withhold consent to evade detection.

Clauses 5 and 6 enable a police officer to authorise an X-ray or ultrasound scan of a person arrested and suspected of swallowing a class A drug. The court and jury will be entitled to draw inferences where consent to search, X-ray or ultrasound is refused without good cause.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I hope that the Secretary of State will not mind pressing the rewind button, but I want to go back over important territory that he has covered already. He has just described clause 2, which is about strengthening the legal position. Many schools now have zero-tolerance policies in respect of drugs, but in a constituency case of mine the anecdotal evidence in respect of quantity suggested to the head teacher that the child concerned intended to supply drugs. What discussions has the right hon. Gentleman had, or intend to have, with the Secretary of State for Education and Skills about the guidance that might be issued to schools that are nervous about their legal position but anxious to secure help for offenders and protect the other children in the school?

Mr. Clarke: Even on rewind, the hon. Gentleman puts his finger on a very important point. Since I became Home Secretary, I have not had a bilateral meeting with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills. However, when I was Secretary of State for Education and Skills, I did have such a meeting with my colleague, the former Home Secretary. In addition, other ministerial colleagues and officials are discussing these matters and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that, between us, we will provide guidance that is clear and agreed across Government. In that way, the head teacher in the case that he described would not have conflicting guidance coming from the Home Office, the Department for Education and Skills and various other people. Our unified guidance will better enable head teachers to make the necessary judgments in such cases.

Clause 8 gives the court power to remand a suspect in police custody for up to 192 hours after charging to allow time for evidence to pass through the body. That is a simple consequence of the change that I set out earlier.

I turn now to treatment and how we will ensure that the criminal justice system deals properly with the core problem. Clause 7 amends the Police and Criminal Evidence Act to extend the existing power to test for specified class A drugs on charge and provides that such a test can be carried out on arrest. That will give police the discretionary power to test people arrested for those trigger offences most closely associated with class A drug misuse. Where the police, at least at the level of police inspector, have reasonable grounds to suspect that class A drugs were a factor in an offence, they will also be able to test in respect of any other offence.

We believe that that is central to helping identify drug abusers at an earlier stage of their contact with the criminal justice system—that is, on arrest rather than at charge. In that way, they could be steered into treatment at the earliest possible moment. The power will apply to people aged 18 and over, but provision exists for the age to be changed through secondary legislation, in line with current provisions for testing on charge. Testing on charge has been shown to work well in conjunction with the arrest, referral and treatment services and testing on arrest will ensure that drug misusers not charged with an offence are nevertheless identified and directed to treatment.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend mentioned the talks that he hopes to have with the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, but will he say something about the talks that he has had with the Secretary of State for Health? If we are to ensure that people are directed to treatment, it is essential that every constituency in the country can provide that. I am worried that people currently in prison may not be willing to accept treatment. Will he say how we can ensure that people are matched to treatment and that they get the support and health provision that they need?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is correct. She will know that the relationship between me, as Home Secretary, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is institutionally very close in this matter. The National Treatment Agency is an NHS body, but it is responsible both to me and to the Secretary of State for Health. The key issue for the agency is to build the capacity to which my hon. Friend referred in communities up and down the country. Since I became Home Secretary, I have not had a bilateral meeting with the Secretary of State for Health, although I will have one shortly. However, I and my colleagues have participated in a full presentation and discussion of the way in which, over the past two or three years, the NTA has been able to build up the availability of treatment. That is one of the factors behind the figure that I mentioned earlier for the reduction in waiting times for particular forms of treatment. The truth is that although we have made some good progress, there is still a long way to go. However, I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that we are committed to reaching that point.

John Mann: My right hon. Friend has mentioned treatment, but is there any chronic, relapsing disease other than drug addiction that those who provide the treatment paid for by the state need have no medical qualification to do so? Is there any other condition that I could set myself up to treat and potentially receive money from his Department for doing so?

Mr. Clarke: That is an important and difficult question. When the National Treatment Agency was established—I was a junior Minister in the Department at the time and involved in the discussions—there was much controversy about whether the appropriate form of treatment for particular conditions at particular times was medical or not. A range of provision existed around the country. One of the aims of the NTA was gradually to reach an agreement about the best form of treatment—medical and non-medical—for certain conditions. Since being appointed, I have asked the question that my hon. Friend asks, and I believe that we are closer to being clear about the best form of treatment for particular conditions.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): I have spent much time in the past few months visiting many centres in the inner cities that deal with drug rehabilitation, and I have identified some serious problems with the way in which the Government are currently thinking about the issue. For a start, they need to stop talking about treatment and start talking about rehabilitation. Treatment includes detoxing, and that is a temporary affair at best. Rehabilitation is the only way ahead. The Secretary of State should look further than what is happening in Britain, because some other countries are way ahead of us. Sweden is a classic example, which has a high success rate in rehabilitation. It has a tough policy: a person has to take the rehabilitation course immediately they have been tested and found to have been taking drugs or they face criminal penalties. The rehabilitation course starts the following day. It is a residential course that can take months and includes mentoring back into the community. It is expensive, but Sweden's addiction rates are far lower and, as a result, its crime rate is far lower, too.

Mr. Clarke: That is a helpful intervention. I agree with the description that the right hon. Gentleman gives of the Swedish approach, which does give people the hard choice that he describes. I agree that that is where we want to be. Why are we not there yet? It is because we cannot immediately make available a course of treatment or rehabilitation—whatever we call it—but, as I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) a moment ago, we are committed to reaching that point. We have made significant progress.

The question about the most appropriate form of rehabilitation, treatment or therapy—I use those words in different ways—is important. Even before I started my present job, I was aware that many people had opinions about the success or failure of particular approaches to the problem. The only way to decide that is to call in top medical opinion and monitor what happens in various programmes. That is what we are doing to try to improve the quality of what is available. The core solution is the one that the right hon. Gentleman implied in his question—to ensure that the best solution, whatever it is, is available from day one, so that the choice he describes can be offered. In some parts of the country, we are close to that point, but we are not yet there across the country. Clause 8 is intended to enable us to provide what one might call the Swedish choice.

Brian Cotter (Weston-super-Mare) (LD): My constituency contains more than 10 per cent. of the drug rehab beds in the whole country. Will the Home Secretary personally consider a report that has just been produced by the police and other agencies in the area, because I think that he would find it helpful in addressing the issues before us? We have many concerns in Weston, with many people coming to the area from other parts of the country and, if I may, I shall send him a letter with details of that and the report. We are especially concerned about cracking down on unrecognised and unauthorised rehab centres that promise rehabilitation but do not necessarily provide the best programmes to achieve it. Will that also be investigated?

Mr. Clarke: I look forward to receiving the letter and reading the report to which the hon. Gentleman refers. He illustrates the approach that I have described. It is important to examine the record of particular approaches in particular circumstances. That is what the National Treatment Agency and the professionals in the field are doing. I have just been told by the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), that Sweden, when it reviewed the situation, decided not to proceed with some forms of treatment or therapy after such monitoring. Across the world, people are considering each stage of rehabilitation carefully. Our problem is that the treatment programme has not been strong enough, until recently, for us to say that any proper programme was on offer. Our first ambition was to reach the point at which options for treatment were available. We have reached that point, but our second ambition is to ensure that those options are universally available. As part of that, we need to monitor and review the treatment properly.

Paul Flynn: While my right hon. Friend considers the Swedish experience, which has seen a recent relatively large increase in drug use, will he also consider the Portuguese experience? In 2001, Portugal decriminalised all drugs, which meant an immediate drop in the number of prosecutions from 2,005 to fewer than 13 in the last year. Drug deaths have also halved and the number of AIDS cases—[Interruption.] This is more serious than the intervention by the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) because the number of deaths in Portugal has halved from 369 to 132. More people use the prescribing system, but the number using drugs has fallen.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is well known for making that argument over many years and he is entitled to make it. It is self-evident that if something is decriminalised, there will be fewer prosecutions for it, so that does not tell us anything. The interesting question arises from the other points that he made. The short answer is that I will consider the Portuguese experience, as I will look at every option, but I do not believe that decriminalising drug abuse is the right approach. Indeed, it is the exact opposite of the right approach. As the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) said, the core issue is the relationship between the criminal justice system and proper treatment or rehabilitation. That is the approach that we need to take to resolve the situation, not least because nobody should minimise the massive impact of drug abusers and their behaviour on the civil liberties of regular citizens. It is our obligation to address that.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): The National Treatment Agency has suggested that the drop-out rate is due more to the procedures in clinics than anything that is wrong with the clients. It is clear that we need to spread best practice through the system, and it is important that my right hon. Friend meets the Secretary of State for Health to decide how that can best be done.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is right. We need to keep learning. For example, the user groups associated with some drug action teams can give genuine feedback on what approach made a difference. I do not pretend that there is a universal solution—a magic wand that can be waved to solve the problem for every individual. People develop drug abuse habits in various ways, and various means will be needed to tackle their problems. I am encouraged to see that we are beginning to make substantive progress, as the figures that I gave earlier suggest. That provides the basis for further progress in the future.

Dr. Iddon: What would my right hon. Friend say to civil liberties groups such as Liberty that say that testing for class A drugs at arrest rather than at charge is setting a dangerous precedent? Does not that criminalise people de facto, ask Liberty and similar organisations?

Mr. Clarke: With all respect to Liberty, I fundamentally disagree with that view—strongly so. We have to get drug abusers who come into contact with the criminal justice system into treatment—whether rehabilitation or whatever word we use—as rapidly as possible. That is the core. No one has a right to abuse drugs, especially when we see the consequences of that abuse in so many aspects of crime. I understand my hon. Friend's concerns; he is well intentioned and has been a clear campaigner on civil rights issues of that kind, but if the choice is between the civil rights of a drug abuser or of those who are abused by the drug abuser, I choose the civil rights of those who are abused by the drug abuser. That is what lies behind the orientation of the Bill, but my hon. Friend is right to raise that point.

Mr. Bercow: The Home Secretary is being extremely generous in giving way. Further to the intervention of the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon), I am strong on civil liberties but there is one important exception in relation to drugs. One of my constituents lost his daughter in a car crash in 1984. To this day, he and his wife believe that the guilty party was either high on drugs or influenced by copious consumption of alcohol. Under the law there was no right to take a test without consent. That strikes me as wrong. As a parent, my constituent has to live with uncertainty as to whether there was causality for the rest of his life. Does the Home Secretary plan to address that important matter in the Bill?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman's general point illustrates extremely clearly the point that I was trying to make earlier. We are looking into impairment tests in that regard. There are some difficulties in relation to consent for people in certain conditions with which I dealt previously as a Minister. The hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) took up with vigour ways of dealing with those issues and we are looking at them in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I have been following the Home Secretary's arguments carefully as he sets out the Bill. I hope that he will turn his face against the legalisation of drugs, although he seems to have left a small opening for the hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn).

Why does the Home Office put so much emphasis on harm reduction and treatment, but so little on abstinence and rehabilitation? Does the Home Secretary intend to reverse that balance and will he tell the House when he will be able to offer a rehabilitation place on demand to somebody who wants to get off drugs?

Mr. Clarke: I have obviously been guilty of misstatement if there is any doubt in the hon. Lady's mind: I am wholly against, without qualification, legalising drugs. If I was unclear in what I said, I reiterate it clearly from the Dispatch Box.

On the point of substance that the hon. Lady raised, abstinence is obviously the right way to proceed. I have seen some excellent work by abstinence-based groups with prisoners and others, which takes a positive course. I do not think that the various regimes should be based on tolerance of a certain level of drug abuse as acceptable but we have to listen to the advice of the professionals about the best way to proceed. I am certainly not such a professional, but we should look at the various ways of proceeding.

On the hon. Lady's point about demand and that we should reach a state of affairs where a rehabilitation or treatment place is available at the outset—the point made by the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green earlier on—I am with her in principle, and that is the direction we are following. The path that we have set out is precisely drawn so that we can reach that stage.

Clauses 9 to 19 deal with the police's power to require those who test positive for a class A drug to attend an initial assessment of their abuse. That will increase the engagement of drug misusers with treatment providers. At present, those who test positive are encouraged to attend assessment but only on a voluntary basis. The powers requiring such an assessment will enable the assessor to determine the level of dependency or the propensity to misuse the class A drug and whether the person might benefit from further assessment, treatment or both. The powers also provide for the police to require a person to attend a follow-up assessment to give a further opportunity to discuss their drug misuse with a drugs worker and to draw up a care plan setting out the assistance and treatment that the person needs.

Clause 20 deals with antisocial behaviour orders and a new civil order—the intervention order—to be attached to an ASBO where the underlying causes of the antisocial behaviour relate to drug misuse. An ASBO sets out behaviour that the perpetrator is required not to engage in; the intervention order will set out activity that the perpetrator should engage in to address the causes of his antisocial behaviour.

In that context, the Bill deals with so-called magic mushrooms. The chemicals inside them are class A drugs; the mushrooms themselves are class A drugs, if prepared or in the form of a product. The Bill will end uncertainty by making it clear that all magic mushrooms, in whatever form, are class A drugs, and will make it an offence, to import, export, produce, supply, possess or possess with intent to supply magic mushrooms in any form.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central) (Lab/Co-op): That part of the Bill deals with an anomalous position, but it also raises other anomalies. Can my right hon. Friend explain what harm currently done by the partially legal position of that drug will cease to be done or will be reduced by making it illegal? The drug grows widely naturally in this country and people could have it in their gardens without knowing it. Are they committing an offence? There is a hugely anomalous position on khat—a drug widely used by part of the community in my constituency; the drug is certainly harmful but it is entirely legal. The Bill does nothing about that drug yet magic mushrooms will be made more illegal than they are currently. What benefit will that bring?

Mr. Clarke: We are looking in detail at the position on khat—

Paul Flynn: Oh no.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is in despair at that proposal.

We are addressing the status of magic mushrooms in particular because the chemicals inside them are class A drugs—they have an effect. As a result, people are preparing products using a brand of magic mushroom, and taking approaches designed to bypass the existing legislation, which is why we are addressing the matter in that way.

Paul Flynn: The Home Secretary is extremely generous in giving way. I want to be clear about the meaning of the provisions. He referred to the possession of magic mushrooms. I own a garden—as do the Queen and the Church of England. If magic mushrooms appear in those gardens, the Bill changes the law so that they become a class A drug for which people can be thrown into the slammer for seven years. Is my right hon. Friend really saying that we should treat the possession of a growing magic mushroom in the same way as we treat someone who owns a crack house?

Mr. Clarke: Obviously my hon. Friend can pursue the issue in Committee if he wants to do so, but the fact is that there has been an increase of 400 per cent. in the number of outlets where those products are made available to the public and we have to deal with that, which is what the legislation will do.

Dr. Iddon: Bearing in mind the fact that we declassified cannabis from class B to class C on the grounds of its harm, what evidence is there that psilocybe mushrooms are as harmful as heroin or either form of cocaine?

Mr. Clarke: Again, we are in the hands of the experts, and the fact is that the hallucinogenic effects of the chemicals in the mushrooms are similar to those of LSD.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): Does the Secretary of Secretary believe there is a case for increasing the bands used for the classification of drugs? Does he agree with the Runciman report and even the Home Affairs Committee, which say that classifying such drugs as class A exaggerates the dangers of magic mushrooms and ecstasy, while diminishing the dangers of heroin and cocaine? We have heard nothing at all about young people. Surely, we must make our drugs laws and classification credible to young people.

Mr. Clarke: Let me be quite candid. There have been two or three interventions from Labour Members and from the Opposition that suggest a tolerance or understanding of people who use those drugs for their own pleasure, or whatever they do. I do not share that view in any respect whatsoever. It is crucial to deal with such drug use, which is what this measure does. Of course, when we look at the analysis of the banding classification system, it is appropriate and right to consider the advice of the professionals who make the medical assessment before coming to a view. That is precisely what we will do, but I do not share any of the apparent tolerance of those drugs that the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) appears to demonstrate. I may have misunderstood him, in which case I apologise, but that is certainly the impression that I have gained.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones rose—

Mr. Duncan Smith: I suggest that the Secretary of State look again at Sweden for one reason: it overcame the problem because it stopped classifying drugs in any way at all. Sweden just has one system: all drug use and abuse—the addiction—is prosecuted, which has had a huge result. Before the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) tells the Secretary of State that there is a better way, I wish to make the point that Sweden did exactly what Portugal did and it was a total disaster, which is why Sweden has gone hard back on classifying drugs.

Mr. Clarke: As always, I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his advice, and I will look at the matters he has raised.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones rose—

Mr. Clarke: This is the final time that I will give way.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: I thank the Secretary of State for giving way to me again, but the debate so far has focused on drugs without an attempt to classify or define what is meant by drugs, and the last intervention is a classic example of that. If we define something as illegal, it becomes illegal, but we never define why it is illegal. Drugs must become illegal where they do harm. If a drug is not doing harm or not doing sufficient harm, it should not become illegal. We use several drugs that are not illegal because society does not judge that they do sufficient harm to make them illegal. We cannot simply say that all drugs are what we say they are, without explaining why we say that they are illegal.

Mr. Clarke: It is impossible to argue that the abuse of class A drugs, which is what we are principally talking about in the Bill, does not cause harm to society. [Interruption.] I am glad to hear that my hon. Friend is completely at one with me on that. I accept that we could discuss what should or should not come within the legal framework. My test has always been, and remains, whether a measure reduces the consumption of a drug, legal or illegal, since consuming less drugs is beneficial to society.

Mr. Bercow: Fewer.

Mr. Clarke: Fewer. I beg hon. Members' pardon; I stand corrected by the hon. Gentleman. [Interruption.] I am being correct again—perhaps we could have a discussion about that in Committee.

Paul Flynn: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Clarke: I will not give way again; I have given way too much. In fact, I shall come to the conclusion of my speech.

[Mr. Clarke]

The Bill shows that the Government have consulted widely on the proposed measures. We have debated most of the provisions already in detail during the debate on the Loyal Address. I believe that the Bill is a measured and proportionate response to the problems that we face and that it will contribute to the Government's strategy to reduce the harm caused by class A drugs. The police have said that the measures will help them to tackle drugs. I commend the Bill to the House.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): Let me begin by telling the House that we welcome much of the Bill. Indeed, on the evidence of the last few interventions, I suspect that the Home Secretary's view is closer to mine than to those of some Labour Back Benchers.

To pick out a few headline points, we welcome the extra police powers to test for class A drugs on arrest and the new measures to deal with those who conceal their drugs. Although the Home Secretary appeared to be concerned about civil liberties, he knows that I am probably tested most on them, but I agree with him entirely about this very important issue, about which Liberty is wrong and he is right.

We are pleased that the Bill proposes a number of lesser measures, including making magic mushrooms a classified drug, although we are disappointed that the Bill does not include khat, which is already illegal in America, Canada, Norway and Sweden. I hope that we can discuss that in Committee. Khat is under investigation, and some Somali community leaders are concerned about it and would like it to become illegal.

Paul Flynn rose—

David Davis: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I shall limit the number of times that I give way because I shall have a limited voice today.

Paul Flynn: The certain result of criminalising khat and magic mushrooms will be, with khat, to drive a wedge between the police and the Somali and Yemeni communities in Britain, and, with both drugs, to create an illegal market. Their use will not go down; it will increase, as the use of all drugs increased when we introduced prohibition in this country in 1971, and it will do so in the hands of an irresponsible black market, and profits will be made. For example, we had 1,000 drug addicts in 1971, and harsh prohibition increased that figure to 280,000. Criminalisation is an extraordinary, foolish and self-defeating aim, especially with magic mushrooms. No one has ever been killed using them and they are non-addictive.

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman has a long-standing difference of view from most of the rest of the British population. That issue was best dealt with by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), when he pointed out that Sweden had tried the route that the hon. Gentleman advocates and it was a disastrous failure. Sweden's current approach has its vagaries, but it is much more successful.

We welcome the Bill, but unfortunately it is only a small step in the right direction. It is not a solution to many of the problems that the Government have allowed to continue over the past seven years, but then no legislation can make up for the failure of policy that we have seen. The Government have had numerous initiatives, summits and crackdowns on drugs, but I am afraid that the result has been more drugs, more dealers, more crime and more violence. There are more than 4 million drug users in England and Wales, and more than 1 million class A drug users. Cocaine use is up 250 per cent. and ecstasy use has doubled.

I agree with the Home Secretary that drugs wreck lives and that they are the scourge of society, and the Government should admit that they have failed to deal with some aspects of the problem. I was going to be quite hard about this, but frankly, given the Home Secretary's approach today, I am inclined to be more kindly, because he attacked the problem with an open mind. We will attempt to make the Bill as strong as we can in Committee. However, the problem is one not just for today—there are millions of users today—but for tomorrow.

Drug abuse among the young is increasing. The Home Secretary cited some numbers that I shall dispute. In 2003, 21 per cent. of school children had taken drugs in the past year. In 1998, that figure was 11 per cent., according to Department of Health figures. Alarmingly, in 2003, almost two thirds of 15-year-olds had been offered drugs. Sadly, British teenage boys top the European league of cannabis users.

I shall dwell on cannabis for a moment. Cannabis is not a harmless drug. Super-potent varieties have emerged in the past 20 years, and scientific evidence continues to show a heightened risk of mental illness for those who use cannabis regularly. A recent report suggested that someone who starts using cannabis at 15 has more than four times the risk of developing schizophrenia as someone who starts at 18. I quote:

> "It is undoubtedly the case that most users of class A drugs, such as heroin and cocaine, start off by using so-called soft drugs, normally cannabis".—[Official Report, 31 October 2000; Vol. 355, c. 430W.]

The Home Secretary will recognise that quotation: he said it.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Did my right hon. Friend see the report today that the Royal College of Physicians is very concerned about the new type of cannabis that can cause substantial brain damage and major problems in later life when it is taken by youngsters?

David Davis: I have not seen that report today, but it is the latest in a line of reports that have come out in the past 12 months that demonstrate that the perception of cannabis—primarily among the 1960s generation, like me, I guess—as a relatively harmless, recreational drug is very far off the mark. In fact, it is a dangerous psychotropic drug that does a great deal of harm, often in the long-term when it causes serious psychotic illness. That view will be reinforced by the report that my hon. Friend mentions.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The right hon. Gentleman is citing examples from different countries and times. Has he read that the prohibition of alcohol in the United States not only more than doubled the number of murders in that country and made the mafia extremely wealthy, but changed the pattern of alcohol consumption? It was safer to transport potent alcohol, so the use of spirits increased enormously and the extent of beer drinking went down. Is there not a lesson to be learned from that example about more potent forms of cannabis?

David Davis: No; I do not think that that is the driving force. I am afraid it is a question not of reducing the volumes that must be carried but of what sells better. I understand the view taken by liberalisers, which is based almost entirely on the experience of prohibition, but I just think that it is plain wrong. These drugs do enormous harm, which is why the vast majority of the world does not believe in allowing them to be freely trafficked. We are part of the general consensus on that, so the real point to address is how well we control drugs, on which I shall take the Government to task in a moment. One of the problems with the Bill is that it will not tackle the users of soft drugs until they graduate to harder stuff.

Paul Flynn: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: Not for a moment. I have only a limited voice left. The drugs that I am taking are legal, but they do not save it from wearing out quickly with this flu. [Interruption.] Magic mushrooms will not help either. [HON. MEMBERS: "How do you know?"] I am sure that I take the Home Secretary's advice.

By the time a drug user gets to hard drugs, it is often too late. Breaking a heroin habit is harder than breaking a cannabis habit. It is not surprising that drug use has gone up. Drug prices have fallen because supply has increased—it is as simple as that. Our porous borders have made it all too easy to smuggle drugs. It is estimated that seizures account for only about 10 per cent. of the drugs coming into the country, and I note that class A seizures went down a couple of years ago for the first time in memory.

The Government have failed in their international responsibility to deal with Afghan opium production. Last October's bumper crop will flood our streets with heroin. With so many drugs available, it is no wonder that heroin has more than halved in price since 1995. Crack can be bought for a tenner in some parts of the country and ecstasy for a pound. At £1.95, a line of coke costs little more than a bottle of coke. Cocaine was once a so-called society drug that was available only to the rich, but now it can be bought with pocket money. Occasional users turn into regular users—users who demand a fix whatever the price.

All too often, the cost of such dependency is crime, which is one respect in which I agree with the hon. Members for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) and for Newport, West (Paul Flynn). Drug-related offences have risen by a quarter in the past three years alone. A heroin or crack addiction can be expensive, and it is estimated that a regular user spends nearly £450 a month on his habit. The Government admit that 70 per cent. of acquisitive crime is drug-related. About three quarters of hard drug users commit crime to obtain drugs, and persistent drug misusing offenders commit almost 10 times as many crimes as people who do not use drugs at all. It was reported last week that a £20,000 kilo of heroin would lead to 220 burglaries by addicts who need to pay for their fix. As of the end of last year, one acquisitive crime—shoplifting—has become punishable by fixed penalty notice. For a regular shoplifter, an £80 fine is less of a deterrent than an occupational expense.

Unfortunately, drug crime is not only shoplifting but high-level organised crime that is often violent and gun-toting. With the drugs trade come drug gangs, drug barons, drug territories and drug wars. The lure of easy money can be too hard to resist. The gross margin from production to retail on a single gram of crack cocaine is nearly £50, so is it any surprise that burglars and other criminals are abandoning their old trade to sell drugs in the dark street corners of our cities and towns?

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): My right hon. Friend has already stated that some class A drugs are cheaper than a cup of coffee from Starbucks, which is clearly wrong. Does he believe that the Bill is deficient on the specific matter of sentencing and that those who deal in class A drugs should face stiffer penalties, as provided for by my private Member's Bill?

David Davis: My hon. Friend will get a roll of honour later in my speech.

The Bill provides for the supply of drugs to children near a school to be considered as an aggravating factor for sentencing. The hon. Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) made an intervention on the Home Secretary about that point. One is tempted to ask why that provision should be limited to schools rather than including youth clubs, skate parks, arcades and bowling alleys. Why should the provision not be extended to supplying children—full stop? We need to make it clear that dealing to children, wherever they may be, is an evil that will not be tolerated by this Government or any other Government of this country.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way—he can rest his voice for a moment. The Home Office "Frank" website gives the following advice on cannabis:

"Smoking a spliff makes most people happy, relaxed and at peace with the world but the effects vary from person to person. Some people have one puff and feel sick. Others get the giggles until the muscles in their face hurt . . . Cannabis is quite an introspective drug. Once stoned, users can find hidden depths in daytime television"

"the most unlikely song lyrics".

Does he think that that advice will encourage or deter cannabis use?

David Davis: The prospect of finding hidden depths in daytime television would terrify me, but my hon. Friend raises a significant point. There is a danger that the approach on harm reduction might encourage the use of drugs, or at least give out a neutral message. I—like the Home Secretary, to be fair to him—believe that drugs are unmitigably harmful and thus should not be encouraged in any way.

I return to my point about penalties and supply to children. The Bill refers to cash payment for drugs that are sold to and couriered by children. I understand that youngsters in some cities are paid up to £30 a day to deliver drugs to users, but the Home Secretary should know that cash is no longer the only commodity traded for drugs. DVDs, CDs, computer games, trainers and mobile phones are today's traded goods for drugs, so people do not receive only the bankers drafts, cheques, notes and coins to which the Bill refers. I hope that we can pick up on that in Committee and ensure that the Bill's wording does not provide a loophole so that an expensive lawyer can get a drug dealer off.

Mr. Bercow: My right hon. Friend's position on drugs is much clearer than that of the late Congressman Schwegel, the representative of Iowa, on whisky. When asked about that subject, he said:

"If, when you say 'whisky', you mean the devil's brew, the poison scourge, the bloody monster that defiles innocence, dethrones reason, destroys the home, creates misery and poverty, literally takes bread out of the mouths of little children; if you mean the evil drink that topples Christian men and women from the pinnacles of righteous, gracious living into the bottomless pit of degradation and despair, shame, helplessness and hopelessness—then certainly I am against it with all my power. But if, when you say 'whisky', you mean the oil of conversation, the philosophic wine, the ale that is consumed when good fellows get together, that puts a song in their hearts, laughter on their lips and the warm glow of contentment in their eyes . . . if you mean the drink the same which pours into our treasuries untold millions of dollars to provide tender care for our little crippled children, our blind, our deaf, our dumb, our aged and infirm, and allows us to build highways, hospitals and schools—then certainly, I am in favour of it. This is my view and I will not compromise."

Hon. Members: More!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman would have been better to quote Robert Burns as saying:

"Freedom and whisky gang thegither".

David Davis: If I may say so, Mr. Speaker, you are the last person I would have expected to quote that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) has published a private Member's Bill—

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Before the right hon. Gentleman leaves whisky—

David Davis: No. The Bill is not about whisky. I may mention whisky later and give the hon. Gentleman another chance, but I will not give way now.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley has published a private Member's Bill that will ensure that anyone who is caught dealing in drugs with children will receive a custodial sentence. His Bill will also set a mandatory sentence for repeat dealers. Will the Government support it? I am sure that he would not mind if they adopted his measures in their Bill. Will the Government, while they are at it, consider encouraging schools to follow the Abbey school example and begin random testing for drugs at schools?

The Home Secretary, when he was Secretary of State for Education and Skills, I believe, started the enabling of that process, but it was a very cautious enabling. Reading the guidance almost made me afraid of the proposal. Will the Government provide the resources and support to make random testing at schools happen? It is clear that many parents are concerned about drugs—

Mr. Charles Clarke: The short answer is yes. The right hon. Gentleman is right to identify random drug testing in schools as a necessary weapon for head teachers who wish to use it. I do not think that it is accurate to say that we were less than fulsome about it. On the contrary, we positively encourage it, and I certainly did as Secretary of State for Education and Skills.

David Davis: I am pleased to hear that. If I remember—I am relying on my memory, which is probably not a good idea given that I am on cold drugs—extreme caution was advocated. I think that that was the phrase used. That is one aspect. In any event, we should look at the guidance.

The second point is resource. There are drug-testing machines that schools would not be able easily to afford but it might well be worth while providing them to local education authorities. It is my party's policy that we would do that. It would be a good idea if the Government took that on board as a way of accelerating the process. Addiction among the young is the most pernicious ailment afflicting our society, but as the Home Secretary said, it can be beaten.

When I spoke to the Americans this summer on this matter they told me that they were able to reduce addiction generally among teenagers by 11 per cent. in two years. As the addiction that they were talking about included alcohol, I will give way to the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) on his point on whisky.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: I thank the right hon. Gentleman—he has given way often—for giving way belatedly to me. Which would he regard as more harmful, a spliff or a bottle of whisky?

David Davis: A spliff, because of the effect on the psychological health of the person in the long term. Whisky is, of course, harmful when used immoderately. Beyond that, I shall rest on Mr. Speaker's advice on the matter.

I return to the issue of the reduction of addiction among teenagers. The rather simple point—a blindingly obvious point in a way—that the Americans made to me when they were talking about the matter was that the key was simultaneous reduction of supply and demand. They made the very good point that if supply alone was reduced, price was increased, and that that encouraged more supply, so that did not work. If demand was reduced but not supply, the pushers looked for new markets, tried harder and pushed demand back up. Simultaneous reduction of the two is a key part of any Government's strategy. It may sound an obvious point, but it is not something that many Governments manage to achieve.

As I have said, we welcome the testing of class A drugs on arrest. As I understand it, the Bill makes provision to do so only for those aged over 18. Given the increasing use of drugs by minors, why not extend the provision to those under 18? That seems to me to be self-evident. It is a point that would be worth picking up by the Minister today or in Committee.

It is proposed in the Bill to extend the arrest referral scheme, making it compulsory for those testing positive to attend assessment. As far as I can see, it does not make it compulsory to undergo a complete treatment programme. It is important to complete that programme, because starting such a programme is not a solution—finishing it is. Again, the Bill appears to apply only to those over 18.

For those testing positive, what sort of care plan do the Government have in mind? Under the current arrest referral scheme, the Government's research seems to show that 97 per cent. of those interviewed failed to make it into effective treatment. The Government's flagship treatment programme, the drug treatment and testing order, has only a 28 per cent. completion rate and an 80 per cent. reconviction rate. One Whitehall insider is quoted as saying that "breach is the norm" with DTTOs. The only way to break the link between drugs and crime is to adopt the policy outlined by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green when he talked about Conservative policy offering residential rehabilitation or the criminal justice system, and that choice immediately, not after a wait, and not the halfway measure that appears to be proposed in the Bill.

John Mann: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: I will in a moment.

I understand that the Home Secretary has to sort out the resources. However, it began to sound, when he was speaking, as though he agreed with our strategy. I take that as a good sign.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

David Davis: I will give way to my right hon. Friend first.

Mr. Duncan Smith: My right hon. Friend is touching on the rehabilitation point. A few weeks ago I visited a centre in Norfolk—the Princess of Wales rehabilitation centre, I think. About a third of its beds were not occupied. The reason was the way in which the local authorities were involved in deciding how much money was allocated and whether people could be put into that rehab. Does my right hon. Friend agree that we need to put the power to put people into rehabilitation either in the hands of the courts, with the money to follow them, or in the hands of the police, or both, but certainly not leave it to local government or any other body, even including health departments, and that when someone is found to be on drugs the decision should almost immediately be made and the process begun?

David Davis: I agree for two reasons. First, for the immediacy of the decision, and secondly because the systems that work require some continuing coercion. They require the option, for example, of saying, "If you fail in this system, you are back into the criminal justice system." For both those reasons it is worth while doing exactly what my right hon. Friend says.

I now give way to the hon. Member for Bassetlaw, who I know has a long record of interest in these matters.

John Mann: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why, when his party voted for residential rehabilitation 18 months ago, it cited Sweden as the example? Will he explain also why Sweden reduced last year the number of places in residential rehabilitation by more than two thirds?

David Davis: Off the cuff, I cannot explain why Sweden did that. It was not just Sweden. As I have said, I talked to the Americans during the summer, and they were sceptical. I know that the hon. Gentleman is also sceptical of residential rehabilitation. There are other schemes that can work for some, but the predominant fact about residential rehabilitation, backed up by coercive measures, is that there is recognition of how difficult it is to get off drugs. What is proposed will have to be matched inside prisons.

Mr. Duncan Smith: One of the answers about Sweden is the budget pressure that it has had. The argument in Sweden takes place on the basis of how much more the residential care programmes delivered, given the extra effort put in, than non-residential programmes, and whether it was worth the extra money.

In the UK, I used to visit C-FAR in Devon, which worked with prison officers and the police. By taking people residentially, it has reduced reoffending among young offenders to under 40 per cent. in Devon as opposed to 73 per cent. nationwide.

David Davis: As my right hon. Friend speaks, the head of C-FAR is addressing a conference at Portcullis House on precisely that issue.

Paul Flynn: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

John Mann: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: No. Hon. Members can speak about these matters later in the debate if they want to do so.

I move on to the Government's latest proposal in clause 20, which is the intervention order. The Bill states that a new order can be made alongside an antisocial behaviour order when drug misuse has been the cause of behaviour that led to the ASBO being made. Government statistics show that 25 per cent. of people experience drug-related incidents of antisocial behaviour. The explanatory notes say that there are 15 million incidents of antisocial behaviour each year. That could mean nearly 4 million acts of potentially drug-related antisocial behaviour every year.

The Government's estimate is that only 100 of the new intervention orders will be issued each year. That means that about one in 40,000 drug-related antisocial behaviours will be picked up. Even if it is 5 per cent., it will be one in 7,000. That is hardly going to solve the problem. The explanatory notes state that the cost of 100 orders will be £370,000. With 1 million hard drug users in the country, that is 37p a piece or about £1.50 per problem user. However, given that the Government have agreed to delay the commencement of that provision until April 2006, it will be rather meaningless for the next 15 months. It may be a good idea, but as it stands it is an inadequate measure that will be introduced too slowly and too late. If it is to be introduced, it must be done properly and immediately. There are problems today as well as in a year's time, when another generation of children will get hooked on class A drugs.

I am glad that the Government have not given up the war on drugs, but although we may not have lost it, we are not yet winning it. We will support the Bill today because it is a step in the right direction, albeit only a small one. The Bill does not reclassify cannabis, it does not require residential rehabilitation, and it does not encourage schools to test pupils. It does not set mandatory sentences for repeat drug dealers or provide for automatic custodial sentences for people dealing to children. The illusion of action is sometimes more dangerous than inaction. I hope that in Committee the Bill will be toughened up, and I am optimistic, following the Home Secretary's speech, that there will be tougher practical measures on drugs. So far, there has been a great deal of rhetoric but not enough action, and too many children are at risk in the country to allow that to go on any longer.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): First, I wish to clear up the issue of what happened in Sweden. As a rapporteur for the Council of Europe, I produced a report on drugs policies in which I made comparisons between the two most prohibitionist countries in Europe and two with pragmatic policies. The report covered the period from 1900 to 1999, and it showed that areas with the harshest policies in Britain and Europe had the largest increases in drug use. I do not know whether the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) was updated on the position, but since 1995 there has been a fourfold increase in drug deaths in Sweden. A report by the Swedish Forensic Medicine Institute said that Sweden probably had the highest number of per capita drug deaths in Europe. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman received an explanation, but there are some very good propagandists for the policy.

Mr. Duncan Smith: The hon. Gentleman is a fair man, so I am sure that he would like to correct those figures. He will recall that Sweden followed a programme of complete liberalisation in the 1970s and early 1980s, and the figures show that addiction levels went through the roof. Since the Swedes have taken a harder position, addiction has fallen dramatically. Yes, there have been some increases, but they are in line with other increases in the west following the advent of crack cocaine. That has changed things, but I suspect that the Swedes are better off now than they were with that liberal policy.

Paul Flynn: The right hon. Gentleman is right that there was an increase, as there was in Switzerland, after liberalisation, although that is not the case now. However, the picture over the past 40 years in Europe is clear: some forms of decriminalisation and free-for-alls are certainly not desirable and do not work. However, the sum of experience on our continent and elsewhere shows overwhelmingly that prohibition increases drug use. In this debate, we all share a common desire to reduce the consumption of every drug, because they are all dangerous. We must make decisions about their comparative danger, but as I said in an intervention, Portugal has recently achieved some interesting results in a short period. Italy, Belgium, Switzerland and Germany have also tried interesting experiments by setting aside areas in which people can use heroin in safe conditions rather than taking it in the street, as happens in this country. Such experiments clearly have significant health benefits.

Decriminalisation was introduced in Portugal. People may treat that lightly, but some offences are still in place. Prosecutions went down from 2,500 to 13, which represents an enormous saving in time for the police, the courts and prisons. The drop in the number of deaths—the worst possible outcome of drug taking—has been most impressive. They have fallen from 369 in 1999 to 152 in 2003, and are still going down. There are fewer drug users with AIDS compared with non-drug users, and the percentage has declined in both real and relative terms. The number of drugs in use also went down in both absolute and relative terms. Decriminalisation has therefore been an unquestionable success in just four years.

There is, however, a period of 25 years to study in the Netherlands, and I have spent a great deal of time looking at what has happened there. I always like to make the point that I have never used an illegal drug, and neither have I used many medicinal drugs in my entire life. I am very hostile to drugs and, having spent most of my working life as a chemist, am suspicious about the side effects of drugs, including many medicinal drugs. I do not want anyone to use any drug whatsoever if that can be avoided, but we must accept the reality of what is going on. The Bill is the most atrocious piece of populist, knee-jerk legislation in the House since the Dangerous Dogs Acts.

There is no case for taking the approach to magic mushrooms adopted by the Bill. I have been in correspondence with the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), about the position on magic mushrooms, but not in my wildest dreams did I believe that that would precipitate the measures in the Bill. The Government could have done three things. First, they could have left the law alone and not touched it, even though it is absurd and irrational. If hon. Members went down on their hands and knees and grazed on magic mushrooms as they grew, they would not be committing any offence whatever. If they picked the magic mushrooms and ate them, they almost certainly would not be committing an offence. If they picked them and left them overnight, they would be using a class A drug because there would be a change in the magic mushrooms. The present law cannot necessarily be defended, but it does no harm.

One country has recently set up legal outlets for magic mushrooms, and that would have been a sensible way forward for the Government. Instead, however, they have made a laughable decision. The hallucinogenic effects of magic mushrooms are not serious, and are not as bad as some of the side effects of over-the-counter drugs that can be bought in chemists. No one has ever been poisoned or killed by taking magic mushrooms. The Government website points out that they are not addictive in any way. They are among the mildest drugs, whether legal or illegal, that are available. Unlike those great killers, alcohol and nicotine, magic mushrooms are an entirely innocent drug and the dangers involved are not comparable. There is a market for them, and I agree that it is growing a little—there were more at Glastonbury than there had ever been before, but that meant that there was not as much ecstasy, so there was a decline in the use of other drugs. If magic mushrooms replace the use of more dangerous drugs, so what? The idea of banning them and treating them as a class A drug on a par with heroin and cocaine is ludicrous. I hope that the Government will have second thoughts, because their action cannot be justified. As I suggested in an intervention, criminalisation will certainly increase their use, as that happens with all prohibition.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument about the connection between prohibition and usage. By way of analogy, would he support a ban on smoking in public places, particularly pubs and restaurants?

Paul Flynn: Yes, I would, but I very much support the use of snus. Inveterate users of tobacco who cannot give up can take that Swedish drug, which has reduced cancer deaths among males from nicotine by 50 per cent. That is one of the most extraordinary health improvements in the world. Sweden is the only country to have reached World Health Organisation targets for the reduction in cancer deaths by 2000, and it did so by encouraging people to ingest nicotine rather than smoke it. As with cannabis, the danger comes from smoking. In this country, people mix cannabis with tobacco, a dreadfully toxic addictive drug that kills.

To return to the point that I was making, one of the stronger arguments against prohibition is that in the Netherlands, after 25 years of regulated, controlled decriminalisation of cannabis, its use among all age groups is half the rate of use in this country, and it is often used in a way that avoids smoking—in a safer way, by being ingested in cakes or drinks, or in other ways.

I see two stages to the campaign: first, we must get rid of prohibition—of course, we must increase treatment; and, secondly, we must campaign with a message that is credible and that will be believed by young people. The proposal before us will be greeted with nothing but derision by the country as a whole, especially by those who use magic mushrooms. I asked the Minister a question and did not receive an adequate reply, but I believe that if we designate the magic mushrooms growing wild in our gardens and elsewhere as a class A drug, we will all possess it and we will all be open to the charges. We cannot make nature illegal. Magic mushrooms are part of the natural world. Some might describe them as a gift from God.

The Bill is an attempt by the Government to appear tough on drugs. I suggested some time ago that we could not read the manifesto of any party for the next election without coming across the word "drugs" and in the following sentence the word "tough". The Government have excelled themselves this time by ensuring that in the Home Office press release there are four "toughs" in 150 words. The clause is the News of the World clause. Like the campaign that was conducted by the tabloids on dangerous dogs, the News of the World has a campaign and the Government react. Dogs bark, children cry and politicians legislate. I urge the Government to stop taking the tabloids. They would do well to stop pandering to the lowest common denominator of public opinion.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: My hon. Friend says the Government are pandering to public opinion, but I am not sure that is the case. Public opinion is not the same as the majority view expressed in Parliament. I recall one of the tabloid papers—The Sun—running a campaign against cannabis and inviting its readership to express their opinion. The readership overwhelmingly deplored the opinion of The Sun and said that cannabis should be made a legal substance.

Paul Flynn: I stand corrected. What I meant to say, and what I think I did say, was the lowest common denominator of public opinion. All the informed groups that have reported on drugs and all the committees that have met, including our own Home Affairs Committee, have urged reform along the lines that I support, rather than along the lines that the Government and the Opposition support. That is telling.

I remember the day in 1998 when we set up the drugs tsar. There was unanimity among those on all the Front Benches, which is always a certain sign that the Government have got a policy wrong. Only one Member spoke against the drugs tsar with his preposterous posturing and his idiotic targets of reducing the use of some drugs by 25 per cent. and even some by 50 per cent. I was disappointed with the answer I received when I asked the Minister the difference between drug use now and in 1998. He gave one figure that related to 1998. Readers of Hansard will notice that all the other examples he gave had nothing at all to do with 1998. He mentioned a few years selectively.

Since 1998—indeed, since 1971—there has been a huge increase in the use of drugs. It has been gradual, and occasionally the figures have gone down a little, but the overwhelming trend in use has been upwards and the trend in price has been downwards.

Mr. Evans: I thought Keith Hellawell was a very good drugs tsar. Sacking him sent all the wrong signals. That was the point at which the direction of Government policy on drugs such as cannabis went wayward. The hon. Gentleman's thesis is that if only we were to legalise drugs, the problem would go away. If the solution was as simple as that, it would have been done many years ago and in many countries. The fact that that has not happened disproves his case. We need to get the message out and send the right signals, particularly to young people, that the drugs that the hon. Gentleman wants to legalise and make freely available on the streets are killers.

Paul Flynn: The hon. Gentleman speaks as a seller of tobacco. Perhaps I could tell the House that he persistently invited me to visit a club in the west end of London with which he was acquainted in some way. People there greeted him with the words, "Hello, Nigel" and me with "Hello, Mr. Flynn". As members of the House of Commons drugs misuse group, we went to inspect the drug precautions in the club. We inspected every floor and every area of the club, we saw the cameras, and everything seemed to be entirely in order. People there were very pleasant to us and explained what a wonderful drug policy they had. A fortnight later came the news that that club had become the first one in Britain to be shut down because of the open and blatant sale of all illegal drugs. I think it was called "Home" in Leicester square. It was useful to gain from the experience of the hon. Gentleman and visit his club.

Mr. Evans: Not my club!

Paul Flynn: The hon. Gentleman was well known there. His fame must have gone before him.

The Bill is another example of evidence-free legislation. All the organisations that have any merit have criticised the Bill. Drugscope, which represents more than 900 agencies, is highly critical, as is TurningPoint. Lord Victor Adebowale said:

"We need to focus on making current treatment programmes more effective, not dreaming up new offences to shovel people into the system. Instead, we see both the Conservative and Labour parties in a pre-election pantomime trying to prove who's toughest on drugs."

Absolutely right. Release said:

"It is a matter of concern that some of the best and most creative elements of the government's drug strategy are becoming distorted by virtue of misguided attempts to placate populist criticisms to the effect that it is insufficiently 'tough on drugs'."

Last week I attended the World Health Organisation's conference on mental illness as a representative of the Council of Europe. It was a ministerial conference and one of the main issues before us was a report from the European monitoring centre on drugs and drug abuse. The figures for what they call co-morbidity and we call the dual diagnosis were frightening. The report quoted 80 per cent. of people with serious psychiatric problems also having serious problems of drug dependency. There is also a problem with smoking. A huge percentage of the people in mental hospitals are smokers, a far greater proportion than among those who are not mentally ill.

Over the years, unanimity among all parties in the House on a Government policy has meant that it has not worked. We accept the increase in the number of cases of rehabilitation and treatment. My hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) is an expert on the subject. Treatment usually means abstinence, and it is coerced abstinence, which is never very effective. If it is voluntary abstinence, there is a good chance of people coming off the drug, but there is a dreadful failure rate for those involved in drug treatment. It is no way of taking people outside the system.

We should consider what every group has suggested. A report was prepared by the group that advises the Prime Minister, suggesting that we should take a different line. In a splendid report, the Home Affairs Committee suggested that we try at least one intelligent idea that has been used successfully throughout Europe: users rooms for people who are inveterate addicts and who have been on programmes of rehabilitation and assistance for a number of years. I visited one of those in Amsterdam, and it was dealing with 400 addicts. Those people were unlikely ever to get off drugs, but the programme allowed them to use drugs that were clean, of known strength, and under circumstances in which there is assistance in case of trouble afterwards. An IT programme is provided, and those involved publish their own newspaper and have support. Many of them go back into the world of work and are rehabilitated. There is even a home for geriatric heroin users in Amsterdam, which we do not have here. Sadly, our addicts tend to end up on the streets, taking heroin of unknown strength and purity in unhygienic conditions, with dirty needles, and they have a short life span.

We used to have a system in this country, before the 1971 Act, in which those people who were addicted to heroin could get hold of it from the national health service. That was contained, it worked, and there were virtually no deaths. Many of the people involved became addicted during the first world war through the use of diamorphine in battlefield surgery. One woman who took heroin in that way was the author of the book, "National Velvet". She was taking a prodigious dose of heroin, and eventually died in her bed, at the age of 91.

Under our current system of prohibition, however, addicts are unlikely to see a full life. It is not the drug that is killing them—that is not to suggest that it is not dangerous—but the drug laws passed by us in the House. We will place an increased burden on those with mental illness—we are doing it, and the decisions cannot be pushed off to anyone else. In many cases, people sincerely believe that prohibition is working, although I cannot understand why, given that it has been shown over and over that it is not, and that it makes matters worse. There is also an element of populism: we are unlikely to get a sensible change with an election in view. Sadly, an attempt to gain popular appeal is very much what lies behind the Bill.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab): I apologise to my hon. Friend for not being in the Chamber to hear the beginning of his comments. He claims that prohibition has resulted in increased drug usage, yet the legalisation of alcohol has also led to a massive increase in alcohol consumption. Can he comment on that in relation to his analysis?

Paul Flynn: When alcohol was prohibited, the use of alcohol decreased, but people moved from drinking beers to drinking distilled spirit—moonshine—the alcohol content of which was difficult to control, and it was toxic in many cases. There was also an increase in drug deaths. The worst effect, however, was the creation of empires of crime, with the result that an illegal market supplied the product. That went on for 13 years and then came to an end. At the same time, around 1920, the drugs that are illegal now became illegal throughout the world. A right-wing evangelical group in America spread their message throughout the world. We did not prohibit alcohol, but we did prohibit cannabis, heroin and cocaine, all of which we used as medicines for years before that, which had been doing little harm. The use of those increased, and the people in America who were selling moonshine moved on to selling illegal chemical drugs.

If any Government wanted perversely to cause problems, they would decide that khat, which was mentioned earlier, and magic mushrooms should become class A drugs. The results, as I mentioned in an intervention, are absolutely certain. I have a large Somali population in my community, and khat is undesirable. It is not on a par with many legal drugs. It is chewed, and has a certain effect whereby people end up with a headache in the morning. It is not hallucinogenic, but it is undesirable because people waste a lot of time doing it. Many of the elders in the Somali and Yemeni communities are opposed to its use. It has been used in the Yemeni community in Cardiff and the Somali community in my constituency for 100 years. If it is made illegal, as the Government hinted that it would be, along with magic mushrooms, the immediate effect will not be reduction in its use; instead, it will become attractive, as it will have the appeal of forbidden fruit. There will be illegal users, the price will go up, and the profits will go up. The Government will therefore give an incentive to an entirely new illegal market. It could move from being a minor drug used by very few people to one that is used as greatly as many other drugs.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Illegality does not destroy the market—I am surprised that the Tory Front Bench team does not understand the market—it still exists, and competition always exists within a market. In an illegal enterprise, the only way in which people can compete is to use violence against their competitors. Because they are in an illegal market, their competitors cannot go to the police for protection from the violence being used against them. A pattern of increasing violence therefore results. That is exactly what happened in America during prohibition, when the murder rate skyrocketed, and it is what is happening today in our inner cities, where crime is being fuelled by an illegal drugs market.

Paul Flynn: Another example of the unreality of our world is that we are signed up to a United Nations programme that is being run under the deluded battle cry, believe it or not, of "A drugs-free world, we can do it". It claims that it is "on target" to eliminate all coca, cannabis and opium cultivation by 2008, which is a delusion of Olympic proportions.

We should consider what America has done with Colombia, as we are about to repeat the same process in Afghanistan—we are about to Colombia-ise that whole section of central Asia. In Colombia, for 30 years, America has been destroying the crops by spraying, wrecking the livelihood of people living on less than a dollar a day. That has not worked, and world consumption of coca and all drugs has increased. In Colombia, there has been a slight decrease in production, but that has been replaced by production in Bolivia and Peru. Colombia is in continual bloody chaos, with three armies fighting a civil war.

John Mann: Is not the history of Colombia that cocaine production only began there in 1975, that before that there was no Colombian cocaine production, and that cocaine production in Colombia was begun by both right-wing and left-wing extremist factions to fund their activities, rather than the other way round?

Paul Flynn: Coca, of course, has been cultivated for at least 1,000 years, and was used mainly by people in Bolivia as an appetite suppressant and to counter altitude sickness. They chewed it, and western man—it almost certainly was a man—discovered that if coca is taken without the process of chewing, thereby avoiding contact with saliva, it is a hallucinogenic drug. We are trying to solve the problems that we have on the streets of Birmingham, and which the Americans have on the streets of Chicago, by wrecking the economies and the peace of third-world countries.

Mr. Evans: Just over a year ago, I visited Colombia, where I met British police officers who were liaising with Colombian security forces to help them tackle the drug problem. Surely we should not give up and allow Colombia and other countries to grow cocaine and other drugs. We should examine other countries—the hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) has mentioned Peru and Bolivia—and obtain the same sort of co-operation between them and countries that live under the scourge of drugs, such as the United Kingdom, the United States and others, to ensure that we spread the co-operation that we extend to Colombia.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. We are moving away from the core of the Bill and into a discussion about Colombia, and we are in danger of repetition. May I say to hon. Members who want to catch my eye that ever-longer and more frequent interventions are not helping the cause?

Paul Flynn: The United States has led the world to believe that harsh prohibition by fighting and by spraying crops will somehow reduce the problem. My point is that prohibition increases the problem. The only way in which to collapse the illegal, irresponsible and criminal markets in this country and in most other countries is to replace them with legal, regulated and controlled markets. Nobody is asking for a free-for-all that would expose people with children or people with mental health problems to drug use.

A legal market reduces the need for control. To a great extent, that is what has happened in Holland, which accounts for the success of its policies over 25 years. Drug use by children is not a problem in Holland. Policing is much easier if one allows balanced adults to make their own choices. We would not dream of prohibiting alcohol or tobacco, although they do a great deal more harm and are more toxic and addictive than other drugs.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: Drugs are illegal in this country, and they would have to be legalised if we were to end up where the hon. Gentleman wants us to end up.

[Mr. Laurence Robertson]

Legalisation would surely send out a message. We should learn the lesson from lowering the classification of cannabis, which sent out a message that confused young people, many of whom thought that cannabis had been legalised. This place is not only about passing laws, but about sending messages.

Paul Flynn: In the eyes of most of the population, cannabis is legal now. In practice, my local police force and most police forces treat cannabis as though it were a legal drug. They do not waste time arresting people and taking them to prison, and they certainly do not waste time dealing with people who take cannabis as a medicine. Young people have made their own decision, and public opinion is in advance of that in the House—we are behind. People see the use of cannabis in the same way as the use of tobacco or alcohol, both of which are undesirable.

Members of Parliament are a group of people who have had no experience of drugs in our youth, except for certain Conservative and Labour Front Benchers. The Home Secretary has said that he used cannabis in his early life and the shadow Chancellor has also said that. That strengthens the argument that cannabis is the start of a slippery slope. If one starts on cannabis, one ends up on one or other of the Front Benches, which is marginally better than the gutter, I suppose.

We should follow the policies that work. America should not be used as a model. In America, 2 million people, most of them young blacks, are in jail for soft drug use. When I entered this House, 40,000 people in Britain were in jail. Now 70,000 people are in jail, most of them for drug offences, which are no more dangerous than taking many other ordinary drugs.

Now we have this awful knee-jerk legislation. I never thought that I would say this in the House, but I hope that the revising Chamber will have the good sense to sabotage, wreck and obstruct the Bill in any way possible. At least the House of Lords contains one ex-heroin addict, who can talk from a great deal of experience. The Front Benchers were reticent when they discussed the Bill. Turning magic mushrooms or khat into drugs that are treated in the same way as cocaine and heroin is a crime-creation measure, and we cannot go ahead with it.

The market is chaotic and out of control. The vulnerable people who are hit hardest are those who have the dreadful misfortune to suffer from a psychiatric illness and to have a drug problem. They are more exposed to illegal pushers than they would be if they lived in a country in which drugs were decriminalised, because it would then be much easier to concentrate on their protection. We must seriously examine the harm caused by drugs, which includes an increasing number of deaths, and the increasing use of drugs by psychiatric patients. The buck stops here. All parties have made wrong decisions on the matter since 1971, and the result has been a vast increase in the abuse of all drugs.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn), who made an interesting and thoughtful speech—I agreed with some parts of it and disagreed with others. I was particularly struck by his description of the Bill as one of the most dangerous, populist and knee-jerk Bills to come before the House since the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991. If he considers the content of the past few Queen's Speeches, he will realise that he is setting himself an exceptionally high standard.

In all fairness, although the Bill is a good attempt, the Government have not quite managed it. It has more than a whiff of populism about it, and, as the hon. Member for Newport, West observed, the timing, coming as it does in the run-up to an expected general election, is no coincidence. That is unfortunate because, as other hon. Members have observed, drugs are one of the most serious and profound scourges to affect many of our communities. Although today's debate has been good and has ranged fairly widely, the communities that we serve deserve better.

It is an established fact that the United Kingdom has one of the highest rates of illegal drug use in Europe. Some 4 million Britons report using illegal drugs in the past 12 months, and the crime associated with illegal drugs costs society £16 billion a year. No community is immune from drugs. Because of its geographical remoteness, my constituency is often seen as being somehow safe from some of the worst social ills faced by metropolitan communities. Although it is certainly true that we do not suffer the same problems to the same extent, in my constituency, and particularly in Shetland, a growing pattern of hard drug misuse is emerging. We have seen drugs deaths, which would have been unthinkable 10 or 15 years ago.

Before I entered this House, I was a solicitor in criminal court practice working along the Moray coast and in Aberdeenshire. I have seen heroin take a grip on fishing communities such as Fraserburgh and Peterhead and the damage that it has done to them. Those areas have a strong sense of community, which should have afforded them some protection, but such is the strength of the threat that it has not done so.

Unlike the Conservative party, Liberal Democrats do not oppose the Bill, but we can see room for improvement.

Mr. Clapham: The hon. Gentleman says that the strength of the communities that he represents has been undermined by heroin. Has he asked his CDRP—crime and disorder reduction partnership—whether it has done any recent research in relation to the audit that it will carry out, and does it show that there has been a decrease in heroin use?

Mr. Carmichael: To be quite clear, I said that there was a growing hard drug misuse problem in my constituency. It would be overstating the case to say that we have yet been undermined in the same way as some of the other communities in which I worked previously but do not represent. Heroin may have reached Shetland, but as far as I am aware, CDRPs have not yet reached our shores, although we may have similar organisations. The police and other social agencies in my constituency tell me that they are increasingly concerned about the growing use of hard drugs, particularly heroin. We may be five or 10 years behind the rest of the country in this respect, perhaps because we are better able to stem the flow of drugs into the community because of the limited number of entry points into places such as Shetland and Orkney. That is an obvious geographical advantage.

It is curious that much of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill does not deal with serious organised crime; yet clause 20 of this Bill amends the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill. That gives rise to a little cynicism.

The provisions in clause 1 seem acceptable on the face of it, although some scepticism was expressed by the Secretary of State's Back Benchers, who perhaps know more about the extent of the problem that clause 1 addresses. Certainly, aggravated supply was not a phenomenon that I came across in the years that I spent in prosecution and defence in criminal court practice. If we accept that there is a mischief, the manner in which the Government are dealing with it may not be as clever as it could be. The fact is that supplying in the vicinity of a school is already illegal, as is supplying anywhere. It is already illegal to use a courier, because they would be guilty of being concerned in supply under section 4(3)(b) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. Why is the age limit of 18 stipulated for couriers? Why not 16? If the Government are to be consistent in their logic—although it is not necessarily to be commended—surely a 16-year-old school-leaver should be caught, as well as an 18-year-old.

If the procurator fiscal or the Crown Prosecution Service are on the ball, all such information should be put before the court as things stand. We should not insert a new section into the 1971 Act to say that age is an aggravating factor without determining the extent to which the sentence is to be aggravated, as happens with bail offences in Scotland. If an offence is aggravated by being committed on bail, the sheriff or judge has to make clear the extent to which that aggravation is reflected in the sentence. That is a rather more sensible way in which to proceed.

Dr. Iddon: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that whatever age limit we set, criminals will use even younger children? When I worked with Greater Manchester police on the police service parliamentary scheme, I found that children as young as 12 and 13 were conveying drugs around the Longsight and Moss Side areas of Manchester.

Mr. Carmichael: I fear that the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right and that that practice will arise. That reinforces my suspicion, further to the point made by the hon. Member for Newport, West, that the Bill owes more to window-dressing than to dealing with the problems that arise from drugs use associated with people of school age.

I have a less friendly interpretation of clause 2. Clause 1 is unnecessary, but clause 2 is potentially very dangerous. The Minister will be aware that case law already says that where the court is satisfied that the quantity of drugs alone is such that it can draw an inference of intention to supply, a conviction can follow. The Home Secretary said that different quantities would be specified in relation to different drugs. That is true, but I hope that he accepts that there will also be differences between what constitutes a dealer quantity, so to speak, in different parts of the country. An amount that would be a dealer quantity in London might differ from what would be the case in Birmingham, Glasgow, Edinburgh or Aberdeen. We will have to find some means of pulling all those different levels together, probably to the lowest common denominator, into one statutory instrument—but for what purpose? It will not leave the prosecuting authorities in any better position than that which they are in at the moment.

The danger is that a police officer who is inexperienced or not as well supervised as is desirable will find somebody in possession of an amount of drugs that is, say 2 or 3 g less than the prescribed level, and say, "We've not got enough for possession with intent to supply under section 5(3) of the 1971 Act, so we'll do them for simple possession under 5(2)." In that situation, the evidence will not be properly considered, even if it is possible to set the level in the way that the Government seem to anticipate.

As for clauses 3 and 4, it is only right that we acknowledge the practical problems that the police and other investigating authorities face in relation to people ingesting drugs, and we should try to tackle that. However, I should like the Minister to assure the House that the provisions will be used fairly sparingly and will be genuinely limited to those who are suspected of dealing and trafficking, and that meaningful safeguards will be in place to ensure that they are not used against those who would at most face charges of possession, not supply. I am thinking back to my experience as a prosecutor of having police officers coming to seek warrant applications in relation to supply allegations although all that was eventually found was a very small amount that would at most support a simple possession charge.

With regard to clause 3(5), which inserts new section 13A in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, I am uneasy about the court's right, in relation to a refusal to undergo an intimate search, to "draw such inferences from the refusal as appear proper".

Presumably those would be adverse inferences. I am not sure what is meant by the form of words that the Government have chosen to use. I hope that where such an inference is drawn it will not be akin to a presumption of guilt. As the Minister will be aware, the Home Office's own statistical bulletin shows that there were positive results in only one in seven of those who were subjected to intimate searches in 2003–04.

I am also uneasy about the right to hold people for up to 192 hours. Again, I want assurances from the Government that the provision would be used only when an X-ray or a scan shows that ingestion of some sort has taken place and some higher test than mere suspicion has been applied. If it has been established that a substance has been ingested, for example, a powdered substance in a condom is often mentioned, holding people until, one way or another, it is out—if I may put it that way—is sensible; otherwise, there is always a risk of the vessel that contains the powder bursting and the person in question suffering an overdose. I understand the force of the provision but I would like some reassurance about the guidance that will be given.

We have concerns about the provision for testing for class A drugs on arrest rather than charge and believe that it could be open to misuse. However, we will go along with it for the moment and simply say that the proof of the pudding will be in the eating. We can judge it to be a success if it leads to a greater number of people who complete treatment. I hope that it might be used to develop arrest referral procedures. Although that is a voluntary scheme, it has great potential that has not yet been realised.

We shall try to explore several issues in Committee. We want to examine the way in which the results of testing and arrest will be used and the guidance, especially for police. Could any evidence that is adduced be used in relation to further, unrelated charges? We would also like some examples of the guidance that will be given to the police to ensure that testing for class A drugs on arrest is not used arbitrarily or oppressively, in the way that is sometimes suggested that stop and search has been used.

We broadly welcome intervention orders, for which clause 20 provides. In the spirit of co-operation that the Home Secretary mentioned, we are prepared to work with the Government to ensure that the orders can be made as easily workable as possible.

Let me deal briefly with the so-called magic mushrooms, which clause 21 covers. We must accept that the current position is anomalous but I am worried about designating those substances as class A. It is unrealistic to suggest that they are on a par with heroin and crack cocaine. It is the sort of provision that brings the drugs laws and this place into disrepute because it lacks credibility in the outside world. It is an example of the need to reconsider the classification of proscribed drugs in the way in which Runciman outlined.

There could also be legal difficulties about possession. A landowner who has substances growing on his land and knows about it fulfils the tests of knowledge and control that constitute possession under section 5(2) of the 1971 Act. If the Minister can provide an alternative explanation, I shall be interested to hear it. I wonder if the clause will prove to be the provision that puts into clink the remaining country landowners who have not already put themselves there by refusing to stop hunting.

The Misuse of Drugs Act was passed in 1971. It is ironic that we tend to revisit road traffic legislation every 10 years, yet we have had 33 years during which the 1971 Act has been largely unrevised in anything other than a peripheral and piecemeal manner. A comprehensive overview and re-examination of misuse of drugs legislation is long overdue. It is profoundly regrettable that the Bill is not that comprehensive re-examination. On the basis that half a loaf is better than no bread, we will support the Bill but look for something more in the future.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): The Bill, although limited in scope, contains one provision that, slightly amended, would provide a tremendous opportunity to enhance drugs work throughout the country. I shall deal with that in some detail later.

The underlying problem in our debates about drugs is that we talk about drugs in general rather than the different types. If we were discussing cancer care, hon. Members would talk about the range of such care. For example, the diagnosis and treatment of skin cancer cannot be equated with that of liver cancer. Nobody would contemplate not differentiating in a debate on funding and organising the health service to tackle the problems of cancer. We do not do that when we discuss drugs, yet there is a great range of different drugs. We discuss the treatment for heroin as if it is the same as that for cannabis, anabolic steroids or cocaine. The treatments are different—sometimes there is a crossover, but sometimes they are entirely different. That is one of the big weaknesses in our approach to drugs.

Let me consider the specifics of the Bill. Clause 1 mentions the "vicinity of a school". When I conducted an inquiry in my constituency, 3,000 constituents wrote in and gave evidence at my instigation. More than 200 expressly made allegations about drug dealing outside the school gate. They were highly precise and they named individuals. That was a major cause of concern, especially for parents. It is obviously something that a Member of Parliament would pick up. I therefore methodically spoke to those people and found that they were wrong. Their thoughts were not wrong but they were wrong to suggest that there was evidence. They all had an anecdote but none had evidence.

I went into schools on many occasions to discuss the issue with pupils, especially but not only sixth formers. I asked them about drugs in school, at the school gate and outside the school. It would be accurate to summarise their response as deriding my suggestions. A comment was often repeated: "Why do you think we'd be stupid enough to buy or sell drugs in or just outside school? If we want drugs, we know where to get them and we'll get them. These are the kind of places where we'll get them." Parties were especially mentioned, but also premises where drugs would be supplied from time to time and individuals who were known to possess specific types of drug.

There was fairly widespread knowledge, especially in some schools, about who could supply drugs, and indeed who should be avoided. However, the idea that people would bring drugs into school or that dealers would wait at the school gate was laughed out of court. That was a great surprise to me, because although I did not believe that the problem could be tackled easily, I presumed that it could be highlighted and that something could be done about it. Only one incident could be found in police records, and it occurred significantly nearer my office than any school. Indeed, it was nowhere near a school gate. We need to consider what we mean by particularly in the light of the proposal from the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) about aggravation in relation to sale to a minor. Whether we refer to any changes as strengthening or altering the law is really a political point, but we should be more precise.

We should not give a false impression to the population at large that drugs are a major problem in and around schools. My contention is that that is not the case. Drugs in the community are the problem, not drugs in schools. These measures give our schools a bad name, and if we do not analyse the real problems, the solutions that we as legislators introduce will be the wrong ones. I therefore strongly recommend that the Government reconsider not the principle of what they are trying to achieve but whether their proposals will in fact achieve it. I do not think that they will.

My second point relates to drug testing, of which I am totally in favour. Indeed, I might go even further than the Government in this regard. Drug addicts, particularly heroin addicts, repeatedly say to me, "Test us, stop us, force us, coerce us into treatment." There is obviously no opposition from the general population to compulsory drug testing, but the drug-using population in my area also supports it. It could also be extended to drug users returning to work. The testing might need to be voluntary in those circumstances, but not necessarily. Large employers in my constituency who refuse to take people on who have a criminal record for theft—which nearly always relates to their having previously been a drug addict—would do so if drug testing were available to them.

I am suggesting that there should be compulsory drug testing, and that people with a criminal record for theft or for drug addiction who apply for jobs should accept that as perfectly reasonable. What form should such a system take? There is an important opportunity for union negotiation in this regard. I am involved in discussing with certain unions the possibility of establishing a fair and appropriate system that would give people the chance of re-entry into the workplace.

The testing proposed in the Bill is a separate issue. The provisions talk about class A drugs, but I want to ask the Minister why we should not include class B drugs—especially amphetamines—as well. The problems caused by amphetamines are as great as those caused by cocaine, crack cocaine and heroin. They do not cause the biggest problems here—indeed, they are quite a small problem in my area—but amphetamines are the major problematic drug in countries such as Australia.

Mr. John MacDougall (Central Fife) (Lab): Glasgow council and Central Fife council have introduced a system of drug treatment and testing orders, which offer an alternative to imprisonment for people indulging in drugs. They are given the opportunity to rehabilitate rather than go through the judicial system. Does my hon. Friend agree that that would be of benefit?

John Mann: I commend that approach as more effective and more cost-effective to the taxpayer.

To return to the classification of drugs, I believe that the whole range of amphetamines should be reclassified as class A. I would like, however, to suggest an even better system. There should be three classes of drugs. The first should contain those drugs that are legal but damage people's health, such as nicotine, alcohol and certain over-the-counter drugs. Such drugs are likely to cause damage to people's health but not to the rest of the community, although perhaps we could argue about alcohol in that regard.

The second class of drug should include those illegal drugs that happen, conveniently, to be in class C at the moment. It should be made explicit, however, that they can damage people's health but taking them is unlikely to lead to anyone taking action that would damage other people. In my view, it was right to reclassify cannabis as a class C drug, although I come to this argument from a slightly different angle from the Government. Cannabis can cause significant damage to health but it does not lead to people behaving in a way that would cause damage to others.

The third class of drug should contain those that we now call class A drugs—there would need to be some changes in the classification, involving the total removal of class B—which damage people's health and are likely to lead them take action that would damage the community. We know that people who take cocaine and crack cocaine regularly are likely to be more violent. We also know that people who are addicted to heroin are likely to steal to feed their addiction. Amphetamines fall into both the second and third categories, which is why I feel they should have a higher classification.

Those should be the three categories of drugs: two containing illegal drugs, the third covering legal ones. Some of the non-debates that we have about cannabis—we seem to have an obsession with cannabis—could be conducted in a more constructive context if that were the basis of drugs classification, because that is the basis on which we police those drugs, and rightly so. It also ought to be the basis on which we resource action against them. The highest priority ought to be given to those drugs that will cause damage both to people's health and to the rest of the community.

Mr. Clapham: I hear my hon. Friend's proposal for the three classifications. Will he accept, however, that a cannabis user who also drinks can present a real problem so far as antisocial behaviour is concerned? Part 4 of the Bill introduces the means of tackling such problems. In my community, cannabis dealers have been dealing to young people who have then gone out drinking. The drinking has fuelled antisocial behaviour and caused huge problems. We need to bear it in mind that there is a crossover point.

John Mann: I am no supporter of being weak on cannabis. It is a very dangerous drug in terms of the health ramifications involved in its use. I am not sure that it is the cannabis that is causing the antisocial behaviour in my hon. Friend's constituency, however—I have seen no evidence that it can do so—whereas excessive use of alcohol is clearly directly related to antisocial behaviour and other criminal activities. This is the only lack of logic in my argument. We could say that there should be two categories of legal drugs. The important point, however, relates to illegal drugs. We should place drugs that damage people's health in one category, and those that also make it likely that their user will cause damage to the community in another. That would allow us to have a much more effective debate and to take more effective action on drugs.

My third point on the contents of the Bill is by far the most important. A slight amendment would give us the opportunity to revolutionise drugs treatment, particularly for users of heroin but also for users of other drugs such as amphetamines. My proposal relates to the definition of assessors and follow-up assessors. The biggest weakness in drug treatment in Britain is without question the vagueness of the assessment procedure. Unless the Government are proposing any changes in this regard—I do not see any in the Bill—an assessor or a follow-up assessor may come from any of a whole range of professions. A psychiatry student straight out of university could be asked to make an assessment of a person's drugs treatment, for example. That is my experience, and that, in my experience, is why so much drug treatment in this country does not work.

The situation in my constituency is fascinating. Two areas are particularly unsuccessful when it comes to drug treatment. The figures are astronomically different. One small area, Worksop, is covered by Mansfield primary care trust, which does not regard drug treatment as its responsibility—it believes that primary care should not be taking the lead. The same applies, incidentally, to all other Members' local PCTs. As far as I know, the only PCT in Britain that takes a lead is Bassetlaw. My constituents in Worksop with drug problems go and see, perhaps, a young psychiatry student just out of university, who tells them "You have a drug problem," and refers them on—and on, and on. Those who live in Bassetlaw go and see a GP. They do not see just any GP. They do not see the GPs people living in Worksop and Mansfield might eventually see—GPs who do not get jobs in practices when they apply for them. The GPs in Bassetlaw are highly professional, and people living there go and see them, unless they are subject to drug treatment and testing orders.

If someone has a DTTO, a probation officer makes the decision. The only constituents in Bassetlaw who do not manage to see a GP for drug treatment are those with DTTOs. Some do, but not all do. A probation officer can look me in the eye and tell me what drug treatment should be given—what substitute drug should be prescribed, and what the dosage should be. That is the system that we have in Britain. That was the mess we had in Nottinghamshire, and still do in some parts of it. That, indeed, is the mess that we have in most of Britain.

Were we to include in the Bill the modest proposal that the assessor could be the local GP—or, far better, should be, but I think the response would be that the health service is not quite ready for that—it would provide an opening to a drug treatment service that would work in most parts. Sweden has now moved away from residential rehabilitation, which is not particularly successful, and towards a GP-led service that is highly coercive. Someone caught with drugs in Sweden can be put straight into a secure unit—it is called a hospital—with locked doors. They will stay for five days, and when they come out their GPs will treat them. I would love to see that system operating in Britain. Sweden resources it very well.

Although the Swedish system is not residential rehabilitation—one of the Opposition parties seemed confused about that—it is coercive, and it is compulsory. The parents of young people must accompany them to counselling sessions, and I think we could adopt that model as well. In my area, coercion is not the problem with DTTOs—quite the reverse: the problem is the treatment modality.

Two years ago, only two people in my area were being treated by a GP. Today the figure is about 320. I do not have the precise figure, because it is rising daily. Virtually no one has dropped out: the drop-out rate is no more than 2 or 3 per cent. The figure has been rising for 18 months, so this is not a flash in the pan. Strangely, crime has fallen during the same period. The average number of burglaries in west Bassetlaw is down from 80 to 20 a day. I believe that that is the biggest fall in acquisitive crime in Britain. I stand to be corrected, but that is what the police tell me. The reason is simple: all the drug addicts who were doing all the thieving, burgling and shoplifting, or at least a significant proportion of them, are now having treatment.

There are other benefits to the economy. Some of those people are returning to work, and instead of being benefit recipients they are becoming taxpayers. They are contributing to society. I think that that is a rather good definition of rehabilitation. People can go to their own GPs in their own communities. What is the first thing most of us do when we move house? We register with a GP. In a sense, that defines living in a community. It is wrong that a person's own GP should not be prepared to treat that person for an illness that is having an impact on the rest of the community. More than just medical treatment is needed from GPs: psychological treatment is important as well.

All the evidence from Sweden, France and Australia suggests that when people go back to work, the vast majority no longer commit crimes and do not use the drugs that were causing them problems earlier. There are other benefits. Two years ago, 173 people were admitted to Bassetlaw hospital's accident and emergency department following drug overdoses; in the past 12 months, 39 have been admitted. The situation is much better for my constituents, who no longer see so many drug addicts clogging up the accident and emergency queue, and it means a phenomenal saving for the hospital.

There is even better news about in-patient admissions for drug-related illnesses. Deep vein thrombosis is the main reason for a heroin addict to be admitted. Two years ago, at any one time two beds in Bassetlaw hospital would be occupied by drug addicts. Other patients stood a fairly good chance of having a drug addict in the bed next to them. That has been reduced by 400 per cent.

There is a further saving to the health service. The hospital's main worry was that drug suppliers—friends of patients, rather than dealers—would go on to its premises to provide heroin or amphetamines for their friends. That is now a very small problem, because hardly any addicts are occupying hospital beds. The most startling development, although it is not one that most of the community is bothered about—it mainly concerns the mothers and families of addicts—is that whereas two years ago there were 11 overdose deaths, there has been none in the past 12 months. Those statistics are not mine—they are official, although that does not necessarily mean that they are undeniable. Because they mirror what has happened in France, Australia and Sweden, they should dictate what we do here, especially when it comes to treatment for heroin addiction.

I recently met the prisons Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins), who told me that the Prison Service was adopting essentially that approach. I am pleased about that, because it is the right approach, but it should be built into the Bill, because giving assessment duties to probation officers or drugs workers—whatever that means—constitutes a fundamental weakness. We should be methodically beginning to ensure that whatever treatment is provided is under the control of a person's GP. If a GP wants to refer someone for residential treatment for a week, a month or six months, that is excellent if it is appropriate for that person. If GPs want to involve specialist mental health care, as those in my area regularly do, they should be able to. The GP should be the pivotal point in the treatment. That is the big difference between us and countries that have been far more successful with drug treatment.

Modest though the Bill is, with those slight amendments it could put real pressure on the health service to deliver. The levels of crime reduction and health improvement that we are seeing in my area could then spread to the rest of the country.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann), who has been interested in drugs policy for as long as I have known him. He has looked at best practice in a number of countries that he has visited, identifying where things are going right and where they are going wrong. We should all be looking for examples from around the world, although we may not be able to replicate them exactly because ours is a different society. Some countries can do things that we simply could not replicate here because our culture is somewhat different, but it is still important to take note of those countries that have got it right, and to see whether we can take the best of what they do and put it into practice.

I agree that the Bill, which I shall certainly support, is modest, and we should try to improve it and strengthen it in Committee. This is an opportunity to see exactly what we can do to improve the quality of life of everybody in this country who is dogged by drugs in some way or other: those who are personally hooked on drugs and who want to get off them; the families who suffer as a result; and the wider community, which suffers because of the drug dependency of certain individuals. We need to tackle that problem and although the Bill is a step in the right direction, we can take some further tentative steps to ensure that it is more effective.

I should clarify what the hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) said about our visit to a club over a year ago.

Mr. Carmichael: Stop digging.

Mr. Evans: Indeed, and if Members can hear an echo reverberating, it is because I am at the bottom of the hole in question. As well as being a former chairman of the all-party group on drugs misuse, I am also a vice-chairman of the all-party music group, and it was in the latter capacity that I, along with the hon. Gentleman, was invited to that club. The hon. Gentleman made it sound as though I was a regular visitor, but that visit was the first for both of us. We were given a tour of the club and, as he said, we examined each of the several floors and the closed circuit television system, and considered the club's use of bouncers on the front door and the staff's general attentiveness. We were impressed by what the club was trying to do. Young people visit nightclubs and we want to make them safe environments for everybody. Although that club's policy—as shown to the hon. Gentleman and me, at least—was absolutely right, it clearly was not as effective as it should have been because, as he pointed out, it was closed down a couple of weeks later because of drug use and dealing on the premises. That does not alter the fact that all clubs have a duty to play a role in ensuring that their environments are safe for young people to enter, free from the scourge of drugs.

The Bill arrives against the very worrying backdrop of the United Kingdom's now topping the European league table for cocaine abuse; indeed, in that regard we have reached a level similar to the United States. UK levels are twice the average of any other country in Europe, apart from Spain. That is not a record to be proud of. An extremely worrying reported add-on is that 5 to 7 per cent. of Britons aged 15 to 24—we should remember that age group—have used class A drugs recently, with the levels in towns and cities likely to be "substantially higher".

On cannabis, the report in question says that English boys are more likely than other European teenagers to have smoked a joint, with 42 per cent. admitting that they have tried the drug. Some 42 per cent. of boys and 38 per cent. of girls aged 15 in England have tried cannabis at least once. In Greece, Norway and Sweden—Sweden has been mentioned time and again, so we should probably go there to find out exactly what is going on—the corresponding figure is 10 per cent. England also has the highest proportion of heavy users, with 10 per cent. of 15 and 16-year-old boys having smoked cannabis more than 40 times in the last year. That is a hugely worrying statistic, and drug crime is of course on the rise. Indeed, there are an estimated 1 million users of class A drugs in this country.

I agree with the hon. Member for Bassetlaw about schools. The picture is being painted of a school system completely riddled with drugs and drug abusers, but that certainly is not the case in my constituency. I am not saying that no instances of drug use have occurred during my 12 glorious years as Member of Parliament for Ribble Valley—of course they have—but the headmasters there have cracked down on the problem extremely well and have received great support from the local community in doing so. The problem does not exist in every school and classroom every day of the week, and we must ensure that that remains the case.

I support the Bill's provision on drug dealing within the vicinity of a school. One young person abusing cannabis or class A drugs is one too many, and if we can prevent that from happening by stopping dealing within the vicinity of schools, or within schools themselves, that is what we must do. I was interested in what the Home Secretary said about possible funding of drug-testing equipment for schools. All school budgets are clearly somewhat constrained these days, so in areas where the problem is prevalent, schools might want to use such equipment, which they cannot afford to buy. I hope that schools that desperately need such equipment do not fail to get it for the want of resources.

If such equipment is used and certain youngsters are found to have used class A drugs or cannabis, I hope that they will then get the counselling and attention that they need and deserve. As the hon. Member for Bassetlaw rightly said, such counselling should take place in the presence of parents. The parents will obviously be greatly worried and will want to take part in the counselling so that they can learn about the problems associated with drugs. Being parents does not make them know-alls about drugs; indeed, some are worryingly ignorant of what their children get up to.

As the shadow Home Secretary said, the distinction is often made that cannabis is not a hard drug and has a "sixties" feel. However, this is 2005 and the cannabis generally available today is 10 to 20 times stronger than that available in the 1960s. It is a completely different drug. It is often regarded as being less harmful than class A drugs, but that distinction worries me. It is true that it is different, but a number of studies have pointed to the long-term effects of its use, particularly for those who start young. Indeed, I have just quoted statistics showing that a worryingly large number of young people are starting to use cannabis at a young age. Everything must be done to educate them and to get into the classrooms information on the damaging effects of cannabis and of class A drugs.

Youngsters talk to each other, so they know whether dealing is going on in the vicinity of their school. I hope that they are encouraged to give that information to the head teacher, to Crimestoppers or to another known number, so that they can play their part in cracking down on the dealers, who should be behind bars, and in saving the lives of their friends. Those who get hooked on class A drugs, or on cannabis at the age of 14, face the prospect of death. Such an initiative would give some hope that the dealers can be taken out of the system, and that such youngsters might be given the chance, which comes only once at that age, that their lives can have some meaning.

I cannot believe that the Bill has been criticised for being populist. What is wrong with populism? If introducing the measures in the Bill—along with some add-ons to stiffen it up—is popular in the country, what is wrong with that? What is wrong with ensuring that kids will not face drug dealers at the school gates, or be dealt drugs by a sixth-former? What is wrong with stopping the problem at source?

Mr. Carmichael: The hon. Gentleman is falling into the same populist trap. Such conduct is already illegal, and this provision is characteristic of much that the Government do, in that, in order to be seen to be doing something, they criminalise an already illegal act.

Mr. Evans: Clearly, dealing in drugs is illegal, but ensuring that it is viewed as aggravated if it is carried out in the vicinity of a school is absolutely right. We should send that message out repeatedly to drug dealers—that they will be dealt with in a much more severe fashion if they are caught. Also, if youngsters are being used as couriers, that must be stamped out as well. Drug dealers are some of the worst people in our society, and they will stoop to all sorts of tricks to ensure that their dirty trade continues. If they can get away with using kids to sell to kids, they will do it.

I therefore support the Bill's provisions on dealing with drugs in the vicinity of schools. The Government know that my private Member's Bill is due on 25 February. I have been accused of being populist in respect of that, too, but I do not mind. My Bill is concerned with the people who deal drugs to youngsters. As the shadow Home Secretary mentioned, it is concerned not only with dealing in schools. For goodness' sake, young people go to a number of places, whether it be pop concerts, football grounds, youth clubs or whatever—they are all over the place. Frankly, anyone who deals to youngsters should be viewed as having committed an aggravated offence. That status should not be confined to those who deal within the vicinity of schools. I hope that we can look further into that in Committee to extend the red light to wherever young people are.

My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) made a compelling point about the drug testing of drivers, which is important when accidents have taken place. We should ensure that drug testing happens. Everyone knows about the dangers of drink-drivers, but the same applies to drugs. In 1984—I think that that was the date mentioned earlier—I am not sure that the methods for testing were as sophisticated as they are now; so let us look further into that matter in Committee.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that, in some parts of the United States, offences caused by motorists subsequently found to be under the influence of drugs, particularly cannabis, outnumber the cases of drivers being under the influence of alcohol? Of course, drugs stay in the system for much longer than alcohol.

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I believe that cannabis can stay in the blood system for about 30 days; the effects can certainly last longer. If that is what they are doing in the United States and it amounts to good practice, perhaps we should investigate further and find out what equipment they are using and how best to use it in this country. The United States is one of my favourite countries and the Americans know how to crack down hard on alcohol. Anyone going into a pub there has to be 21, demonstrating that the Americans know about the damaging effects of alcohol. Overall, when it comes to drugs in America, the percentage is about the same as in the United Kingdom. The US does not have such a great record on drugs as it does on alcohol.

Searches are another aspect of the Bill. I sometimes feel uncomfortable about the issue. I am often as concerned about civil liberties as the next man, and I was amused by what my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham said about whisky in that regard. Civil liberties are important, but so is people's ability to live their lives free of the scourge of drugs. I understand why intimate body searches of those accused of concealing class A drugs must be voluntary, and I therefore understand the Bill's caution in that respect. People also have to sign up to X-rays, but they do not seem to me to be the same as intimate body searches. I would have thought that anyone suspected of dealing in drugs should have an X-ray whether they like it or not. If there is good evidence to suggest that they are concealing class A drugs, they should be X-rayed. I understand that, later in the Bill, it is made clear that the courts can take a refusal to consent to an X-ray into account. Again, I would like to look further into the issue in Committee.

On rehabilitation, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Bassetlaw and others, we should reflect on what happens in Sweden, where GP-led rehabilitation takes place. That seems to be right for Sweden, but we do not yet know whether it is right for the UK. We do not know whether it would work in exactly the same way. What we do know is that there simply are not enough places for the people who need rehabilitation. I believe that we have only about 2,000 places, yet we need about 25,000.

John Mann: Over recent months, a whole series of rehabilitation places have closed. Voluntary places, under the brand name of "team challenge", have been shut down because there is not enough demand for them.

Mr. Evans: If someone is convicted of a class A drug offence and sent to prison, they should not just be left in prison for whatever the term of the sentence. We need to ensure that they can rehabilitate themselves while they are in prison. Sadly, we all know of cases where that has not happened, perhaps because of shortages in resources or in the number of trained personnel required for rehabilitation. The skills required are demanding and we need to ensure that we get the right people to help those who are hooked on drugs. Whether it is done under GP referral or in residential centres, it is crucial to get the right people to assist with treatment. If we are to crack down on drug dealers and give some hope to those who are hooked on drugs, we must ensure that the places are there in some form. I hope that the Government can assure us that that will happen. There is no point in convicting people if we cannot give them the assistance that they so greatly deserve.

Prohibition has been mentioned repeatedly, but it is clearly not part of this particular Bill, as it represents tackling the problem from the opposite direction. If legalisation of drugs were the answer, I suspect that it would already have happened somewhere. It would have been seen to have been a great success and we would all be following the example. However, I suspect that the vast majority in the House and in the country believe what I believe: that if drugs are made more generally available, even through a legal system, more people will use them. My hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) referred to the signals that we send. One can only imagine the sort of signals that would be sent if we legalised or decriminalised the use of class A drugs. It would be a complete shambles. We have seen the effect of being softer on drugs in other countries and we do not need to repeat their mistakes.

On the reclassification of cannabis, I refer to the Brixton experiment. The comments of many people, from police chiefs through vicars to mums, testify to the greater availability and use of cannabis in that area since that experiment started. Let us learn the lesson. Part of my private Member's Bill deals with the reclassification of cannabis. As I said, a number of reports have been published about the longer-term effects of cannabis. We should not put it on a pedestal and say that it is okay and that only dirty class A drugs are harmful. We need to tackle all drugs.

When the former Home Secretary first appointed the drugs tsar, Keith Hellawell, I thought that it was a good decision. He brought out an annual report; we had an annual debate; and targets were set, if not always met. At least there was a focus of attention and a strategy. There seems to have been a blurring of late. We may not be able to go back to having a drugs tsar, but I hope that we can get back to having an annual report and setting targets.

I hope that the Bill will be amended to make it stronger. Pressure can be exerted—from Conservative and Government Members and others—against drug dealers, whether they are dealing with class A drugs or cannabis. We should set targets to ensure that our policies are working effectively. We must aim to clean up our schools and the places where our young people go, so as to ensure that our communities are safer and free of the fear of crime fuelled by drugs.

The Bill is a good start. It goes in the right direction, but I hope that discussion in Committee and in the other place will strengthen it and make it more effective.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): I shall touch on three issues—the national scene and the rationale behind the Bill, the local drug scene in Barnsley, and finally the content of the Bill and ways in which it might be improved.

I heard what was said by my friend the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) about Keith Hellawell, the former drugs tsar. However, the development of the Government's drug strategy since 1998 has brought good results, which my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) described. I hope to illustrate that when I set out the improvements achieved in Barnsley through the application of various programmes within the framework of the Government's drugs strategy.

This Bill will toughen the law to reinforce the fight against drugs in our communities. The organisations DrugScope and Training Point have some concerns about that, which I share. I hope that in Committee we will be able to concentrate on the points that those bodies have raised. In particular, I hope that treatment will be improved by taking on board what they have said.

The renewed drive to tackle class A drugs has achieved good results in Barnsley already. I shall give some of the details later in my contribution, but that success has been achieved within the framework of the Government's strategy. There is still quite a long way to go, but there are signs that progress is being made and that there have been improvements throughout the community. That is why I support this Bill, although I believe that taking on board the suggestions of the two bodies to which I have referred will make it better.

All hon. Members know that drugs cause misery. They fuel crime and antisocial behaviour, and the latter problem is dealt with by part 4 of the Bill. In my constituency, we had some problems about 18 months ago with young people who combined the consumption of softer drugs with drinking alcohol. That caused a real problem in the community, but we have tackled that problem locally and seem to have got on top of it. As I have said on many occasions in this House, the crime and disorder reduction partnerships offer a good mechanism for bringing together all the agencies in a locality to tackle crime and disorder.

Some developments have been especially good. For example, our local primary care trusts work with wardens in the communities, and that has enabled us to tackle problems of antisocial behaviour caused by drug taking and fuelled by alcohol. Nevertheless, the cost of dealing with these problems is enormous. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) put it at about £16 billion, but all sorts of figures are thrown around, with some estimates as high as £19 billion. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister, when she winds up, will say what the real cost is. It is difficult to be accurate about such matters, as programmes run in each local authority area tend to overlap. It is also hard to estimate the cost of police and court time, and of the work done by the probation service, treatment centres and social services. Nevertheless, the amount of money involved is clearly enormous and must be between £16 billion and £19 billion.

There is clear evidence that the Government strategy is beginning to work. It deserves to be supported, even if that means that we must bear a greater part of the cost. The Bill gives us an opportunity to come to grips with many of the problems in our communities.

The link between drugs and crime is especially pertinent in my constituency, and in Barnsley as a whole. The local authority publicised a very interesting statistic after a survey was conducted in the mid-1990s. It stated that, in 1975, Barnsley was 15 per cent. below the national average when it came to crime but that, by 1994, the area was approaching 20 per cent. above that level.

Two significant things happened in that period—the dislocation of the local economy as a result of the colliery closures, and the advent of drugs. Cannabis and heroin are the main drugs and they had become a real problem by the mid-1990s. There is no doubt that heroin had an impact on the statistics that I have just set out.

On the national scene, it is evident that there is a relationship between drugs and crime. For example, the national England and Welsh drug abuse monitoring project—New Adam—conducted surveys and interviews involving 3,091 arrestees. The findings showed that 60 per cent. of them acknowledged a link between their drug use and their offending behaviour, and that there was a strong association between the use of heroin and cocaine and levels of acquisitive crime. Users of both heroin and crack cocaine reported that they needed an illegal income to pay for their drug use of about £24,000 a year on average.

The same conditions apply to Barnsley. Much of the local research shows that users of cocaine and heroin resort to acquisitive crime to pay for their habit.

John Mann: Does my hon. Friend agree that the actual figure is far greater than £24,000? The figure of £24,000 represents the cash value of the stolen goods, not their actual value. If someone steals a computer worth £2,000 and sells it for £10, the difference is £1,990.

Mr. Clapham: My hon. Friend makes his point clearly, and I agree with him. The research shows that the cost of drugs in terms of crime in our communities is considerable. To tackle crime effectively, we must tackle the drugs problem. On a positive note, a growing body of evidence suggests that if offenders receive advice and treatment at various stages in the criminal justice process, their drug use and drug-related offending can be reduced substantially. That is the rationale behind the Bill.

In Barnsley, we have had a considerable heroin problem, which first became obvious in the early 1990s. A survey in 1997 by the drugs action team suggested that as many as 5,000 people in Barnsley regularly used heroin. However, that has changed since the Government's strategy began to come together in a more coherent framework. I shall refer to some of the results of the application in Barnsley of the Government's drug strategy.

In order to obtain a fuller understanding of the drugs problem, and in readiness for the latest CDRP audit across the borough, the drugs action team commissioned the Barnsley drugs market mapping exercise, which was carried out by Sheffield Hallam university. The survey was done in 2004 and has provided some useful information. I have been surprised that the debate so far has made little reference to much of the work that the CDRPs have done, especially some of the research that they are doing as we move into the third phase of the CDRP audit system.

The Barnsley survey made the point forcefully that drug misuse that is especially visible in disadvantaged areas is a significant problem in the area. We have several wards in the top 10 per cent. of deprived areas. Indeed, we have some of the most deprived areas in the country across the borough. However, the survey suggests that the drug misuse problem is not out of proportion to Barnsley's social and economic status. It also suggested that Barnsley has 1,500 problematic drug users. The term "problematic drug users" is not defined, but in 1997 Barnsley had 5,000 heroin users. I suggest that problematic drug users include those who regularly use heroin and are involved in acquisitive crime to pay for their habit. According to the survey, there were some 2,000 problematic drug users in 2000, but that has fallen to 1,500 in the latest survey.

The main drug used is heroin, with a small group of crack cocaine users. There is also a strongly embedded cannabis culture across the borough and a growing powdered cocaine culture, which reflects the increased affluence of the clubbing population. As I have said, Barnsley has some of the most deprived wards in the country, but a great effort has been made by the local authority, with Government support, to renew the economy. Significant changes have been made.

It is estimated that much of all crime is drug related, especially acquisitive crime such as domestic burglary, theft from vehicles and shoplifting. In common with research in other parts of the country, it appears that many problematic drug users acquire half of the income they use to pay for their drugs through low-level crime, including property crime, benefit fraud, drug dealing and prostitution. In fact, Barnsley does not have a significant sex trade, so that factor is different when making comparisons with the rest of the country; there are reasons for that, although I shall not go into them at the moment.

The illegal drug economy of the town cannot be viewed in isolation. The research showed that a network links Barnsley and some other south Yorkshire towns to Sheffield, Leeds, Hull, Manchester, London, Liverpool and Nottingham. Heroin is established and widespread in Barnsley, although there is higher use in some communities; for example, the wards of Worsbrough, Athersley, Kendray, Thurnscoe and Goldthorpe all have higher heroin use and all are within the deprived 10 per cent. Most users go to a handful of regular dealers and most dealing appears to be small scale, although there is some evidence of established larger dealers who are usually paid in heroin.

The Government's drug strategy has had a positive impact in Barnsley, and I noted from the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw that the same was true in his area. The change in trends has been significant, which increases my confidence that the Government's strategy is working, so the Bill will be helpful in ensuring that we make that change even more comprehensive. In Barnsley, the drug user profile shows that drug users tend to be older, in their mid-20s, and that fewer young people are attracted to the scene. That suggests that we have reached a plateau, at least over the period when the research was being carried out, and that fewer and fewer young people are coming on to the heroin scene, which must be good.

More people are going through treatment programmes; for example, in 2003, 1,139 people went through treatment, while in the first three quarters of 2004, the number was 1,222, which suggests that when the report for the whole year is completed more than 1,600 people will have gone through such programmes.

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Gentleman paints an optimistic picture of Barnsley, while admitting that there is still a significant drug problem in his constituency. Does he have statistics on how many of the people who went into treatment actually completed it and on the outcomes for those individuals?

Mr. Clapham: No, not in the current statistics, but the Library research paper suggests that, largely, clients drop out because of the way the clinics work rather than because anything is wrong with the client, so we need to take on board through the Bill what has been said by organisations such as DrugScope and ensure that the available treatment is uniform across the piece, rather than showing the wide variations that my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw mentioned. We need to drive forward best practice, because that will avoid the current high drop-out rate.

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Gentleman is most generous in giving way again.

I agree that best practice must guide our footsteps. I am not trying to catch him out in any way, but does he agree that it is important that we obtain verifiable statistics on the number of users who complete their treatment and follow them up even after that, the better to inform ourselves about which treatments are successful and which are the most positive outcomes? Sadly, at the moment either that information is being unwittingly concealed or no resources are available to obtain it. We would all benefit from such information and I shall be interested in the hon. Gentleman's comments.

Mr. Clapham: I agree with the hon. Lady that we need to know the drop-out rate, so that we can address it. Certainly, I would have thought that all the crime and disorder reduction partnerships knew the drop-out rate. I will make inquiries and obtain the drop-out rate in Barnsley. Indeed, I will let her know the figure.

More than 1,600 people had passed through treatment by the end of 2004. Importantly, acquisitive crime is down very significantly. Domestic burglary is down by 31 per cent. and thefts from vehicles by more than 20 per cent. As we put more people through treatment and as we deal with drug taking—in particular, heroin, which is a class A drug—we can see the benefits in the reduction in crime across Barnsley.

In September last year, the criminal justice intervention programme and the prolific offender scheme went live. The ultimate aim of those programmes is to ensure that more offenders get access to treatment and are retained in treatment—the point that the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) made. The programmes will build on the work that is already going on in Barnsley and further improve the situation.

We must all ask whether the Bill will assist—I believe that it will—but I said at the beginning of my contribution that I share some of the concerns of DrugScope and Turning Point. Moreover, there is some merit in the points that they make in their alternative Bill, and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister has seen some of those points. It is clear that, as we increase the number of people who undertake treatment, we need to ensure that fewer people drop out—again, the point that the hon. Lady made—as well as providing ongoing support.

It is important that we can provide support in the community for people who have undertaken the treatment process. In that respect, I note that page 14 of the Library research paper states that there is evidence that those who are referred for treatment from the criminal justice system were 2.7 per cent more likely to drop out than those referred from other routes. It is important that we understand that point and that we better co-ordinate the pathways to treatment—again, something that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider to try to ensure that we have an improved treatment system that retains the people who are put into it.

The same research paper suggests that a successful treatment outcome was related to the clinic at which the client received treatment, rather than to anything that was wrong with the client—a point that I made earlier. We need to ensure that such variation is overcome. We need to drive best practice throughout the treatment system. The National Treatment Agency for Substance Misuse has agreed to that point, and it is considering how it can make the treatment more effective. We therefore need to concentrate our efforts to speed up the treatment.

It is essential that we get people into treatment as early as possible, which is why I support the Bill in its endeavour to ensure that people go from arrest and interview in custody suites to treatment. At the same time, we need to ensure that best practice is driven through the treatment centres in the system, and perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will say, when she comes to the Dispatch Box, whether there are plans to do so in co-operation with the Department of Health.

Last Friday, I visited Holden house, which is in my constituency. It is administered by the English Churches Housing Group and runs the supporting people programme, which was introduced in 2003. I am told that the programme had a budget of £1.8 billion when it started. However, the budget will be reduced over the next three years, which will threaten some of the short-term accommodation provided for young people, many of whom have mental health problems and have come through treatment to engage again with society. The programme is worth while and we should ensure that it is properly financed. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister finances the programme, so will the Minister make it aware that there are worries that cutting the programme might well result in vulnerable young people being out on the streets? The programme is cost-effective when one bears in mind the fact that a vulnerable person out on the street is likely to be attracted back to the drug scene, which will result in increased police and court time and costs and NHS costs. The programme must be continued with an adequate budget.

I support the Bill because it will contribute to the Government's drug strategy and help to make it more comprehensive. It will also help us to get more people into treatment. We need, however, to examine best practice and how we may speed up the process of getting people into treatment.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham), who made a comprehensive speech. My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), who spoke before the hon. Gentleman, is promoting a private Member's Bill on drugs. He was lucky enough to come second in the ballot and is putting his good fortune to use in probably the best way possible, given the problem that the country faces.

Although I am sure that it was unintended, I got the impression from the Secretary of State's tone that he thought that the drugs problem was being beaten, but I submit that that is not the case. I support the Bill because it is an attempt to achieve that. Although I cannot demonstrate the deep knowledge of the matter that many hon. Members have shown, I want to speak in the debate because we are not beating the drugs problem.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) said, the Bill is a step in the right direction, but only a small one. I regret to say that it is an attempt to correct the damage caused by the Government—perhaps inadvertently—when they lowered the classification of cannabis. I will make no apology for returning to that point on many occasions. The House does not only pass legislation. After all, legislation can only do so much, so we must send messages. Lowering the classification of cannabis got far more publicity throughout the country than the Bill will receive.

As I said during an intervention, I recently heard that many young people think that cannabis has been legalised. One or two Labour Members said that the police are not bothering to arrest people for cannabis crime. Let us add those two things together: if young people think that using cannabis is legal and the police are not bothering to make arrests, why should young people not take cannabis? The Government are giving the message that drugs are bad, yet that taking the so-called recreational drug cannabis is not as bad as it used to be. We cannot tackle the drugs problem seriously when we give such mixed and misleading messages.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley referred to the Brixton experience. A pilot study was carried out, but because it did not produce the results that the Government wanted, the lessons drawn from it have been forgotten. The Government hired a drugs tsar, and because he did not say the things that the Government wanted to hear, he was moved quickly to one side. That is not the way to tackle the problem of drugs.

There are good messages in the Bill and although it contains some good measures that are too strong for one or two Labour Members to take on board or agree with, such messages and measures are pointing in the right direction. However, the messages about drugs are rather weak when we compare them to some of the other messages that we send out from this place. For example, we are rightly deeply concerned about binge drinking, but we seem to hear much more about the problems associated with binge drinking—I accept that they are considerable—than about the problems associated with drugs.

I return to my point that the message about drugs is not consistent and is not strong enough. Potentially, we are turning smokers into criminals, if the Government are returned. It seems that those who have a social drink or a social smoke are being treated like pariahs, yet drug takers are having far more tolerance extended to them. Sympathy they need, and I entirely support the calls, especially those made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), for better rehabilitation, but the message about the evils of drugs, including the evils of cannabis and the psychological difficulties caused by cannabis, must be advanced with greater strength.

We have heard arguments for the legalisation or decriminalisation, whichever term we use, of drugs, especially from the hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn), who made a thought-provoking speech. He demonstrated great knowledge but I disagree with the conclusions that he drew from the extensive studies that he has obviously undertaken. He said that if an activity is illegal, it arouses curiosity, especially in the minds of the young. I suppose that that is true. I suppose that many young people are curious about what it is like to purchase alcohol if they are not 18, but I did not hear the hon. Gentleman suggesting that we should legalise the purchasing of alcohol by those who are under 18. I do not think that we can follow the logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument in terms of what happened during prohibition. When I challenged him on whether he would ban smoking in public places, he said that he would. However, that sends out an inconsistent message.

The hon. Gentleman almost suggested—I am sorry that he is not in his place to hear what I am saying—that the fact that it is illegal to possess and to take drugs made the committing of crime more prevalent. I do not follow that logic. The crime is committed to secure the money. If drug taking were legal, given their cost and their effects, many people would continue to commit crime to fund their habit. On that basis there is no logical or consistent argument.

Drug taking or drug possession must be illegal if there is to be legal consistency. The taking of drugs fuels crime and crime fuels the taking of drugs, not only crime such as burglary or theft—those are the obvious two crimes—but, as the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone said, prostitution. When prostitution is fuelled by drug taking, further problems ensue, such as the trafficking of young girls. The result is a terrible vicious circle. The outcome is also higher rates of other crime. In Northern Ireland, where I happen to spend a little time and carry out studies, the drugs trade is an industry in itself.

I cannot follow the logic of the argument that the problems would be removed if we legalised drug taking. If the crime that fuels the drugs is illegal, the drugs themselves should be illegal. As I pointed out in an intervention, if drugs are to become acceptable we would have to decriminalise them and make them legal. That process would send the wrong message. Are people who propose that drugs should be legalised suggesting that they should be sold alongside the Mars bars in the shop of my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley? That would not be appropriate, but where would people obtain drugs if they were made legal? I believe that they would probably obtain them at the same places that they obtain them now. They would buy them from dealers, but cannabis dealers, I am afraid, also deal in stronger drugs. They do not just deal in what are sometimes erroneously termed soft drugs. Where will young people be advised to buy drugs if they are made legal?

People take drugs for different reasons. Some turn to crime to fund their habit, but others may be considered the silent victims, and are members of the working population, the middle classes—whatever that means these days—and even higher classes. I telephoned Gloucestershire constabulary for advice on my speech this morning and asked how many such people take drugs. They said that, by definition, they did not know, because those people do not break other laws or steal to finance their habit. People who take drugs who then commit crime are the visible drug takers who are in the public eye but, worryingly, there are others we do not know about.

The Bill that my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley has introduced is rightly concerned with drug dealers, although it also calls for a full survey of the evils of cannabis. I am advised that if the police take out a drug dealer and he goes to prison—I am not suggesting that that should not happen—another drug dealer steps into his place and continues the supply of drugs. In other words, the demand side is probably the bigger problem. That does not mean that we should not hammer, for want of a better word, drug dealers, but a more imaginative approach is needed to stem demand as well as supply. Stemming supply might reduce usage but it might increase the cost of drugs, which could have a knock-on effect on crime, which would increase as people tried to pay for those drugs. The solution to that problem is extremely difficult, and I shall return to it in a moment.

The law, as I have said, must crack down on dealers, and the police are using the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 to do that. They say that it is helpful to be able to seize the assets of people who have been sent to prison for drug dealing because the police do not believe that prison is enough. Drug dealers, like many habitual criminals, regard prison as an occupational hazard. The police therefore find it useful to confiscate assets so that when those people come out of prison they cannot easily return to their evil trade. On the other hand, the police say that reducing those people to nothing may mean that when they leave prison, they are tempted to return to crime to get started in the drugs trade again. I do not know the answer to that problem—I am simply trying to highlight it.

The supply of drugs is highly organised and suppliers deal in all kinds of drugs. Indeed, they deal in the drugs that they can get at that particular time in order to sell on. If they can get a shipload of one kind of drug at a decent price, they will buy that drug and move it on. As I said earlier, people who supply cannabis also supply many other drugs.

Some aspects of the Bill are contentious. Testing on arrest does not seem much different from breathalysing somebody who is suspected of drink driving. If that helps the process, I do not see it as a problem. Another issue is the "reasonable" test when someone is caught in possession, to determine whether that person is a dealer, not just someone who takes drugs. "Reasonable" is probably the most important word in the English legal system, but it presents problems. What do we mean by reasonable? Is there any such thing as possessing a reasonable amount of drugs? I am not sure how the courts will determine that. The Committee may want to try to clarify the matter.

The supplying of drugs must be tackled, as must the demand. More joined-up thinking is needed. Before 1997, we heard how the Labour party would introduce joined-up government. We are still waiting for that, and nowhere more than in drugs policy. There must be a stronger link between education, health and the criminal process. We should not be afraid to teach young people about the evils of drugs, the damage they cause, the fact that they can be carcinogenic and addictive, and about how starting on cannabis often leads on to class A drugs. We should say that much more clearly than we do.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): I do not want to be antagonistic, but does the hon. Gentleman have any empirical evidence whatever to support the thesis that milk drinking leads to whisky drinking, or that cannabis smoking leads to the injection of diamorphine hydrochloride?

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that friendly intervention. No, I cannot say that drinking milk leads one on to whisky, but I am advised by many police officers that most heroin addicts started on cannabis. I am not an expert on the subject, as I said at the beginning of my speech, so I am persuaded by the views of the many police officers to whom I have spoken, who work at the sharp end of the business.

We must teach young people about the evils of drugs in terms of their cost and the health effects, and we must stress how stupid it is to take drugs. We cannot do that while reducing the classification of the so-called recreational drug. I have Front-Bench responsibilities on other days for the Consumer Credit Bill. I said on Second Reading of that Bill that legislation cannot cure all the ills, and I accept that that applies to this Bill as well. Much depends on education.

We have a difficult situation in this country, and probably throughout the so-called developed world, where attitudes do not help to combat drugs. We hear a great deal about civil liberties, and I agree with the Secretary of State when he says that one man's civil liberties are another man's ruined life. I paraphrase, but that was his general message. We must work on the basis that we believe in the freedom of the individual under the rule of law. When it comes to drugs, we need such law.

Mr. Pound: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: I hope this will be an easier intervention than the last one.

Mr. Pound: The hon. Gentleman's prayers are answered. Would he be interested to know that I think that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was trying to present to the House Sir Isaiah Berlin's famous comment that liberty for the shark does not necessarily mean liberty for the minnow?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman puts it far better than I could have put it, and far better than the Secretary of State put it, too, which is not surprising. He has been in the House an awful lot longer than I have, but I have been here long enough to know not to take him on in combat. I will not go further down that route.

I want to re-emphasise my main points: we need a stronger law, and I will therefore support the Bill, which moves us in that direction. We need the right messages to be sent from Parliament about drugs, and we need better rehabilitation treatment, and as in so many other walks of life, better education.

I want to conclude on the point with which I started: the drugs problem is not beaten, and I am not yet persuaded that, at the moment, we are beating it.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): I welcome this Bill, for one reason: that we can debate drugs in the House today. After all, it is the third largest business in the world in terms of producing the raw materials, trafficking them to nearly every country in the world, and selling them illegally, in most countries in the world, to people who suffer as a result of the illicit drugs market.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) is right that it was useful to have a drugs tsar, for one reason alone: it allowed us to have an annual report, which allowed us to have an annual debate. When we lost the drugs tsar, we lost the annual debate. Bearing in mind what I said about drugs being the third largest business in the world, I have always argued—I have raised this matter at business questions—that we ought to have an annual debate on what, after all, is one of the biggest social problems facing Britain today. We need to measure how our Executive, the Government, are getting on with the powers that we give them to tackle what is a vicious problem.

I am glad that, today, the phrase "the war on drugs" has not been used all over the House. I hate that expression. In my estimation, we cannot have a war on drugs: what we must have is a war on the causes of the misuse of drugs. In my opinion, those causes are simple: poverty and social exclusion. The poor people of Colombia and Afghanistan are forced, because they have nothing else to grow and no infrastructure to transport it, to grow the raw materials that are exported to the west—coca in one case, and heroin in the other—and in any case, there is much greater profit in that. Certainly, those people are socially excluded and poor. When the drugs come over to a modern, westernised country such as Britain, it is largely the poor and socially excluded who suffer as a result of using the end product. It is ironic that a connection exists between one country and another in that way.

Drug selling is the biggest pyramid selling racket in the world. Reference was made to the fact that someone can be taken out of the pyramid and another person pops in. That is the nature of pyramid selling—the profits in the pyramid are so great that it never collapses. Even Mr. Big at the top stays, and if he is taken out, another Mr. Big goes into the same pyramid, whether it is the Italian mafia or another organisation that trades drugs, such as the IRA. In my estimation, the only way to collapse the global drugs trade is to collapse those pyramids. Economically, the only way to collapse a global pyramid that is making fantastic profits is to collapse the profits, which can only be done by taking out the risk and all the enforcement action throughout the world.

My views on decriminalisation have been expressed in the House previously. Prohibition will never win this war, if we want to call it that. I have always argued that we should move away from the enforcement end of the spectrum and towards the health end. Many of those who take drugs are sick people—we are talking about addicts.

The hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) mentioned that a recent report about dual diagnosis states that 80 per cent. of people who misuse drugs are also mentally ill. I am chairman of the drugs misuse all-party group, which is meeting right now. Four or five years ago, we conducted a survey on dual diagnosis, which estimated that 40 per cent. of people who misuse drugs are also mentally ill. I expect that the percentage has gone up because more people use drugs now, but 80 per cent. seems rather high. Whatever the figure, we should never forget that many people who misuse drugs are mentally ill. The scale on which we criminalise mentally ill people is perhaps wrong, although if you have committed a crime, you have committed crime, and we should take those aggravating circumstances into consideration.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) referred to the difficulties with treatment services, which still fail to recognise that they are often dealing with people who not only misuse drugs but are mentally ill. People who misuse drugs often have multiple complex problems: they may be homeless; they may have been excluded from their families because of their drug misuse; they may have few friends; and they may lead completely antisocial lives. To get those people back into society requires not only a policeman on the doorstep but a complete holistic service.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw made the point that all those individuals are different—they come from different backgrounds and have had different experiences. In the past, many drug users who went into prostitution were unfortunately from care homes, which was tragic and sad. The Government have taken action by increasing care through social services from the age of 18 to the age of 21. That is one of the ways in which we are tackling the problem, and that point is often not flagged up in debates such as this.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): My hon. Friend has probably anticipated my intervention by mentioning my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw. By and large, methadone is not used in the experiments in Bassetlaw, and it is not used in France, where a drug that blocks the additional use of heroin, which prevents people from overdosing and from using heroin at the same time as methadone, is used. Is it not time that we did something as a country to try to expand such experiments? I hope to convince people in Scotland, where the main substitute for heroin is methadone, that it is time to examine other drugs that block the use of heroin.

Dr. Iddon: I am glad that my hon. Friend mentioned that point, which I shall develop in detail in a moment.

Mr. Evans: The hon. Gentleman has mentioned the psychiatric needs of many drug users, and I agree with him on that point. Although he comes at the problem from a completely different angle from me—he supports legalisation or decriminalisation and I do not—will he concede that many people who now use cannabis, which is completely different from the cannabis that was available in the 1960s, will need psychiatric services in the future if they continue to take the drug at their current pace?

Dr. Iddon: I am coming on to that point. I want to knock on the head a few myths about cannabis that have been mentioned again this afternoon. Someone—it might have been the hon. Member for Ribble Valley—said that cannabis is 10 times stronger today than it used to be. Skunk, to which I think that they were referring, contains a tremendously high level of tetrahydrocannabinol, which is the main psychoactive component of all cannabis plants. However, there are 23 different varieties of cannabis plant. I have never taken an illegal drug in my life and have therefore never smoked cannabis, but I take an interest in the subject and have been to an Amsterdam coffee shop. Many people who walk into Amsterdam coffee shops partake of not only coffee but cannabis—all the varieties are laid to choose from.

When I went to Amsterdam with the police service parliamentary scheme and visited one of the more reputable coffee shops, the gentleman on the counter, who incidentally had been a leading athlete for Holland in the Olympic games, asked me directly whether I had ever smoked cannabis before, and if so what kind. People do not get asked questions like that in Britain—they pick up whatever is on the street and do not have a clue what they are smoking. In Holland, they will be told the tetrahydrocannabinol content. If someone who has never smoked cannabis before goes into a Dutch coffee shop, they will not be sold skunk immediately—they will start on one of the 23 varieties of cannabis with the lowest amount of THC. Some people work their way up the spectrum, increasing the amount of THC content as they become veteran smokers, although I am not applauding that.

When I go to schools and talk about drugs, I never encourage any children even to try a drug, but we have to tell children the truth. We cannot simply say that the cannabis that is available today is 10 times stronger than it used to be, because that is meaningless and untrue—only one variety out of 23 is stronger. One of the mistakes that we are making is that we are not giving information to children straight. Indeed, in my admittedly limited experience, many teachers do not know the facts themselves, and children often know more than they do about drug misuse.

One of the best things that the Government have done is to start the "Frank" scheme. I applaud them for that. The "Frank" website gets an amazing number of hits—well into the multi-millions. Young people are hitting the website to find out what they cannot find out from their teachers. One hon. Member quoted the website on the question of cannabis, but that was taken out of context, because one has to read all the information that it provides about cannabis before one gets the full picture.

Mr. Pound: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his brief guided tour of the cannabis shops of Amsterdam. It is a subject that I do not know a great deal about—or if I did, I have forgotten. Is he seriously suggesting that if I entered one of these cannabis shops, suitably disguised in a wig and kaftan, and ordered a few grams of primo skunk, the owner would say, "I don't think that is entirely suitable for you, sir," and try to steer me towards cannabis indica or cannabis sativa? Surely if one walks into the shop with the guilders, one gets the gear.

Dr. Iddon: I was careful to say that I went into a reputable coffee shop. The police are closing down the disreputable coffee shops in Amsterdam, and there are now half as many as there were 10 years ago.

Mr. Connarty: My hon. Friend will recall that we visited that coffee shop together and that the athlete whom he mentioned generally advised his clients not to smoke cannabis because he had made it up in other forms that could be chewed.

Dr. Iddon: He had been smoking for most of his life, but he was getting a bit unfit and told me that he would not do it any longer.

The Road Traffic Laboratory has carried out research on the effect of cannabis on drivers. I believe that its report said that one spliff can calm some nervous drivers down enough to make them better drivers, although of course it did not recommend taking cannabis and driving. I am concerned about testing for drugs at the roadside. Cannabis stays in the fatty tissues of the body for up to 30 days—a whole month—but it is not psychoactive and will not affect a person's driving for more than a few hours. Where are the civil liberties in testing somebody six days after they have smoked a spliff, assuming that they have not smoked in between? Surely their ability to drive must be tested at the same time as testing them for cannabis, and what matters is whether they are incapable of driving. We must be aware of that point.

I do not support total decriminalisation of drugs as the hon. Member for Ribble Valley intimated. However, I recommend that the Government move the debate along and try different methods, as other countries throughout Europe are doing. The problem has only just become stabilised and is not reducing greatly. Indeed, it may increase again—I hope that it does not.

I supported moving cannabis from category B to category C on the basis of the recommendations of Dame Ruth Runciman's committee, which produced the Police Foundation report on the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. It strongly recommended the categorisation of drugs according to the harm that they cause. I agree with that. People knew that I had an interest in the subject and many, not only from my community, came to whisper in my ear. Some were professional people—not all were from poorer backgrounds. When cannabis was in category B, distinguished people—I shall not mention names for obvious reasons—approached me to ask me to keep pushing on the door. They knew that some of their children or their friends' children were using cannabis. If they were caught, the family would be stigmatised.

One of my reasons for supporting the recategorisation of cannabis was my belief that criminalising hundreds of thousands of young people, many of whom did not know what they were doing, was wrong. Criminalisation had all sorts of consequences, for example, for getting visas to visit America and answering the question on job application forms about whether they had ever been convicted of a criminal activity. It is wrong to give so many young people such a bad start in life. It was right to concentrate on category A drugs rather than cannabis, on which the police focused at the time.

I re-emphasise that we have to get the message about drugs across to young people—for example, through the "Frank" website. We must train teachers who teach children about the moral and ethical aspects of life to give proper advice so that when a child approaches them with a difficult question on a one-to-one basis, they can answer it. The Government are increasingly providing such training.

One important provision, which is in schedule 2, has not been mentioned in the debate so far. Paragraph 6 repeals the extension of section 8 of the 1971 Act, which was introduced as a result of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001. That Act extended section 8 of the 1971 Act to include not only heroin and opiates in general but all illegal drugs. Hon. Members will remember that John Brock and Ruth Wyner, who ran the Winter Comfort home in Cambridge, were caught badly by that. Those two good, honest people ran a home where homeless people could drop in—I have already mentioned the possible connection between some homeless people and drugs—and some drugs changed hands on the premises. I understand that they had been warned but the police invaded and arrested the two managers, who were in prison for quite a long time, despite an appeal and much public sympathy. That case raised fears among many people who worked in housing associations, for example, or who ran community centres—people who were looking after the most vulnerable members of our society. They were all afraid of being trapped by this extension of section 8 of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971.

To be fair to the Government, the provision in the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 has never been implemented. However, I am not sure whether hon. Members realise that if this Bill is enacted, it will repeal what I regard as that vicious measure, which will give confidence back to the people who help the most vulnerable members of society to try to give up drugs, get themselves organised, and get themselves a home and the benefits that many of those who live on the streets have never had.

The Bill is about treatment, and I have some concerns in that regard. My hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw is absolutely right. When we are discussing drugs, we should discuss each one separately as their profiles are all so different. It is pretty obvious that cannabis is very different from heroin, cocaine and crack cocaine, but they are all different. We must also remember that many members of society are poly-drug users, and I include alcohol and tobacco in the list of the drugs involved. Each drug interacts with the others in a symbiotic way. Taking one drug will not have the same physiological effect as taking a cocktail of drugs, including alcohol and tobacco.

Sometimes it is difficult to treat a person, especially if they are a poly-drug user. In this country, however, we have gone mad on methadone, methadone, methadone. Methadone is not always the right drug to use as a substitute when treating a heroin user. Since 1997, I have argued in this place that we should offer heroin addicts a choice of treatment, rather than simply sending them down to the pharmacy for the green liquid known as methadone. Of those addicts who take their methadone in the pharmacy, some are of very long standing, and those who prescribe the methadone are so cautious that they prescribe a dose so low that it will not give the addict the buzz that they have been experiencing on the street. We all know what they do: they go down the road, they sell as much of the methadone as they can, and they stick to the heroin that gives them the buzz. Where is the sense in that? We have to titrate methadone according to the tolerance level that the heroin addict has built up, but not many of the people in the community drug teams are able to do that. I have always argued that long-term heroin addicts should be treated by proper professional people, which is what my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw was saying earlier. I entirely agree with him. I know people who have been addicts for up to 35 years.

I want to raise a point that I feel very angry about. It concerns the General Medical Council, which has been striking off doctors who have been dealing with the most chaotic heroin addicts, particularly here in London, for a long time. The first such case involved someone whom I shall call a friend of mine, Dr. Adrian Garfoot. His brother is a Methodist minister. They were very concerned about drug addicts, and Adrian treated more than 1,000. He said that one of them came at him with an axe one night, but he managed to calm him down. Those are the kind of people that he was dealing with—truly chaotic heroin addicts of long standing who were using cocktails of drugs. We cannot send those people down to the pharmacy and give them a low dose of methadone—it will not work.

So what has the GMC been doing? I do not believe that it understands these problems. I went along to the GMC to represent Adrian Garfoot at his hearing. He had already been cleared under the Home Office's special procedure; this was his second, unofficial, trial. I looked around the table at all the middle-aged and fairly elderly ladies and gentlemen who were members of the special committee set up by the GMC to try—I use the word advisedly—Dr. Garfoot. They began to ask me questions, we had a conversation, and I concluded that not many of those who were trying this fellow who had been treating the most chaotic drug addicts in London had a clue what his business had been about. Anyway, he has gone; he can no longer practise as a doctor.

Nearly 30 people have been through the same procedure. All had treated the most chaotic of drug addicts. I do not suggest that they were all angels—there were one or two bad apples among them, and I do not deny that some may not have been doing the right thing—but Adrian Garfoot is certainly an honest, straight man. There are seven more people before the GMC now, and I feel very angry about what it is doing to the Stapleford seven.

Until he retired last year, Colin Brewer, whom I know, was head of the Stapleford clinic here in London. He is one of the few specialists in the country who can implant naltraxone patches, of which the NHS does not approve because the implantation is intrusive. Naltraxone is a heroin antagonist: try taking heroin when you have a naltraxone patch in your breast. It will make you sick. The patch lasts for up to a month, protecting the patient against heroin during that time. It is not an approved treatment in this country, but I think more research should be done on it, because it is a very good heroin antagonist.

When I came here in 1997, I argued in favour of buprenorphine, or Subutex, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) referred earlier. France prefers not to use methadone, and large parts of Australia have gone off it; they use buprenorphine. To be fair to the national health service and the Department of Health, they have introduced it now, but it is still not widely used in Britain. I think that that is a scandal, because in my opinion buprenorphine is far less addictive than methadone, which is an opiate substitute. Buprenorphine has a safer window of operation. It is possible to overdose on it, but not to the extent that it is possible to overdose on methadone.

A friend who was a synthetic organic chemist—I worked with him at Salford university—came to me with a wonderful proposal, which I put to the Department of Health, but it has gone nowhere. Methadone is a mixture of two molecules, related to each other as the left hand is related to the right. We call them L and D methadone. Only one of those molecules is physiologically active as a heroin substitute. The other stuff is useless and, of course, toxic. My friend developed a process of synthesising L-methadone, in the total absence of the other stereoisomer. That brings down the toxicity level of the same dose, with the same physiological effect, by nearly 50 per cent. in patients prescribed methadone.

I asked the Department of Health to ask this gentleman to prepare some batches and give the substance a trial to establish whether it was superior to the mixture of molecules that we currently sell people. The Americans are using laevo-alpha-acetylmethadol, or LAAM. Again I tried to interest the Department. It has sent me written replies explaining why it will not give LAAM a trial. What I am trying to get through to the Minister is this: we are unbelievably set on methadone in this country. There are alternative heroin substitute drugs, and we could be a bit more imaginative and at least conduct clinical trials on some of them.

We must not forget abstinence. Some people prefer 12-step programmes to taking a chemical to get rid of the chemical that is in their body to detoxify the chemical that they have already been on for ages heroin. We should pay a little more attention to those who want to go straight on to abstinence programmes; indeed, some treatment clinics tell me that we should offer such a choice. It is a question not just of treatment, but of choices of treatment.

Let me deal briefly with cocaine. Unlike heroin, for which methadone is the substitute drug, there is no substitute for cocaine. One cannot send people down to the pharmacist saying, "This will give you the same buzz as cocaine, even though it isn't cocaine." Such a drug does not exist. Indeed, the police and the Home Office are extremely worried about cocaine. Whereas heroin depresses people and puts them into a state of euphoria—it is a downer, rather than an upper—cocaine, particularly crack cocaine, is an upper, a stimulant. Those who are on cocaine are extremely aggressive, although their lives are admittedly short as they have to keep snorting it or smoking it, according to their preference. Such aggression is why the police are very concerned about people moving from heroin to cocaine—from downers to uppers. We should be very worried about the increase in cocaine sales, the price of which has come down tremendously.

I want to give the House some hope. Some 18 months ago, I attended a symposium on this subject at my old university, and more recently I heard the scientists speak again. Not many people are aware of the fact that a vaccine is being developed for drug addiction, although I hope that the Home Office and the Department of Health are. Would it not be amazing if, instead of substituting one chemical for another, we could get addicts off all drugs by using a vaccine? I hope that the Department of Health is proposing clinical trials of this vaccine, because it is one of the most hopeful developments in the drug treatment world for a long time.

I am all in favour of getting as many addicts as possible into treatment, but I am slightly concerned about coercing them into it. They tell me that they will give up a drug only when they are ready to do so. They have usually gone through a pretty horrific process that involved wrecking their family life and committing crime; even so, they cannot—so they tell me—suddenly decide that they will give up the drug tomorrow. Yet that is what this Bill asks them to do. It asks addicts—I am talking about real addicts, not casual users—to sign up for treatment at a time when they are not ready for it. The Home Office cannot simply coerce them into treatment programmes.

I have a second hesitation. I know quite a few drug addicts who are desperate to get treatment; indeed, my community drug team has a 12-week waiting list. That is far too long to wait. Such teams should open their doors to anybody who wants treatment, as some already do. About three years ago, I spoke to a community drug team leader who operated an open-door policy. Of course, things were chaotic and there were queues for most of the day. Back then, that team had to deal with a lot of drug addicts; indeed, it probably still does, given the location of the practice. My community drug team, however, expects people to make appointments and to turn up for them. If they do not turn up for treatment on the dot, they are put to the back of the queue as punishment. That must be wrong.

Any addict who has not yet committed a crime, but who might do so because we are not treating them properly, should be able to walk into a treatment centre and say, "I'm ready now: I want to give up my addiction." However, it is not always possible for non-criminalised drug addicts to do so, and that is my second reservation about the Bill. If we are to coerce more people into treatment, what will happen to those who are not yet involved in the criminal justice system but who might become so—and who want give up drug addiction without going round that magic wheel? I ask the Minister to think about this issue seriously.

As has been said, we have to follow people all the way through the treatment process—and beyond. All of us with an interest in drug addiction know that relapse with this disease—that is what addiction is, a sickness or disease—is much more common than for any other disease that I know of, including cancer or mental illness, though I have pointed out that some of these people have mental illness, too. They relapse. What addicts tell me is that, when they are having panic attacks or are tempted to go back on the drugs, they need somebody to talk to. It is a matter not of getting an appointment next week, but of getting one immediately.

I make a plea for 24-hour crisis centres. Having one in every town would be far too costly, but I would expect at least one somewhere in Greater Manchester. Fortunately, some of the leading charities are beginning to develop 24-hour crisis centres. We should think about how much suffering we can prevent and how much money we can save, not to mention how much criminal activity we can stop, by providing someone with the opportunity go to a crisis centre and be saved from going down the dangerous path that they have already trodden.

I have looked carefully into drug testing, as has the all-party group, of which I am chairman, and we are concerned about some of the firms that are getting on to the bandwagon. Let me say immediately that some of the firms involved in drug testing are credible and competent. However, as we expand drug testing, as recommended in the Bill, we will encounter cowboys jumping on the bandwagon and I know of no accreditation system for firms working in this sector—not even any form of self-regulation. In any case, there are various ways of testing. We can take pieces of hair, urine, blood and body fluids in general, but the most powerful non-invasive mechanism used today is taking mouth swabs, which one company is promoting and the Department of Health and the probation service have started to use. Will the Minister consider whether we should be accrediting such firms, particularly if they are being used by Government agencies?

I also want to flag up a point about "false positives". It is possible to carry out a drug test on someone and identify a positive. However, if a test is duplicated or another firm tests the same sample, it can appear that the first firm produced a false positive—the person is not, in fact, on the drug that the test seemed to demonstrate they were on. I am very concerned about that. We must have safeguards against false positives.

One of my constituents was in the Army. He had only just joined and had been in it no more than nine months when the Army carried out a random drug test on him. One day, he was picked out for a drug test and it came up positive. He did have a drug in his body and it was called amphetamine. The problem was that he had had a very serious cold and chest infection and had gone to the pharmacist, who had recommended a prescription that contained—yes, you guessed it—amphetamine. He was not an amphetamine user or addict, but had simply been taking a medicine containing the substance, which was legal and above board. As a result of being identified as positive for amphetamine, he lost his job in the Army. I made some protests to the Army about it, but I am afraid that they were unsuccessful in his case.

Finally, I want to deal with the inclusion in the Bill of provisions on mushrooms containing psilocin, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West referred in some detail. I shall not go over the same old ground. I understand why the Home Office wants to include provisions on this matter, but if I were sitting in Committee, I would be asking Home Office Ministers to provide a lot of evidence. The Bill must be evidence-based. The Government use that phrase a lot at the moment: all legislation should be evidence-based. I want to see the evidence that psilocybe mushrooms should be included among class A drugs. I have seen no such evidence, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will say whether a report on those mushrooms has been produced by the Advisory Committee on Drug Dependence. That huge body of experts should know more about the subject that anyone in the House.

I am not convinced that class A covers the right drugs. People talk about the relationship between LSD and hallucinations, but many people have hallucinations without drugs. The chemical psilocin produces a compound that causes hallucinations in some—but not all—people, so does that merit its inclusion in the class A list, along with LSD? There is even an argument that LSD itself should not be put alongside heroin, cocaine and crack cocaine in class A. That should also be discussed in Standing Committee.

Around the world, different cultures—the Aztecs, for instance—have long used natural drugs to get their kicks, instead of the alcohol and other drugs used in the west. They have done so safely, and for centuries. Mention has been made of khat this afternoon, but psilocybe mushrooms and khat are only two of the drugs that could be used. I have a list of the chemicals and plants that occur in nature, which people could use. For instance, ibogaine contains a hallucinogenic indole compound.

The Government want to include psilocybe mushrooms in the misuse of drugs legislation, possibly as a class A drug—an approach that I question. They want to do the same for khat, even though the Somali community has a cultural relationship with the drug. What else do they want to bung in class A? The question of displacement is relevant in this case. The numbers of people using psilocin is very small compared to those using heroin, cocaine and cannabis. Of course I do not approve of the use of drugs such as psilocybin and khat, but is it worth including them in a major Act of Parliament?

My warning to the Government is that including such compounds in an Act of Parliament might persuade people who do not want to break the law to use other substances instead. A similar thing happens when the police act against prostitutes in one area of Bolton. The result is that they are merely diverted to another area. That is another problem for discussion in Committee. If I were to be a member of that Committee, I should like to see a lot more evidence about psilocybe mushrooms.

I was asked to speak for longer than normal, and I have.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon), who I think followed me in the previous debate in this House on drugs. I secured an Adjournment debate on the case of Dr. Adrian Garfoot, to which the hon. Gentleman very kindly contributed. Dr. Garfoot is a constituent of mine, and I shall say more about the case a little later.

Drug addiction is probably the biggest blight on modern society. It costs many lives, and causes untold misery in thousands of families across the land. In 1954, 317 addicts were registered in this country, but the number had risen to 1,729 by 1967. Last year, 4 million people in the UK used drugs, and the Home Office estimated that 1 million of them used cocaine. Roughly 500,000 of those 4 million people are problem drug users. Replying to parliamentary questions from me, the Minister has said that there are 345,752 problem drug users in the nine English regions. In September last year, a written reply from the Department of Health stated that only 125,913 problem drug users were receiving structured treatment. That means that 219,827 get no treatment at all.

A number of hon. Members on both sides of the House have pointed out that most addicts are forced into a life of crime to feed their habits. The criminal justice costs of drug addiction are estimated at £16 billion a year. That is hardly surprising when the Metropolitan Police Commissioner estimates that 75 per cent. of all burglaries, robberies and muggings in his force's area are drugs related.

The supply of controlled drugs, as the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East pointed out, is a vast industry worth more than £8 billion a year. There are more than 100,000 dealers in the UK, but last year fewer than 10 per cent. were convicted of drug dealing. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) pointed out, with profit margins of up to 3,000 per cent., dealers can make a fortune.

I have described the context in which we should consider the Bill and judge whether it will have any impact or help those who most need it. I have maintained for some time that the criminal justice system has a key role to play in tackling drug addiction and its causes. Indeed, the drugs intervention programme is a good mechanism for identifying, assessing and diverting drug users into treatment. The Government are right to include in part 1 measures to make it an aggravated offence to be found dealing near schools or to use young people as mules to run drugs.

The Bill will give the police greater powers in relation to dealers who swallow drugs or hide them in body cavities. The police will be able to order X-rays or scans, and magistrates, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) pointed out, will be able to remand in custody suspects whom they believe to have swallowed drugs for a period of up to eight days. I support that change.

I have some reservations about clause 7, which contains a key proposal to amend the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 to allow for drug testing after someone has been arrested for a so-called trigger offence. If that test is positive, the person will have to attend an assessment so that a case plan can be drawn up. At the moment, as several hon. Members have pointed out, a drugs test can be administered only if someone is actually charged. We will discuss the issue in greater detail in Committee, but in the meantime I share some of the reservations of organisations such as DrugScope and Turning Point.

The main emphasis in the Bill is on the punitive approach and the criminal justice system. However, an equally important priority should be ways to make treatment more effective. The Bill is mostly concerned with those drug users who come to the attention of the criminal justice system, but much more needs to be done to help people before they turn to crime. The national treatment outcomes study estimates that for every £1 spent on treatment, £18 of cost to the criminal justice system can be saved. I was therefore surprised when the Home Secretary said that the figure was £3. Perhaps he was using different statistics from another organisation.

I am also concerned about the large numbers who drop out of treatment. Indeed, in a recent report, the Audit Commission estimated that 34 per cent. of drug users who leave treatment drop out within the first 12 weeks. According to the National Audit Office, of those offenders who received a community sentence, such as a drug testing and treatment order—which requires that the offender undergo treatment instead of receiving a custodial sentence—in 2003, only 28 per cent. completed the programme. We should not forget those people who have not committed any crime but who could be prevented from committing one by prompt access to treatment.

[Mr. Henry Bellingham]

I have some concerns about omissions from the Bill. Several hon. Members have pointed out that many people who are dependent on drugs and, in some cases, alcohol also have mental problems. In fact, one third of patients in mental health services have drug or alcohol problems. Many users are falling through the gaps and end up being passed from agency to agency. Furthermore, one in three problem drug users are either homeless or in need of housing support.

Mr. Pound: I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument with great interest. As ever, it is intelligent in every way. Is he saying that the addiction follows the illness, or that the mental illness follows the addiction?

Mr. Bellingham: I was saying that the two are often interrelated. There are people with mental illness who happen to have addictions and there are addicts who have mental illness. There is an obvious crossover between the two and that must be recognised.

As I said, many of those people have other serious social needs; many of them are homeless or in need of housing support. I was interested in the intervention by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), who referred to the scheme in Devon, the C-FAR scheme set up by a former Royal Marines major who helps people to work their way back into the community. I feel strongly that services must be able to deal with all aspects of a person's life and place greater priority on providing aftercare for addicts who are leaving treatment.

Mrs. Gillan: My hon. Friend is making an extremely interesting and cogent speech. Trevor Philpott's C-FAR operation is much to be admired. Does my hon. Friend agree that current thinking in some parts of the medical profession, especially the work being carried out by Professor Robin Murray at the Institute of Psychiatry, shows a clear link between cannabis use and the development of inner city psychosis? More such evidence is coming to light and that makes it even more imperative that we look closely at the available scientific and medical evidence, as cannabis is not the innocuous drug that everyone thinks it is.

Mr. Bellingham: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. I do not know whether she has visited C-FAR, but I certainly want to do so to look at the work that Major Philpott is doing. My hon. Friend is probably aware of the report issued today by the Royal College of Physicians, which comments on the serious damage that can be done by the stronger types of cannabis; younger people can end up with serious mental illness.

If treatment services do not deliver, addicts will not be able to rebuild their lives and return to society as productive and fulfilled members. Another omission in the Bill that the Government will have to address is the need for investment in staff training. There is a real recruitment and retention problem at all levels. A recent study by DrugScope estimated that there are at least 3,000 too few key staff with specialist knowledge in drug treatment centres. What does the Minister plan to do to improve the status of all staff who work with substance misusers? What do the Government plan to do about investment in the training, development and retention of staff? When the Minister winds up the debate, perhaps she will touch on that point.

There is a need for far greater investment and training to encourage general practitioners to work with patients with drug problems. GPs are a key resource and can help people to access other services. At present, there is a huge shortage of GPs qualified to deal with drug misuse and there is no co-ordinated infrastructure to support them. There is obviously a need for much greater liaison and partnership between GPs and specialist agencies, including many in the voluntary sector.

The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East mentioned the case of Dr. Adrian Garfoot and I, too, want to mention that extremely serious and unfortunate case as Dr. Garfoot is my constituent. Dr. Garfoot trained at the Royal Free Hospital school of medicine and was a GP in Yarmouth and Kilburn. During that time, he developed a deep interest in, and awareness of, the drugs crisis and the plight of drug addicts. In 1990, he opened the Laybourne clinic in east London, which soon became a renowned centre of excellence. During the 10 years from 1990, the clinic treated more than 1,200 patients whose typical age was 37 and a half—substantially older than the average age of patients in NHS clinics, which was 29. The overwhelming majority of Dr Garfoot's patients were long-term addicts who had been injecting themselves for anything from between 20 and 30 years and who maintained their habit through crimes such as theft, burglary, drug dealing, prostitution and so on.

At one point, it was calculated that the 270 patients attending the clinic had between them spent more than 600 years in prison. It is interesting that the recidivism rate for the drug addicts at the end of the treatment given by Dr. Garfoot at the Laybourne clinic was only 7 per cent., whereas the recidivism rate for those leaving the Prison Service was 50 per cent. In other words, Dr. Adrian Garfoot was able to rebuild the lives of many people, deal with serious medical conditions and restore family relationships, so I appreciate the praise given to him by the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East.

Most importantly, Dr. Garfoot enabled those people to get on with a normal life and keep out of trouble. I have calculated, with the help of several independent experts, that Dr. Garfoot probably saved the country more than £10 million—a remarkable achievement. His prescribing policy was based on harm reduction and non-coercive user friendly protocols. Above all, he used his clinical independence. He put in place voluntary and supervised withdrawal programmes. No patient ever died from an overdose during his time at the Laybourne clinic. There was one suicide when medication was seized by the police, with the result that the local hospital refused to help.

It is worth pointing out what the National Treatment Agency of Substance Misuse has said in its recent guidelines and press releases. I quote Professor John Strang:

"The message for specialist clinicians is that yes, injectable heroin and injectable methadone have a role to play in the treatment of drug misuse—but it's a limited role and one that needs to be developed very carefully".

There is no evidence at all of any diversion of drugs during Dr. Garfoot's time at the clinic. He was always incredibly assiduous in preventing the diversion of prescribed drugs to the wider community. However, back in 1992, there were complaints. Later, there were further allegations, and he was summoned before a Home Office misuse of drugs tribunal on charges of alleged irresponsible prescribing. After an analysis of 1,500 prescriptions, there was no sign of any discrepancy whatsoever. Dr. Garfoot was cleared by the then Home Secretary and there was a finding of abuse of process against his accusers. The cost of that case ran into thousands of pounds.

In 2000, however, the interim audit committee of the General Medical Council imposed serious restrictions on Dr. Garfoot. He then went to the professional conduct committee of the GMC in September 2001, and there was a finding that his name should be erased from the medical register on the grounds of serious professional misconduct. He took a decision to appeal to the Privy Council, but, unfortunately, he lost.

It goes without saying that the case has been a total disaster for Dr. Garfoot, but it is also been an even bigger disaster for the patients at the clinic. The clinic carried on for a while after Dr. Garfoot left, but it was unable to continue to provide the same level of treatment. A number of patients left, 21 of whom have subsequently died. Many others have returned to a life of crime and prostitution, and they are now back on the conveyor belt that leads to crime, inadequate treatment and back to crime again. Only last week, Dr. Garfoot told me that he had two very distressing calls from former patients who were in total despair about the lack of treatment available to them.

What is also very unfortunate about the case is that, following the Shipman case—no doubt, with the best of intentions—the then Secretary of State for Health, now Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), insisted that the GMC should increase the period before which a doctor erased from the medical register could apply for reinstatement from 10 months to five years. An exception was made for doctors whose cases had been completed already. No doubt as the result of an oversight, no such provision was made for those whose cases were currently in progress.

At the time, I wrote to the Secretary of State to say how desperately unfair that was to Dr. Garfoot. He had been advised in writing at the outset—the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East has seen the letters—that restitution could be applied for after 10 months. His case was conducted from beginning to end in line with that regulation. It was not until the case had been completed that he was informed of the changed procedure. I simply submit that natural justice must cut in and lead the Secretary of State to intervene. He should investigate not only the case of Dr. Garfoot, but those of several other doctors in exactly the same position.

As the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East pointed out, in the year in which Dr. Garfoot was struck off, 20 other prescribing doctors suffered a similar fate. One such doctor was Dr. John Marks. After his clinic in Widnes closed, 42 deaths occurred in two years. The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the case of the Stapleford clinic, which is ongoing and thus sub judice. The situation is serious because we are losing doctors such as Dr. Garfoot.

Dr. Iddon: I am not sure whether Dr. John Marks, whom I know quite well, was struck off. I think that his practice in Widnes folded because the health services that were supplying him with patients stopped his funding. He was practising the British system of drug treatment, but that system became unpopular, so we are now using the American system.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I can check the facts, but I know that the doctor is currently abroad—I think that he is in New Zealand at the moment. The hon. Gentleman will agree that there is no disputing the fact that 42 patients in Widnes died over two years, which is horrific and appalling.

It is absurd that at a time when we have a serious shortage of GPs, such doctors are not allowed to go back into general practice, at least. It is one thing to strike them off and prevent them from earning their living for five years, but Dr. Garfoot is living in King's Lynn with his father, who is a well known Methodist minister. He is unable to earn a living, but there is a shortage of GPs in the area and practices are crying out for locum support. Such doctors should certainly be allowed back into general practice and be able to return to treating drug addicts in due course, because as I said earlier, there is a chronic shortage of GPs working with drug addicts in this country. I hope that the Minister will address that point in her winding-up speech. If she does not have time to cover the case of Dr. Garfoot, will she write to the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East and me about it? We feel strongly about the matter because an individual has suffered a gross injustice and there has been a huge loss of someone who was able to work with drug addicts, save lives and make a real difference and impact.

The Bill can make an impact. I support a lot of it, which is why I am glad that we will vote for it. However, it takes perhaps too narrow an approach. The Government can succeed in their drugs strategy, but not if they view the Bill in total isolation. They need to combine it with the wider measures that I cited. If they do that, we can continue to make progress on a non-partisan, cross-party basis.

5.8 pm

Mr. John MacDougall (Central Fife) (Lab): I also welcome the Bill because my constituency of Central Fife has had numerous problems with drugs over the years that many of the Bill's measures attempt to tackle. Although many good points have been made today and we will have the opportunity to consider the Bill's measures in greater detail in Committee, we cannot underestimate the devastating impact of class A hard drugs on Central Fife and no doubt on other communities throughout the country.

Drugs do not have an impact on only the people who use them, but, as the Bill tries to point out, they have a wider impact by indirectly affecting the neighbours of users. I know from public consultations that people complain about finding needles in their back gardens. Unsuspecting children are under immediate threat because their parents cannot protect their well-being. We must find a way to try to minimise the likelihood of such events taking place, and I believe that the Bill addresses that threat.

The difference between drug use in a poorer community as against that in a wealthier community is that drugs in a wealthier community can be much more easily resourced whereas drug use in a poorer community leads to the accrual of money to fund that habit by illegal means. Therefore, the impact on a poorer community is all the greater. It would be no surprise to find—it would be an interesting survey—that the impact on a poorer community is a higher increase in crime.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): My hon. Friend is right to identify areas of drug misuse, especially in deprived areas such as my constituency. Does he agree that the problems could be resolved if people, especially young people, were offered quality jobs and quality opportunities? Would he further agree that projects such as the new deal have particular applications for young people? If the new deal was not in place, there would be even further drug misuse.

Mr. MacDougall: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point. The ability to finance a drug habit would remove the need to steal, but I am sure that he would agree that the real issue is how to deal with the habit itself and how we encourage rehabilitation. Some of the more interesting points raised today have been about other countries and their approach to drugs. We can all learn from taking into account what does and does not work elsewhere. That is a sensible approach to a complex issue to which I believe there is no one answer.

Mrs. Gillan: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman can help me on a point of clarification. I have read clause 24(6) and I understand that the significant majority of the Bill applies only to England and Wales and does not cover Scotland. Is that his understanding? As he was speaking, it seemed that he was suggesting that the Bill would affect his constituency in Scotland, and I do not believe that it would.

Mr. MacDougall: I thank the hon. Lady for raising that point. As I said at the offset, I wished to bring to the debate the experience of a community. I was not suggesting that the Bill will impact on that community, but I thought that it would be helpful to the House to learn from the experience that I wish to describe. It is extremely relevant to the content of the Bill.

Tragically, in Central Fife—I am sure that there have been similar cases in other constituencies—a young man lost his life during the Christmas period. During that period, on two or three occasions when we should have been celebrating, there were headlines in the press and articles that were full of the family's bereavement. The sad feature is that the young man had just come out of prison, where he had been for using drugs. That highlights the point about the need to concentrate on rehabilitation where possible and to accept that not all people will be able to be rehabilitated.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) said that we cannot force rehabilitation. A horse can be taken to water but it cannot be made to drink. I accept that there will be people who cannot benefit from rehabilitation. I recognise, however, that excellent work is being done in my constituency through the use of drug treatment and testing orders. We are still waiting to see the outcome of the results, but, so far, they seem to be heading in the right direction. More time will be needed to assess whether there is an upward trend, a hopeful trend, or whether the approach is not as successful as we hoped that it would be.

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that if people relapse, they need extra support to go back on a programme? They should not be written off, as that extra support often makes the difference.

Mr. MacDougall: I agree. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East spoke about the need for rehabilitation centres, and cited Manchester as an example. We cannot have them everywhere, but that does not mean that we should not have them at all. If we do the obvious, we simply impose greater responsibilities on the courts, which are already overcrowded, and on the judicial system. That is not helpful to the country.

Drugs are a complex issue, and we have heard figures about the costs involved. A drug habit is distinct from other habits, as the need to feed it extends far beyond the user and impacts on many others in the community, including the immediate family and colleagues in the workplace. Also affected are schools but, although I agree that there is a problem, it is not as widespread as has been suggested. On several occasions, my constituents have expressed concern that drugs are being pushed in schools. We must consider to what extent that is the case, but we should not exacerbate people's fears, as that does not help us to tackle the problem.

Drugs have an impact on the health of the individual, and the health service is called on to assist people who have overdosed. Such incidents have implications for the NHS and for the family, who undergo a trauma, and may require medical support themselves. Different drugs have different effects. The difference between cocaine and heroin has been mentioned—one is an upper and the other is a downer—but both bring out another side of someone's character. Some drugs make people aggressive, but others calm them down. Someone who takes a drug that makes them aggressive can be a threat to the community, and that must be tackled, with a cost to supporting services and the courts. The Bill provides us with an opportunity to look afresh at those difficulties that can arise in communities.

There is a need for strategic working, and local authorities, health services, Parliament and other nations that have experienced the problems of a drugs culture have a key role to play. I recently visited Holland. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East spoke about his experiences there, and I found out that Rotterdam had a very different policy from Groningen in the north. There were different geographical and cultural problems—one place was more rural, but the other was city-dominated, so they dealt with drugs differently. Reference has been made to a bold attempt in Rotterdam to remove drug users from the streets. A deliberate political decision was made, and they were banned from the city. However, that only pushed them into other areas, and did not solve the problem. Everything in Holland is not right, but many things there are worthy of examination. For example, the UK has, I believe, adopted its policy of ensuring that addicts have an opportunity to acquire clean needles, which are important in stopping the spread of disease. By taking a positive approach to tackling such problems we are supporting not the habit but an illness. We also prevent disease and avoid the need for further medical support. We can learn from these and other measures, such as the use of methadone, that have been adopted by other countries including Holland and Sweden, which have been highlighted today.

The Bill complements the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002. The Government have consistently moved in the same direction, with increasing momentum. The 2002 Act deals with a larger and more serious issue. We should not forget that the tragic events of September 11 were largely funded by the proceeds of drugs crime, which trickle down from such a major disaster to the small human disasters in our communities, such as that of one individual losing his life in Central Fife, which is a major disaster to his family. The entire drugs industry causes nothing but chaos and must be dealt with. Drugs are big business, which brings with it, sadly, big pain.

We rarely get an opportunity to watch TV, so I do not know how many other hon. Members watched a very good BBC television programme on cocaine the other evening. The programme highlighted the economic problems arising from the drugs culture and showed the poor farmers who farm the coca leaves. All they were interested in was earning a living by doing what they do best—growing coca leaves. The coca market collapsed, another buyer offered to buy the leaves from the farmers, and paid not much more than they were getting before, but it was their living so they sold their product, which was turned into cocaine for the market. The farmers had no option. That was their only opportunity to use the skills that they had. The problem was a system that allowed the cocaine dealers to go in and take advantage of people who were trying to earn a living. That economic problem must be tackled if we are to make a difference to the drugs culture.

I must compliment my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann). Because of my interest in the subject through my constituency and through the substance abuse group, of which I am officer, I know that my hon. Friend has, throughout my time in Parliament, shown great stamina in addressing the issue. He has always articulated his case extremely well in the House. His positive contribution today and the warnings that he gave were equally impressive.

The Bill tackles a serious antisocial problem in our communities. If we do not act, people will accuse us of doing nothing to tackle a problem that impacts upon them in various ways, whether it affects a son or daughter, a distraught mother, a loved one or a colleague who is lost, or some youngster taking drugs at school and influencing other youngsters. The impact on one person affects an entire community, such as mine. I hope the experience that I outlined today illustrates why I believe the Bill should be supported. Without any disrespect to my hon. Friend the Minister, I hope that the Bill will return to the House in improved form, in the best interests of the House and, more importantly, of the people of Great Britain.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I do not want to make a long contribution, which is somewhat out of character with the debate so far. It has been an interesting debate, however. I want to make two main points, mostly related to treatment services and the connections with mental health.

The Opposition support this Bill. It is only a start, however, and will not on its own address the continuing surge in drug use in this country. It must be seen in that context. It might grab some headlines, but it is only one small part of the jigsaw, which we need urgently to piece together. I will support the Bill, because I will support anything that clamps down much more heavily on those who make a living out of peddling this poisonous and destructive trade.

Throughout this debate, we have heard many figures from different Members. The figures make terrifying reading, however, particularly in relation to abuse and use by young children. British crime survey figures indicate that 12 per cent. of 16 to 59-year-olds have taken illicit drugs in the last year alone, of which 3 per cent. used class A drugs. There are 3 million cannabis users in the country, a quarter of whom are between the ages of 16 and 24, and we know that users are getting much younger all the time. Two in five 15-year-olds in the UK have tried cannabis—more than in any other country in Europe. Certainly, I support any measures to clamp down on anybody trading in drugs around schools and other youth facilities and preying on impressionable youngsters.

We also need to clamp down on drugs cafés, with which the Bill does not appear to deal. Worthing has had a rather grisly experience of cannabis cafés and how they can lead to the hard drug trade and suck in serious crime and serious criminals to a profitable activity. A couple of years ago, in Worthing, no fewer than three cannabis cafés set up trade in the town centre, one in my constituency, and the other two in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley). The one in my constituency was originally set up under the benign, well-intentioned guise of being the headquarters of the Legalise Cannabis Alliance. It was set up almost as a social service, in particular advertising its services to elderly people suffering from multiple sclerosis and rheumatic problems who could come along and have discounted drugs made available to them—very community spirited of it, I am sure.

The problem was that it was not just the equivalent of a bingo club to which people could come and go and dabble in soft drugs as they please. It became a nightmare for local residents, attracted all sorts of low life, with dealers hanging around near schools, and caused havoc in local mental health residential establishments' halfway houses, whose staff were run ragged because patients were attracted to it. Violence occurred around it, with problems of noise and so on.

Despite the fact that what was going on was quite plain, it took more than a year to shut down that establishment, notwithstanding several raids by the police and intensive, costly policing. It celebrated its first birthday party with a great big cake—goodness knows what was in it. I was kindly invited to that party, but I declined the invitation. It gloated, however, that it had been allowed to carry on this trade for more than a year. Eventually, due to a lot of hard work by the local council and local police in particular, that café was closed down, to the great relief of local residents.

Soon after it was closed down, a delegation of those who had run it came to one of my surgeries to complain that it had taken the police so long to close them down. What a waste of police resources it had been to take more than a year to close down what was clearly an illicit activity. It sounds rather comical, but however well intentioned or not one might think that the original people who set up the establishment were, it had been overtaken by some more sordid sorts. More serious hard drugs were circulating through it, and it was becoming a real cash cow and a lucrative little business, with all sorts of criminals getting attached to it. That is what can happen. Regardless of what is and is not in the Bill, the Government must make it much easier for the police—as I hope that certain parts of the Bill may do—to stamp on such activities the minute that those involved put their heads above the parapets. I support any measures that make it harder for such establishments to open up in the first place and easier for the authorities to close them down as soon as possible. I also support any moves that make it easier to close down dealers who, as we have heard from several hon. Members, use children, often as young as 11, 12 or 13, as their runners.

Dealers are extremely clever in outwitting the police and police raids, and I have seen that problem in my constituency, where they have been getting away with it at one notorious place, which is literally within 100 yd of a local police station. We must make it easier to prosecute those who are clearly running rings round the law as it stands.

A worrying fall has occurred in the price of drugs. As one newspaper put it, it is now cheaper to buy a line of cocaine, which has fallen in value to as little as £39 per gram, than it is to buy a cup of coffee from a high street coffee emporium.

I want to raise two main concerns this afternoon. Any strategy to reduce drug use cannot rely purely on law enforcement against the perpetrators and must drastically increase the number of rehabilitation facilities and the extent of drug awareness and education programmes in order to reduce the clientele for drugs in the first place.

The treatment sector is still massively underdeveloped and too many programmes are not seen through. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) mentioned that too many people drop out early—they are allowed to do so—from treatment programmes, which must be tightened up. We need many more treatment programmes, but they must be suitable and well policed.

A little while ago, I visited a clinic for people with various addictions. I sat in a room with people who have drug, mental health or addictive shoplifting problems. I took off my jacket and introduced myself by saying, "I'm Tim. I'm a politician." That seemed to be one of the worst problems in the room—being a politician is rather more addictive than many of the problems for which those people were being treated.

I was struck by one individual, a young lad of 16 or 17, who had been on heroin and other serious drugs and who had run up a criminal record, mainly by knocking off cars to steal the radios and fuel his drug habit. He had attended various NHS establishments to obtain treatment, where he was invariably fobbed off with methadone as a substitute for his habit. Methadone had not got him off heroin, but the free dose had pepped him up sufficiently to knock off more cars and sell more radios in order to buy heroin, which is what he really wanted. He was in a vicious circle, which that innovatory clinic, based in Kensington, fortunately got him out of by using a completely different treatment. Treatment too often consists of what is easiest and most convenient, because suitable treatment is not available. We must examine how we can treat such people much more intelligently.

Last year's reclassification of cannabis was accompanied by a wishy-washy, low-impact advertising campaign, which cost the Government rather less than £1 million, to remind people that cannabis was still illegal. It failed dismally, because as we know, nine out of 10 children think that cannabis is legal, and it also failed to mention any link between cannabis and mental health problems. Ironically, when cannabis was reclassified and when the advertising campaign was supposedly highlighting the dangers of drugs, drug education officers were being withdrawn from schools due to a shortage of funds. While central Government were sending out the message that cannabis is not especially harmful, the real message that all drugs are poisonous and harmful, which we must start to put across in schools, was not getting through.

John Mann: For the benefit of the House, will the hon. Gentleman tell us precisely which schools have had drug education officers removed from them?

Tim Loughton: I cannot give the names, but at least two education authorities were cited at the time, a year ago, and it was mentioned in the national press as well. It is not just anecdotal. There were serious pressures on drug education officers in schools at a time when cannabis was being declassified and it was most necessary to get across the vital message that had been distorted by the actions that the Government had wrongly taken.

I share the concerns of Turning Point, in particular, about the need for treatment in the community for drug users who have not committed a crime and for whom prompt access to suitable, appropriate treatment could keep them off the slippery slope of drugs and crime—the vicious circle that I mentioned.

In all the areas that I have mentioned there is a need for much better joined-up, inter-agency working between the Prison Service, youth offending teams, schools, youth services, health services, social services and the police. We need to ensure that the professionals are on the ground working at the sharp end with people who have these problems. If we do not get those structures right, the Bill will not count for much. It is just one part of the jigsaw.

Jim Sheridan: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we need joined-up government. Does he include devolved parts of the UK in that?

Tim Loughton: Drugs dealers are no respecters of national boundaries. It would be crazy if cheaper supplies of cocaine came south across the border from Scotland or vice versa, and absurd if one of the effects of devolution was to create drug soft spots in certain parts of the United Kingdom. I hope that that is not one of the after-effects of devolution. It is absolutely essential that we are tough on drugs, be it through this Bill in this House for England and Wales or through similar measures in other parts of the United Kingdom that the Bill does not cover.

We need much better joined-up working so that people who have committed low-level antisocial behaviour offences and have not been poisoned by drugs do not end up in custodial sentences shoulder to shoulder with hard-line drug users and pushers. We need to strike the right balance between coercing offenders into drug rehab treatment and ensuring that the right facilities are there for them early on in order to help them kick the drug habit.

I said that I did not want to speak for long, but I have taken several interventions. My second and final point, and my main worry, concerns the connections between drugs—not least cannabis—and mental illness. My hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) touched on that. The report that came out before Christmas was alarming. We know about the physical effects of drugs, including smoking cannabis. We know that cannabis burns at a much higher temperature than tobacco and that the smoke is drawn much deeper into the lungs, making them much more susceptible to cancer. We know that smoking three joints is the equivalent of smoking more than 20 cigarettes in terms of damage to the lungs. We know that there is evidence that when pregnant women smoke cannabis it brings about changes in the brains of their children that can manifest themselves much later on.

We know about the physical impacts, but the report that came out before Christmas underlined the potential mental health impacts. There have been about 15,000 scientific papers on the effects of cannabis, but what is different about the paper that came out before Christmas is that it directly links the effects of cannabis to mental health outcomes, particularly among young people. It shows:

"Half of regular smokers of cannabis who are psychologically vulnerable to its effects may end up needing treatment for psychosis . . . Up to 10 per cent. of the adult population, almost four million people, has a tendency to paranoid thoughts or grandiose ideas and may be tipped into psychotic delusions by the effects of the drug".

The four-year study of 2,500 people aged 14 to 24 found that, of those who smoked cannabis regularly and had a pre-existing risk of psychosis, no less than 50 per cent. developed psychotic symptoms. That is twice the rate of those who did not use cannabis and more than three times the rate of those who were neither vulnerable nor took the drug. Those figures are pretty alarming.

Cannabis produces strong psychological as well as physical dependence. It occupies the same receptor sites in the brain as heroin and morphine. In 1997, 200,000 people in the United States were admitted to hospital treatment programmes with cannabis dependence, with 65,000 of them admitted as emergencies. We have already heard that the effect of cannabis in modern times is much more powerful than it was in the 1960s. The average THC content was 0.5 per cent. then, against 5 per cent. nowadays. That depends on the brand, but as we know, skunk is much more powerful than the cannabis of the flower-power period of the 1960s.

Dr. Paddy Power, a psychiatrist at Lambeth hospital in south London, who has appeared as a witness before the pre-legislative scrutiny Committee on the draft Mental Health Bill, on which I serve, said that cannabis is a factor in 70 per cent. to 80 per cent. of psychosis cases—people whom he sees day in, day out.

Dr. Iddon: The hon. Gentleman cites the myth about the THC content of the cannabis on the street today being much higher. Does he accept that much of the cannabis on the streets in Britain today comes from Morocco? When he talks about high THC content, he means the stuff that is grown by people in Britain to sell separately on the street. However, the vast majority of the stuff comes from countries such as Morocco and is not skunk.

Tim Loughton: Absolutely. There are also other varieties. I do not claim that the majority of people use skunk. Many other varieties, which are much more powerful than the average, are readily available. Perhaps it is more worrying that many people do not know what they are smoking. They do not know whether they are smoking something much stronger and whether they can handle it—some people cannot. However, I believe that the hon. Gentleman would agree that the average strength of most of the cannabis that is freely available is much more potent than anything that was available in the 1960s. I do not say that: the scientists do, especially those behind the reports on the links with mental health.

In 1987, a study of 500,000 conscripts in the Swedish army—one of the biggest studies—revealed that those who admitted at the age of 18 to taking cannabis on more than 50 occasions were six times more likely to develop schizophrenia in the ensuing years. A Dutch study in the American Journal of Epidemiology in 2002 found that those taking large amounts were seven times more likely to develop psychotic illness, and the well-known New Zealand study from Dunedin found that those who used cannabis when aged 15 were four and a half times more likely to develop psychosis by the age of 26.

According to those studies, in some young people, cannabis may interact with a pre-existing genetically or environmentally determined vulnerability of the nervous system to develop psychosis. Whatever view one takes of the science, even if one does not believe that cannabis and other drugs directly cause mental illness, it is incontrovertible that it can act as a trigger for latent conditions. That is why there is such an increase in those conditions. That costs a lot of money. According to a Professor Henry, an estimated £1 billion a year is spent on schizophrenia. That is 3 per cent. of the NHS budget. Increasing the use of cannabis could cost the health service an extra £330 million annually.

Reclassifying cannabis was a mistake: it sent all the wrong messages and caused great confusion, especially among young people. Marjorie Wallace, the chief executive of the mental health charity SANE, reiterated her opposition to reclassification. She said:

"These studies are showing links between cannabis and schizophrenia and illnesses like it, which we have suspected anecdotally for many years.

In many instances cannabis is the trigger for the schizophrenic breakdown. We would oppose re-classification."

She went on to say:

"We have 1,000 calls a week on our helpline, of which 36 per cent. are from psychotics. Among all those young men I have interviewed on the helpline, with only one or two exceptions, cannabis was involved."

These are people's experiences; these are the facts. We know that obesity and a lack of exercise are the precursors of heart attacks. Now, we are learning to identify the precursors of psychosis. Mental health professionals are warning of these dangers much more than ever before. Dr. Robin Murray has said that cannabis is the No. 1 problem facing the mental health services in inner cities.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): Professor Robin Murray has now been mentioned twice in this debate. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, despite Professor Murray's concerns about those who have a propensity to mental illness using drugs of any kind, including cannabis, he was not against the reclassification of cannabis to class C—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I should like to bring the debate to order, and to remind the hon. Gentleman that, although this is a Second Reading debate, it would be helpful if he could now make some reference to the contents of the Bill.

Tim Loughton: Of course, Madam Deputy Speaker. My main reference point is the fact that the Government have not seen the error of their ways and taken the opportunity to change the classification of cannabis in the Bill.

A particular problem exists in relation to dual diagnosis. People with mental health problems who also have problems with addiction, particularly to hard or soft drugs, are being let down. Theirs are the worst cases of all. All too often, they might be able to access treatment for their mental health problem—or occasionally for their drug addiction—but then have to wait another six to nine months or more to get the other part of the equation dealt with, by which time they have slipped back down the slippery slope. We must ensure that all the appropriate treatment for people with a dual diagnosis is available as a package. It is ridiculous to get someone off a drug problem that has led to a mental health problem without treating the mental health problem. It could lead them to revert to drugs if they have to wait another nine months for the other part of the package. We need much better joined-up thinking when dealing with patients with a dual diagnosis involving drugs and mental health.

I support tougher measures against those who profit from the drugs trade. I also support measures to make it as easy as possible for the police to act against the real criminals. The Bill will fail, however, unless it forms part of a package that includes better rehabilitation and joined-up services, and better education to teach young people to stay away from drugs in the first place. We need to concentrate on the links between drugs and mental illness.

We also need to give to drugs, and their link with mental health problems, the same priority that we give to the message that drink-driving kills innocent people, to the message that excessive drinking can rot the liver and lead to violence and premature death, and to the message that smoking can cause heart disease and lung cancer, and can kill us prematurely. All these things—hard drugs, alcohol and tobacco—are poisons that are bad for us when used in excess. The Bill on its own will not achieve these aims, and the Government need to do much more about prevention, education and rehabilitation. If they can do that, the Bill will form an important part—but only a part—of the jigsaw involved in dealing with the real drugs menace that is overtaking too many inner cities and other parts of the country.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): It is a pleasure to follow speakers of this calibre and to listen to a debate that is so well informed. We have all learned a great deal more about this vexed subject from each other this afternoon than we knew before. To summarise the purpose of the Bill, it is to tackle drug addiction and the harm that it causes to individuals and communities. That is wholly to be commended. I have heard some hon. Members taking a somewhat clinical approach to this matter, concentrating on how we should tackle addiction once it has occurred. I think we must start a little before that.

Perhaps this is confession time. My first experience of drug-taking was in the early 1950s, when I was an habitué of Wolverhampton and west midlands jazz clubs. To be honest, at that age most of us thought that grass was something you got out of the front garden, but people were smoking it surreptitiously, although there was very little evidence of heroin or cocaine use. We knew the famous American song with the line

"I get no kick from cocaine".

In fact, it featured very rarely in the ordinary lives of people out to enjoy themselves. It was very much an American phenomenon.

It was in the context of my interest in the world of jazz that I was shocked to learn of the death of an icon of the modern jazz movement, Charlie Parker. Some Members may have seen the Clint Eastwood-directed film "Bird", which followed the track of that wonderful musician's life and his downfall through the use of drugs. It featured a scene showing the death of Charlie "Bird" Parker. His middle name, by the way, was Yardbird, which is how he came to be known as "Bird".

A doctor was called, rushed in and examined Charlie Parker, who was lying on the ground. He started to write a description: "Negro, 14 stone, 5 ft 9 in, aged approximately 70". Charlie's girl friend said "No, no—he is 35." The doctor replied "Well, what a life that guy led! Give me some of it." The truth is, though, that all that magical stuff ended in tragedy simply through addiction to drugs.

Later in Wolverhampton there was a wonderful UK musician called Tubby Hayes. He was the best—but he was mainlining at the age of 21, and dead at 28. That is what happens to people. At least they have produced wonderful music for other people, but it would have been much better had they not been using drugs. Musicians often say "But you play so much better when you've got that buzz." Charlie always said "I thought that, until it nearly killed me three or four times. You don't play better, you play worse. You just think you are playing better." What sad, tragic incidents there have been.

In the mid-1970s I was a voluntary worker for a youth organisation in Wolverhampton. At that time there were no more than half a dozen or so known heroin addicts who mainlined. Two of them died, tragically—they were quite young—but not before they had been through the horrendous experience of having terrible cysts on their legs and arms. We used to bathe them in an attempt to do something for them. It was the most awful sight that could be imagined: young people who had done that to themselves.

When I expressed bafflement—why did those addicts put up with it?—people explained to me that they were "addictive personalities". I am in no position to argue with that: it is probably true that some people have what are known as addictive personalities to a greater or lesser degree.

John Mann: My hon. Friend speaks of addictive personalities. It may surprise him to learn that the overwhelming majority of Bassetlaw's heroin addicts—more than 90 per cent.—come from coalmining communities ravaged by unemployment, rather than from the middle-class or rural communities that happen to constitute half the population.

Mr. Purchase: No, it—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I again remind hon. Members of the content of the Bill that we are discussing this afternoon?

Mr. Purchase: Of course you may, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I accept your point entirely. I am trying to demonstrate, for the record, the horrors associated with the consequences of drug taking and with the worst drugs known to humankind. The Government are trying to tackle those horrors, and it is extremely important that such efforts be made. I of course ask for your forgiveness, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I intend to stick entirely to the point of the Bill, which is to deal with those consequences.

Sometimes, we know more of such matters from our personal experiences than even learned Members of this place can tell us about. The reputation of a Wolverhampton estate that I represent was totally ruined by the presence of drugs, and in just the ways to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) referred: through poverty, lack of opportunity and poor facilities, and above all through unemployment and slipping into illicit work patterns such as prostitution, drug pushing and petty crime. Those are the social consequences of having insufficient money to live decent lives.

The Bill tries to address such problems when they occur, but we have to deal with them before they get to first base. We should not be prepared to tolerate unemployment in the 21st century. We certainly should not tolerate it to the point where whole families are unemployed, there is no culture of work, the work ethic means absolutely nothing and some believe that wealth comes from a giro cheque. Many Members will have been visited at their Saturday morning surgery by, say, a young woman with two or three children who says, "But how do they expect me to manage on this?" What are such people talking about? They mean a giro cheque. They do not know who "they" are. They have no understanding of wealth creation and no knowledge of caring for themselves through going to work. That is the problem that we must tackle. Being sympathetic later to the consequences of drug addiction is hardly a help at all.

I apologise to those of my hon. Friends who know this subject well—including the technical and clinical aspects—but I must point out what I see, which is absolutely horrendous. The entire population of an estate in my constituency, consisting of 1,200 houses, is now ashamed to say where they live. The situation is improving bit by bit and we are clawing our way up the ladder. Much of the problem is caused by factors such as gangsterism. Wherever there is poverty, we can be sure that a gangster is there who is willing to wind the situation up a bit more, to crush and screw people, and to ensure that part of whatever they do have belongs to the gang or to somebody's minder. We see young women—perhaps not even turned 16—tarted up in the most appalling manner, and we know that they are touting for trade. Allowing such things to happen destroys and demeans us all. Sympathy is fine, but when people are off their heads on drugs and do not know what they are doing, it is too late. We have to deal with the underlying social causes that bring these situations about.

When I entered this House in 1992, one of the first issues that I dealt with was LSD, the first two letters of which stand for lysergic acid. I do not know what the last one stands for.

Dr. Iddon: Diethylamide.

Mr. Purchase: I thank my hon. Friend very much. Throughout the 1950s, clever-dick doctors—

Dr. Iddon indicated assent.

Mr. Purchase: Throughout the 1950s, doctors conducted a series of clinical trials under laboratory conditions, through which they administered LSD to people suffering, in their opinion, from mental problems. As the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) mentioned earlier, the link between drugs and mental illness is quite well established. These doctors, particularly the one in the west midlands, decided to conduct a series of clinical trials that would determine whether lysergic acid could help to improve mental conditions. The upshot—not just in the west midlands but throughout the nation—was that more than 1,000 people were left, as a result of a closely controlled clinical trial with LSD, with the most severe sort of mental illnesses and disturbances imaginable. It took eight years finally to get a case to court and, in the end, there was a minor pay-out on the grounds that the duty of care had not been fully exercised.

We all express considerable sympathy and talk about access to treatment, saying that this and that must be done. Even under those near perfect laboratory conditions, however, the application of those unstable substances had unpredictable outcomes on different personalities. Clearly, even under those conditions, we did more damage than good.

Whatever else is true, we must try to educate our youth on how to avoid the use of drugs—and I include alcohol. Let me say bluntly that the idea of having 24-hour licences—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I really must ask hon. Members to relate their comments specifically to the Bill. They should explain how their experiences can helpfully shed light on particular provisions in the Bill.

Mr. Purchase: Indeed, Madam Deputy Speaker. The question of the police powers granted by the Bill is interesting. The police have many duties and it seems to me that, unless we tackle these problems at source, we shall be placing a load on the police, which is bound to detract from their other important work. We should not exclude from consideration the issue of drunken behaviour, which is a serious problem, as are burglaries and many other crimes that are being committed in our communities as we speak.

To conclude, it is noble and proper that the Bill should tackle the problems of drug addiction and all the harm that it causes. However, it is even more important to look at how society operates in order to understand how the opportunities are given to the criminal classes to squeeze those who live in poor circumstances. As I say, that is far more important than the Bill itself. I wish the Bill well, but I know that when it is passed and the real work starts, we will still have serious underlying problems—in our nation and perhaps elsewhere—that will ultimately have to be dealt with in social and economic, rather than clinical, terms.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): I apologise for my yo-yo attendance during the debate. I was in my place for the opening speeches, but I had diary commitments that pre-dated the time at which I realised that I would be sitting in Committee on this Bill.

The Bill will command cross-party support, and I am afraid that I have no interesting personal confessions to make on the subject. I want to concentrate on the proposed new subsection 4A(4) to (7) in clause 1—it is an insertion into the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971—which relates to the dealing of drugs in the vicinity of schools. I am a little concerned that the provision specifies one hour before a school opens or after it closes. I wonder whether that will be sufficient. I am a governor of one particular secondary school and I know that it carries out activities over a much longer period than that. Perhaps we could discuss the issue in Committee, as many schools conduct activities in the evenings and have homework clubs, breakfast clubs and so forth going on.

Caroline Flint: The Bill does cover that. The proposal about one hour before and after the school day would apply outside term time too. We recognise that schools are at the centre of their communities and that young people should be able to use them in the holidays as well as before and after the school day. However, we can look at the clause in more detail in Committee, to assure hon. Members on this point.

Angela Watkinson: I am grateful to the Minister for that response. We need to ensure that the restrictions that we put in place will be adequate.

I shall concentrate on why I think dealers are attracted to schools, almost like bees around a honey pot. I anticipate the intervention that the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) wants to make by saying that the reason for that is that schools offer a ready source of customers. As I have said many times, I blame the style and content of drug education material for the level of demand. That material is misguided. We could do more to reduce demand, and the levels of drug taking among young people, if we stopped concentrating on harm reduction and concentrated instead on prevention. Most of the literature used to support drugs education concentrates on harm reduction and on the provision of comprehensive information about every aspect of drugs and their consumption that one could possibly imagine—and about some aspects that one could not imagine.

John Mann: The hon. Lady speaks about drug dealing outside schools. Over the past 10 years, there has been an above-average number of arrests and convictions for drug dealing in my constituency, but I can find no examples of any such incidents taking place outside school gates. Can the hon. Lady give the House specific examples from her constituency of arrests and convictions for drug dealing outside schools?

Angela Watkinson: No, I cannot, but head teachers in my area and the local education authority tell me that drugs are in circulation and in use in our schools. We must do everything possible to prevent that.

I shall give a couple of examples of printed material that I think is misguided and going in the wrong direction. It may be well intentioned, but its effect is the exact opposite of what we would want. I shall quote a paper by Mary Brett, who is well known to all of us who take an interest in this subject. Until recently, she was head of health education at Dr. Challoner's grammar school in Amersham. She says that the press

> "have widely publicised the true and very alarming picture of the relationship between cannabis and psychosis, and the steady increase in the number of young psychiatric patients, 80 per cent. of whom have a cannabis history. A fact that is well played down by FRANK . . . FRANK merely suggests that 'some people can get anxious and paranoid especially if they are smoking the stronger varieties'."

By urging young people merely to take precautions and reduce the possible harm caused by cannabis use, I believe that we are missing an opportunity to warn them and so prevent them from using cannabis in the first place. Brett goes on to state:

"On average, the THC content today is 5 per cent. compared with 0.5 per cent. in the sixties—10 times stronger . . . Its THC strength can vary from 9 to 27 per cent. FRANK says, 'Some people may find it too strong and the experience disturbing, while others may enjoy the greater effects'. What about those who may have an acute psychotic episode requiring hospitalisation? Why mention the fact that 'increasing amounts of this are being home grown for private use'?"

To Mary Brett's mind, that is almost "an invitation to experiment." She goes on to say:

"It is irresponsible to say that physical addiction is unlikely. Around 10 per cent. of those who ever try the drug will become addicted according to Professor Wayne Hall, the Australian researcher. And, out of the 6 million drug addicts currently in the USA, around 4 million are cannabis-dependent."

I imagine that all hon. Members received the briefing paper from the London Drug Policy Forum, in preparation for this debate. The forum is funded by the Corporation of London. It has partnerships with the 32 London boroughs, central Government and regional government, drugs service providers, law enforcement agencies and community groups. It states that its intention is—in the buzz phrase used in all these publications—

"to reduce the harm . . . concentrating on what works to improve services".

DrugScope and Turning Point, in their briefing paper which I received today, say that they produced an alternative drugs bill last year, just before Christmas, which "emphasises treatment provision, harm reduction and improving the capacity of the health service".

All those three factors are important, but they will not work unless we reduce the number of new addicts. Providing residential treatment would be wholly unaffordable if more addicts continued to come along. Unless we stop the source, we will not be able to afford to treat the addicts that we have already.

Then there is "Score". I do not know how many hon. Members have seen that delightful little publication, but it tells people everything they could possibly want to know about drugs—what they are, what they do, every possible drug on the market and what the law says about them. But it is entirely the wrong approach to provide lots of value-free, non-judgmental information to young people who are too immature to make adult decisions with it. They need guidance and they are not getting it.

Thank heavens—how appropriate—for the Christian Institute, which comes down on the other side of the argument. It comments:

"Even drugs education does not aim to discourage drug use. 'Harm reduction' in the drugs field is a philosophy which, instead of seeking to prevent drug use, seeks to reduce some of the damaging effects of drug use."

Dr. Iddon: I am not sure that I am following the drift of the hon. Lady's comments. Is she suggesting that no harm reduction material be published and people be allowed to die?

Angela Watkinson: No. What I said was that none of those strategies will work without drug misuse prevention. They have to be underpinned by prevention, but that is not happening. Harm reduction is a damage limitation exercise and it is not enough. We need far more than that.

Dr. Iddon: The hon. Lady is trying to mix two different things. We all agree that drug abuse prevention and education are important. In fact, I would increase the amount of money spent on that. However, once a young person has embarked on trying cannabis and other drugs, perhaps experimentally to start with, they should surely know what harm they could cause themselves and how they could avoid it.

Angela Watkinson: The two policies are not mutually exclusive. In fact, they fit together. Indeed, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) made that very point. We have to get to young people much earlier and prevent them from becoming addicted in the first place. Harm reduction comes afterwards. We need more prevention built into the publications that are available and education programmes. I rarely see any comment that tells young people that drug taking is illegal and wrong, and that they should not do it. Drug literature seems to concentrate entirely on the provision of information—a description of drugs, how to take them, what will happen if they are mixed and what the social effects are. We should concentrate instead on abstinence and prevention.

Mr. Carmichael: Is the hon. Lady suggesting that we return to the days of campaigns that suggested "just say no"? Does she not think that that was demonstrated not to work at the time?

Angela Watkinson: I am saying that, and it has been demonstrated that the current policy is not working either. Perhaps we should try both together. We should tell young people to say no first, but once they are addicted we clearly have to work on harm reduction.

John Mann: Has the hon. Lady seen the fascinating research that has been carried out by DARE in Nottinghamshire? It has shown that saying no to drugs is not the message that works. It has developed programmes to teach children how to say no to things that they do not want to do, including drugs. That has been incredibly effective with 11-year-olds and is now DARE's approach to drugs education.

Angela Watkinson: The DARE project is having a great deal of success. We need to give children the tools to say no. The same applies to sex education—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Once again, I ask hon. Members to relate experiences from their constituencies or from organisations to the content of the Bill.

Angela Watkinson: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am coming to the conclusion of my remarks. The tenor of what I was saying was that the chain of events that leads to dealers being attracted to schools, because there they have a ready supply of customers, relates to the style of drugs education in schools, which is, I believe, misguided and does not concentrate sufficiently on prevention.

The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) suggested in his speech that drugs might be categorised according to the harm they do. That would put the responsibility fair and square on the users, who are often portrayed as victims, entirely devoid of responsibility for taking drugs. If we give them information about how harmful drugs are, they must take responsibility for their decision to take drugs in the face of all that information. In this debate, drug addicts are being portrayed only as victims. As has been said, 80 per cent. of drug addicts also have mental health problems, but 20 per cent. do not. That 20 per cent., who take illegal drugs for recreational use, must take responsibility for that decision.

Until that responsibility is taken, we must introduce tough love in what we are doing. As the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East said, it is no good just feeling sorry for people. It is too late for that; we have to prevent them from becoming addicts in the first place. I will support the Bill, especially the strengthening of the law creating an aggravated offence in the vicinity of schools. I wish the Bill fair weather in Committee.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): Probably few words are used more and mean less than those that describe a particular debate as being of excellent quality and deep erudition, but I venture to suggest that this afternoon we have had such a debate. Certainly, it has been informed and the Members who have spoken have done so not just with the passion and commitment that we would expect, but from a well of deep knowledge.

Everyone has paid tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) and I certainly add my voice to those in praise of him. My hon. Friend the Member for Central Fife (Mr. MacDougall) spoke with the authentic voice of his community.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) has yet again educated us in such a way that makes many of us wish that we had been his pupils at Salford—[Laughter.] My hon. Friend may not wish that I had been one of his pupils.

I want to make two points that are relevant to my hon. Friend's contribution. In a throwaway line when he was referring to the problem of drug distribution in Northern Ireland, he said that the IRA was responsible. In fact, hard drug use in Northern Ireland is confined solely to Ballymena, an area where the IRA's writ does not run. That organisation may have many faults but drug dealing is not one of them; we all know who is dealing the drugs.

My hon. Friend also referred to the need for there to be someone at the end of the phone line when there was a danger of relapse. I have done much work with Narcotics Anonymous, whose mentors are available when someone rings and we hope that we can respond. Often, we can do little other than offer sympathy and support, but the role of Narcotics Anonymous and its unpaid volunteers should be recognised.

I sometimes worry that I find myself agreeing with the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) rather more than is probably healthy. He painted a glorious vision of a narcotics supermarket on the high street where one could choose between varieties—a pick'n'mix narcotics bazaar.

Until recently, such bazaars existed—one of them was called Harrods; one was called Whiteleys, and another, Dickens & Jones. Heroin and cocaine could be bought in Harrods. In about 1933, Lady Diana Cooper, the greatest beauty of her age, wrote very eloquently in her diary of spending a weekend with a friend, injecting themselves with heroin in Brighton. She referred to her anxiety of being, as she said, torn between desire and the deed before making the injection. In fact, they had bought the drug at a place called John Bell & Croydon in Wigmore street—so such places existed.

I hope that, if one thing has marked the excellence and seriousness of the debate, it is that we have perhaps moved on from the possibility of saying that utter prohibition is the answer to anything and that, to paraphrase a statement made earlier, it is possible to win the war on drugs. Few communities in the world do not have a drug problem. I understand that the Inuit were once drug free, but now have a drug problem. We must all face the problem.

I welcome the Bill because this is a jigsaw that must be brought together, as the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) said. The Bill contains sound, sensible provisions. It may veer more towards the stick than the carrot, but that is the nature of the Bill. I was worried about the prohibition on sale around schools when I first looked at it, but the reality is that people will search out new markets given that cocaine is on a price level with a cappuccino. One of the reasons the debate is both timely and necessary is that, as the prices fall, the need to expand the customer base will become even stronger and, yes, we will see drug dealers around the high schools. That may sound like a cliché from a horror comic, but sadly, it is the reality.

I support the Bill, except for one small point that has been touched on already: under clause 21, psilocin will be brought within the ambit of class A drugs.

Khat has been mentioned. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for her concern about that subject—she has spoken to me about it and has done a lot of research on it—but not everyone in the Chamber, if I may be presumptuous, understands how corrosive, vicious and pernicious the problem of khat chewing is, certainly in my part of the world, west London. Every morning, a plane disgorges its load of khat, which is then taken to Western international market and sold. Large numbers of people in west London chew khat all night long, becoming increasingly aggressive.

I am sure that most hon. Members know that khat contains a naturally occurring alkaloid, with amphetamine affects. It is masticated and ingested, entering the bloodstream through the gums. People become very voluble and aggressive. They stay out all night, come home in the morning, beat up the wife and try to sleep through the day. We must address that problem, and if other hon. Members are aware of it, I hope that they, too, will bring it to the Minister's attention and possibly that of the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee.

I know little of magic mushrooms. To be honest, I thought that they were a cartoon invention; I did not realise that there were such things as what my teenage son calls "shrooms", although he claims no personal knowledge, or rather he denies all personal knowledge. I know about khat, however, and in parts of Hanwell, Northolt and Greenford, people can see the green leaves—the detritus—of a night spent chewing khat scattered around the streets in the morning.

The extremely efficient and cost-effective London borough of Ealing council obviously sweeps up those leaves at the earliest opportunity, but that vile narcotic spore is there for all to see, and I hope that it is something that we will consider. If we are to bring magic mushrooms within the ambit of the law, let us consider khat because it is a problem that will grow. One reason it will grow is the fact that the drugs trade moves as different drugs become available. MDMA did not exist 20 to 25 years ago, but it is probably one of the most widely taken drugs in urban society today.

In making perhaps my point of greatest significance, I pick up something that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East mentioned when he referred to the British method. That expression was recognised throughout the world until about 1968. It meant that we treated drug addiction as an illness. We had a system whereby people who were addicted to narcotics—they did not have to be registered addicts—could get prescriptions from GPs that could be cashed at Boots or any other chemist. The prescriptions were made out for maintenance doses, and despite what people think about 1960s, this country had a low level of hard drug use.

What went wrong? A couple of individual doctors, Drs. Swann and Petro, who are no longer with us, absurdly over-prescribed. We ended up with a ridiculous situation in the Criterion buildings in Piccadilly circus, and Dr. Petro famously once wrote a prescription for one-sixth grain tablets of heroin—I am not even sure that one can get them nowadays—on the back of a cigarette packet. The situation got out of control and the response was to throw out all the good of the British method of maintenance and bring in the American method.

I have spoken to many drug addicts during my life and I always ask them why they take drugs and what stops them giving up. It seems to me that the effect of taking hard drugs is that of hitting oneself on the back of the head with a ball-peen hammer. They move people to a state of near unconsciousness, although admittedly one in which they do not feel pain—it is like being wrapped in cotton wool. Drug addicts say to me, "I take it so it doesn't hurt any more," so in other words they take drugs to stop the cravings and pain.

We must disaggregate the problem of drugs. We must not think of drugs as cannabis, ecstasy and all the other different drugs. We must think of the individual problems of khat, the foul, pernicious and murderous crack cocaine—I do not have time to talk about that—and heroin. We must consider substitute prescribing and maintenance. We in this country must not think of reinventing the wheel, but perhaps look again at the British system, which worked.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): The debate has revealed that a wide range of views are held on both sides of the House, which probably reflects the complexity of the question of drugs and the problems faced by our society.

I start by acknowledging the wider audience outside the House and the valuable work on drugs carried out by people throughout the country. Many hon. Members have mentioned the counselling, assessment, referral, advice and throughcare teams in prisons, drug action teams, general practitioners and the voluntary sector. We never underestimate such people's contribution to our society and I never cease to wonder at the time that people give to try to help others with chaotic lives to find a productive way forward.

I acknowledge the excellent contributions that hon. Members on both sides of the House have made. We heard good interventions on the Secretary of State from my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith). My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham, like many of us, is rightly concerned about the guidance that will be available for schools and head teachers. I hope that the Minister will touch on that point in her winding-up speech or in Committee.

The hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) is a well-known "legaliser" and is to be commended for his consistent approach to the subject, whether one agrees with him or not. He accused the Minister of producing an atrocious piece of knee-jerk legislation, the like of which he has rarely seen under this Labour Government, if at all. He thinks that the decision to legislate on magic mushrooms is laughable. He believes that the Bill has not been based on evidence—more of that later. However, the hon. Gentleman acknowledged the mental health issues. Indeed, he has been examining those with the Council of Europe. I hope to hear more of those when he is made a member of the Committee that considers the Bill. He is concerned about coerced abstinence against voluntary abstinence and its record of success. Once again, we heard from a classic and genuine legaliser. I hope that in the same way as all of us acknowledge that the hon. Gentleman has been consistent in his approach, he will acknowledge that others are equally genuine in wanting a drug-free society and are starting from that base.

The hon. Gentleman followed my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis). He should know that my right hon. Friend raised the subject of khat with the Minister. The hon. Gentleman also raised the subject of khat although he is against, as we could imagine, that being included in the Bill. It is to be hoped that we can consider that in Committee.

The hon. Gentleman also took on board the wider problems in Colombia, Peru and Afghanistan and the supply chain for drugs. It is interesting that he said that he hoped that the House of Lords will throw out the Bill. I do not know whether he knows something that we do not. Obviously the timing of the Bill is an issue.

That was echoed by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), who likewise thought that there was more than a whiff of popularism about the Bill, but, like us, he will not oppose it. It is interesting that he raised points that I, too, would want to pursue in Committee on the levels of dealer quantities of drugs and possible regional variations. The hon. Gentleman referred to the practical problems and the issue of holding people for 192 hours. These are matters that will bear much closer scrutiny when we consider the Bill in Committee, where it will be interesting to hear the views that are expressed by Members on both sides of it.

The hon. Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann), who has great knowledge of this subject, made an excellent contribution to the debate. He challenged the evidence, based on his own investigations in his constituency. The issue of dealing within the vicinity of schools has been brought into question, and the hon. Gentleman referred to a network in schools that passes on knowledge of where to get drugs. The hon. Gentleman and I need issues around that matter to be clarified, so the Minister will have to deal with that.

The definition of assessors and follow-up assessors has been mentioned. The hon. Member for Bassetlaw criticised the failure of the qualification of assessors, if I might put it in that way. I want to know, and I want to press the Minister in Committee, about the qualifications of those who are providing advice and treatment on drugs. Many people are involved and there are no benchmarks and no qualifications governing them. The Minister could and should have addressed that issue within the Bill.

I take my hat off to the general practitioners in Bassetlaw because it is obvious that they have been doing a great deal of work. When there is effective intervention in the drug-taking community, we see the results. That has been shown in the accident and emergency treatment for drug overdoses, where there has been a decline in such admissions, as there has been in admissions for other drug-related problems. That is an important development.

Certain problems underlie the Bill but I am interested in pursuing the idea of the GP having a pivotal role and examining what treatment GPs are able to provide. Too often people who are referred for treatment that they willingly want to have are told, "Go away. It will be three or four months before we can find you a suitable place somewhere." That situation must be addressed, but the Bill fails to do that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), who made an excellent speech, will be introducing a private Member's Bill—I make no apology for doing a commercial for it—the Drugs (Sentencing and Commission of Enquiry) Bill, which will be in the House in a starring role on 25 February. I hope that my hon. Friend will be speaking to packed Benches, unlike tonight. I hope also that the Minister will respond positively to my hon. Friend's Bill. Indeed, I throw out a challenge to her, as she could easily undercut my hon. Friend's starring role on 25 February by adding the provisions in his Bill to the Drugs Bill.

Mr. Evans: That would make my day.

Mrs. Gillan: I agree with my prompt. It might even give my hon. Friend a day off. He raised the interesting prospect of compulsory drug testing after road accidents, which should be explored.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) spoke about drugs and crime as well as the cost of crime in Barnsley. He also referred to the heroin problem. I was not quite sure about his definition of problematic drug users, but he left me with the impression that there was not a seamless set of treatments and interventions in Barnsley. I was particularly worried by his point about reductions in the "Supporting People" budget. I should like the Minister to address that serious problem, as it is not an isolated incident. The "Supporting People" budget is used for drug interventions, but it has been reduced by the Government. The Minister and the Secretary of State may need to take serious action to ensure that it is reinstated throughout the country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) made some pertinent points about the Government's mixed message on drugs. By the Minister's own admission, there is such a message; otherwise the Home Office would not have spent £1 million reinforcing the fact that cannabis is still illegal after its reclassification. It is similar to the mixed message on 24-hour licensing and binge drinking—the muddle and confusion must be put right, as it is not good for our society and it is not good government. The message is not consistent or strong enough, and that view is shared in many parts of the House.

I am sorry that I was not in the Chamber to hear the speech by the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon). By his own admission, it was a Whip-requested lengthy contribution to our debate.

Dr. Iddon: I did not say that.

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Gentleman said that he was asked to speak longer than usual, and so he did. When a lecturer is asked to address an audience there is a danger that he will not know when to sit down but, none the less, the House learned a great deal from the hon. Gentleman's speech. I, too, would like to know about naltraxone and the use of methadone alternatives. It is a reflection on society that we have started to treat maintenance as the norm. Some people should be on methadone for 16 weeks and should be capable of coming off it, but we are maintaining them on it for 16 years. There are therefore some important issues to consider. I have heard about the vaccine to treat addiction, and almost thought that it was a magic mushroom. It appears to be a magic vaccine, but if it is proving advantageous in the tests that are being run, the Government should consider its use. We are familiar with the problem of false positives in drug testing, and must examine it in Committee. We disagree about magic mushrooms, but the call for the evidence base is important, and the Minister must respond to it.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) made a characteristically measured and thoughtful contribution in which he supported the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley. He also dealt with the drop-out rates in treatment, which is a concern for all of us. His robust defence of his constituent, Dr. Garfoot, should not pass unnoticed. The hon. Member for Central Fife (Mr. MacDougall) gave us the Scottish perspective, but the Bill does not extend to Scotland. It extends to Northern Ireland, so I hope that the Minister will explain what is happening in Scotland.

Mr. Carmichael: May I bring to the hon. Lady's attention the fact that the provisions in part 1 relating to the amendment of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, which is a UK-wide statute, apply north of the border?

Mrs. Gillan: I am grateful for that clarification. I think that it is clauses 22 and 24 that apply to Scotland, but the rest of the Bill applies to England and Wales.

Mr. Carmichael: It is clauses 1 and 2.

Mrs. Gillan: Yes, but I think I am correct in saying that that application is achieved through the medium of clause 24 at the end of the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) speaks with great authority about mental health matters for my party, and his contribution showed his measured approach to the problem. He tacitly admitted to being addicted to politics among other things. He expressed concern that law enforcement is not enough in the fight against drugs and that treatment is essential. We can all agree on that. There seemed to be some issues with the Minister relating to the linkage between drugs and mental illness and perhaps we will have time to explore that in Committee.

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase), who is not in his place, made a guest appearance and talked us down memory lane and through the jazz clubs. My hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) made her usual excellent contribution and quoted my constituent, Mary Brett from Dr. Challoner's, who has done sterling work in drugs education. My hon. Friend raised issues relating to the "Frank" campaign, about which we are all concerned.The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Pound) brought up the rear, not for the first time, and clipped in a magic little contribution. I commend his work with Narcotics Anonymous. Like him, I call for sound and sensible legislation.

In his opening remarks my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden welcomed the provisions of the Bill, and I agree that some of the basics are there. However, the proposals have come at the eleventh hour and are seen by some to be too little, too late. If the Government are serious about enacting provisions that will make a difference to drug abusers and to law-abiding citizens, the Minister will have the opportunity to consider and adopt the amendments and additions that we will table in Committee. I hope she will encourage her hon. Friends to table their own amendments.

The Bill has been put together in haste, and things that are put together in haste can be regretted at leisure. We intend to propose that khat be added as an illegal drug, and we will examine clause 1 and make sure that its terms are not limited to schools, but include youth clubs, skate parks, arcades and other areas where children gather. We must study the fine wording of the Bill, such as the provision that it is a reasonable excuse if somebody did not know that a school was being used as a school or that there were young people in it. That would allow people to wriggle under the net.

I am worried about the cash definitions. In the modern economy we know that it is not just cash that is traded between dealers and their runners. Other goods are also traded and I want to make sure that they are included. We want to encourage schools to begin random testing for drugs, and I hope the Minister will consider amendments to the Bill. Testing for class A drugs should extend to under-18s. We want to make it compulsory to complete a treatment programme, and I hope to explore with the Minister the ways in which we could achieve that. We also want to consider offering more residential rehabilitation.

I believe the Government do not care whether the Bill becomes law or not. The timing of its presentation, so close to a possible election, is cynical, and the Bill has been prepared with extreme haste, which is reflected in its provenance. The regulatory impact assessment reveals that there has been little, if any, consultation. In the words of the Home Office on page 13 of the regulatory impact assessment,

"No external consultation has been carried out" on the provisions on antisocial behaviour orders.

We know that about seven weeks ago No. 10 hosted a one-off meeting at which the Prime Minister, the Minister and about 20 police officers discussed the Bill's provisions. If, as we all suspect, a general election is called for 5 May, we will have only a very few sitting days and the Bill will have little chance of becoming law unless a deal is done over it. But that will allow the Government to grandstand and trumpet that they have been tough on drugs, and to point to the Bill as the so-called evidence. No. 10 cannot fool all of the people all of the time.

This is a serious subject, so as a responsible Opposition we will support the Bill, but we will work with the Minister to improve such an undersized piece of legislation. The subject is too important to be thrown away in a flurry of pre-election posturing. I regret that such a valuable opportunity to improve drug treatment and rehabilitation—and even to deal with the wider issues of supply and public health, on which we have not had an opportunity to touch—has been rushed through in an indecent haste by a Government determined to cover all their bases for the next election.

We all wish to improve our society, and our route as politicians is through legislation. That legislation should be well thought through. We will help the Minister in Committee, and I hope, in the spirit of the Secretary of State's words, that we can improve what is on offer, despite the lateness of its presentation to the House.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): We have had an excellent debate this afternoon. It has demonstrated that everyone who has spoken, on whatever side of the argument, cares deeply about the impact of drugs and the way in which individual lives, families and communities can be shattered when the misuse of drugs gets completely out of hand.

Several Members, on both sides of the House, have tried to imply that somehow the Bill stands on its own, and have questioned why it does not cover a number of issues regarding treatment and so on. The reality is that the Bill is part of an overall Government strategy, in which the Home Office leads, to tackle drugs, crime and treatment for anyone who has a drug misuse problem.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the Minister give way?

Caroline Flint: I cannot give way at the moment, as I am going to try to answer all Members' questions.

The Bill is intended to complement what we have already achieved: unprecedented amounts of resources going into treatment; for once, Government policy that recognises the link between drug addiction and crime and that is trying to stop that vicious circle; and for once, mechanisms by which we can assess what treatment is happening and what is good, indifferent and bad, and by which we can try to address that. The Bill does not stand on its own. It complements what we are already achieving up and down the country, part of which is 54 per cent. more people in drug treatment.

If we are to have a reasonable debate on drugs, it is important to consider the Bill in context. I remind the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) and other Conservative Members that not long ago we issued to every Member of Parliament a copy of the document, "Tackling Drugs, Changing Lives", outlining in detail exactly what we are doing to expand provision and to tackle problems of supply, treatment, and importantly, prevention. The Bill and the measures contained in it have arisen out of several different discussions, both formal and informal, with different groups that have specialist expertise and knowledge of the problems in relation to both addiction and enforcement of the law. That is why we have considered measures that, rather than standing on their own, will enhance what we are already trying to achieve.

I want to deal with a number of comments that Members have made. If I do not respond to all of them, I will have to write to the Members concerned, or take up the issues in Committee. First, I want to comment on khat, which was mentioned by the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) and my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Pound). We take the issue seriously, and I have dealt with an Adjournment debate on this very subject. Currently, we are keeping the status of khat under review. Positively, we have arranged with Turning Point and the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders to undertake two studies considering the level of khat use and misuse in communities. On top of that, we are actively considering what is necessary to communicate and engage with those communities for which it is a problem. That issue has been raised with me by members of the Somali community, in relation to how we get across information to them about the dangers of that drug. We are therefore actively considering that area.

Issues of organised crime were also raised. The Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill is currently going through the House, and I spent two days on it in Committee last week. We believe that the establishment of the Serious Organised Crime Agency and extended powers in terms of Queen's evidence and disclosure will greatly assist us in putting behind bars more of the Mr. and Mrs. Bigs who run organised drug crime and other forms of organised crime. That is another piece of legislation that complements what we are trying to do in tackling the problems of drugs in our communities.

On children and the aggravated offence of drug dealing in the vicinity of schools, my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) pointed out that no direct evidence exists and that no figures are kept, but a number of different groups, parents, teachers and others have raised their concerns. We are examining how we can introduce preventive measures as well as how we can deal with the current situation. The legislation is directed at areas rather than children per se because the aggravating factor of targeting vulnerable people, which includes children, already exists, and we felt that that particular area was covered.

On mandatory sentences, I have not had a chance to see the private Member's Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans). However, I remind him that section 110 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 requires the court to impose an appropriate custodial sentence of at least seven years on a person convicted of three class A drug offences. We must see the detail of the Bill before we explore that area further.

On drug testing in schools, the Department for Education and Skills guidance is clear. It provides advice and a number of measures, one of which is drug testing, for schools. Drug testing must sit alongside a school policy on what to do after a positive drug test. It is one part of the guidance, but knowing what to do and how to connect with agencies that might assist an individual young person who has a substance misuse problem is a real issue.

On testing equipment, a number of hon. Members raised the issue of how long drugs remain in a person's system. For example, cocaine can be out of a person's system within a couple of days, whereas cannabis remains for a lot longer. There is therefore a danger that we will not pick up those young people who are involved with class A drugs and that we will pick up the ones who may use cannabis. Drug testing is an option that should be open to schools, and where schools use it, we should examine how to support them.

On testing under-18s at the point of arrest, in the past year we have started to examine testing on charge for under-18s, and there will be provision to extend the age group, but at this stage we need to see how the testing process works with that particular age group.

A number of issues have been raised about the reclassification of cannabis, which is obviously not included in the Bill. We must have a credible discussion about the relative harm caused by different drugs. An evaluation of the Government's public information showed that 93 per cent. of under-18s understood that cannabis continued to be illegal after its reclassification. Estimates from January 2004 indicate that we have saved about 189,000 police hours in relation to the bureaucracy that was generated by policing the old offences that applied to cannabis.

I remind hon. Members that the Home Affairs Committee agreed that we should reclassify cannabis from class B to class C, which was supported by the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), who is currently responsible for co-ordinating Conservative party policy, and which the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Malins), who is part of the Conservative home affairs team, did not vote against. It is not always clear where people are coming from on this issue.

With the Department for Education and Skills and the Department of Health, we are developing a series of health messages that will ensure that we get it across that serious issues exist in relation to the use of cannabis. We are working with a number of people who are involved with mental illness and mental health to ensure that materials are produced that make people aware of the dangers of using any drug, including cannabis, if one has a mental illness. The National Treatment Agency and the Department of Health have taken up dual diagnosis. It is important to ensure that we recognise the different issues, whether they concern mental illness or drug addiction.

I reject the suggestion that magic mushrooms are harmless, because they are equivalent in effect to LSD. The rapid increase in outlets selling magic mushrooms in what we consider a prepared form, which is illegal, has caused problems. The National Association of Alcohol and Drug Abuse Counsellors has said that it feels that the area needs to be clarified, which is why we have gone down this route. Indeed, a recent court case clearly made that point.

On legalisation, all I can say is that I am afraid we do not believe that it is a panacea or answers all the questions. Those involved in organised crime would simply regroup. If one legalised drugs and said to the public, "You can have a certain amount of that drug at a certain price," some criminals would try to undercut that price or offer more drugs than would be available through a regulated outfit.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) raised several issues relating to certain clauses that we can discuss in more detail in Committee. I should say that these measures originate from those on the front line who feel that gaps and loopholes allow dealers to get away with being charged for dealing offences. As regards detention, we are trying to target dealers, not mules.

My hon. Friends the Members for Bassetlaw, for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) and for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) made excellent speeches that drew on their experiences and knowledge of their constituencies. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw that we need to ensure that those involved in carrying out assessments and offering advice are able to do that job. If he wants to come and talk to me about his concerns, my door is open. We are looking to the National Treatment Agency to ensure that people are accredited. We are also encouraging more GPs to take up a role in this respect, as the fact that many have not wanted to do so has been a big problem. In the past year, we have worked with the Department of Health to ensure that primary care trusts take that responsibility more seriously. I hope that we can grow a new generation of GPs who see it as part of their core business.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone for his remarks about how well drug action teams and crime and disorder reduction partnerships are working in his area. He proved that the resources we are providing are making a difference on the ground.

I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East for his work on the all-party group on drugs misuse. He raised several issues. I agree that we need to consider substitutes other than methadone, and the NTA is actively considering that. We should be mindful of the need to give users choice, and we will address that proactively and in more detail in future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Central Fife (Mr. MacDougall) was right to cite his experiences as a Scottish MP. I hope that the debate will be listened to in Scotland and that likewise we will listen to the debates in Scotland. He mentioned our measures on the proceeds of crime, which mean that at last we can take the assets from drug dealers. That, together with other sentences, will make a real difference to their lifestyles, as well as their investment in their drugs businesses.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley talked about the level of drug use in the UK compared with the rest of Europe. Those statistics are open to question and some of the figures are misleading. I am prepared to discuss that with him another time. Drug use in the UK has stabilised. I am not excusing its high level, but there have been rapid reductions among young people in several areas.

The hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) expressed concern about cannabis and talked about the importance of teaching people about the dangers of drugs. That is exactly what we do through Talk to Frank, Blueprint and every other means at our disposal to engage with young people in whatever environment they may be, whether in school, youth clubs or elsewhere.

We have had a very interesting debate. This is an issue that we can never give up on. I do not like the term, "Fighting the war against drugs." We have to be mindful of how drugs change, and when new drugs come into our communities we have to be prepared to deal with them. The Bill allows us to build on our already positive record.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) said, this is about prevention as well. That is why we are working actively with the Department for Education and Skills to go back to the point before young people get involved in drugs. We want increasingly to consider the risk factors that may lead young people into drugs, early sexual activity, truancy or simply not thriving in school. If we can get there early enough, we can challenge some of the dangers that can lead them into crime and imprisonment in future.

I commend the Bill to the House and look forward to debating it in far more detail in Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

DRUGS BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A (6) (Programme motions),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Drugs Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Thursday 3rd February 2005.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

Programming Committee

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Programming of proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Ms Prentice.]

Question agreed to.

DRUGS BILL (MONEY)

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order 52 (1) (a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Drugs Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) expenditure incurred by the Secretary of State by virtue of the Act;

(b) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act.—[Ms Prentice.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119 (9) (European Standing Committees),

eEUROPE 2005 ACTION PLAN

That this House takes note of European Union Document No. 9675/04 and Addenda 1 and 2, Commission Communication on an update to the eEurope 2005 Action Plan; welcomes the actions proposed by the Commission as a follow-up to the mid-term review of the Plan; and supports the Government's objective, during its Presidency of the EU, of ensuring that the 2006–2010 Action Plan contributes positively to the enhanced deployment of Information and Communications Technology (ICT) in business and in the public sector, thereby contributing to the goals of the Lisbon Agenda.—[Ms Prentice.]

Question agreed to.

COMMITTEES

Ordered,

That Kevin Brennan be discharged from the Public Administration Committee and Iain Wright be added.—[Mr. John McWilliam, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

Ordered,

That Caroline Flint be discharged from the Administration Committee and Kali Mountford be added.—[Mr. John McWilliam, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITION

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): I have great pleasure in presenting a petition that has been signed by more than 4,000 of my constituents and others in support of a ban on doorstep cold calling for property repairs and maintenance. The national campaign has come to be called Isobel's law. It is named after Isobel Gray, an 82-year-old lady who was brutally murdered by intruders associated with bogus repairers.

I am grateful to all the individuals and groups that have collected signatures. I would also like to express my gratitude for the support of the Yorkshire Evening Post on the campaign, to Brian Steele, the former detective chief superintendent who investigated Isobel's death, Stuart Pudney of the Trading Standards Institute and Councillor Mick Grubb, who has been awarded the Queen's police medal and is chair of Horsforth town council. As a former police officer, he tackled cases of distraction burglary and property crime.

The petition states:

The Petition of the residents of Pudsey constituency and others declares

That communities and individuals, particularly older citizens, require far greater protection from the activities of bogus and exploitative property repairers and notes that the Government is currently consulting on a range of possible measures to combat these and other activities involving cold calling.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons enact legislation that will ban doorstep cold calling for the purposes of offering property improvement, repair or maintenance.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Medical Services (Northumberland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

7.2 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): I am glad to have the attention of the Minister with responsibility for public health on the problems that we face in Northumberland because, in more than 30 years of representing Northumberland in Parliament, I have never received so many complaints and representations about failings in the local health service as I have had since the new out-of-hours system was introduced last September. Patients and their families are angry about it, and professional nursing and ambulance staff are concerned that they are expected to make decisions without the back-up of a doctor and that they have to explain to patients that they need to be taken 50 miles for treatment, which used to be available locally from the GP on duty.

Once the Government signed the new GP contract, under which practices no longer have responsibility for cover after 6 pm or at weekends, a system had to be created to replace them. That was difficult enough, but it is even more difficult in a scattered rural area where patients are at least 20 miles and often 50 miles from a general hospital. We rely on the infirmaries in Alnwick and Berwick, the community hospital at Rothbury and GPs for a wider range of services than is necessary when there is a major hospital nearby.

Two problems were clear from the start. First, it would not be adequate to have one doctor to provide sole cover for three hospitals and home visits in an area of 1,000 square miles, yet that is all that was thought necessary between midnight and 8 am. Secondly, most local GPs did not want to take part in the new service, so it depended on bringing doctors in from London or Wales, or flying them in from Germany at high rates of pay—£115 an hour in some cases. Apparently, £1,000 a night is the going rate in some other remote areas.

I was told about a German doctor who likes to play golf. It is difficult to get on the golf courses in Germany at the weekend. He therefore comes over, does a weekend's work and has a good income and a good living out of that work in England. He flies back to Germany on a Monday and gets on the golf courses for the whole week. This has helped us out in a crisis, but it does not seem to be quite the right way to run our health service.

The arrangements are the joint responsibility of two trusts. The hospitals come under the Northumbria Healthcare NHS trust, while house calls are the responsibility of the Northumberland Care trust. The names are confusing enough. The primary care trust has had a financial crisis leading to the resignation of its chairman and chief executive, and the joint chief executive of the hospitals trust is now doubling as acting chief executive of the primary care trust. One benefit of this presumably temporary situation is that there can be a single focus of responsibility for putting matters right. I have discussed the problems extensively with the chief executive and I expect to have a further meeting with him in the next few weeks. Indeed, I have been having meetings with the health authorities since before this new arrangement began.

The same doctors provide the service for both trusts, but they are engaged by an agency, Northern Doctors Urgent Care, which is located well outside the area, at Longbenton, on the edge Newcastle. The same organisation provided GP night cover in parts of my constituency before the new system came in, but it was then more closely integrated with the GP service.

In some cases, the arrangements have broken down completely. For example, on 26 November, three local councillors attended Alnwick infirmary to observe the new arrangements. At 6.30 pm, no doctor was present to support the busy casualty department or to do home visits: At 8 pm, the hospital was told that a doctor was on her way from London, but that the train was late. At 8.30 pm, the doctor arrived at Newcastle station, 30 miles away, but there was no driver for her. She eventually arrived at 9.40 pm. There was no back-up or alternative cover.

On another recent occasion, a dying patient in a care home needed pain relief, which could not be prescribed by the care home staff. The doctor who was at the infirmary a mile away could not attend because no driver was available. It did not seem to occur to them to call a taxi, although there are plenty available. The patient had to be put into an ambulance, and died on the short journey to hospital, without the comfort and dignity to which she was entitled in her final hours.

I have been told of one occasion on which a doctor was brought more than 60 miles from Newcastle to write a prescription for pain relief in a similar case because no doctor was available locally. In another case, which I took up with the trust as a complaint, a doctor did not arrive to see a leukaemia sufferer with suspected pneumonia for 12 hours after her sister had called the emergency line. The doctor arrived at 9 pm on a Saturday, the call having been made at 9 am.

For many patients, the consequence of the change has been long journeys to Wansbeck hospital, which is in Ashington, more than 50 miles from Berwick. These journeys tie up an emergency ambulance for two hours. Some of the visiting duty doctors will apparently not carry out basic procedures such as stitching, saying that it is not in their contract. The acting chief executive of the care trust has admitted in a letter to me that the agency was "relying on doctors who, although clinically competent, were not as experienced in the local provision of healthcare."

As a result, many more patients are being taken by ambulance to Wansbeck hospital, where ambulances have been queuing up to get patients in. The health care trust admits that it has "seen an unprecedented rise in the number of admissions and A and E attendance", part of which is clearly caused by the new out-of-hours system.

So serious is the crisis at Wansbeck that a third of the beds at Alnwick infirmary have now been temporarily closed so that staff can be shifted to Wansbeck in an attempt to relieve the situation. The ambulance service is having great difficulty in meeting the increased demand caused by moving so many patients so far at night. Serious gaps in the emergency ambulance cover in the rural area are inevitable while ambulances are detained so far away. In many cases, the ambulance is being expected to take the place of both the local hospital and the doctor's house call. Nursing staff have been issued with instructions that if a patient on a ward has a cardiac arrest after 6 pm or on a bank holiday, they should ring 999. I have here the piece of paper that they were issued with. Clearly, some conditions could make such a 50-mile transfer—or a 40-mile transfer to the Borders general hospital at Melrose—essential. However, many cases could be dealt with locally, and they should not be filling up the larger hospitals or diverting the hard-pressed ambulance service.

The way in which most people approach the new service is to ring an emergency number. One of these numbers connects them to NHS Direct, where they have to explain first to an operator and then to a nurse why they are in urgent need of a doctor. If they get through those hurdles, they will be transferred to an operator at Northern Doctors Urgent Care, where, no matter how distressed or anxious they are, they will have to go through the whole explanation again, possibly twice. If they are successful in negotiating this obstacle course, they will be told that a doctor will ring them, although that could take up to an hour. A visit is still further away.

So what people do, if they can, is get into a car and get driven to the infirmary, where they might be told that no doctor is available. They might then have to drive another 50 miles to Ashington, where they will queue up with those who have been brought in by ambulance. I understand that the care trust is reconsidering the multiple-triage system with a view to eliminating NHS Direct from the process. That would certainly be an improvement. Leaflets have been issued, including the Northern Doctors Urgent Care number, which should also be on the answerphones of all GPs' surgeries.

A separate problem arises from the fact that patients no longer have access to doctors on Saturdays for relatively urgent but non-emergency consultations. People were astonished when notices suddenly appeared in every doctor's surgery saying that there would be no more Saturday morning surgeries after 1 September. I raised the matter in the House on 14 September. The Secretary of State replied that under new national requirements there would be,

"should a patient's condition require it . . . access to a Saturday morning surgery."—[Official Report, 14 September 2004; Vol. 424, c. 1114.]

That does not appear to be happening. Someone who has struggled to work all week with a bad bronchial condition may want to consult the doctor on Saturday to establish whether he or she is fit to return to work on Monday. The only recourse is to go to accident and emergency and ask the doctor to deal with the case as an emergency, alongside all the injury cases. Casualty departments are not equipped or specifically trained for work of that kind. They are busy dealing with injuries. What is supposed to be happening to meet the Saturday surgery requirement that the Secretary of State set out so clearly in the House, and what information will be given to the public? I hope the Minister will be able to make that clear.

I also hope she will tell us whether there are examples of best practice in new arrangements for out-of-hours care in other remote rural areas. If there are, I should like the health trusts in our area to take them up.

I am sure it cannot be said that the defects of the new service are a result of attempts to do things on the cheap. It must be fabulously expensive, given the very high rates being paid to entice doctors from Germany and the great increase in ambulance journeys, as well as the cost of staff transfers to deal with the increased pressure on Wansbeck hospital. There really must be a better way of using this money to provide a service that is tailored to local needs.

There are certain requirements for that service. Given that doctors must cover both hospital and home-visit cases, we need a doctor in Berwick and a doctor in Alnwick throughout the out-of-hours period, and each must have a driver. Sometimes one is shared between two places, which is a hopeless arrangement. Even an account with a taxi firm would be an improvement on circumstances in which a doctor cannot go out on calls. A back-up arrangement with local doctors needs to be in place in case doctors cannot reach an urgent case, or are delayed as they fly in from wherever they are coming from. I should like to see a major effort to attract local GPs to participate in the service, and I hope the Minister agrees.

More forms of treatment should be available at local hospitals to reduce the number of long-distance ambulance transfers that the system has generated. Staff should feel that they have adequate back-up and are doing work that is appropriate to their training and grade. The public should be able to speak to a doctor by telephone in urgent cases without having to go through numerous intermediaries, and should be able to secure a house call when it is needed. Saturday morning surgeries should cater for all patients who cannot reasonably be expected to put off seeing a doctor until Monday, or who have real difficulty in attending during the working day.

All those services were available in Northumberland when we had a GP-led out-of-hours service. Now they are not, and people are very angry about what they see as a serious and threatening reduction in the national health service. The care trust has stopped saying, as it said last August, that patients would see no difference in the standard of service. Today, I understand, it has said it is "different but adequate". It is certainly different, and it is costing a lot more money; but it is an inferior service. It is not adequate, and I want Ministers to act to help put it right.

Today the Northumbria health care trust issued a press release announcing that the two trusts have agreed jointly to review the urgent-care system across the county. That may be the first result of today's debate, but the review needs to be fundamental, starting with patient needs rather than with the trust's existing structures. It needs to examine alternative models for the provision of out-of-hours care in scattered and remote rural communities. It needs to consider how we can increase, rather than decrease, the role of local hospitals in Alnwick, Berwick and Rothbury. It needs to consider the fact that extensive medical equipment and facilities in GPs' surgeries, which were provided with the support of public funds, are locked up and unused from 5.30 on Friday until 8 o'clock Monday morning, and throughout the Christmas and new year periods. It needs to consider reducing dependence on flying in doctors from the south and from Germany at vast expense, and to look for ways of attracting the support and involvement of as many local GPs as possible. It needs to make use of best practice in other remote rural areas; above all, it needs to listen with an open mind to the concerns of patients, NHS staff and the community. It is those concerns that I have tried to voice tonight.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): I begin by congratulating the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) on securing this debate. I know that this issue is very important to his constituents, and particularly to the families and others whom he mentioned or alluded to; I join him in recognising that importance. I am sure that he will join me in congratulating the NHS staff in Northumberland on their work. They are dedicated to delivering high quality services and they deserve our admiration; they doubtless enjoy his, as well as mine.

I want to begin by saying a little about the policy of out-of-hours medical care. We said that we would introduce these changes in April 2002 and as a result of them we have devolved funding locally, so that people can get the services that they deserve locally, and that decisions can be made at that level. The right hon. Gentleman doubtless fully endorses that principle, given that he believes in taking as many decisions as possible at a local level.

The change to the contract supports the development of an integrated system of high quality out-of-hours care. The right hon. Gentleman said little about integrated systems but he mentioned other good examples of such provision, to which I shall come in a moment. The previous arrangement often involved sub-contracting out to GP co-operatives, but now practices can themselves transfer such responsibilities to primary care trusts, as the lead commissioners of NHS services in their areas. That enables PCTs to rethink and reconfigure the provision of out-of-hours services, and to co-ordinate them with other services such as accident and emergency, social care and NHS walk-in centres, where such centres have been opened. The long-term aim is to have a seamless, integrated and unscheduled care network that brings together all services in meeting patients' unplanned needs.

I recognise that the right hon. Gentleman's comments suggest that the situation in Northumberland is not working out as it should, but before I deal with the points that he raised I want briefly to mention the investment that we are putting in. As he rightly said, we have increased such investment significantly. We have doubled this year's out-of-hours development fund to £92 million, we have provided additional resources of £14 million to assist PCTs in very rural and urban areas, and we have made available to PCTs £30 million in capital incentives. In addition, some £180 million is available that was previously given to practices to pay for out-of-hours services; under the new contract arrangements, that money goes to the PCTs. To save the right hon. Gentleman some arithmetic, that totals some £316 million.

Mr. Beith: As I understand it, Northumberland does not qualify for the rural benefit because it is a mixture of a very urban area and an enormous rural area. The Minister might like to consider that point.

Miss Johnson: I am very happy to do so and the right hon. Gentleman may well be right. A number of mixed areas sometimes fall foul of this problem; none the less, there has been investment in the health service in Northumberland as a whole, and a big increase in the number of GPs—from 231 in September 2001 to the current figure of 272. That is an increase of 18 per cent., so it amounts to a substantial increase.

I have already mentioned the arrangements that we believe should work and the opportunities that they provide. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, GPs in Northumberland opted out of providing cover out of hours, although 30 per cent. of doctors there still provide a service under the Northern Doctors Urgent Care arrangement during the week—and they are local doctors. Various arrangements are being put in place, including one GP on duty after midnight at either Alnwick or Berwick, and a driver is supposedly available overnight. I take note of the right hon. Gentleman's comments on that. The majority of local doctors do not provide weekend services and that is when agency doctors are mainly used. A large team is on call, which should allow for flexibility in travel arrangements. The aim is to work to achieve the targets of responding to all urgent calls within two hours and to non-urgent ones within six hours. Again, I note the right hon. Gentleman's comments about the time scale of some of the calls that he has drawn to the attention of the House.

As a result of examining the issue, and mindful of the fact that the trust has had a few months to see the system operate, I am pleased to say that the two trusts—I agree with the right hon. Gentleman about the confusion of the names—jointly agreed to review urgent care systems across the county, and it is expected that the review will be concluded by the end of February. I trust that it will be concluded at that time, as I appreciate that many of the issues raised by the right hon. Gentleman are of significant concern to his constituents—and rightly so. I am aware of worries about journeys to Wansbeck. Sometimes, such journeys are necessary to provide the best possible clinical care, which can often be received only at a general hospital. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would not argue with that.

As to coverage, what we aspire to and what is being delivered in other areas is that the service provided should meet the national quality requirements provided by the primary care trust. The PCT must performance-manage the provider to ensure that that happens. Where the provider fails to meet the requirements, action has to be taken to deal with it. Clear times should be specified within which patients should receive an initial clinical assessment and receive clinical treatment, which may vary, depending on the seriousness of the condition or disease. Providers must ensure that patients are treated by the clinician best equipped to meet their needs in the appropriate location. Where a face-to-face consultation is necessary, it must take place within clearly defined time scales.

On some occasions, patients may need to travel. They may need to attend an accident and emergency, hospital or clinic-based outpatients' appointment, for example, and the PCT has a duty to recognise that the distance should not be unrealistic, though it should not preclude patients who urgently need a face-to-face consultation being seen within the specified time frame.

As I said, I am pleased that the strategic health authority announced today that it would undertake a review, and I trust that it will be conducted speedily. I will additionally ask the Recovery and Support Unit in the Department to ensure that it supports colleagues at the SHA in carrying out its review of services. The right hon. Gentleman might like to note that in February and March we are also bringing together out-of-hours providers and PCTs in a series of workshops across the country, to focus on ensuring the quality of out-of-hours services and how providers and commissioners can work together on managing performance.

In that connection, I promised that I would turn to the question of how the service is organised elsewhere—in central Cheshire, for example. It is across the other side of the country, but not a million miles from where the right hon. Gentleman is based. There, all 30 practices opted out on 1 April 2004. The PCTs established an all-encompassing out-of-hours service covering an area formerly provided for by five co-operatives. It integrates GPs, nurses and paramedics in a way that has not been widely remarked on. Triage nurses advise patients or refer them to treatment centres in Crewe or Northwich, and home visits are made by paramedics. Between 50 per cent. and 60 per cent. of the area's 140 GPs have agreed to do shifts for the PCT, and salaried GPs are also employed.

I could give other examples from around the country. People are configuring services to reflect how they can best be delivered. Clearly, issues arise in respect of an area's pattern of towns and settlements, as well as its geography and provision of GPs, hospitals and other services. However, a number of areas have taken a creative approach to producing a better and more seamless service, with a much wider skills mix among the people who provide the care. There is a much better distribution than was the case historically of the way in which patients are seen by GPs with the relevant skills, at the relevant time and in the most relevant place.

Mr. Beith: May I observe that, under the old system, we were lucky? We had a well integrated GP and hospital service. The GPs provided the hospital night service and used that as the base for attending house calls. Will the Minister clarify how the Secretary of State's promise that there would be Saturday morning surgeries will be met? Patients who are not emergencies but whose needs are pressing must be able to know that they can see a doctor on a Saturday morning.

Miss Johnson: People can see a doctor on a Saturday morning, as I am sure the right hon. Gentleman appreciates. The question of whether they can see their own doctor is a separate matter. Whatever his criticisms of the provision in his area, I understand that people in Northumberland are able to see a GP on a Saturday morning, and that there is no problem about access normally. I do not think that I can say anything more about that.

I shall also ensure that the SHA looks at the regular performance reviews of the interaction between the commissioner and the provider, and that it will consider matters such as performance, capacity, contingency arrangements and the suitability of commissioned out-of-hours service. Prompt action should be taken to resolve any problems that arise.

I appreciate that this is a serious matter, and that the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed has raised issues that we must be sure that we can deal with. The SHA and the PCT must also ensure that they can deal with these matters. However, I assure the right hon. Gentleman that we take his comments seriously, and that the local trust will want to address the matters that he has raised.

The PCT is in the lead when it comes to service provision, and the right hon. Gentleman and I will agree that local decisions are best made locally. Appropriate investment has been made to render that possible, and I am sure that the relevant local bodies will be keen to ensure that health provision is up to the standard that we all expect in this century. We want out-of-hours care to be targeted as much as possible in the appropriate way, and to be available to people as necessary, regardless of the hour of day or night.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty eight minutes past Seven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Devolved Government

1. Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): If he will make a statement on the political process towards re-establishment of devolved government in Northern Ireland. [208434]

4. Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): If he will make a statement on the restoration of devolved government. [208437]

5. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): What assessment he has made of the implications for the peace process of the recent theft from the headquarters of Northern Bank in Belfast. [208438]

6. Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): What plans he has to convene talks between political parties on a political settlement in Northern Ireland. [208439]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Paul Murphy): As I said in my statement to the House last Tuesday, I deeply regret the fact that progress towards the re-establishment of devolved government in Northern Ireland has been put in jeopardy by the Northern bank raid.

I cannot forecast when it will prove possible to re-establish an inclusive power-sharing Executive, which the Government continue to believe provides the best long-term guarantee of peace and stability, and we shall not abandon our commitment to that.

I am in the process of talking to the Northern Ireland parties, with a view to hearing at first hand their assessments of the current position and their views on a number of difficult questions that now face us.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I welcome the Secretary of State's response, but how can the people of Northern Ireland be assured when there are denials of the bank robbery on the part of those who hitherto denied certain incidents in the past, such as permitting a young lad to return to Londonderry, telling his mother that he would be safe and then ordering his execution? How can we rest with any sense of trust and peace with that sort of nonsense going on?

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Gentleman is right in pointing out in his last few words the significance of all this for the trust, confidence and faith between parties that must exist before we can get the restoration of the institutions in Northern Ireland. I believe that the Chief Constable was right in his assessment; the Irish Government believe the same; and I think that the people of Northern Ireland believe it as well. The issue now is how we get into a situation where we can restore those institutions, but before we can do that, we have to restore the trust, which is exactly what the hon. Gentleman referred to.

Mr. Mackay: The Secretary of State will be aware that the whole House has huge sympathy with his predicament. He has been very badly let down by the republicans. Can he confirm the following facts: first, Sinn Fein and the IRA are inextricably linked; secondly, it would be impossible to have in devolved government people who have carried out such a large criminal act?

Mr. Murphy: Yes, and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said precisely that. The issue that has caused this problem is that of criminality, and that issue must be addressed before we can restore the institutions—not least because, as I suggested in my last answer, we simply will not get politicians, party leaders and people who have been elected in Northern Ireland together unless that trust is restored.

The other issue is that, of course, as dramatic and big as the bank robbery was, we must not forget the other aspects of criminality that go on, day in and day out, in Northern Ireland, in loyalist as well as republican areas. We must stop that criminality, as otherwise we get a society that is not wholesome. People have had their minds concentrated because of the events of the past few weeks, and perhaps in some ways that is not a bad thing, because we can tell the people of Northern Ireland that we will concentrate on trying to end that criminality and ensuring that all parties that are in the Executive abandon any idea of linkage with groups that involve themselves in any criminality.

David Taylor: Following last night's denial by the Provisional IRA that it was involved in last month's Northern bank robbery, the Police Service of Northern Ireland has asked why the statement has been made now, not three weeks or so ago, and the Secretary of State has said that he still concurs with Chief Constable Orde's judgment that IRA-Sinn Fein are implicated in the crime. If that is so, why does he not impose on Sinn Fein the penalty of exclusion—for, say, 12 months—from a new power-sharing Executive?

Mr. Murphy: The issue of exclusion from an Executive would arise, of course, in the event of an Assembly being up and running, and rules are laid down for that. The Independent Monitoring Commission would report to the Assembly. If the Assembly did not take a decision on that, it would come to me in terms of exclusion. At the moment, of course, there is no Assembly, but the issue still goes back to the fact that there must be trust among the parties for an Executive to be formed. There were considerable negotiations leading up to Christmas that, in the end, did not work. That was a great pity, but at the end of the day, unless we tackle the criminality, we will not get the trust for the parties to get together. Whatever the reasons behind exclusion and all the rest of it, that is the fundamental problem that we face. Both Governments agree that the IMC should report earlier than in April. We have not yet decided the details. Of course, we will request the IMC to do precisely that; and of course it has in its remit the possibility of sanctions and penalties.

Mr. Campbell: How can the Secretary of State reassure people in Northern Ireland that in discussions that he will have with the political parties he will not countenance bank robbing, gun smuggling, gangsterism and terrorism as any part of a process aimed at getting a satisfactory form of devolved government back in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Murphy: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I have already talked to him and his party, and doubtless we will have more meetings as the weeks go by. It is important for us to talk to parties about how they think we can move forward, and part of those discussions will deal with the possibility of establishing scrutiny over me and my fellow Ministers. In addition to that, it is important that we emphasise the issue of criminality during any discussions with parties. We must make it clear to parties that bank robberies and criminality in any form simply do not form part of a modern, democratic, non-violent political society in Northern Ireland. Such activities cannot continue, because they corrupt society.

Tony Cunningham (Workington) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the unity of the British and Irish Governments in putting pressure on the IRA to cease paramilitary activity should continue and be encouraged?

Mr. Murphy: One of the important aspects of the past couple of weeks has been the way in which the British and Irish Governments have reacted in exactly the same manner to the bank robbery. This week I met Dermot Ahern, the Irish Foreign Minister, and there will be a formal meeting of the British and Irish Governments in Dublin in just under a fortnight to determine where we are. It is important that both Governments take the same view on criminality, as we do, and especially on how the raid on the bank has had grave consequences for the political and peace processes in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): The Secretary of State said that the past process was brought to a halt by criminality. Does he agree that the joint declaration following the Leeds series of talks indicated that paramilitarism and criminality were debarments from future talks? What then happened in respect of the heists and robberies at Makro and Gallahers and the abduction of Bobby Tohill? Were they not acts of criminality carried out during the talks process? What was new that meant that this specific criminality brought the process to a halt? If the Secretary of State gets back to the talks, will he go back to the basics of the Good Friday agreement and make them inclusive of all parties in Northern Ireland that subscribed to that agreement? The people of Ireland—north and south—endorsed the principle of inclusivity on a proper basis for such talks.

Mr. Murphy: Yes, and one of the great benefits of the process in which my hon. Friend was involved in the lead-up to the Good Friday agreement was the fact that all parties were in Castle buildings making decisions together. There is no real substitute for that. However, I remind him that although that was a major principle behind how we arrived at the talks, a further principle of the Good Friday agreement was that there should not be criminality and that bodies such as the IRA and loyalist groups should not be associated with parties regarding criminality. It is important for hon. Members and people in Northern Ireland to realise that the bank robbery in Northern Ireland violated the Good Friday agreement and the principles that lie behind it. The Good Friday agreement was not about continuing criminality and paramilitary activities, but ending those things.

Mr. Michael Mates (East Hampshire) (Con): I am sure that everyone will sympathise with the position in which the IRA has put the Secretary of State and his Ministers through its blatant disregard for the letter and spirit of the Good Friday agreement. Does he agree that several issues have been on hold for some months in the hope that we could get a devolved government so that the Assembly, if it could come together again, could make decisions that needed to be taken? Now that it is clear that there will be no progress on that front for many months, if not years, may I urge him to implement the measures that have been held up and thus give the people of Northern Ireland firm government at least, even if it has to be the second best—the continuation of direct rule?

Mr. Murphy: The right hon. Gentleman's point about second best is right. We have to get the best, which is local Ministers taking decisions locally and being held accountable by local people. That is the aim of us all. But of course the right hon. Gentleman is correct: government has to continue, decisions have to be made and there has to be good governance in Northern Ireland, albeit through direct rule. Our job is then to consult as widely as we can with people in Northern Ireland, including the political parties, when we make vital decisions.

Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): The Secretary of State is right to see this appalling crime in the context of the wider future for Northern Ireland and its potential devolution. Does he agree, however, that Sinn Fein should take that crime as its opportunity to make a clean break with the criminal and IRA elements in the communities that it is supposed to be representing politically?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend makes an important and interesting point. If that break with criminality does not come, we really have no hope of getting the institutions in Northern Ireland up and running again.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): We all recognise the crucial importance of tackling the deep divisions in Northern Ireland society, but it is now more than a year since the consultation on "A Shared Future" ended. Is the Minister aware that it identified continuing communal conflict and tensions, but little evidence of significant increases in shared education and housing? Given that the consultation led to specific strategic and tactical recommendations, both national and local, may I ask when the Government intend to publish their action plan based on "A Shared Future"?

Mr. Murphy: The new policy framework is currently at the final draft stage. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State and his officials have engaged in consultation with all parties and other stakeholders in Northern Ireland. Publication is expected in late February or March, and an action plan is expected to follow in the autumn.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): In an earlier answer, did not my right hon. Friend put the cart before the horse? In order to set up the Executive, surely there needs to be the exclusion of Sinn Fein, rather than the other way round.

Mr. Murphy: We must never get away from the central issue that this bank robbery has highlighted: criminality. We have to resolve that in order for a fully inclusive Executive to be established. For a voluntary coalition to work, it would have to involve nationalists and Unionists. The parties are making suggestions to me about other methods by which we could improve scrutiny in Northern Ireland; whether that is by having an Assembly without an Executive, as some parties have suggested, we will have to wait and see. At the end of the day, we have to concentrate on stopping criminality as the major issue for us in Northern Ireland.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): I am sure that the Secretary of State will have noted the comment of a very senior Sinn Fein negotiator that the abduction and murder by the IRA of Mrs. Jean McConville, mother of 10, was not a criminal act. Does not that single comment indicate the distance that Sinn Fein and the IRA still have to travel before they really understand what democratic and peaceful politics is about?

Mr. Murphy: The abduction of Mrs. McConville, who was, as the hon. Gentleman said, a mother of 10, was a wicked criminal act, and to suggest otherwise is preposterous. No political party can define what a crime is in Northern Ireland, or anywhere else for that matter. I think that everybody in the House and in Northern Ireland would recognise that that was a wicked, terrible crime, which everybody condemned.

Mr. Lidington: There is no difference between the Secretary of State and myself on that.

Will the right hon. Gentleman make it clear in his conversations with the political parties that the Government will not allow the IRA to treat guns, private armies and criminal empires as some kind of bargaining chip to be traded for political concession or meetings at No. 10; that giving up crime and violence is a condition of inclusion in democratic politics and in government; and that all the powers and resources of both the British and the Irish Government will be directed at breaking the grip that both republican and loyalist mafias still have on too many communities in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Murphy: I very much agree with the hon. Gentleman. As I have said repeatedly this morning, there is no question of having an inclusive Executive until the problem of criminality is resolved. We simply cannot have our communities in Northern Ireland, whether in loyalist areas or in republican areas, bedevilled by criminality and paramilitarism.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): Given the continuing failure of the IRA and Sinn Fein to abide by exclusively peaceful and democratic means, and given, in the IRA statement last night, their contemptuous refusal to face up to the truth and accept their involvement in criminality, terrorism, paramilitarism and so on, when will the Secretary of State reflect the anger of the community across the board in Northern Ireland, come to the House and tell us what action he will take? When will he move ahead with those parties that want proper devolved government up and running in Northern Ireland and stop allowing the criminals of Sinn Fein-IRA to hold the rest of the community to ransom?

Mr. Murphy: First, because he has attended meetings with me, the hon. Gentleman is conscious of the fact that I have to talk to his and other parties in Northern Ireland to see where the future lies in terms of devolution and the institutions. I repeat that we cannot have an Executive as it is envisaged in the Good Friday agreement unless we tackle criminality, and we cannot have a voluntary coalition unless it contains both nationalists and Unionists. There might be other ways in which we can exercise democracy in Northern Ireland—for example, through the Assembly without an Executive—and, like my Irish counterparts, I am perfectly willing to consider all the aspects of strands 1, 2 and 3. What is important is that we continue the dialogue and aim for local involvement in decision making in Northern Ireland. The hon. Gentleman is right to point out that many people in Northern Ireland, not just politicians, want a devolved Administration in which their politicians can be held to account.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim) (UUP): The Secretary of State has shown extreme patience in trying to find a political way forward, but what useful purpose can be served by further talks with Sinn Fein-IRA, whose spokesperson, P. O'Neill, is an undoubted liar? For how much longer will the representatives of truly democratic parties in Northern Ireland be denied the opportunity to represent the law-abiding electorate?

Mr. Murphy: I have little to add to my previous answer on what we have to do to get a voluntary coalition or the Executive as it is envisaged in the Good Friday agreement. However, there is sense in talking to representatives of Sinn Fein, not least because we can emphasise to them the significance of what has happened since the bank raid and the importance of ending criminality in Northern Ireland. We have to make it clear to them that that is the purpose of the Government, the Irish Government, all the people of Northern Ireland, and all Members of this House.

Ministerial Accountability

2. Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): What steps he is taking to ensure there are mechanisms for accountability of Ministers in his Department to electors in Northern Ireland. [208435]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. John Spellar): As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said to the House last Tuesday, we recognise the concerns that a number of people have expressed about the accountability of direct rule Ministers. We will reflect carefully on ways in which the existing accountability mechanisms may be strengthened and supplemented, including proposals put forward by some of the parties in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Turner: A moment ago, the Secretary of State mentioned the possibility of having an Assembly without an Executive. Is he willing for his Ministers to be accountable to that Assembly?

Mr. Spellar: The Secretary of State rightly said that we have had a number of suggestions, some of which are variations of the one that the hon. Gentleman just described. We have to engage in discussions, and my right hon. Friend and I are discussing with political parties how to move on, but we have to get some common ground between the parties on such issues.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh) (SDLP): The Minister might agree that at a time like this there is always the temptation to do something for the sake of doing something. Will he firmly resist the temptation to go down the James Prior road and have an Assembly without either authority or responsibility? He should not spend time and effort on something that will fail, but base the effort on the fact that only the two sovereign Governments acting together have the power and the authority to deal with criminality, illegal arms and illegal armies.

Mr. Spellar: I echo the comments of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about the core importance of tackling criminality, which is re-emphasised by the hon. Gentleman. His party has views on how we could move forward to greater ministerial accountability. We are considering that, but obviously we need common ground between parties as to how we make progress, recognising the common desire for greater accountability.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): Is not one way to ensure greater accountability to transfer certain powers away from Ministers to directly elected local authorities? In that context, will the Government press forward with the proposals under the review of public administration that seem to have been gathering dust in pending trays for far too long?

Mr. Spellar: That is not right. The Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, South (Mr. Pearson), has been having discussions with parties regarding the review of public administration. There is not unanimity even on, for example, the number of local authorities there should be. Discussions are taking place as to which powers should be delegated to those local bodies. Of course, that would have a significant impact on a future Assembly and Executive, so the matter is not straightforward. We take the point that devolving decisions to the most appropriate local level is important, but we need to achieve some common ground on it.

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that one way of increasing the accountability of Ministers to the people of Northern Ireland and making the workings of the House more accessible to them would be for the sittings of the Northern Ireland Grand Committee to take place in Northern Ireland during the suspension?

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Spellar: As my hon. Friend and those who cheered that comment know, there is not exactly common ground on that in the Northern Ireland Grand Committee. We continue through the usual channels to explore how that could be progressed, but we recognise that there are difficulties.

Northern Ireland Assembly

3. Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): What the total cost of the Northern Ireland Assembly has been since its suspension in October 2002; and if he will make a statement. [208436]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Ian Pearson): The cost of maintaining the Northern Ireland Assembly since suspension in October 2002 until 31 December 2004 has been £53.5 million. That comprises £23.2 million for costs relating to Members and political parties, £20.2 million for costs relating to Assembly staff, and £10.1 million for property, accommodation and business service costs.

Lady Hermon: Can the Minister explain the moral justification for continuing to squander £2 million per month on a phantom Assembly at Stormont?

Mr. Pearson: It is important to recognise that the Assembly machinery must be maintained for when devolution is restored. As a Government we carefully monitor the situation. The number of Assembly staff has been reduced from 403 to 292, and about 40 per cent. of those have been fully or partially redeployed. We have saved about £15 million during the present financial year by allowing staff to go to work for other departments. We will continue to keep these matters under review.

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): Rather than continuing the phantom, empty, inoperative Assembly, should not the Government move ahead and give us accountable government by speeding up local government reform, getting rid of the health and education quangos and giving us a tier of local administration on top of Government, similar to the way in which England and Wales are governed?

Mr. Pearson: I agree that it is important that we move forward with the review of public administration, which the people of Northern Ireland clearly want to see. As the hon. Gentleman knows, I have been having discussions with a range of political parties during recent months, and I will continue to do so. We are just finishing some work on local identity, and I hope to have a firm proposals paper ready for consultation either at the end of February or early in March, which I hope will fully address the issues that he rightly raised.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [209301] Ann McKechin (Glasgow, Maryhill) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 19 January.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): If you, Mr. Speaker, and the House will allow me, before listing my engagements, I will once again briefly update the House on the current casualty figures from the tsunami in respect of the British missing and dead. The number of category 1 missing—those most likely to be lost—is, including the 53 confirmed dead, now 274, which is down from 410 last Wednesday. The category 2 figure—those unaccounted for in the region but not in the highly likely category—now stands at 360. That is down from over 600 last Wednesday.

This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Ann McKechin: This week, Dr. Jeffrey Sachs presented his report on the millennium development goals to the United Nations, and showed how far short the world is of reaching those targets. When 150,000 children in Africa die each month from malaria alone, and when 114 million children are denied even basic education, does my right hon. Friend agree that, when the G7 finance leaders meet next month, we should press them for substantial increases in debt relief, and to use the International Monetary Fund gold reserve to achieve it?

The Prime Minister: I entirely agree with what my hon. Friend says. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced that the UK would pay its share of the debt service owed to the World Bank and African Development Bank on behalf of low-income countries that could then use the debt service reduction for action on poverty, health and education—the very things that the millennium development goals deal with.

We will press other G7 countries to join this initiative. It is important that they do and I hope that Europe joins this initiative as well. We can then make sure that the money that these countries desperately need, scarce enough as it is, is not going to pay billions of dollars-worth of debt service repayments.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): I am grateful to the Prime Minister for updating the House on the latest figures for victims of the tsunami.

The appalling photographs in today's newspapers bring shame on our country, but we should recognise that they in no way reflect the true character of Britain's armed forces. While the current court martial will decide on individual issues of guilt or innocence, what steps will be taken to investigate the circumstances in which conduct of the kind alleged can take place?

The Prime Minister: First, let me say that everyone finds those photographs shocking and appalling. There are simply no other words to describe them. However, in fairness to our armed forces, I want to make two points. First, the difference between democracy and tyranny is not that in a democracy bad things do not happen, but that in a democracy when they do happen people are held and brought to account, and that is what is happening under our judicial system. Secondly, the vast majority of those 65,000 British soldiers who have served out in Iraq have done so with distinction, with courage and with great honour to this country. So while we express in a unified way our disgust at those pictures, I hope that we do not allow that to tarnish the good name—fully deserved—of our British armed forces.

I can also assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that we will do everything that we can—the Army is doing this already—to investigate the circumstances surrounding these matters. The very fact that these courts martial are being brought is an indication of how seriously the Army takes them.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle) (SDLP): Given the Chancellor's positive statement on sending assistance to the poorer countries of the world, and given that the poorest countries in the world are those without education, is not education one of the best forms of assistance that we can send, because it will enable such countries to become totally self-sufficient in a generation or so?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right that investment in education is the best investment that we can make. It is worth pointing out that measures led by this country have already been taken on debt relief. For example, Uganda has been able substantially to increase the number of children in primary education, precisely because it has been able to spend money on education. That is why it is so important that the initiative announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is extended to other countries and that they agree to it.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): All of us agree with the sentiments expressed earlier by the Prime Minister on the publication of the photographs of abuse and I am sure that he will agree that the photographs' very circulation is likely to increase the difficulties and dangers for our troops, who are good and honourable, in Iraq. What is his assessment of the impact of the circulation of those images on likely levels of violence? Given the reports of bombings today, does he think that there may yet be a need for additional British troops to bolster the safety of the troops who are currently in position?

The Prime Minister: On the last point, the additional deployment for the purposes of the election is satisfactory and sufficient, and I am not aware of any request for additional troops. On the first point—we saw this when pictures of American soldiers were published—I think and hope that people in Iraq understand that the fact that we are taking action and prosecuting people who we believe may have been guilty of offences indicates that we do not tolerate that type of activity in any shape or form. It is worth emphasising that Iraqis to whom I spoke on my visits to Basra have paid tribute to the British armed forces' work.

Over the next few weeks, Iraqis will have the chance to participate in their first ever democratic elections. Millions of them want to take part and I am sure that they will. According to the United Nations, the vast majority of Iraqis who are allowed to participate want to participate, whatever part of Iraq they come from. In part, they can do that only because of the courage of British soldiers, who are remaining in Iraq to help them reach the state of democracy that the Iraqis want.

Mr. Kennedy: On troop numbers, given that the Governments of Holland, the Czech Republic and Portugal have all indicated that they will start a phased withdrawal of their troops from the British sector in Iraq over the coming months, what is the likely consequence for our troop numbers? For example, does the Ministry of Defence plan to send in more troops after the election to plug any gaps left by the withdrawal of those forces?

The Prime Minister: No, there are no plans to expand the British contribution. It is correct that some of those countries that had a time-limited commitment to Iraq will act in accordance with it. For example, the Dutch will withdraw their troops at a certain point after the election process. At the same time, however, the Iraqis' capability and capacity in relation to armed forces, police and civil defence is being developed all the time. It cannot be emphasised too often that we do not want to stay for a moment longer than we need to and that the Iraqi people do not want us to stay for a moment longer than we need to. It is a question of staying until the Iraqis' capability is sufficiently robust that they can look after their own security. Everything that comes out of Iraq makes it clear that the people who are causing terrorism and insurgency do not represent the vast majority of Iraqis or even the vast majority in the communities around Baghdad. If they were left to it, those people would be very happy to live in a free democracy, as would the rest of us.

Q2. [209302] Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): I am sure that the Prime Minister knows about my Bill, which I have introduced with cross-party support, to require approval by a vote in Parliament before British forces are sent into armed conflict. Will he support those proposals, so that no future Prime Minister can ignore the important precedent that he set when we had a vote, whether or not some of us liked the result, on Iraq, and will he consider setting another precedent by providing Government time in which to debate my Bill?

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind acknowledgement that we provided an opportunity for this House to debate the conflict before entering into it. On the rest of his points, I am afraid that I will have to disappoint him. As I have said many times before, it would be unthinkable for a country to go to war against the wishes of Parliament, but it is not right to constrain the prerogatives that exist at the moment. We did allow people to have a vote before the Iraq conflict, but there may be circumstances—I cannot foresee them, but there may be—in which action has to take place very quickly. I will study my hon. Friend's Bill carefully, but we would have to consider the detail of it before any such change was made.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): Before the last election, the Prime Minister promised not to increase the basic or top rate of income tax. Will he give the same pledge today?

The Prime Minister: We have of course honoured that pledge. In respect of any pledges that we make at the next election, the right hon. and learned Gentleman will have to wait for our manifesto. Of course, there will be a Budget in the meantime. I would point out to him that we have not raised the top rate of tax and that we have actually cut the basic rate.

Mr. Howard: Everyone will have noticed that the Prime Minister is not prepared to give that pledge. Now, will he promise not to increase national insurance contributions?

The Prime Minister: As I said before, we will give the details of any tax commitments we make in our manifesto. I might point out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the Government of whom he was a member fought an election specifically on not putting VAT on fuel, and then put VAT on fuel, so we will take no lessons on broken promises on tax from him.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister promised not to put up taxes at all. He said that he had no such plans. He said that no one should assume that this Government would increase national insurance contributions, and the first thing that they did after the election was to increase national insurance contributions.

Every independent expert—the International Monetary Fund, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the CBI, the British Chambers of Commerce, the National Institute of Economic and Social Research, The Economist, the Institute for Fiscal Studies—says that the Government are spending more than they are raising and that a Labour Chancellor would have to put up taxes. Why does the Prime Minister think that they are all wrong?

The Prime Minister: I think that they are wrong for the very simple reason that the Treasury forecasts on the economy have been proved right. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was the person who told us that we would have a recession as a result of Government policy.

As we are talking about tax commitments, I have been having a look at the right hon. and learned Gentleman's supposed tax commitments. I hope that he will now publish the detail behind the so-called James review, because it is actually based on the Government's own savings as set out in Sir Peter Gershon's report. It also has a set of completely incredible savings. To give just one example, the right hon. and learned Gentleman is going to save almost £1 billion from the commissioning of care by primary care trusts, when the total amount of care commissioned by PCTs—the administrative costs—is £90 million. That is one example, and I will give many, many more. It is a long list, but we will have time to explore it. In addition, he is going to cut the new deal, despite the fact that it has helped hundreds of thousands of people into work, on the very day when unemployment has yet again fallen. That is the difference between Tory cuts and Labour investment.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister has got his figures on James wrong, just as the Transport Secretary and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster got them wrong on Tuesday. We have published whole of that report—173 pages of it; it is on the Conservative party website. Is it not absolutely clear that the Prime Minister plans to do what he has always done—to put up taxes in the first Budget after a general election? Is it not clear that the choice facing the country is between more waste and higher taxes under Labour and value for money and lower taxes with the Conservatives?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is into that argument because he says that everything is published on the website, but I have been having a look at what is published. For example, it says that, by changing the role of regional development agencies, he will save £365 million, yet the total administrative costs of all RDAs are far less than that figure. It is regeneration programmes in local communities and not bureaucracy that will actually be cut. He says that he will cut £1 billion by scrapping the sustainable communities plan but that figure includes £400 million that is spent on social housing and on helping pensioners and others get a better standard of living. That is not waste, that is cuts in front-line services. I can do no better on his record on tax than to quote this:

"The sad truth is, when we were in office we made promises on tax we couldn't keep."

Who was the author of that statement? The shadow Chancellor.

Mr. Howard: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong on social housing, too. We have spelled out in detail how we shall be able to provide more social housing than the Government. Everybody knows that the Government waste money. The Gershon report says that they waste £21 billion of taxpayers' money, and we have been able to provide more savings. Have there ever been a Government who taxed so much, wasted so much and achieved so little?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is keen to get away from the detail of that but he is not going to in the days ahead. Let me give another example of his so-called cuts. He says that he will scrap the Small Business Service, which means approximately £400 million—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say to the Prime Minister that he must concentrate on the policies of his Government. I say to the Leader of the Opposition that he has commented on his policies when he should be asking a question. Perhaps the Prime could oblige me.

The Prime Minister: Absolutely right, Mr. Speaker, and therefore let me make a commitment on our policy: we will keep the Small Business Service, not cut it. We will keep the new deal, not cut it. We will keep the money that goes into regeneration, not cut it, and we will keep the money that goes into health care and not cut it. We will never promise to cut taxes and spend more—the promises that the previous Conservative Government made. What did they end up with? Boom and bust. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chairman of the Catering Committee, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner), should know better.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): If we can get away from elections and back to the reality of my constituents for a moment, I am conscious that my right hon. Friend is aware of the effects of the recent disastrous floods in Carlisle. The latest position is that thousands of people have been forced out of their houses, perhaps for at least eight months, and 260 businesses have been badly affected. So far, the Government's response has been good and I hope that that will continue. However, will he ensure that the new flood defences that were planned will be modified and that work on them will be started as soon as is feasible? Will he give a commitment that they will be of a standard that would have withstood the water that caused the recent flood?

The Prime Minister: I express my sympathy to my hon. Friend's constituents who have been affected by the flooding. I understand their concern, since more than 3,000 houses have been flooded and many more have suffered wind damage. The Environment Agency was already considering the options for a new flood defence scheme to give added protection to Carlisle. I note that, as a result of what has happened, it and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs are considering how they can ensure that any new flood protection scheme tries to tackle the problem that has affected my hon. Friend's constituency. We understand the urgency of that. As I said when I spoke to him the other day, I shall take a personal interest in ensuring that that is done properly.

Q3. [209303] Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Will the Prime Minister pledge—and tell his Chancellor—not to raise taxes at all?

The Prime Minister: As I have already said, the Chancellor will set out the detail in the Budget. When we come to the election, we will set out our promises on tax as on everything else. We will not make promises that we cannot keep. In particular, we will not say that we can somehow cut everyone's tax and increase spending without that resulting in a serious problem for the country. Not merely on the detail but on that general principle, the right hon. Gentleman and his party have lost any minimal credibility that they had, and we will enjoy pursuing them on that issue between now and polling day.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Does the Prime Minister recall that, in the past two years, the Government have had to intervene in regard to railway firms that were not pulling their weight and, in one case, to a firm that was being neglectful on safety? Is he aware that the coal industry is now suffering from the same problem? UK Coal, the largest employer in the industry, is not only neglecting safety but running down the few remaining pits. I would expect the Government to do the same for the energy industry as they did for the railway industry. They should intervene, get rid of UK Coal and put somebody in there who can be trusted to save the mines.

The Prime Minister: I will certainly look into the point that my hon. Friend has raised on UK Coal. Part of the problem comes from the way in which privatisation took place, both in transport and in the coal industry. The result of that has been the waste of many billions of pounds—we have been debating waste today—and the loss of jobs in mining communities.

Q4. [209304] Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): At the last election, Labour sent a text message to young people that said:

"CLDNT GVE A XXXX 4 LST ORDRS? VTE LBR ON THRSDY 4 XTRA TIME"

Given the increasing concerns about binge drinking, alcohol-related crime and antisocial behaviour, is the Prime Minister proud of that campaign?

The Prime Minister: I have to say that this is the Conservatives' attempt, after the debate about the changes to the licensing law, which they supported at the time, to say that they were really against them. Let me explain the position to the hon. Gentleman. The fact is that the changes will introduce more flexible licensing. The number of clubs or pubs that will apply for 24-hour licences is very small, but there will be greater flexibility. The important point is that, in addition, there will be greater powers for police and local residents to object to licences to ensure that the minority of places that are causing the trouble are shut down. There are greater powers under the antisocial behaviour legislation to deal with people who are drunk and disorderly and causing trouble. As I said last week, the pleasure of the 95 per cent. of people who play by the rules and abide by the law should not be affected by the small minority who misbehave under the existing laws and would misbehave under any laws. The task is surely to deal with them specifically, and to deal with the pubs and clubs that are allowing them to misbehave in that way.

Mr. Fabian Hamilton (Leeds, North-East) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the divisional commander of Chapeltown police, Chief Superintendent Howard Crowther, and his team on an operation last month that resulted in the removal and arrest of 180 drug dealers from the streets of Chapeltown? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the only way to sustain the freedom of the streets for the community is to adopt the kind of policies that this Government support, which ensure the social, economic and physical regeneration of suburbs such as Chapeltown? Does he also agree that if the Conservatives ever got back into Government—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: I congratulate Howard Crowther and his team on what they have done in Chapeltown, which I know is an example that is being studied elsewhere in the country. It is an example of the police working with the local community to use the new antisocial behaviour powers. It is important that they do that. The other point that my hon. Friend made is also important. This is not just about having tougher laws on closing the houses of drug dealers, seizing their assets and making sure that they are properly prosecuted through the courts. The other part of the equation involves regenerating some of these areas in terms of housing and employment. That is why it is so important that the money that we have set aside for this continues to be spent.

Q5. [209305] Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): Six years ago, the average first-time home buyer paid no stamp duty. Last year, they paid £1,300. Will the Prime Minister have a cosy fireside chat with his Chancellor about that?

The Prime Minister: We will publish over the next month proposals that will help first-time home buyers. For those families who are struggling to get on the housing ladder, it is important that we increase the supply of housing in a planned and orderly way that does not affect the green belt. It is no use Conservatives saying on the one hand that they are in favour of helping people on to the housing ladder and into the housing market, while on the other hand opposing all the measures necessary to do so.

Q6. [209306] Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the considerable economic progress made in the city of Glasgow since 1997, with more than 50,000 new jobs being added to the city's employment base. Is he also aware, however, that the number of people classified as economically inactive remains at 100,000, which is one in three of the available work force? Will he consider what new initiatives and additional resources might be made available to the Department for Work and Pensions, Jobcentre Plus, Scottish Enterprise Glasgow and other local agencies, to enable them to help many of those on incapacity and related benefits back into work?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend points out rightly that we now have record employment levels, with 2 million more jobs since 1997, long-term employment down by 80 per cent., and the number of young people on the dole having fallen by almost 80 per cent. since we came to office. He is also right, however, to say that there is much more to do. That is why it is important that the new deal programme is kept and extended, and that we help people on incapacity benefit who can work to get off benefit and into work. All of that requires an active policy for the labour market, which is precisely why, instead of savaging or privatising Jobcentre Plus, which is the policy of the Conservative party, we should ensure that we help more people off benefit and into work. Those 2 million jobs have not just been about the strength of the economy, important though that is, but about active Labour party—and labour market—measures to help people off benefit and into work, to give them training, child care and all the things that sometimes stand between them and a decent job.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): The Prime Minister has known for some time that the republican movement was responsible for the Northern Bank raid. Because he has yet to develop a coherent response, he is in danger of giving the impression that after a little while he will welcome back through his door the biggest bank robber in British history. Does he realise the damage that that will do to himself and his party?

The Prime Minister: First, I should say to the right hon. Gentleman that I do not in any shape or form dismiss the importance or seriousness of what has happened. We are now seeing what we do to find a way forward which ensures that those people who are democrats and committed to every aspect of the democratic process are able to find a way forward, and that those people who are not prepared to commit themselves to exclusively peaceful means do not hold up the process for everybody else. That is what we will consider. As he knows, such a proposal requires not only support in the Unionist community but support in the nationalist community, too. If I can, I still want to find a way forward that includes everybody. It must be said, however, that we can no longer have a situation in which political parties are associated with paramilitary groups that are committing either what we might call terrorist offences or ordinary criminality. There simply can be no place for that. Unless and until it is absolutely clear that things have changed fundamentally, it is difficult to see the way forward on that inclusive basis. But the challenge is not for us. The challenge is for those who have been engaged in that type of activity to realise that we cannot wait for ever while they make up their minds.

Q7. [209307] Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Overall crime continues to fall in my constituency, with burglary down 33 per cent. last year. Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the seven new community support officers who have just started work in Lowestoft? With 20,000 more CSOs planned nationally, can he tell us how many more new CSOs my constituency can expect to see and what more he will do to tackle antisocial behaviour, if we continue to invest in crime fighting rather than cut the Home Office budget as the Conservative party would do?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right in saying that overall burglary has fallen, according to the British crime survey, by about 40 per cent. If one is a victim of burglary, however, is it no consolation to know that that is the case. It is therefore important that as well as the type of laws that we have introduced in relation to antisocial behaviour and drugs particularly—often, burglary and acquisitive crime are linked to drug addiction—we increase the numbers of police and community support officers. I assure him that that programme will continue and be expanded in the way in which we have said, and that it is fully funded within the Government's programme. Community support officers—opposed by the Conservative party when they were introduced—have in fact been tremendously popular.

Q8. [209308] Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): Will the Prime Minister look again at the decision as asked for by the colonel of the Royal Welsh Regiment—that Welsh regiments should be allowed to show their names in the same way as the Royal Regiment of Scotland?

The Prime Minister: I will certainly look into that. I am aware of concern about it. I think that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is looking into it already, but I will ensure that I am properly acquainted with the facts as well.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that what has been described as the finest music auditorium in the world is not in Paris, not in Rome, not in New York, and not even in London? [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is it?"] In fact, it is in Gateshead. When my right hon. Friend visits the new Sage music centre on the bank of the Tyne, which he will do fairly shortly, will he take the opportunity to congratulate all who have been involved with it, and in particular congratulate Gateshead's Labour-controlled council on its vision? Will he also ask his Ministers to co-operate fully with the council in its further efforts to develop the quayside area of Gateshead?

The Prime Minister: Anyone who has visited the quayside area knows that what my hon. Friend said is absolutely true. The centre and, indeed, the whole development are a testament to the vision and leadership that have been offered locally. I think that that is one reason why people now consider the area one of the places to go in Europe, a fact of which my hon. Friend and his constituents can be very proud.

Points of Order

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask what the arrangements are for amending Hansard? A few moments ago, the Prime Minister suggested that the official Opposition had voted with the Government on the Licensing Bill. We did of course oppose it on Third Reading.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me and it is not a point of order.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Have you received a request from either a Law Officer or any Minister to clarify the law of sub judice in relation to courts martial? The events in Osnabruck at least require clarification in relation to sub judice.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me.

Opposition Day

[2ND ALLOTTED DAY]

Value for Taxpayers' Money

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

12.32 pm

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House notes that the Government has increased taxes 66 times and has failed to give value for taxpayers' money; is concerned that independent commentators believe that taxes will have to be increased under the Government's spending plans; and calls for a change of direction away from the path of more waste and higher taxes to a path of value for money and lower taxes.

The debate gives us a timely opportunity to discuss the Government's failure to give taxpayers value for money, a timely opportunity to discuss the tax increases that almost every independent expert now believes to be inevitable if Labour is re-elected, and of course a timely opportunity to discuss how we should be putting spending on a more sustainable basis, enabling us to cut taxes imposed on hard-working families.

I welcome the presence of the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, because he has been the invisible man this week. As I have toured the television and radio studios, I have kept bumping into the Secretary of State for Transport, who has taken on the role of the Government's chief spokesman on spending. Obviously the purdah that applies to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the context of election campaigning has been applied to the entire Treasury team, and they are all being kept under lock and key. I am glad to see, however, that the Chief Secretary has been let out on day release for this important debate.

There is a danger that debates of this kind may become somewhat partisan, and we would not want that to happen, so let me begin by trying to establish cross-party consensus. I shall do that by agreeing entirely with what the Financial Secretary to the Treasury said recently:

"we're going to have an election . . . when people will say 'we've paid a lot of taxes but what has really been achieved with all that money?' . . . Too often a lot of money has been spent but very little seems to have been achieved".

I agree. I am happy to work on the basis of that consensus: I want to establish that at the outset.

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Osborne: I will certainly give way to the hon. Gentleman. Does he agree with the Financial Secretary that a lot of money has been spent but very little seems to have been achieved?

John Robertson: Does the hon. Gentleman not think that jobs are the most important thing, and it is in that regard that we get the best value for money in terms of tax? My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary and his colleagues have done more than anyone else to get people back into employment.

Mr. Osborne: I am absolutely delighted that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman, who agrees with the Financial Secretary that a lot of money has been spent but very little seems to have been achieved. We have established a consensus. On employment, I should point out that there are now more than 1.1 million people who are not in work, training, or education—more than in 1997.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Mr. Osborne: I am happy to give way to the hon. Gentleman; perhaps he agrees with the Financial Secretary.

Mr. Bailey: What assessment has the hon. Gentleman made of the value for money of the poll tax, which was introduced by the Tory Government?

Mr. Osborne: I was at school when the poll tax was introduced, and at university when it was abolished. I shall concentrate instead on what the current Government are doing, given the legion examples of waste under them, on which we can have a good three-hour debate.

I was building on the consensus established by the Financial Secretary and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson). We agree with the Financial Secretary that people have paid a lot in taxes. There have been 66 tax increases—

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Osborne: I will do so in a second, but so that the hon. Gentleman is aware of the Government's tax record, which the Financial Secretary has helpfully outlined, I should point out that as a result of the 66 tax increases and this so-called progressive Labour Government, the tax burden now falls hardest on the poorest in society. There are taxes on pensions, petrol, mortgages, marriage, employers, employees and the self-employed, amounting to £5,000 per family. The hon. Gentleman is a member of the Treasury Select Committee. Does he agree with the assessment of the International Monetary Fund, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and the Institute for Fiscal Studies that taxes will go up if Labour wins the election?

Mr. Plaskitt: I want to deal with 66 tax rises that the hon. Gentleman likes to cite—a figure at which he has arrived, I think, by working through the Red Book and itemising all the lines that give a tax increase. He is right: there are 66 tax increases, but will he confirm that according to the same accounting methodology, there are also 232 tax cuts?

Mr. Osborne: Any tax reductions introduced by this Government have been more than outweighed by the massive increase in taxation, which amounts to £5,000 per family. But I am glad that this consensus is growing and that the hon. Gentleman accepts that there have been 66 tax increases. It is very useful, as we approach a general election, to have a Labour member of the Treasury Select Committee agreeing with us.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): There is one important tax cut that the hon. Gentleman has not mentioned: the cut in VAT on fuel. The current Leader of the Opposition was a member of the Conservative Government, who intended to increase VAT on fuel to 17.5 per cent. ultimately. They never implemented the second stage of that increase because they were defeated by the Labour party, which on entering government immediately reduced VAT on fuel to the minimum level of 5 per cent. That reduction has benefited every taxpayer in this country.

Mr. Osborne: The hon. Gentleman did not mention fuel duties, which have rocketed under this Government. Indeed, because of their very nature, and because of the pledges concerning the basic and top rates of income tax that the Prime Minister made during previous election campaigns, many of the stealth taxes have been imposed through duties. Such taxes fall hardest on the poorest in society, which is why the Office for National Statistics points out that the greatest tax burden is now paid by the poorest quintile.

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con) rose—

Mr. Osborne: I am happy to give way to my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin).

Mr. McLoughlin: For the record, I agree with the Financial Secretary that a lot of money has been spent and wasted, but does my hon. Friend agree that this is not really a new error? The Government agree with that assessment, which is why they commissioned the Gershon report, and why the Chancellor announced at the Dispatch Box that he wanted to sack 80,000 civil servants. Should we not welcome the fact that the Government have belatedly recognised that they have spent all this money and wasted it?

Mr. Osborne: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: the Government do recognise that fact, but sadly, they are not doing what they said they would do. I am sure that my hon. Friend is an assiduous reader of The Guardian, so he will have seen the article on page 14 of today's edition, entitled "Axing Whitehall jobs is smoke and mirrors". It begins:

> "Gordon Brown's plan to make savings by axing 84,000 jobs in Whitehall and relocating another 20,000 staff is largely an illusion".

That is because the Chancellor has not implemented his proposals. We accept the Gershon recommendations, but the difference between us and the Government is that we would implement them.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Did the hon. Gentleman also read the front-page story in The Guardian today about the Maypole nursing home in my Hall Green constituency? Twenty-eight elderly people died there in the space of 12 months in what can best be described as unusual circumstances. I understand that the Conservative strategy on value for money would do away with strategic health authorities and the Commission for Social Care Inspection. We would not know about the situation at the Maypole nursing home were it not for the diligent work by those bodies, so could he tell us what plans he has to replace them with other organisations?

Mr. Osborne: I do not know the exact details of the case, although I have read about the nursing home in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, and heard about it on the radio this morning. If the hon. Gentleman seriously believes that a strategic health authority would do wonders for the patients of that home, I am afraid he is under a delusion. Strategic health authorities are a hugely bureaucratic waste of money. They do nothing to put money into front-line services, and when taxpayers in our constituencies pay their taxes to fund the NHS they do not expect it to end up in the hands of bureaucrats. The public, I suspect, do not even know that strategic health authorities exist.

Mr. Bailey: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Osborne: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman, and if he will allow me to proceed, I shall certainly do so again later.

Returning to the consensus that I am trying to establish, as well as saying that taxes had gone up a great deal the Financial Secretary said that a lot of money had been spent. That is true, as Government spending has increased by 60 per cent. from £320 billion to £520 billion. The proportion of gross domestic product spent by the Government has increased from 37 per cent. to 42 per cent. I very much agree with the Financial Secretary that "a lot of money has been spent but very little seems to have been achieved".

Those remarks were endorsed by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Anniesland earlier. I salute his candour, and I also salute the candour of the Labour members of the Select Committee on Education and Skills, which produced a report this month on public expenditure in education. I recommend it to hon. Members, as it makes interesting reading. In the first paragraph of conclusions it says:

"The Chancellor's budget book for 2004 claimed a direct relationship between the increased investment in education since 1997 and improvement in GCSE results in particular. Our evidence showed that with lower levels of investment GCSE results had improved to at least the same extent in earlier periods in the 1990s. The Government needs to take great care in making claims about the effectiveness of increased investment in education in increasing levels of achievement which the evidence cannot be proved to support. Links between expenditure and outcome remain difficult to establish."

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): To add to the very good case that my hon. Friend is making, I can tell him that my own constituency in Worcestershire receives one of the lowest Government grants for education and schools, yet achieves some of the highest results, which merely proves what the Education and Skills Committee has finally and commendably put on the record.

Mr. Osborne: I congratulate the schools in my hon. Friend's constituency. I agree that it is good that the Education and Skills Committee is telling us the truth, as is the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that my local education authority, too, is doing extremely well and getting good results? A number of small schools in Norfolk want to use their own capital funds for doing minor building works, but Government rules prevent them from doing so, and they have to use the county council property services, which cost far more. Could my hon. Friend could look into that?

Mr. Osborne: Under our right to choose, almost all the money in the education system will be directed through parents, so there will be no need for the huge bureaucratic layer of local education authorities in their current form to decide such things. Money will go where parents want it to go and where pupils go, which will dramatically improve standards in our schools still further.

The OECD—I am still trying to tell the House what it said—is an august organisation; the Chancellor often quotes it with approval at the Dispatch Box. The OECD said recently that the UK education system had fallen from fourth to 11th place in the world for science, from seventh to 11th for reading and from eighth to 18th for maths. On the extra spending in the NHS, the OECD said that growth in the volume of health care output had slowed down, compared with the first half of the 1990s. The OECD, the Education and Skills Committee and the Financial Secretary are all right when they say that a lot of money has been spent but little has been achieved.

What is the reason for that failure? It is that the extra money has not been accompanied by reform. The Government have stumbled around in the dark, not knowing what to do with the public services. They have been through several phases. When they first arrived in Whitehall after the 1997 election, they immediately abolished the previous Government's public service reforms. Out went GP fundholding, trust hospitals and grant-maintained schools. The Government actually believed their own election propaganda—that simply getting rid of those things would improve public services.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): On public expenditure reform, when the hon. Gentleman's party was in government why did it not make the successful changes that Labour has made? I refer to planned expenditure in education. In my own area, heads of schools and colleges tell me that being able to plan ahead and have properly planned expenditure has not only allowed them to increase general expenditure on the education of their pupils, but has vastly improved standards and allowed them to make capital investment. That situation has come about thanks to important reform. Why did not his party do that?

Mr. Osborne: I think that I have just had a glimpse of the speech that the hon. Lady is planning to give later. Perhaps she should have listened more carefully to what I was saying; I do not deny that the Government have increased the money going into education, but the point I was trying to make is that the money they have spent has not delivered the increased performance that they told us it would. In fact, when people look at the education system they see precious little evidence that it has delivered improved results, and that is borne out by the OECD and the Education and Skills Committee. That is because, as I was saying, we have been through these phases.

First, the Government got rid of the public service reforms introduced by the Conservative Government. That did not work so they were frustrated, and in the late 1990s they decided to centralise everything and run it from Whitehall. It was like a tractor factory in the Urals; in came targets, task forces, 10-year plans and that kind of stuff. They called it modernisation. Things still did not improve, so the Government now declare that targets are dead and centralisation was a mistake. Decentralisation has become the Government's new buzzword—at least for the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, if not for the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

In have come foundation hospitals, funding flows and earned autonomy for schools, which all—on paper at least—look suspiciously like the trust hospitals, GP fundholding and GM schools that the Government abolished in the first place. So after seven years of new Labour, they are back to square one, except of course that this lot cannot really let go.

The experience of foundation hospitals showed that they are not actually prepared to hand over control to the professionals. The earned autonomy promised to successful schools in the Government's flagship Education Act 2002 has never been given to a single school. In other words, we sat through all the debates on that flagship Act, which was part of Labour's main manifesto at the last general election, yet not one school has achieved the earned autonomy that we had all those debates about.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): On the question of earned autonomy, does it occur to my hon. Friend, as it does to me, what a falsehood that phrase actually is? The concept of earned autonomy merely corroborates the omniscience of the centre and the sovereignty of the Secretary of State over everything that happens in every school and every hospital.

Mr. Osborne: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The very concept of earned autonomy is that it is something handed down from on high as a reward rather than being integral to the system. Schools should have autonomy, parents should be able to send their children to the schools they want, and the money should follow each child. That is the way in which an education system should be run.

Of course, the Government's instincts are to interfere and meddle, and the vast bureaucracy that they have created—the 300,000 extra bureaucrats in countless new quangos, agencies, units and so on—have a vested interest in keeping power out of the hands of the users of public services: the patients and the parents. Sir John Stevens, the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, said recently:

"I have never seen so much inspection and monitoring . . . It is getting in the way of our business".

If people want an explanation of why they do not see police officers on the street and why there are now more than 1 million violent crimes a year, they should perhaps listen to the Metropolitan Police Commissioner.

Of course, the failure to reform means a failure to deliver. Public sector productivity has fallen for the past three years of published figures. The European Central Bank recently published a paper that found that if the UK public sector were as productive and efficient as others in the developed world, outputs would be 25 per cent. higher. Instead of reform and delivery, we have had waste on a huge scale. Of the 88,000 people employed to work in the education system in one year, just 14,000 are teachers and teaching assistants. The number of tax inspectors is rising twice as fast as the number of new doctors and nurses. There are more officials in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs than there are dairy farmers.

We have seen two examples in the newspapers today—two reports from the National Audit Office. The NAO has again qualified the accounts of the Department for Work and Pensions because it says that benefit and fraud mistakes are costing taxpayers £3 billion a year. The report on the NHS IT system for patient choice—a multi-billion pound system that was supposed to make 200,000 bookings last year—shows that it only made 63 bookings last year.

It is not just the big ticket items that tell the story of waste under the Government; sometimes the small examples can be just as illuminating: the £1,000 chairs in the Ministry of Defence and the Cabinet Office taxi bill, which has gone up 1,000 per cent. under the Government. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said recently that "when we talked about delivery, that may have been something of a mistake".

One can see why when one looks at her own backyard. According to recent written answers, the Department of Trade and Industry has in the past few years spent £23 million on office refurbishment, £7.9 million on furniture, £30 million on overseas trips, £10 million on first-class travel and £120,000 on flowers. At least with the four-fifths reduction in the number of DTI civil servants, there will be less need for pot plants.

Rarely in the history of politics have a Government spent so much and achieved so little. That has an economic consequence, and hon. Members do not have to take my word for it.

Mr. Bailey: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Osborne: I am happy to give way, but perhaps the hon. Gentleman will tell me—he is versed in these economic matters—whether he agrees with the International Monetary Fund, the OECD and so on that taxes will go up if Labour wins.

Mr. Bailey: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will answer my question. I understand that he was at school for a large proportion of this time, but previous Conservative

[Mr. Bailey]

Governments received a largesse of £87 billion from North sea oil and gas tax revenues, slashed public expenditure and raised taxes. What sort of example and what sort of credibility do the Conservatives have in arguing for value for money on that basis?

Mr. Osborne: I was taught at school that Conservative Governments took the sick man of Europe and transformed the country into the most successful economy in the world.

Let me talk about the present, rather than the past. I should like to quote the Prime Minister's chief economic adviser—the man who gave the Prime Minister his economic advice for seven years. Derek Scott says:

"Gordon Brown's economic inheritance was better than that of any previous Chancellor in living memory. But there are limits to the length of time that public spending can increase at a faster rate than the growth in GDP without causing problems. By the time I left Downing Street, Britain was approaching or had perhaps passed that limit. The regulatory burden had been increased, the tax system had become more complicated and the tax burden was rising too."

I agree with the chief economic adviser to the Prime Minister—more cross-party consensus. Britain cannot carry on down the path of spend, waste and tax without storing up huge problems for the economy. That is what almost every independent observer of the British economy thinks, too. I have mentioned them already and I will mention them again. The IMF, the OECD, the ITEM Club, the National Institute of Economic and Social Research, the CBI, the chambers of commerce and the independent Institute for Fiscal Studies all now believe that the Government have created a structural deficit of anywhere between £8 billion and £12 billion.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): I want to find out how far we can press the consensus that the hon. Gentleman talks about. He has just cited the Institute for Fiscal Studies. Does he agree with the following comments, which it made yesterday:

"The proposed Conservative tax cuts would offset only about a seventh of the rise in the burden as a share of national income that the Treasury has pencilled in over the next fives years"?

So given the plans announced on Monday, would the tax burden still not rise, even under his plans?

Mr. Osborne: I seem to remember that the IFS said that under a Labour or Liberal Democrat Chancellor taxes would go up, and under a Conservative Chancellor taxes would go down. That is a fair assessment. Indeed, the Liberal Democrats have a list of strange taxes on pets and all sorts of other things, but their proposal for a 50 per cent. top rate of income tax would give us a higher top rate of tax than France, Italy, Spain or Belgium. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman, who has worked in the City, will explain in his speech how he thinks that Britain could compete with a higher top rate of income tax than those countries, let alone many of the English-speaking economies of the world.

Of course, it is an historic achievement to have a structural deficit after seven years of tax rises. I have to take my hat off to the Chancellor. He now faces a choice, as indeed does the country: higher taxes or spending that the country can afford. Which will it be? This week, we gave our answer. We would spend £12 billion less than the Government by the year 2007–08, and we could use that money to fill the budget deficit and to cut taxes on hard-working families. We would achieve that by making the specific savings identified by David James and his team of independent experts. I heard the Prime Minister earlier casting aspersions on David James. That is rather strange, as the Prime Minister hired him to sort out the mess of the millennium dome.

I stress that the savings that David James and his team have found in the NHS and schools—every penny saved on bureaucracy, waste and unnecessary quangos—will be reinvested in the NHS and schools. We will radically reform those services so that they are driven by the right of parents and patients to choose, rather than by the diktats of Ministers, so people will get real value for money and see real improvements in standards. The same goes for the savings found in transport, the police, defence and international development; they will be re-spent in those areas, to improve the quality of service that people receive.

Kali Mountford: The hon. Gentleman is extremely gracious and generous in giving way again, but is he not aware that the Gershon review is duplicating a lot of what is recommended by James? Has he not yet realised that money cannot be spent twice, so that money cannot be saved twice? What extra saving that is not a myth can he point to?

Mr. Osborne: I do not think that the hon. Lady was listening to me. We accept the Gershon savings—indeed, we will be significantly better at implementing them than the present Government—but we go beyond, with the James savings. In the document that we have produced this week—I am happy to give her a copy if she has not managed to get hold of one—we have listed at least £12 billion of savings additional to those referred to by Gershon.

I know that we will fight about these decisions as we approach the general election. For example, we will get rid of the new deal, because as the NAO and many independent studies have shown, it does not work. It does not deliver value for taxpayers' money.

Mr. Bailey: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Osborne: I have given way twice to the hon. Gentleman, and I do not think that I shall do so a third time.

Only a third of people who go through the new deal find sustained employment, and the figure is even lower for those in long-term unemployment. We propose an alternative called "Work First", which is partly based on the Australian model, although we have also looked at what happens in Wisconsin. Above all, however, we have examined what happens in the 13 employment zones that already exist in this country. We are modelling our proposals on the existing zones because they are considerably more effective at getting people into work than the new deal. We would thus save a substantial amount on the new deal and we argue—indeed, we will prove—that our plan will help people who are unemployed to find work.

The Small Business Service will go. The Prime Minister suddenly became a champion of it half an hour ago, but less than a fifth of small businesses know that the Department of Trade and Industry offers such a service, and fewer than one in 20 uses it. At a cost of £500,000, we do not think that it is giving especially good value for taxpayers' money. Some 168 quangos and public bodies will go.

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Osborne: I shall give way to my constituency neighbour in a second, but first let me ask him whether he can do without the Government office for London, the Commission for Integrated Transport, the Office of Public Services Reform and the Prime Minister's delivery unit.

Mr. Hall: Do the proposals to scrap quangos involve English Partnerships? If so, what will happen to the £30 million that it is giving to stabilise the town centre in Northwich? Is that value for money?

Mr. Osborne: I am pretty sure that English Partnerships is not on the list of 168. [Interruption.] It is not on the list, then—I give myself no let-out clause.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): It is not there.

Mr. Osborne: My hon. Friend helpfully reminds me that it is not on the list. We are only getting rid of things that do not perform an especially useful function. We are merging bodies that can be merged and getting rid of bodies that provide no value for taxpayers' money. It is a good list of 168 bodies, and I am sure that the hon. Member for Weaver Vale (Mr. Hall) would agree that the whole lot could go.

We will also get rid of 235 bureaucratic posts, although I accept that some of the Labour party's funders will find that controversial. [HON. MEMBERS: "Two hundred and thirty-five?"] No, 235,000.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): You said 235.

Mr. Osborne: I am happy to be corrected by the hon. Gentleman. The correct figure is 235,000. No doubt the public service unions that back the Labour party's election campaign will kick up a big fuss about that, but we believe that the posts do not deliver real value for money. However, unlike the Government's proposals, which involve compulsory redundancies, we will set aside almost £6 billion to pay for generous voluntary redundancy programmes for civil servants in posts that will go.

Regional assemblies and all the apparatus that goes with them will also go. I do not know whether Treasury Ministers noticed that there was a recent referendum in the north-east of England. The people of this country do not want regional assemblies or regional bureaucracy, so it should go.

We have identified total savings of £12 billion in non-priority areas. The savings will not be made on paper-clips, or through the intangible efficiencies about which the Chancellor talks, but through a reduction in Government activity in areas in which the taxpayer is not getting value for money. The savings can and will be achieved by a conscious act of political will. Of the £12 billion savings, £8 billion will be set aside to fill the structural deficit and £4 billion will be used to give back to taxpayers some of their own money. I know that Labour Members will want to know which taxes on hard-working families we will cut. Let me assure them, especially those defending marginal seats, that those taxes will appear on billboards near them soon.

One of the most amusing sights of the week was the Labour party's attempt to rubbish the James report. The Secretary of State for Transport, acting in his new role as the Government's chief spokesman on spending, produced with a great flourish 10 things that did not stack up in the James report. He said that we could not possibly merge the Food Standards Agency and the Meat Hygiene Service because they were merged already. We got on the phone to the Food Standards Agency and Meat Hygiene Service and asked the names of their chief executives. One said that he was called Chris Lawson and the other said he was called Dr. John Bell. That sounds like two separate bodies to me, although I know that the Government get confused about such things, because they too have two chief executives.

The Transport Secretary said that the savings that we aimed to make in the Rural Payments Agency were incredible because they exceeded its entire administrative budget. I suggest to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury that the problem with letting the Transport Secretary do this sort of thing is that he is not up on the detail. He had obviously not read the annual report of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, because it says clearly that the agency is spending £188 million on administration, which is a huge amount given what it does. The cost is considerably greater than that which would be expected if the agency was outsourced, and much greater than the £112 million of savings that we set out in our document. I think that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury gave a little nod there, because he agrees that the Transport Secretary is not very good at that job.

Our spending plans are credible. The Institute for Fiscal Studies says that they add up. They will mean that the country will spend what it can afford and taxpayers will get value for money. We have an answer to the black hole in the public finances. We can make credible savings and protect vital public services. We can fill the deficit and reduce taxes. What is the Government's answer? Which of the options set out by the OECD will they choose: "a slowdown in spending", or "a rise in taxation"? Not the slowdown in spending.

Chris Bryant: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Osborne: I am happy to give way to the hon. Gentleman, because he can let me know whether he would choose to increase taxes or reduce spending.

Chris Bryant: For the avoidance of doubt, I shall answer a question that the hon. Gentleman asked everyone else, but chose not to ask me. I disagree with the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, if he said the words that the hon. Gentleman cited earlier.

The hon. Gentleman inserted the little phrase "protect vital public services" in his speech. As far as I am aware, those services include only the NHS and schools—not all education. Does that mean that the youth service and special educational needs will be protected?

Mr. Osborne: The hon. Gentleman needs to read the document, which spells out the position on schools, the NHS, international development, the police, pensions, transport and children's social services. The difference between the policies on which the hon. Gentleman and I will campaign during the election is that our plans are published and say how we will fill the black hole. The Government currently give no indication that they will do that, so we will use the debate to try to tease out some answers from the Chief Secretary to the Treasury.

Mr. Jenkin: It is extraordinary for a Labour Member to complain about special educational needs. The Labour Government are forcing the closure of special schools throughout the country, but we would keep them open.

Mr. Osborne: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The education budget—not just the schools budget—as set out in our plans will increase to 2007–08.

It is obvious from the spending review and the pre-Budget report that the Chancellor has no intention of reducing the growth in spending to a sustainable and affordable level, so he will have to increase taxes. Almost every independent commentator is expecting that, and it is what the Chancellor is secretly planning. However, I would be amazed if he did that in the Budget that he will present in a few weeks—just before the coming election. We remember that the Chancellor's only Budget that did not raise taxes was that presented—surprise, surprise—just before the last general election. After the election, he clobbered everyone with a hike in national insurance. With Labour, of course, the political cycle is more important than the economic cycle.

We can be sure that taxes will go up in the first Budget after the election if Labour wins. The £8 billion tax question for the Government, which we put to the Chief Secretary today is: which tax will it be? Will it be the 2p on the basic rate of income tax, VAT on food, capital gains tax on main homes, or that old favourite of the Chancellor, a rise in national insurance by removing the upper earnings limit and taking 10 per cent. on incomes over £33,000? According to the Treasury's ready reckoner and the figures that it has produced, all those tax measures would raise about £8 billion. That is £8 billion from hard-pressed families, who, as the Financial Secretary says, have already paid a lot of tax and seen very little in return. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) broke the cross-party consensus that we had established on that point.

Chris Bryant: Let me tell the hon. Gentleman why I have broken the consensus. In my constituency, I have seen more police officers and more community support officers, I have seen crime being cut, I have seen the schools that used to have leaking roofs and windows being repaired, and I have seen more teachers and more doctors. That is the difference that the money is making.

Mr. Osborne: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman does not agree with his Treasury Front-Bench colleagues. If he wants to get on in the Labour party, he needs to agree more with the Government.

All the tax measures that I set out would raise about £8 billion. Does the Chief Secretary rule out 2p on the basic rate of income tax? VAT on food—yes or no? We know that the Treasury has considered capital gains tax on people's homes. Does he rule that out? What about getting rid of the upper earnings limit on national insurance? That would be a 10 per cent. tax on earnings over £33,000. I think that the most likely candidate. Perhaps the Chief Secretary will give us a yes or no. Or are there other stealth taxes that will go up instead: petrol duty, stamp duty, or the stealthy moves with income tax thresholds that we are used to?

The choice at this election could not be clearer: higher taxes and more waste under Labour, or lower taxes and value for money under the Conservatives. The question that the Chief Secretary must now answer is: which tax will go up?

1.12 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Paul Boateng): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"believes that economic stability is the foundation for continued investment in public services; welcomes therefore the lowest inflation since the 1960s, lowest interest rates for 40 years and the longest period of economic growth for 200 years; further welcomes this Government's record investment in public services; believes that it is important to ensure taxpayer value for money and therefore welcomes the fact that the Government is making efficiency savings to release resources into frontline services; further welcomes the fact that Sir Peter Gershon has identified over £20 billion efficiency savings across the public sector and notes that he said that to go further than the efficiencies he identified would put at risk the delivery of frontline public services; and further believes that any proposal to make cuts in public spending would not only damage frontline public services but the economy as a whole."

Britain's economic stability has been hard won. As the Prime Minister said only this afternoon, it follows decades of boom and bust, with the price for economic failure being paid by hard-working families in mass unemployment, sky-high mortgage rates and record home repossessions. Nothing must threaten the strength and stability of Britain's economy. Britain is working. We do not intend to allow the Tories to wreck it, and if this motion were to be agreed, you could bet your bottom dollar that they would.

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham) (Con) rose—

Mr. Boateng: I shall make a few opening remarks, and then I shall be only too happy to give way to the right hon. Gentleman.

I want to say a few words to the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), the shadow Chief Secretary. I am a great admirer of the hon. Gentleman. In the serried ranks of the Opposition, he is a precocious talent among all those grey locks, and I enjoy his speeches.

[Interruption.] He is certainly younger than me, and he may be better looking. [HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] Yes. I know, it is hard to believe. I have news for the shadow Chief Secretary: it is no defence for economic failure in the recent past to claim that one was in short trousers. It is not good enough to say that one was at school when Britain had double-digit inflation and, as my hon. Friends have said, when Britain had 3 million unemployed not once, but twice. It is not good enough to say that one was at school when we saw unemployment double and the numbers on incapacity benefit treble. That is the record of the hon. Gentleman's party in government, and we do not intend to allow it ever to do that again.

Mr. Maude: On that point, does the Chief Secretary agree with Derek Scott that the Labour Government inherited the best economic legacy that any Chancellor has ever had?

Mr. Boateng: No, I do not. I say to the right hon. Gentleman, who must, I fear, take some responsibility for this, that when we took office his Government had been paying more to service their debts than they were spending on schools. That is something for which the Conservatives ought to apologise.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con) rose—

Mr. Boateng: I give way to the hon. Gentleman, who, perhaps, is going to apologise.

Mr. Goodman: Speaking of debt, my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) offered the Chief Secretary a menu of prospective Labour tax rises for him to rule out. Will he now rule out all of them? Indeed, will he rule out any of them?

Mr. Boateng: The hon. Gentleman cannot seriously expect me to do that. It would be absurd for a Government to address the issue of tax in a speech by the Chief Secretary in an Opposition half-day debate. The hon. Gentleman is an informed observer of these matters, and he knows well that they are dealt with in a Budget speech or a manifesto. That is how they have always been dealt with, and that, I suspect, is how things will be in the future. Let us have a serious, grown-up debate about these issues.

Let us look in a little more detail at the James report. We waited a long time for it. First, we heard that it was to be published last August. Then we heard that it might be published last December. Last Monday, we had an announcement.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Boateng: I will not give way at the moment.

What we have not yet had, and I ask for some reassurance on this point now, is sight of the full James report. [Interruption.] I am not talking about this less than salubrious ring-binder. It is not clear who made this folder, but it seems to consist of a number of slides. It seems to be a PowerPoint presentation. All we are asking for is something that goes beyond a PowerPoint presentation and resembles, in its weight, strength of analysis, depth and accuracy, the "Independent Review of Public Sector Efficiency" by Sir Peter Gershon, but so far we have not had that. I ask my Conservative opposite number when he will publish the James report—not this PowerPoint presentation but an actual report, with the detailed workings and analysis that underpin it.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con) rose—

Mr. Boateng: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), who, I understand, speaks with some authority in the Conservative party. Perhaps he can tell us when the report will actually be published.

Mr. Cameron: The James report has been published in full. Perhaps the Chief Secretary will answer this question: will he confirm that, according to the Government's Red Book, the tax burden in 2008–09 will be the highest for 20 years? Is that true or not?

Mr. Boateng: Once again—[HON. MEMBERS: "Yes or no?"] Hold on. Once again, I reiterate my request for the publication of the James report; then, we can have a serious discussion. The Opposition cannot pretend that a PowerPoint presentation equals a report. Will we see a report? Will we see its workings and its analysis?

Mr. Borrow: Let me take my right hon. Friend back 20 years, when taxation under the then Conservative Government was relatively high. Does he agree that that high taxation coincided with high unemployment? In contrast to that Government, the present Government can afford to spend money on public services, because there are so many people in work and so few claiming benefit.

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The new deal and Jobcentre Plus have proved to be essential in reducing unemployment and keeping it low. The new deal has helped 1 million people into jobs and every day Jobcentre Plus carries out 36,000 work-focused interviews and helps 4,800 people into jobs. No right hon. or hon. Member has not at some time appreciated the role in their constituency of the new deal and Jobcentre Plus. For Conservatives to produce a PowerPoint presentation that offers a 40 per cent. cut in the budget of Jobcentre Plus and to scrap the new deal altogether shows theirs to be a party that would imperil our hard-won economic stability and our success in creating jobs.

Mr. Boateng: I intend to advance my argument a little further before giving way again; then, I shall give way to the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), a former Secretary of State for Health, followed by my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey).

The country would pay a heavy price if the Conservatives put the James report into effect. That price would be paid by hard-working, decent families throughout the land. We make no apology for comparing their record in government with ours. When they last held office, our national debt doubled. Was that value for money? Borrowing hit £50 billion. Was that value for money? Interest rates soared as high as 15 per cent. and millions of families struggled under negative equity. Unemployment was shockingly high, reaching 3 million not once, but twice. All that is the Conservatives' record in government, and whether or not the hon. Member for Tatton was at school during that period, we do intend to allow him or anyone else to forget it.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): Will the Chief Secretary now address himself to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron)? Is it not correct to say that the Red Book commits the Government to tax plans that will ensure that by 2008–09 the tax take will be the highest proportion of national income for 20 years? Is it not therefore unavoidably true that the Government are committed to raising tax?

Mr. Boateng: I shall not go down that road—[Interruption.]—and let me tell hon. Members why. The right hon. Gentleman has been a Treasury Minister and he knows precisely the status of the Red Book. He knows that no Chief Secretary or Financial Secretary, which I recollect he was when we first exchanged views on economic matters, would give undertakings or make comments on tax of the sort that he has sought from me.

Mr. Dorrell: Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Maude: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boateng: No, I shall not, because I have given way to both right hon. Gentlemen, for whom I have the utmost respect. Let me instead draw the House's attention to figures from the OECD—an organisation for which I too have some respect. They are figures to which the hon. Member for Tatton failed to refer in the course of his speech. They demonstrate that in 2002 total UK tax revenue was 35.8 per cent. of GDP, compared with an European Union average of 36.9 per cent. In 11 EU countries, including France, Germany and Italy, total tax revenue as a percentage of GDP was higher than in the UK. For Conservative Members to portray the UK as an over-taxed, high-tax economy flies in the face of the truth.

Mr. Osborne: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boateng: I shall finish my point before the hon. Gentleman gets up on his feet or, indeed, on a high horse—he has that glint in his eye that suggests that he will be awfully self-righteous. However, he misquoted my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, who will make that clear himself later, so let me direct the hon. Gentleman's attention to something that certainly is not a misquote—the right hon. Gentleman in question has never denied it—from The Sunday Mirror, no less, of 31 October 2004. It reads:

"Businesses are reluctant to locate to places where tax rates are too high, regulatory controls are too intrusive and political instability threatens business stability. Places like the UK, the USA, Hong Kong and Singapore attract because their tax rates for business are low."

That was said by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who, I believe, sits on the Opposition Front Bench and speaks on regulatory matters. That is the clearest possible endorsement from the right hon. Gentleman of the present Government and their economic policies. We will never allow that economic stability or this country's political stability to be threatened.

Now, as I promised, I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West.

Mr. Bailey: This is a question that I would have preferred to ask the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), but he declined to take it; perhaps my right hon. Friend can shed some light on it. At different times I have heard Opposition spokespersons say that they would use the money from scrapping the new deal, first, to fund their huge pension commitment and, secondly, to cut taxes. Do the Treasury calculations indicate which of those, if either, it could be used for?

Mr. Boateng: No briefing that I have from Treasury officials throws any light on Opposition thinking, nor would I ask Treasury officials to divine what the Opposition propose. However, I have reflected on the lack of credibility of the Opposition proposal to spend more while reducing what they call a structural deficit, and simultaneously promising tax cuts. That is incredible, as a number of informed commentators have pointed out.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): Both parties claim that they can do that by attacking waste. The Chief Secretary asked for some heavyweight analysis. His hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is a member of the Public Accounts Committee. Will he read the scores of reports published during this Parliament that outlined how we can attack waste in the public service, and check his Treasury minutes to see whether every recommendation that we made to deal with waste has been implemented? In the real world we could surely work together to save substantial amounts of public money.

Mr. Boateng: Having sat, as my hon. Friend sits, as Financial Secretary on the hon. Gentleman's Committee, may I take the opportunity to pay tribute to the work of the Public Accounts Committee? We in the Treasury and all colleagues across Government take its deliberations seriously, even when not every one of its recommendations is adopted. The Committee does an important job and it would be unwise of any Government to ignore its findings.

Chris Bryant: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one form of waste that we should tackle is not financial, but the personal wasted opportunities represented by the many millions of people who are on incapacity benefit and would like to get into work if they were given the chance? Does he agree that the pathways to work programme that we are advancing, despite being an expensive element of the Budget, is well worth while and is a proper investment for the future?

Mr. Boateng: Not entirely surprisingly, I wholeheartedly agree with my hon. Friend. The comprehensive spending review and successive Budgets and pre-Budget reports have recognised the value of the programme.

Delivering value for the taxpayer depends first and foremost on the economic health and stability of the nation. Our record on that is strong, and we intend to do nothing that would imperil it. That is why I make the comparison that I do with the record of the Conservatives when they had stewardship of the economy.

Mr. Dorrell rose—

Mr. Boateng: I will not give way at the moment.

Our Government's policies are delivering the longest sustained economic growth for 200 years. That is the product not of chance or good fortune, but of the tough decisions for the long term that we have taken since we took office in 1997. The first of those decisions, which the Opposition never had the political courage to implement, was the independence of the Bank of England and our fiscal rules. The Conservatives opposed both. I understand that they have recanted on the former and now support the independence of the Bank of England, while having the bare-faced cheek to lecture us about decisions taken in the phase of the political, as opposed to the economic, cycle, as my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Helen Southworth) pointed out sotto voce when the hon. Member for Tatton made that bizarre assertion.

The hon. Gentleman will no doubt tell us that he has always supported the independence of the Bank of England. I fancy that examination of his record shows no such thing. Will he stick to our fiscal rules? I suspect that another general election defeat will be necessary to bring the Opposition round to that conversion.

Mr. Osborne rose—

Mr. Boateng: I give way, as long as the hon. Gentleman promises, cub's honour, to answer my question, rather than going off on some frolic of his own, which I fear he is about to do, from the look in his eye.

Mr. Osborne: We have made it clear—I am surprised the Chief Secretary did not notice—that we adopt the Government's fiscal rules, but we propose a fiscal projections committee that would be independent of the Treasury. That is supported by the Governor of the Bank of England and the National Audit Office, and I suspect it has some sympathy among Treasury civil servants. I recommend it to the right hon. Gentleman, and I recommended it to the Financial Secretary when we debated it in Committee.

Mr. Boateng: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He throws light on at least one aspect of Conservative party policy and I welcome his conversion to our fiscal rules. That makes it more difficult for him to promise increased public spending while promising to address what he describes as the structural deficit and to make tax cuts. We will no doubt explore that further in the course of the debate.

On the basis of that solid platform of macro-economic stability we are able to deliver historic levels of investment in public services. It has enabled us to focus new resources on priority areas that matter most to honest hard-working families—hospitals and schools—and across our public services. On health, spending will increase to £92 billion in 2007–08, compared with £33 billion in the last year of the Conservative Government. That additional spending has already delivered 77,000 more nurses and 19,000 more doctors.

On education, with which the hon. Gentleman dealt at some length, albeit with too little accuracy, spending will be £12 billion higher in 2007–08 than in 2004–05. We have already delivered 28,500 more teachers since 1997. I shall address in detail some of the assertions made by the hon. Gentleman when he suggested that that was not money well spent and questioned the productivity of our education policies.

Mr. Boateng: Before I come to health—where the right hon. Gentleman, the former Secretary of State for Health, may be able to throw some light on our deliberations—let us consider what has been achieved in education. Between 1997 and 2004, the percentage of 11-year-olds achieving expected standards in literacy and numeracy rose from 63 per cent. to 78 per cent. in English and from 62 per cent. to 74 per cent. in maths. That fell slightly short of what were stretching and demanding targets of 85 per cent. and 75 per cent. respectively, but it is an improvement on the time when the Conservatives had the stewardship of the education system—a dramatic improvement, as one of my hon. Friends says. The proportion of 16-year-olds achieving five or more GCSEs rose from 45.1 per cent. in 1997 to 53.7 per cent. in the last year for which we have figures. Conservative Members should not decry that; we should be thanking teachers, parents, local education authorities and the Government for that. It is the partnership between all of those that has resulted in real improvement in the life chances and opportunities available to our young people. All of that would be put at risk were the Conservative party ever to have stewardship of the economy.

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful to the Chief Secretary for giving way again. I should like to take him back to the argument that we were having in answer to the question posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron). The right hon. Gentleman gave an interesting reply when I asked him to confirm that the Government's own Red Book set out plans for an increase in the percentage of national income accounted for in tax. He said that it did not matter, because our percentage taken by tax is below the levels of other European countries. Is it therefore the Government's policy to raise the tax burden until it is in line with that of other European countries? Would it not be a more intelligent tax policy for the Government to recognise that a relatively low tax burden, compared with that of other European countries, is an important source of competitive advantage for the British economy, the safeguarding of which should be a high priority for the Government?

Mr. Boateng: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, we have consistently argued within the European Council for tax competition rather than tax harmonisation. That is now and has always been our policy. But I am interested in his foray into tax policy, because if we are talking about tax, and the Conservative party seems anxious to do so, reference should be made, as it always is, to the dividend tax credit on pension funds. I can remember when the right hon. Gentleman was Financial Secretary, and I think that it was then, when the Tories cut rates of dividend tax credit on pension funds and advance corporation tax in 1993 from 25 per cent. to 20 per cent., that the right hon. Gentleman, to no less a journal than The Guardian, said:

"The change was made to give a cash boost to British industry in the short term, and to raise Government revenue in the medium term. Clearly to do that, the money has to come from somewhere."

That is why I urge the right hon. Gentleman to reflect a little on precisely what is proposed by his own Front-Bench spokesmen when they lay out their tax options, because I think that he will find, applying the rigour and scrutiny that he no doubt acquired when he was Financial Secretary, that the sums of his right hon. and hon. Friends simply do not add up.

Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that what is important with regard to the point made by the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) is not the share of GDP that is taxed, but the share that is taxed as borrowing, in the light of the fact that borrowing is deferred tax that has to be paid? Will he accept that the previous Conservative Government, rather than increasing tax 66 times, massively increased the amount of borrowing and therefore the future liabilities of future generations, while this Government have massively reduced borrowing and increased investment by putting into jobs 2 million people who are paying tax rather than drawing dole; and the debt payments are lower because interest rates are lower as well?

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The Leader of the Opposition, I think addressing last year's Conservative party conference, said:

"In 1992 we promised to cut taxes year on year. But we put them up."

That was a moment of candour from the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and that was breaking out all over the place, because at the same party conference, the shadow Chancellor said:

"The sad truth is when we were in office, we made promises on tax we couldn't keep."

The truth of the matter is that the Conservative party's sums do not add up, yet they continue to raise the promise of tax cuts. We know what value to put on those promises. This was the party, after all, that invented the poll tax, and if ever there was waste and bureaucracy it was in that tax, and this was the party that put VAT on fuel.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Boateng: I have allowed a number of interventions on both sides and I owe it to other hon. Members who are keen to speak to continue to make my speech.

We take the issue of efficiency seriously. That is why we have set out clear plans based on detailed and rigorous evidence that will deliver at least £20 billion worth of efficiency gains by 2007–08—money that will be reinvested in the front line to support essential public services, such as schools, hospitals and the police. That is value for money—better outcomes; investment in front-line services; savings at the centre, including a gross reduction of more than 80,000 civil service posts and a relocation of 20,000 public sector posts away from London and the south-east. We are making progress in delivering those efficiency gains to free up resources to recycle them into front-line priorities. Across government, £2 billion has been saved through better procurement, deals and use of e-auctions. The Department of Health has negotiated savings on medicines that will free up some £1 billion a year for the NHS, again for use on the front line from 2005–06. The Department for Transport will deliver savings of around £140 million in 2004–05 as result of improved Highways Agency contracting and other measures. Crucially, the Ministry of Defence will deliver over £400 million in savings through improved defence logistics.

What we have not heard—it may be that we will get a clearer take on this when the James report is published, not in the form of a slide presentation in a battered folder, but—[Interruption.] I hear protests that it is brand new. Well, some savings should be made there. The hon. Member for Tatton should recycle his own folders rather than lecturing us about chairs.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boateng: Not at the moment. I just want to finish the point about waste and the Conservative party's policy on it, because the hon. Member for Tatton uttered a calumny against the Ministry of Defence, suggesting that money had been spent on chairs that cost £1,000. That is typical of the Conservative party and its approach to waste. If the hon. Member for Tatton can show me a chair that cost the Ministry of Defence £1,000—

Mr. George Osborne: You will attempt to eat it.

Mr. Boateng: I will do more than attempt to eat it. A number of Conservative Front Benchers have been obliged to face up to the fact that they may have to eat their hats or humble pie—they are more likely to eat hats than they are to eat humble pie. If the hon. Gentleman can identify the chair in the real world, rather than in the fevered imagination of those in Conservative party central office, on the day many years hence—20 or 30 years' time—when he eventually achieves ministerial office, I will buy him a chair for that office. [Interruption.] That is the extent of my offer. [Interruption.] Give, give, give—that is what I am noted for. There is no such chair; it does not exist.

I shall go into detail about the chair, because Conservative Members keep raising the matter. Interestingly, a number of public sector organisations use the Herman Miller aeron chair. The standard fee paid by the public sector for that chair is apparently £320. There is no such thing as a £1,000 chair in the MOD. If we are to have a serious debate about waste, Conservative Members could at least do us the service of debating serious matters rather than debating a £1,000 chair. In a moment of candour, the hon. Member for Tatton, who is full of candour, would admit that there is no such thing as a £1,000 chair.

I shall give way to the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), who will, I hope, make a serious point about waste.

Mr. Andrew Turner: The Chief Secretary may be surprised, but the figures that he presented earlier on the improvement in GCSE results, which are quoted in the Select Committee report, were achieved at the expense of a 31.6 per cent. increase in public expenditure. Over an equivalent five-year period from 1990 to 1995, a greater improvement in results was achieved with an 11.4 per cent. increase in Government expenditure. I know that the Gershon report proposes reductions of £4.2 billion in Government expenditure on education, of which only £1.2 billion will be found in the Department for Education and Skills. Will the remainder of that money come from the front line, including schools and universities?

Mr. Boateng: That is a serious and interesting point. How can one find adequate measures of productivity in a field such as education? The Atkinson review was conducted to help us in that matter. The hon. Gentleman takes an interest in such matters and knows that it is absurd to suggest that more teachers somehow reduce the productivity of the education system. I am sure that he agrees that that does not make sense. We must work out how to measure productivity in education more accurately.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman also agrees that local education authorities could undoubtedly make savings through better purchasing and better logistics. Education authorities and schools can make such savings, and we must have a serious debate about how such savings may be identified. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman welcomes Sir Peter Gershon's approach.

That is a more serious point than the assertion by the hon. Member for Tatton that savings that might be obtained by abolishing regional chambers. To suggest that one can scrap regional planning for jobs, housing and transport without paying a price is disingenuous, and it is not a serious point. However, he does not have to take my word for it, which he can dismiss as partisan by suggesting, "He would say that, wouldn't he?" This morning, I attended the central local partnership group, and he should talk to some of his Conservative colleagues in local government.

The hon. Member for Tatton dismissed regional assemblies, which is surprising given the good work that they do, but he does not have to take my word for it. He drew the attention of the Treasury team to the vote in the north-east, of which we are well aware, and I shall draw his attention to the words of Councillor Sue Sida-Lockett, who is clearly well known—and much loved, I am sure—in Conservative circles:

> "Despite the north-east vote, there will still be a requirement for effective regional planning functions, provision of democratic mandate for the regions and effective scrutiny of other regional bodies—a role in which the assembly and other voluntary chambers have shown themselves to be extremely competent."

That is an endorsement from no less a person than Councillor Sue Sida-Lockett, who, I fear, is about to be rubbished or undermined in some way by the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois)—I hope that he does neither of those two things.

Mr. Francois: I will do neither of those two things, actually. Is the Chief Secretary aware that the East of England regional assembly, which that lady chairs, produced a regional planning plan in November 2004 to build 428,000 houses in the east of England? One month later, the same regional assembly effectively abrogated its own plan because of the lack of transport infrastructure provided by the Government. If that is successful regional planning, do we really need it?

Mr. Boateng: The hon. Gentleman must take up that point with Councillor Sida-Lockett, and I am sure that he is in a position to do so.

We have not heard a serious response from the Conservative party on the implications for housing if the £1 billion of cuts recommended by the James report were implemented. The hon. Member for Tatton knows that such cuts would mean the scrapping of the sustainable communities plan and that many thousands of first-time buyers would be deprived of the opportunity of owning their own homes. Our efficiency savings at the centre are recycled to front-line services, as opposed to the reckless cuts in public services, of which I have given a number of examples this afternoon, proposed by the Conservative party.

It would be disastrous if the Conservative party were to have its way; our economy would return to boom and bust because the sums do not add up and our infrastructure would be neglected across the board, including areas such as transport, skills and health. When the Conservative party last had stewardship of the economy, it failed to invest in those areas. The contrast is between investment and cuts. We maintain stability and ensure that we keep to our fiscal rules, and stability means that we can invest in the skills of all our people. We are building a platform from which there can be record levels of growth, and maintaining the lowest interest rates for 40 years and the longest period of economic growth for 200 years. It is that combination of low inflation, low unemployment and rising living standards that this party and this Government are determined to uphold.

Rob Marris: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one significant cut in waste by this Government is that of the waste of many people's lives when they are unemployed? The proportion of gross domestic product that is spent on unemployment benefits and interest on the national debt has been cut from the 1997 figure of 4.5 per cent. to the current 2.6 per cent. That represents a considerable increase in efficiency. The latest Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development figures, which were not quoted by the hon. Member for Tatton for obvious reasons, show that in the United Kingdom we have the highest gross national income per capita in the European Union, apart from Luxembourg.

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend is right to draw the House's attention to those facts. Labour Members will not take any lessons about waste from the party that doubled unemployment, which hit 3 million not once but twice. There is no greater waste, not only in terms of borrowing to fund benefits, which happened under the last Conservative Government, but of the wasted potential and lives that unemployment represents. That is of great concern to us, but it has never been so to the Conservatives. That is apparent from their cavalier approach to the budget of the Department of Trade and Industry and from what the hon. Member for Tatton said about the Small Business Service, which will be noted by the Federation of Small Businesses as it has been noted by the CBI. That is the same cavalier attitude that led to 1,000 businesses going bust every week between 1992 and 1996.

We must not forget, and we do not intend to allow the people of this country to forget, the true waste that characterised the Conservatives when they had stewardship of the economy. Our record speaks for itself—economic stability, strong support for the front line, efficient public services, and true value for money. That contrasts well with the flaky facts and empty promises of the Conservatives. For that reason, I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to go into the Lobby with us tonight to vote against the motion and for my right hon. Friend's amendment.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): As ever, I enjoyed the Chief Secretary's speech, although it could perhaps have done with a few judicious cuts of its own. I hope that that chair in the Ministry of Defence is never found, because if it is, he will owe the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) more than a pint.

I welcome the fact that the Conservatives have given us not only an opportunity to debate the Government's strategy on public services and delivering value for money, but an early opportunity to discuss some of the material released in the James report earlier this week.

The Chief Secretary is usually a fair, calm and dispassionate man, as I am sure that he himself would acknowledge, and he was a little unfair to criticise the Conservatives on the extent of the information that they have published so far. I remind him of the caution that his own Treasury team and the Chancellor of the Exchequer showed before 1997, when nowhere near as much information was provided. Indeed, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who does not always support his Front Benchers on all matters, is quoted today as saying that "the Conservatives unveiled the most detailed proposals for tax and spending ever produced by an opposition party."

Certainly, they are considerably more detailed than those set out by the Conservatives before they got into power in 1979 or the Labour party before it got into power in 1997. There seems to be an inverse relationship between the amount of information that parties publish when they are in opposition and their proximity to power. If my theory is right, and if the comment by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe is accurate, the Conservatives may be very far away from getting back into power—perhaps as far away as at any time in their recent history.

Mr. Borrow: The hon. Gentleman suggests that the amount of detail in the Conservatives' proposals reveals their distance from power. Does he think that the same applies to his own party, whose proposals are truly incredible?

Mr. Laws: I think that we are getting closer to power and the Conservatives are getting further away from it, so the relative movement is extremely favourable.

I am sure, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you want me to turn to the motion and its assessment of the problems that the country faces and possible solutions. It refers to "the path of more waste and higher taxes".

Every party, including mine, has had its own review of public expenditure. It is important that we have this debate and that all parties engage in it, because it is inconceivable that an organisation with a budget the size of the Government's, with £550 billion of public expenditure, will not have various areas where savings can be made. However, it is pity that neither the motion nor the speech by the hon. Member for Tatton made more acknowledgement of the need for an increase in public expenditure not after 1997, but after 1999 when the Conservative spending plans came to an end. What is missing in all the discussion of waste and higher taxes is any acknowledgement of the important role of public expenditure in improving our infrastructure and securing improvements in public services, where there were major inherited problems following the 18 years of Conservative Government.

I understand that today the Conservatives signed up to the Government's commitments in respect of overseas development assistance. That is very welcome, and it reminds us that public expenditure is not simply a matter of waste and taxation but of achieving very important objectives. However, I remind the hon. Member for Tatton that when the Conservatives were in power, as opposed to matching commitments in opposition, real expenditure on overseas development assistance to Africa fell by about one third between 1992–93 and the end of that Parliament. I hope that the Conservatives have reviewed their approach to issues such as public sector investment and overseas development expenditure, but that is not evident in the motion or from the remarks of the hon. Member for Tatton.

I want to turn to issues relating to value for money and explore them in the context of the James report, which is extremely helpful and detailed. We should all be concerned about securing value for money. It is clear that the public's appetite for additional increases in taxation is limited, as people want to see delivery in exchange for the additional taxes that they have paid. We have many concerns about the Government's performance in that respect, not least because of their excessive control over public expenditure and centralised control of targets, which is often extremely wasteful. We should prefer a considerably greater devolution of power. We share some of the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Tatton about productivity in the public sector and the fact that it is falling behind that of other countries in relation to the private and public sectors, although it is important to bear it in mind that many of the additional investments in public expenditure since 1999 have been in areas where one would not expect any evident improvement in productivity.

I shall give an example from my constituency, where the ceiling of a hospital fell down six months ago. The hospital was built before the second world war, which predates the national health service, and sticking plaster was—almost literally—applied over the past couple of decades to keep the building together. That solution failed to the extent that the hospital has almost fallen down, but it will be rebuilt. That will not necessarily appear in the productivity data on public expenditure but it is nevertheless a worthwhile investment.

The hon. Member for Tatton put taxation centre stage in his speech. The motion states that there have been 66 tax rises since Labour came to power. That is not a helpful way in which to consider taxation because, as was said earlier, one needs to examine the net balance between tax increases and tax cuts. In addition, as the motion states, there is a need to consider the rate of change of taxation. The motion calls for "a change of direction away from the path of . . . higher taxes".

The right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who is not in his place, raised that issue a couple of times and invited the Chief Secretary to comment on the fact that the Government's public expenditure and taxation documents suggest that the tax burden will increase in the next few years. However, the right hon. Gentleman did not appear to realise that his intervention constituted something of a boomerang for his Front Bench, which is signed up to the same plans, minus a small, moderate reduction in taxation of £4 billion.

This morning, the Institute for Fiscal Studies said that the proposed Conservative tax cuts would offset only about one seventh of the increase in the tax burden as a share of national income that the Treasury has pencilled in for the next five years. In other words, the Red Book shows that the tax burden will rise from 36.2 per cent. of national income in 2004–05 to 38.4 per cent. in 2009–10. The hon. Member for Tatton, who is normally candid in his responses, ducked my question. I asked him to acknowledge that, even after the £4 billion of tax cuts that he intends to implement, the tax burden would increase substantially. Indeed, it will rise from 36.2 per cent. to 38 per cent. of GDP. The tax burden under Conservative plans for the next Parliament will therefore increase by 1.8 per cent. If I am wrong, I would be happy for the hon. Gentleman to intervene. However, I take his silence to show that the Conservative party is signed up in its expenditure and taxation plans to an increase in the tax burden in the next Parliament.

Mr. Maude: By how much would the tax burden rise if Liberal Democrat plans were effected?

Mr. Laws: The right hon. Gentleman knows that we set out clearly our plans for the abolition of the council tax, which is a most unfair tax, and its replacement with local income tax. Our only taxation proposal is for the 50 per cent. upper rate of tax, which would abolish tuition fees and reduce the burden of council tax. However, that does not answer the question that I posed to the hon. Member for Tatton. I take Conservative Members' silence as an acknowledgement of what they would perhaps prefer not to admit: if the Conservative party won the election, the tax burden would increase by almost 2 per cent. of GDP under its current plans.

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman is an intelligent and fair man. He asks my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) to answer a specific question about the Conservative party's plans. Surely he must acknowledge that, if he wants an answer, he must answer the same question about Liberal Democrat plans.

Mr. Laws: My party does not make the same claim as the Conservative party to reduce taxes. The Conservative party is trying to give the impression that if it came to power in the general election that will be held in a couple of months, the tax burden would reduce. The truth about Conservative expenditure and tax plans is that the tax burden would increase considerably, and that is why Conservative Front Benchers do not want to intervene on me.

Mr. McCabe: The hon. Gentleman said that the Liberal Democrats proposed a 50 per cent. top rate of tax. He may know that his party leader said 51 per cent. the other day. I do not know whether that is mission creep. When we combine their top rate of tax of 50 per cent. or 51 per cent. and local income tax, what will be the tax burden on the average hard-working family?

Mr. Laws: The hon. Gentleman will be delighted to know that, under our proposals to abolish council tax and replace it with local income tax, 70 per cent. of households will be better off or no worse off. He should talk to those of his constituents who are retired or on a low income and who often pay 10 per cent. of their income in council tax—a grossly unfair tax that his party should be ashamed not only to retain but to have increased by 80 per cent. since 1997.

I should like to consider some of the public expenditure issues that have been raised in the context of the James debate because they are important. The Conservative party should be congratulated on stimulating debate by publicising all its policies on its website. The Chief Secretary was ungenerous in not giving the Conservative party some credit for the huge bulk of papers that he can have printed off if he is not good with technology. I had a chance to read through them this morning. I also welcome the fact that the Conservative party has undertaken a review of public expenditure. In any organisation, it is always possible to find some efficiency savings and to reprioritise some expenditure. However, it is also tempting for politicians who are desperate for easy and painless solutions to claim that they can find huge amounts of something called waste that can square the circle between public expenditure and tax priorities. We need to consider whether the Conservative party has successfully squared that circle.

[Mr. Laws]

Let us begin by examining the total savings—the £35 billion—that the James report claims to have found. It sounds immensely impressive and a large amount of money. The small print acknowledges that the Government have already said that they will make two thirds of those savings—£22 billion—and use them internally to improve public services. There is a question about whether the Government will deliver them, but the additional savings that the Conservative party says that it can make are not £35 billion but the much lower figure of £13 billion.

Mr. Borrow: The hon. Gentleman mentioned parties looking for painless ways of making savings. His party proposes abolishing the Department of Trade and Industry. Which of the Department's functions would be retained and where would they be placed in the Government structure?

Mr. Laws: I am delighted to give the hon. Gentleman more information about our plans for the Department of Trade and Industry. He may know that, since the Government came to power, there has been a huge increase in the Department's budget. He will also know about reports by the Public Accounts Committee and others about the way in which money has been spent and the fact that many of the industrial subsidies that the Department pays are wasteful and have low economic returns. We would especially target that. Of course, some of the Department's expenditure would remain as part of total Government expenditure, especially some parts of the longer-term science budget, which is important.

Let me deal with other parts of the James report. It includes a list of 168 public bodies that will be abolished. That is clearly set out, and I do not want to be unfair to the hon. Member for Tatton about his list. However, I note some double and triple counting, a practice for which the Conservative party criticises the Labour party. First, there is the double counting of the Gershon savings as both the Government's proposals and those of the Conservative party. Of the 168 bodies, 16—one tenth—are regional agricultural wages committees, 28 are individual health authorities, nine are Sport England regional bodies, and seven are regional industrial development boards. So, four entities account for 60 of the public bodies in question—more than a third of the total.

The Conservatives have also been very clear about their proposed reductions in jobs. They would apparently make a reduction of 235,000 public sector jobs, or "bureaucratic posts", as the James report describes them. That is quite a large reduction. Apparently, however, not one of those posts would be eliminated through compulsory redundancy. I find that difficult to believe, and I wonder whether Mr. James thought that that was a credible proposal.

I assume that most of the bureaucratic public sector jobs are going to come out of civil service staffing figures, rather than individual public services themselves. If that is the case, we are talking about a reduction of about 550,000 public sector jobs, as a base figure. It is true that, under the Conservative Government between 1992 and 1997, the head count in that category was reduced by about 90,000. It is also true that that category has increased since Labour came to power. If I am right, the implication of the Conservatives' figures is that the permanent staff head count would fall to about 410,000 from a peak 10 years ago of about 580,000. That would be almost 100,000 lower even than the head count at the end of the last Conservative period in office. That is an incredible, and potentially questionable, set of figures. It is as questionable as the idea that all those reductions could be achieved through voluntary redundancy. I notice that the Conservatives' largest spending commitment in any one year is a £5.9 billion commitment to fund voluntary redundancies. That says something about the views of the party.

Geraint Davies: Will the Liberal spokesperson make clear what the Liberal position is on the Gershon report? Would the Liberals cut that total number of jobs, or just some of them? What would be the head count under the Liberal Democrats? Secondly, can he confirm that the introduction of a local income tax would increase the aggregate amount of tax being paid in Britain?

Mr. Laws: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's second question is no. The abolition of council tax and its replacement with a local income tax is an entirely neutral exercise. It would not increase the total tax burden. On the Gershon report, my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) has already made it clear that we are committed to delivering those savings.

That brings me to my next point. There is triple counting and a lot of smoke and mirrors in the other parts of the James report, and similarly, when we look at the small print relating to the 235,000 reduction in jobs, we find that it includes the 80,000 reduction that the Government are already implementing, and that 91,000 of the 235,000 jobs would simply be reclassified from the public sector to the private sector. They would therefore not be cuts at all. The figure for the Conservatives' proposed job cuts on top of those implemented under Gershon would be 64,000, not 235,000.

We need to consider in a little more detail the savings that the Conservatives are proposing. There are some with which we have no problem. The Conservatives have identified cuts to be made in some of the industrial subsidies, and cuts in some parts of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. We think that those would be entirely sensible. The Conservatives have also proposed a set of quite small changes with which we may not agree but which are defensible in their own right in terms of costing. We may not agree with their plans to scrap the regional assemblies and the supreme court, for example, but they are perfectly entitled to those policies and to put them into their costings.

The Conservatives' remaining savings proposals seem to fall into two categories. First, there are savings that are credible but frankly unattractive. Then there are savings that sound attractive but are, in reality, incredible. I shall give the House an example. The extent of the Conservatives' proposed cuts to the new deal, to the social housing budget and to Jobcentre Plus would harm some of the most vulnerable people in Britain. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham had an interesting exchange with the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) on the BBC yesterday, in which he pressed the Conservative spokesman on the implications of privatising the whole of Jobcentre Plus and significantly reducing expenditure in that area. My hon. Friend asked his Conservative counterpart how the Jobcentre Plus function of giving advice on work and benefits would be continued, following privatisation and given the scale of the proposed cuts. He was told that those functions would have to be outsourced to voluntary bodies. It is extraordinary to suggest that we should simply sweep away the employment and benefit advice service for some of the poorest people in society and let the voluntary sector take care of it.

I am worried not only about the proposed cuts that would hit those on lower incomes, but about those that I doubt would deliver value for money. There is a good deal of over-regulation in much of society today, and the Government have worsened a lot of that. However, I question whether it would be sensible to abolish the whole local government inspection service and to rely on council auditors and customer satisfaction reports from people who live in a particular area as a means of finding out what is going on in a council. I find it extremely surprising that that proposal should come from the Conservatives, as they were determined to introduce more inspection and accountability in the public sector. An example of that would be their proposals relating to Ofsted, which were bitterly opposed for a while.

We are very doubtful about those Conservative proposals. The costings are perfectly legitimate but the effects would be undesirable. There is, however, a bigger hole in the James report, which we look forward to exploring further in the next few weeks. It relates to the credibility of the savings that appear attractive because they do not involve cuts in key services. I have looked at the figures for reductions in Ofsted, which are already being implemented by the Government. I have also examined the proposed reductions in the advertising and consultancy budget, and I believe that the figures used in the James report are wrong. Claims are also being made in relation to the 30-month scheme and absenteeism, and £3.2 billion of completely unspecified savings are proposed by taking out the Gershon savings from Departments that could otherwise recycle them. The proposals also claim that extraordinary savings could be made by the Treasury in the processing of Inland Revenue payments, on the basis of figures in the James report that look like a back-of-the-envelope calculation. In my view, all those proposed savings are bogus and flaky. Looking at the total of the real savings that are being claimed in the James report—£13.3 billion, not £35 billion—a crude analysis would suggest that half those savings relating to waste were bogus and undeliverable.

Of course, we do not have to rely only on the Liberal Democrats' analysis to draw that conclusion. The hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) spoke about the sceptical majority of the British public this weekend. He said:

> "If you are going to cut taxes . . . there are only two ways you can go. You can either say we are going to cut taxes and we are going to do less, or you can say we are going to cut out a whole lot of waste. Cutting waste is what you say when you are not brave enough to say we are going to do less. They"—

those on Conservative Front Bench—

> "talk about £40 billion of waste. I don't believe it. The waste thing is a fig leaf which is used to avoid talking about the practical implications of cutting taxes and spending."

The hon. Member for Wantage may no longer speak for the Conservatives, but I suspect that on this issue he speaks for the vast majority of sceptical individuals in this country who have become used to having been told by Governments and Oppositions for 100 years or more that all their problems could be solved by cutting out waste. That sceptical majority will not be convinced by the claims being made by the Conservatives.

The Conservatives claim that they will cut taxes, but when we probe further, we discover that under the next Conservative Administration—however unlikely that prospect may be—the tax burden would rise by almost 2 per cent. of gross domestic product. The Conservatives say that they will cut waste, yet most of their proposals involve double counting and incredible claims. On public spending, where Conservative proposals are attractive, they are incredible, and where they are credible, they are, to us, deeply unattractive.

Mr. James, the company doctor, was supposed to deliver a cure for Conservative electoral ills. Instead, I fear that he has turned out to be a retailer of what Mr. Gladstone would surely have referred to as quack remedies. Mr. James is supposed to have a reputation for saving beleaguered enterprises, but he appears to have failed to save the Conservative party not only from intellectual bankruptcy but from electoral defeat.

2.30 pm

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): Eight years ago, in the run-up to the 1997 election, I was asked on the doorstep what Labour's plans were for tax and spending. The party's promises at that time were very specific, and they were of the sort that one could fit on an A4 piece of paper. The promises were very specific and narrow because the Labour party believed that it would become the Government. It did not come out with a document containing pages and pages of detailed savings that it felt it could make when in government, because until one is in government, one is not in a position to say that savings can be made. One cannot do that until one has had a detailed look at the books.

The Labour party was right to be cautious at that time. It identified ways in which savings could be made and in which the tax burden could change. The key ingredient of that was having measures in place to reduce unemployment, principally the new deal, for which the Labour party had identified a pot of money. As a result of the new deal and continued economic growth, 2 million new jobs have been created in the past eight years. The amount of taxpayers' money that was being wasted on unemployment has plummeted. In addition, the amount of tax revenue coming into the Treasury because 2 million more people are in work has gone up. That has allowed the Labour Government, at this point in time, to begin to identify other savings, which can then be used in front-line services.

In many ways, the Gershon report's conclusion that we could make savings of £21 billion, which would involve a reduction in public sector jobs of 70,000, was challenging. Achieving that will be a huge task. I hope that my Front-Bench colleagues have their figures right and have done the necessary work, but I know that delivering that in the next term of a Labour Government will be immensely difficult and will create considerable pain. The bulk of the £21 billion savings is to come not from reductions in the number of public servants, but from better private sector procurement. From speaking to companies in my constituency, I know that they are beginning to feel the pinch when it comes to dealings and negotiations with central Government.

I therefore find it difficult to read reports this week that the Conservative party in opposition can suddenly find not £21 billion of savings, but £35 billion, and that it can pretend that that will be painless and that extra cuts in public sector jobs, whether 64,000 or 160,000, will make no real difference. It is bound to make a difference. When public sector workers in my constituency come to me with their concerns about the Government's proposed cuts and savings, I need to be assured by Ministers that if the numbers of people working for the Government will be reduced, whether in the Department for Work and Pensions or wherever, that will not mean a reduction in the service given to my constituents. It is not right that the taxpayer should pay to employ people to do unnecessary jobs. However, if people are working for the public sector doing necessary and good jobs, if we decide to get rid of those jobs we must be honest and open about the effect on services. If, as a result of investment in IT, certain jobs can be done more efficiently, that is a step forward. If certain jobs do not need to be done because we do not have large numbers of people unemployed, that is good and that money can be spent elsewhere. We need to be open and honest about all that.

What concerns my constituents most when it comes to tax and spending is whether they can afford to pay and whether they are getting decent services for the money that they pay. After eight years of a Labour Government, we have steady economic growth, the lowest interest and mortgage rates for 30 years and more, and unemployment in my constituency now at 1.2 per cent. —which is a huge contrast to the situation 10 or 15 years ago. With that economic stability, steady economic growth and low unemployment, people in my constituency can decide whether they can afford to pay a bit more tax, or whether they want to pay a bit less, in relation to the quality of public services that they receive.

I had a couple of meetings recently with the Lancashire police authority, which has been carrying out consultation exercises over the past few years, on whether the people of Lancashire would be prepared to pay above-inflation increases in council tax to the police authority if they got better services. All the indications are that if the police authority were to increase the council tax element for the police by 10 per cent. or so, and if that led to more front-line police officers, people would be willing to pay for that. If they believe that they are getting a better service, they are prepared to pay for it. If they do not think that they are getting a better service, they are reluctant to pay for it. Therefore, when we talk about investment in public services the key question that people must ask themselves is: are we getting value for money? Is it right for us to continue to pay through taxes rather than buying privately?

Over the past eight years, I have visited schools in my constituency on a regular basis. Every one of them has had major investment in staff and equipment, and virtually every one has new building projects under way. This Friday, I shall go to the opening of a £1 million-plus sports hall at Tarleton high school. The same school had a new £500,000 block built three or four years, with computer suites and so on. That is typical of the schools in my constituency. Parents in my constituency can therefore see from the schools to which their children go that extra investment in education is leading to visible improvements. There may be a question as to whether that investment has led to the sort of improvements in performance that some of us would like, but when I remember what many of those schools were like eight years ago, I defend the need for this Labour Government to put in major capital investment. If a school has inadequate buildings, with leaking roofs, bad windows and inadequate areas for sport and assembly, spending a lot of money on improving that may not automatically lead to better GCSE or key stage 2 results. In a prosperous, wealthy society, however, I would have thought that all Members would agree that it is important to spend that money, and I can certainly say to my constituents that it is money well spent.

The same applies to the health service in my area. We have had dialysis units and cancer units. The doctors' surgery across the road from my office in Leyland seems to have had extensions and improvements every few years as it has expanded and delivered extra services. A new drug and alcohol abuse centre was opened in my constituency a few months ago, which we have all been wanting for many years. Those are tangible, visible improvements in public services, and people can make a judgment on whether it is right to pay for them.

I agree with those who have said today that we may have reached more or less the limit of what most people want to pay as a proportion of the overall level of tax. As sensitive Members of Parliament—

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman explain how he would fill the Government's £8 billion black hole—the gap between their spending plans and their taxation?

Mr. Borrow: I am sure that as the years unfold we will see whether it is a fictitious or a real black hole. During every year that I have been in the House, I seem to remember hearing Opposition Members talk of doom and gloom, saying that there would be a recession, that there would not be the expected tax revenues, that expenditure would be higher than expected and that the Chancellor would be unable to balance his books. Every year those critics have been dumbfounded by the fact that the Chancellor has been right and they have been wrong. If the Chancellor continues what he has been doing over the last few years, I have no reason to believe that he will not be able to deliver the public sector investments and improvements that I want to see, as well as ensuring that the books balance over the economic cycle.

I want to say a little about why some of the investment that the Opposition parties want to get rid of is, in fact, crucial. That applies in particular to the new deal. Members may ask why the new deal is important to a constituency like South Ribble, which has full employment. Two or three years ago, Tesco built a new store in Leyland and we were able to persuade it to become part of a new deal partnership. It recruited many of its employees from the long-term unemployed register. Using new deal money, it put them through a detailed programme to prepare them for work. People who had not worked for many years, and in some cases had not worked at all, eventually found secure, stable jobs with Tesco. Without the new deal, that would not have happened.

Employers often say to me—given that my constituency has full employment—that there are people out there without jobs, but they do not have the skills and the confidence to obtain work. Hundreds of workers in my constituency have been brought in from overseas—from eastern Europe and South Africa, for instance—and are doing excellent work, particularly in horticulture. However, I know that there are probably similar numbers in my constituency who, if we as a society were prepared to invest in them and give them confidence, skills and the work ethic, could be doing those jobs and making a productive input.

That will not be cheap. In the years ahead, the new deal programme may have to be altered to meet the needs of the future. I have no doubt, however, that if we want to make a difference to society, securing employment for people who, in many ways, are seen as being unemployable will be crucial. Breaking the cycle for people who have never worked and whose parents often do not work is one of the real challenges facing us. We have low unemployment and ours is a prosperous society, but a sizeable chunk of the population is not part of the work force and could be brought into it. Simply saying, "Here is a job, go and get it, go for an interview" will not bring them in—what is needed is investment by the community in those individuals. Working with employers and the wider community, we must give them the skills, talents, experience and confidence that are so important to getting them into work. That will have a knock-on effect on crime, disorder and all the other things about which concern is often expressed. Making people part of mainstream society is one of our key tasks.

My patch is one of the lucky, relatively privileged parts of the country—a nice area with nice houses, nice schools and very low unemployment. Even there, however, there are people who should be given the opportunity to work, having not worked for many years if they have even worked at all. That is a key part of the programme, and I think the two Opposition parties are wrong to want to get rid of that programme.

I want to make some criticisms of the Liberal Democrats' proposals, particularly their proposal to abolish the Department of Trade and Industry. I was in Toulouse yesterday to see the unveiling of the Airbus. The Prime Minister said that once the A380 was under way, in full production, there would probably be about 100,000 jobs in the UK linked to and dependent on it. Many smaller companies will be involved as well as the two main companies, Rolls-Royce and Airbus Industrie.

In proposing to abolish the DTI, the Liberal Democrats fail to recognise its importance to projects such as the Airbus. On several occasions during the eight years for which I have been in the House, I have lobbied both the DTI and the Chancellor for launch aid for the Airbus, which has been crucial to the UK's status as a major partner in the project. The idea that we can simply abolish the DTI puts our aerospace industry at risk. Moreover, the DTI provides export credit guarantees, which are crucial to the aerospace industry that employs thousands of people in my constituency in military aircraft production. Without the guarantees, exports of military aircraft from Wharton and Samlesbury in Lancashire would not be possible.

While I am having a little go at the Liberal Democrats, let me point out that I shall take great care to ensure that my constituents who work to produce the Eurofighter in Wharton and Samlesbury know that if there were a Liberal Democrat Government, one of their first acts would be to tear up the contract that was signed by the Secretary of State for Defence for the second tranche of the Eurofighter. That, too, would put thousands of people in Lancashire out of work—work on something that people like me have supported for many years.

It will be interesting to see whether the Liberal Democrat candidates in Lancashire include in their election manifestos, in a prominent position, their proposal to sack thousands of military aircraft workers in the county, or whether they will ensure that the proposal is seen only in parts of the country where military aircraft production is not an issue. The Liberal Democrats are very good at saying different things to different people, and because they are the third party their programme will never be properly scrutinised by the media. When their leader is interviewed, interviewers do not ask him for details of his party's spending and taxation programme because they know, as I do, that the Liberal Democrats will not form the next Government.

Mr. Laws: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Borrow: I shall be more than delighted.

Mr. Laws: Is the hon. Gentleman in a position to give us a guarantee that the Government will go ahead and order all the Eurofighters?

Mr. Borrow: I was at the Wharton factory before Christmas when the Secretary of State for Defence visited it, at the time when the second tranche of the contract for the Eurofighter was being signed.

Mr. Laws: It was the third.

Mr. Borrow: The contract that I was concerned about was the second tranche of the Eurofighter. The Liberal Democrats have pledged to tear up that contract and to sack thousands of workers in Lancashire. I will ensure that the people of Lancashire are aware of that commitment.

I want to finish by briefly discussing the proposed cut in the housing budget. In areas such as mine, which have full employment and high house prices compared with other parts of the north-west, a particular economic constraint is imposed on businesses. Many employers in such areas are struggling to recruit people because there are no affordable properties for them to buy. There is a need for more social housing and for more affordable houses to buy. Such a change can come about only if the Government intervene in the market, which will require a budget of some sort. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has a crucial role to play and it can make a difference in areas such as mine by allowing housing associations to build new properties for rent, and by allowing local agreements to be reached on the building of more affordable properties.

At a time of economic success, it is very easy to ignore many of the ingredients of it and to think that bodies such as the DTI and issues such as housing are not very important, but they do affect the continuation of that success. I have listened with interest to the Conservatives and I am sure that my constituents will take the same view as those in the vast majority of constituencies, namely, that the Conservatives' proposals are truly incredible. They will prefer to vote, when election day comes, for a party with a proven track record of low unemployment, low inflation, low mortgage rates and good public services.

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham) (Con): I declare the interests that appear against my name in the register.

This is an important debate and I enjoyed the speech of the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, albeit not as much as I normally do. He is usually very flamboyant, but today he was much more restrained. I offer him this personal advice: if he carries on in that vein, there is a serious danger that at some stage he will achieve gravitas, which would do his reputation no good at all.

The Chief Secretary inadvertently gave a certain amount away when he got himself into a great state about the form in which the James report has been produced. He held it up with disdain—virtually between finger and thumb—seemingly saying, "This is only a PowerPoint presentation, a mere set of slides. Feel the width of that compared with the Gershon report! Gershon is printed on heavy quality paper and it has a shiny cover. It is altogether a superior product." In a way, that was a paradigm of new Labour. Here we are discussing waste, but for the Chief Secretary the only issue arising from a comparison of Conservative and Labour approaches to waste is the way in which the reports are produced. A glossy report full of heavyweight paper is a proper report on waste, but a PowerPoint presentation—golly!—could not possibly be the goods.

What matters is not the form in which a report is produced but what one does with it. We should consider the significance of what has happened in the months since the Gershon report was unveiled with due ceremony and all the glitz that goes with any new Labour presentation. Instead of much-vaunted cuts, public sector employment has steadily risen month after month. The report is an emblem of new Labour: lots of spin, a glossy cover and heavy quality paper, but no action behind it.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): I am listening with interest to the right hon. Gentleman's comments about the James report. Perhaps he will help us by saying whether there is in fact a report behind the published PowerPoint presentation, or is it true that, as Professor Colin Talbot said on "Newsnight", callers to Conservative central office are told that it will not be published because "it would give too much ammunition to our opponents"?

Mr. Maude: I am given to understand by my hon. Friends on the Front Bench that the James report exists in exactly that form. I commend the work that they have commissioned and done on this report, which is the most serious undertaken by an Opposition on this important subject for a very long time. The report certainly is available.

Mr. Laws: This is a useful opportunity to clarify whether there is a report. Is the report that is published on the website—admittedly, it is fairly extensive, running to 173 pages—the James report, or is it simply a summary of a detailed piece of work?

Mr. Maude: It is flattering that the hon. Gentleman should ask me that question, but I am the humblest of Back Benchers and know nothing of these matters. However, I am assured by my colleagues on the Front Bench that that is indeed the report. It is a very serious piece of work, and it will bear all manner of scrutiny.

The Gershon report's approach and the manner in which it was unveiled—but then not implemented—is a mirror-image of this Labour Government's approach to tax. In their early days, they were very keen on this issue. The hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow) mentioned speaking to people on the doorstep during the 1997 election. We all remember the Prime Minister saying in clear terms that the incoming Labour Government had no plans to increase tax at all. There were no ifs, buts or qualifications: he was perfectly clear. However, they had such plans all along—they must have, because they were implemented almost immediately. As the Prime Minister had made that stark commitment, tax increases had to be introduced by stealth—hence, the first raft of stealth taxes.

The smoke and mirrors of the Gershon report and the Gershon process is the converse of that approach: it is public spending by stealth. The Government say, "Of course we are not increasing public spending overall. We are cutting out all this waste and getting rid of lots of public servants." However, each week The Guardian runs a thick supplement full of advertisements for public sector jobs. So this is all about recycling: taking waste and recycling it into the front line. However, although money is going to the front line it is not coming out of such waste, because Gershon simply is not being implemented. It is a classic example of smoke and mirrors from the Chancellor, in an effort to cover up the fact that public spending is rising sharply and unsustainably. Such spending will place an increasing burden on the economy, making it much more difficult to deliver the growth that the Government hope for and that is essential if the country is to become increasingly prosperous.

Whatever the colour of the Government of the day, it is in the nature of all Governments that public spending tends to increase. In "Yes Minister", Sir Humphrey described this as the "politician's syllogism". Something must be done and this is something; therefore, we must do it. For any politician, the "something" that comes most easily to hand is public spending. It is very easy to spend public money, and then to claim that one has done something and that the problem identified is being addressed. But simply spending money does not solve problems. The effect on public services of the very large amounts of money that this Government have spent since they took office illustrates that point. Such spending simply has not translated into anything like proportionate improvements in the quality of such services; rather, it has translated into burgeoning waste, which is why the James report is so credible. A great deal of money has been misspent, and a lot of surplus money is being wasted that could be saved.

Of course, it is easy to spend money; it is much more difficult to make it translate into improvements. I believe that, over time, the state should take and spend a smaller proportion of the nation's income. That provides not only a stronger economy, but a stronger, more cohesive society. People do not just do more for themselves and their families; they do more for each other and for their communities. It binds society together. I do not believe that this is a better country if people think that they can contract out all their social obligations to the state. We are a better people than that. We want to carry responsibilities ourselves, not only for our families but for our neighbours, our communities and our society.

The trend in the proportion of the nation's income spent by the state—up or down—changes only very gradually. I strongly support the proposition that a Conservative Government would seek to put that proportion on a downward trend. No cuts in public spending would be involved, because it would increase year on year, as it always does and always will do. The key figure is the proportion of the nation's income that is taken and spent by the state, and that has to fall if we are to have a healthy country.

The Chief Secretary gave us some statistics about where Britain stands in relation to other European nations, but the countries that have shown the most vigorous economic growth in recent years include Australia, where the state's percentage of the nation's income is in the low 30s, and Ireland, which has shown the most dynamic growth in the European Union and where the state's share of the nation's income is again in the low 30s. The US is in a similar position. In some of the world's most vigorous economies—the Asia-Pacific region shows vigorous growth, for example—the state takes a much smaller share of the nation's income than is the case in this country.

I make no apology, therefore, for believing in a smaller state. That is why I did not find the Government's proposals on university tuition fees as objectionable as some of my colleagues did. The proposals would increase people's personal responsibility. The scheme was bungled to accommodate the diehards on the Labour Benches and will not deliver what it promised, but the principle behind it is sound. The state should do a little less and people should take more responsibility for their own destinies and lives.

The Government go on about the golden rule, and the Chancellor might just about be able to claim that he has stuck to his definition of it. It is a good rule and I am glad that my right hon. and hon. Friends are committed to retaining it, but it puts no constraint on the size of the state. If Labour wins a third term and if the Chancellor remains in his post—two very big ifs—he will have to increase taxes substantially if he is to stick to the golden rule, because he has built into the public spending plans an increase that is otherwise unsustainable. If that happens, the burden that will be placed on the wealth-creating economy will be increasingly hard to bear and will act as a constraint on the very economic growth on which the Government's plans depend—not to mention the prosperity of the country.

I have heard new Labour Members and Ministers argue that what is important is the way in which public money is spent and what is delivered, not how much is spent—as so many of their colleagues seem to believe. My hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) intervened when the Chief Secretary referred to the concept of earned autonomy—the most repellent phrase in the new Labour lexicon. Apart from the fact that it is a contradiction in terms, the idea has built into it an assumption that the gentleman in Whitehall knows best. It means, "We will give you a little bit of independence, if you behave yourselves, but don't worry, because you will always be on the end of the string. And there'll be a twitch on the string if we think that you are abusing your autonomy." However, if we seriously believe that people who are elected by their local communities to run local government are better able to judge what is right for those communities than we are at the centre, we have to accept the possibility that, in some cases, autonomy will not be used well. It is not a risk-free option. If we do not allow the possibility that autonomy might be used to make mistakes, we suppress the possibility that autonomy will be used in unpredictable ways to find better, more interesting and more dynamic ways to do things. Innovation depends on that, and progress stems from it. It is certainly where progress comes from in the private sector and it should do so in the public sector, if the strings are cut and genuine, unearned autonomy is granted.

Occasionally, we see straws in the wind that hint that the Government are beginning to understand that principle. They pulled back to the centre control over hospitals, GP practices and schools—by getting rid of grant-maintained status—but they are now paying lip service to the idea of removing central controls. Practice commissioning sounds to many of us like GP fundholding, although the Government do not wholly believe in it so it will not work as well as it should. Foundation hospitals are not a bad idea, but again the proposals have been adulterated to accommodate the diehards on the Labour Benches. Foundation hospital status will not, therefore, give local managers the ability to run things themselves.

Money will be spent well, and innovation and best practice will develop and spread, only by letting go of the strings and getting rid of the risk-averse culture. Whitehall is a natural home for the risk-averse culture and it is the job of politicians to alleviate its effects. The Government have tended to accentuate it, and that is why we have had a huge increase in public spending without a proportionate increase in the quality of services.

Mr. Hoban: My right hon. Friend makes some important points about the power that autonomy brings. Is he aware that the state sector schools that topped last week's value-added league tables were city technology colleges, the schools with the most freedom? The schools that came at the lower end of the table were community schools, which have the least freedom in the state sector. That demonstrates the power of autonomy to raise standards and ensure that money is spent effectively.

Mr. Maude: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I remember that several of the secondary schools in my previous constituency sought and obtained grant-maintained status. I remember visiting one after it had become independent, and it was the same school, with the same buildings, same staff, same parents and same pupils. I asked the staff how they felt about the new regime. They said that they were all working much harder, but they were loving it because they could make decisions and make things happen. The school had a different feel about it. Members of Parliament all know that when we go into an institution we can feel very quickly whether it has a crackle of energy, enthusiasm and drive. We can tell whether an institution is alive and thriving. Independent schools and hospitals run by people who have the power to make and implement decisions and who can take opportunities are living, thriving and dynamic institutions. The position is exactly the same in the private sector.

Finally, on tax, my right hon. and hon. Friends have made the right equation, and there is relatively modest scope for tax reductions in their proposals. That is responsible, and it betokens an honest approach to the electorate that is both welcome and essential. It is a big contrast with Labour, who said that they did not have any plans to increase tax at all, yet made 66 stealth tax increases. By and large, people want to live in a society and an economy in which taxes are fairly low, but they want public services to improve. When we take office, we will have to reform public services quite radically. Structural reforms are needed, mostly to achieve the Conservative policy of much greater autonomy for the public services.

Mr. Laws: The right hon. Gentleman has talked about the importance of being honest about taxation and being realistic about taxation plans. In that vein, is he honest enough to admit that his party's plans still involve an increase in the tax burden in the next Parliament of almost 2 per cent.?

Mr. Maude: I am tempted to tell the hon. Gentleman that we will show him ours if he will shows us theirs, as he has been remarkably recalcitrant, diffident and reticent about revealing the full extent of the Liberal Democrats' tax increases. My hon. Friends are right to be restrained, as we do not know what the public finances will look like. However, there is a black hole in them and borrowing has risen to an unsustainable level, so spending must be constrained. It is undoubtedly the case that significant structural reform of the public services in the short term costs money, and does not save it. If reform is done well, in the medium to longer term the money buys more for the community and users of public services. It is therefore right to undertake reform, but in the short term it is a constraint on the ability of any Government to reduce taxes.

We should continue to make the case not only that we have a stronger economy and a better, more cohesive society and stronger communities when taxes are lower. I thoroughly commend the plans that my right hon. and hon. Friends introduced earlier this week. Theirs is an honest, straightforward, well thought out approach, and it deserves the support not only of the House but of the country.

3.13 pm

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): A child aged five when the Tories came to power—I shall call him little Jim rather than little George—would be 31 today. He would have had the misfortune to be educated in an overcrowded classroom, and there would have been insufficient attention to numeracy and literacy at his school. The building itself was probably falling apart, and there would not have been enough teachers. His father was probably one of the 3 million unemployed people thrown on to the scrapheap by the Conservatives, who not only told us that that was a price worth paying but crowed about it. When little Jim's mother was sick, she would have to wait in the queue, as there were about 500,000 people on NHS waiting lists.

Just when the family thought that things could not get much worse, they lost their house as a result of negative equity. The very foundations of their life were destroyed and, while all of that was happening, they lived in an area where crime was doubling and the number of police officers was reduced. That is young Jim's early life—a world of despair, desolation and desperation.

Mr. Laws: And then came 1997.

Mr. McCabe: Jim was part of an ordinary, decent, hard-working family—he was not born into the lap of luxury—like many other people in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and in my own. Their lives were laid waste by the Conservatives' deliberate actions when they were in power. It is quite true that things changed for Jim in a way that he could not have envisaged after the terrible experiences of his early life. At the age of 23, he secured training and a job through the new deal and he now has another job, which is secure and much better. He and his wife have been able to take advantage of stable interest rates to buy a modest home. The combination of tax credits and the minimum wage mean that Jim and his wife can provide for their children. They can run a small car and manage a family holiday. They have been able to build a modest savings account.

Mr. Andrew Turner: What would Jim's plight be if he were in the position of many people in my constituency? Having received overpayments of tax credits last year, they have been deprived of the tax credits that they expected on the basis of the Inland Revenue's calculation and, moreover, they have had money taken away from them this year. They are therefore living on far less this year than they did last year because of the incompetence of the hon. Gentleman's Government and the Chancellor.

Mr. McCabe: I suppose that when one does not like to be reminded of one's record it is tempting to take the hon. Gentleman's approach. I simply make the point that tax credits are available now. Any failure in their delivery is regrettable. We all agree that anything that makes life tougher for people should be put right, but the reality is that nothing like tax credits was available when the Tory party was in power.

Not only have things improved slightly for Jim and his wife but his child is taught in a brand new classroom, and is excelling in numeracy and literacy. He is supported by one of several new teachers who were recently recruited to his school as well as by a helpful classroom assistant. Jim's mother still suffers periodic bouts of ill health, but she is treated at a brand new health centre, which is far removed from the Dickensian workhouse that she used to attend.

Mr. Hoban: If life is so good, can the hon. Gentleman explain why a hard-working mother in my constituency cannot find an NHS dentist to treat her children when they need dental care?

Mr. McCabe: Like the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), the hon. Gentleman would like to forget the record that I am describing. No one denies that there are problems with dentistry in some parts of the country, but we all know who created the original problem by cutting training opportunities for dentists.

Jim's mother receives better medical treatment. His father is now a pensioner, and benefits from free eye tests, the winter fuel allowance, a free TV licence and pension credit. That is the lesson that people like the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), who has conveniently forgotten the excesses of the last Tory Government, need to learn.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): The hon. Gentleman paints a rosy picture of a utopian society in which I wish I lived myself—but I do not. He will remember that his Government promised to solve the crisis in the NHS dental service 2001 and I can certainly back up what the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) said. Many people cannot obtain dental provision in my area, Montgomeryshire, at all. Can the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) tell us how he thinks this serious problem can be resolved? It is a long way from utopia for those who suffer serious dental problems as a result of the Government's failure to solve the crisis.

Mr. McCabe: I am not a Liberal so I do not tend to have utopian fantasies. I am trying to depict a straightforward contrast between the situation during the last Conservative Government and the reality of what has happened since Labour came to power. That is all I am doing; I am simply pointing out what the life possibilities were and how they have changed. I would be the first to concede that we need to do more in the NHS across the board, and that we certainly need to do more to increase the availability of dentists. My view is that that will be best achieved by investment rather than cuts. Any programme designed to cut out the chance of increasing the number of dentists will not help the situation. That seems painfully obvious.

The reality is that nowadays we are living with the lowest inflation since the 1960s. Interest rates are at their lowest for 40 years and we are living through the longest period of economic growth that anyone can recall—[HON. MEMBERS: "Since when?"] The figure varies, but I am told that it is at least 200 years.

What is certainly not in dispute is the fact that our public services are expanding; our schools are improving, crime is falling and employment is at record levels, yet at such a time we are told by the Opposition that they want to turn the clock back. They want to go back to cuts. They want to scrap the new deal so that they can restore unemployment to the levels we saw when the Leader of the Opposition was last in government. They want to axe key business support programmes, despite the protestations of the CBI and Stephen Alambritis of the Federation of Small Businesses. The party of BSE wants to halve the budget of the Food Standard Agency, damaging public health and doing untold damage to national and international confidence in the standards of our food. They want to abolish key NHS targets so that there will be lower standards and waiting lists will rise once more, and of course they want to cut Ofsted and LEA budgets covering things such as special educational needs, about which they say they are so concerned, as well as music classes and truancy programmes.

Mr. Hoban: When the hon. Gentleman's constituents ask for their share of the £15 billion increase in school spending, what will he say to them?

Mr. McCabe: My constituents will comment on the fact that Allenscroft school is about to be completely rebuilt, that Hollywood primary school has recently been refurbished and that Colmore junior school, which achieved excellent results recently, has just recruited new classroom assistants and teachers. They will tell me that the secondary schools have more resources than ever and urge me to tell the Chief Secretary and his colleagues to continue on that path.

I have not heard one commentator endorse—[HON. MEMBERS: "Except Jim."] It may be entertaining, but we were given a very interesting lecture by little George at the outset. He wanted to forget what had happened during all the years that his party were in power, so I am equally entitled to contrast—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman must refer to hon. Members of the House in the proper way.

Mr. McCabe: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. No offence was intended.

I was saying that I had not heard one single commentator treat the Opposition's plans seriously. Those plans are frightening and damaging but no one really treats them seriously. Everyone knows that they are merely a fig leaf to get a failing and weakened leader through an election. What is guaranteed is that as soon as that election is over the first dramatic cut will be the leadership of the Tory party. That is what is happening at the moment and that is what we can expect.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) noted earlier that the Tory motion referred to 66 tax rises and he helpfully pointed out that the Conservatives had arrived at that number by adding together the various changes listed in the Red Book. Conveniently, they have ignored the 232 tax cuts, which can be demonstrated in exactly the same fashion: tax cuts such as corporation tax to help business, jobs and exports; the doubling of capital allowances to small and medium enterprises and tax credits to help hard-working families. All are at risk under that increasingly desperate shell of a once proud political party.

What can we really expect? The shadow Chancellor, who has established some reputation for honesty, is always willing to let the cat out of the bag. He has told us exactly what we can expect. Pain. That is the Tory message to the electorate. It is not painless and there is no point in trying to pretend that it is painless, he said. Now, we have some idea of what sort of pain is intended. This is a slash and burn exercise. The proposals are way above the 2.5 per cent. efficiency savings that Sir Peter Gershon said were possible. He warned that if we went above that we would do untold damage to the economy and our public services. It is not acceptable to come to the House with some kind of PowerPoint presentation that ignores that basic fact. If the Opposition's proposal is to make cuts that go beyond what Gershon said was possible, they have an obligation to spell out in detail what those cuts will be and where they will fall. To do anything else is deliberately to try to deceive the British people.

It seems to me that I am entitled to ask exactly what additional cuts are intended. I say that because I noticed earlier that the hon. Member for Tatton was happy to quote the Institute for Fiscal Studies when he felt that it supported his argument. In return, perhaps he would care to explain the comments of Robert Chote of the IFS who has warned that currently only a third of the Tory plans have been costed and that they will have to go much further and find much deeper cuts. I want to know where those cuts will fall.

I am conscious of the fact that the Environment Agency has been cited. It is possible to make deep cuts in the Environment Agency, and we know exactly what that would result in: more flooding of people's homes, more illegal fly-tipping, fewer prosecutions of cowboys and more risks to public health. If that could be done to one agency, which other agencies that would be dismissed as meaningless quangos would also be chopped to the bone, and which other services that currently exist to protect the British public would be taken out of action? I am entitled to ask that in such a debate. In fact, I shall go further: if the Conservatives have accounted for only a third of their cuts to date, I want to know where the other two thirds would come.

Given the Conservative party's record when in power, I suspect that the Conservatives would start to close schools and hospitals. If so, I want to know which ones in Hall Green the Conservatives intend to take out of commission. Would they cut the new classrooms at Allenscroft, Hollywood or Colmore schools? Which schools and hospitals are on the secret Tory hit list? We are entitled to know. The Conservatives cannot give a PowerPoint presentation and ignore the things that people are really concerned about.

I was astonished to hear the hon. Member for Tatton boast that he would spend £6 billion to sack 230,000 diligent public servants. Given the experience of unemployment in this country under the Tory Government, I was astonished that a shadow Minister could gloat about the fact that he plans to spend £6 billion of public money to throw 230,000 diligent civil servants on to the scrapheap—people who work in the new deal, helping others to find work and unemployment, and people who work in the strategic health authorities, of which the hon. Gentleman is equally dismissive.

Of course, as I pointed out earlier today, we would not know about the abuse of elderly people at the Maypole nursing home in Hall Green if it had not been for the actions of the strategic health authority's staff in uncovering that scandal. The decent civil servants who work at the Environment Agency and the people in the regional development agency who are trying to provide jobs and regeneration in some of the most run-down parts of Birmingham are the kind of people who would be thrown on the scrapheap. Of course, as we heard yesterday at Health questions, the Conservatives would also like to sack the accountants who work in the health service—the very people who are capable of tracking budgets, trying to avoid waste and ensuring value for money.

I conclude—[Interruption]—that I can agree with only one part of the motion. Opposition Members will hear an awful lot more between now and the election, so they should not panic.

Mr. Francois: Some of it might actually make sense.

Mr. McCabe: The simple problem is that it will not make any sense to the hon. Gentleman because he does not realise what mass unemployment does to people's lives. He does not care about cuts in the health service, about the effect of crime on people or about negative equity. He thinks that those are matters of fun. I suggest that he speak to some of the people who have had to live with the trauma of those experiences, which the Conservative party inflicted on their lives.

I agree with one part of the motion: there is a need for a change of direction. It is time the Tory party abandoned its back-to-the-future vandalism and started to recognise that the British public constantly reject the Conservatives because of their false prospectus and their fantasy policies.

3.32 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): The kindest thing that I can say about the contribution made by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) is that he was obviously gallantly and valiantly responding to a plea from his Whips to come into the Chamber to fill up some time so as to disguise the Labour party's evident embarrassment and indifference towards this very important question.

The need to monitor spending and control the Executive's spending appetite is the first role of the House. We ought to discuss that matter more often than we do. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) and right hon. and hon. colleagues on giving us this opportunity and on inviting Mr. James and his colleagues to produce the excellent report that we have all received. It is very easy to get it off the internet; my secretary did so this morning with no difficulty at all.

The report is an impressive piece of work, and it is particularly important that public attention should be focused on the extremely worrying growth in public expenditure over the past few years and the fact that we are now running a £40 billion-a-year deficit that must be paid for, with interest, by future taxation. That is a clear burden on future generations. This is the right moment to focus on the issue.

The report brings out absolutely astonishing, spectacular and frankly scandalous revelations. For example, I have learned that the administrative costs of the Department for Culture, Media and Sport have more than doubled since 1997, although its responsibilities have increased only trivially. It is clear that bureaucracy in that Department is out of control. I have learned that the National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts—NESTA—which distributes grants under those headings, has given away £7.3 million, yet its bureaucracy has cost £5.9 million. That is a scandalous waste of public money by any standards, so I am grateful that the report has brought that out.

Some aspects of the report are slightly weaker than others. I am not quite convinced about savings of £1 billion or more in defence procurement in the Ministry of Defence. Additionally, the person who was responsible for drafting the part of the report on overseas aid—I know a little about the subject because I serve on the International Development Committee—was not up to the standard of those who wrote the rest, because that section is very muddled. It says:

"the EU is widely recognised as one of the least effective aid channels, since only 52 per cent. of EU overseas development aid goes to low income countries."

It is a fundamental error to confuse giving aid to poor people with giving aid to poor countries. The largest development programme that we have is to India, and although that is a middle-income country, there is enormous poverty in Orissa, Bihar and other states, so we are right to continue to give such aid. The fact that only 52 per cent. of EU aid goes to low-income countries says nothing about the efficiency of the programme.

The James report suggests splitting the EU aid budget

"to separate aid aimed at EU Peace and Security from aid aimed at poverty reduction."

Such a split already exists because there is a separate budget under the external relations part of the own resources budget that is related primarily not to poverty reduction, but to building stability in the near abroad. The budget makes a useful contribution to building stability in the Maghreb, the Balkans and the Commonwealth of Independent States, and I think that we are committed to it. Additionally, the European development fund is administered by EuropeAid, which is a completely different bureaucracy. The split already exists, so I am mystified by the proposal.

The report talks of "bringing back to the UK the voluntary contribution that . . . goes to the European Development Fund."

The contribution is voluntary in the sense that it has nothing to do with our contribution to the EU's budget and that not making it would be consistent with our obligations under the treaties, but it is not voluntary in that we are committed to making it under the Cotonou agreement and we would let down many poor countries if we did not do so. The section of the report is bizarre and muddled, so it must be reconsidered.

Several aspects of the report are modest and we could have been more ambitious about cutting Government expenditure in some areas. I was surprised that there were no proposals to reduce quangos in the section on the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, so I hope that we can consider doing that.

There is an open question about whether we should provide legal aid at all for non-criminal cases in this country, given that we have provision for contingency fees. Although I do not have time to go into that point now, there must be a case for restricting access to legal aid for civil cases to UK residents. We have that restriction in the national health service, but apparently not under the legal aid budget, so surely legitimate savings could be made. We know from the newspapers that scandalous abuses of civil legal aid have involved non-UK citizens.

When considering the Home Office, we should think about savings in the Prison Service. The Federal Bureau of Prisons in the United States raises more than half its costs through prison work programmes, and I have felt strongly about that matter since I was a Parliamentary Private Secretary in the Home Office under Ken Baker. The Home Office said that it would try to do something, but I encountered enormous resistance to the idea in the Prison Service. We should take the matter up.

On the Department for Education and Skills, I think that we could be braver than the James report suggests and abolish local education authorities altogether. It seems to me that there is a residual function in looking after children with special needs and those who have been excluded from mainstream schools, but that concerns a very small number of people and does not require an LEA. All their regulatory, advisory and inspection functions could and should be totally closed down.

I have a final, personal contribution to make. This is worth billions, and I think we should consider it urgently. I propose the introduction to the NHS of compulsory generic prescribing. That is to say that when a doctor prescribes a pharmaceutical compound or combination of compounds, the dispensing pharmacist should where possible, if they want to be reimbursed by the NHS, dispense one that is ex-patent and available in generic form, often at a cost that is an order of magnitude lower than the branded version. We should not be using taxpayers' money to pay for packaging or brand; we should be paying simply for the clinical compound that is required.

That is my additional suggestion. I am moving forward on the excellent basis that has been established by the James report, which I hope will inform the debate that we will be having over the next few months, when the rising burden of public expenditure and taxation will be, as it should be, one of the major themes in the coming election campaign.

3.41 pm

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): It is a pleasure to sum up for the Opposition this afternoon, after what I think we can all agree has been a rather lively debate. It was opened by my hon. Friend the Member for

[Mr. Mark Francois]

Tatton (Mr. Osborne), the shadow Chief Secretary, who provided a robust advocacy of our new value for money proposals, of which more again in a moment.

That was replied to by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. It is a funny old thing, politics. He may recall that we first debated together back in 1997 in a secondary school in Wembley, I think, when I was the Conservative candidate in Brent, East, the seat neighbouring his. May I compliment the right hon. Gentleman on his consistency? He had a particular debating style back then, and I hope that he will not mind me saying that it has not altered much even to this day.

May I correct the right hon. Gentleman on a couple of points? With regard to the depth of our research, Gershon, which he prayed in aid, is a 60-page report, of which only some 10 pages are specifically about savings, whereas we have published all the results of our research on a website. At Prime Minister's questions earlier today, the Prime Minister quoted, in detail, from our report on the website. If there is enough detail in there to satisfy the Prime Minister, perhaps the Chief Secretary and the Financial Secretary should take it on board.

There is a great problem with the new deal. We have 1.1 million people in this country under the age of 25 who are now not in employment, education or training. The new deal has failed those young people. The acronym for that group is NEET. I have to tell the Chief Secretary that Labour's record on the matter does not seem very neat to me.

I hope that I do not misquote the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws), but he said that the James report was extremely helpful and detailed. He also said that the costings are perfectly legitimate. We welcome that acknowledgment from the Liberal Democrat spokesman of the depth of work that has gone into this process. The hon. Gentleman admonished us gently on the list of 168 quangos that we would abolish, pointing out that some are regional bodies that crop up a number of times. That is because the Government have balkanised a number of national organisations in their obsession with a regional agenda; Sport England is just one example. It is not our fault that the Government did that, and in abolishing those organisations, we obviously have to act regionally, which adds to the total.

Mr. Laws: Since the hon. Gentleman is trying to sum up the debate and cite all the comments that have been made, may I ask whether he agrees with the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies), who described certain parts of the James report as bizarre and muddled?

Mr. Francois: No, I do not agree with all of that. I shall discuss my hon. Friend's contribution in a moment, but first let me ask the hon. Gentleman whether he agrees with what I understand his hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) said on BBC Radio 5 Live in a debate at lunchtime today: "Trust us, we will put your taxes up."

The hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow) spoke about reaching a threshold beyond which people in Britain simply are not prepared to pay any more tax. I have some sympathy with his argument; unfortunately, he was unable to tell us how the Labour party will then fill the Chancellor's black hole. I put to him the point made by Mr. Stephen Lewis, an economist at Monument Securities, in The Guardian of 3 December:

"It is one thing for a chancellor to miss his borrowing target because economic conditions have let him down. It is quite another when the error occurs despite the economy performing in line with his expectations. The only conclusion then to be drawn is that the public finances are out of control."

I invite the hon. Gentleman to think carefully about that.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) delivered a thoughtful speech, as one would expect from one of his experience in these matters. I take it that he would be in sympathy with the comment in The Sunday Times of 16 January that

"according to Labour's version of things, economic stability and success did not start until after May 1, 1997. That is wrong. Low inflation was well established before Blair was elected, and the current record run of growth began in 1992."

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) made an entertaining contribution in which, in effect, he rewrote Labour's election slogan to say, "After seven years and billions of pounds, things have got ever so slightly better." He treated us to the views of his notional constituent, Jim, and some of his experiences. I suggest to him that, under the Labour Government, in addition to what the hon. Gentleman told us, Jim's family have had to endure 66 tax rises, probably cannot register with an NHS dentist, and have probably been burgled twice in the past five years. Jim is now struggling to find the money to pay the tuition and top-up fees for his children, which the Labour Government promised him he would never have to find.

Perhaps on our behalf the hon. Gentleman will forward to Jim a copy of The Economist of 15 January, which contains an article intriguingly titled, "Boasters", with the subtitle, "The dubious self-congratulation on Labour's campaign posters". The article concludes:

"The economy has certainly been doing better in the past few years than it was doing earlier. But the turning point was not in 1997, when Labour took office, but in 1992, when the Conservatives adopted an inflation target."

I say to the hon. Gentleman, please pass that on to Jim with our compliments and invite him to vote Tory next time.

To my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) I say only that he has a long-standing interest in certain matters and he has expressed concern, but I assure him that any savings found in the Department for International Development are to be reinvested in the Department, so the amount of money going to international aid will not decrease under our proposals. In fact, it will most assuredly increase. However, he has experience of those matters and if he would like to come and discuss them with Front Benchers, we would be delighted.

Lembit Öpik: I request clarification. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the shadow Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Wiggin), said in the most recent sitting of the Welsh Grand Committee:

"the block grant—will not be touched by any changes in funding."

When the Secretary of State challenged him by asking

"is the hon. Gentleman saying that he has a unique exemption for Wales from the shadow Chancellor's £35 billion-worth of cuts and that Wales will be completely immune to those cuts?"

the hon. Gentleman replied:

"The block grant is immune."—[Official Report, Welsh Grand Committee, 7 December 2004; c. 11.]

Will the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) confirm that and say why Wales is to be excluded from the Conservatives' strategy?

Mr. Francois: I can most assuredly confirm that under our plans Wales will receive precisely the same amount of money that it would from the Labour Government under their plans. There is no difference. In return, may I point out to the hon. Gentleman that Gladstone, whom his Front-Bench spokesman mentioned, once wisely advised leaving money to "fructify in the pockets of the people"?

Forty Liberal Democrat tax rises would make that impossible.

In the two minutes or so that I have left to speak, I wish to make the point that a great deal has changed in the past seven years. In 1997, all the talk was of prudence and of the Labour Government never repeating their predecessors' mistake of taxing and spending and getting into financial trouble. Now we find that most of the major economic forecasters—the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the International Monetary Fund, the Institute for Fiscal Studies and the ITEM Club—agree that the Chancellor has a burgeoning black hole in his finances, to the point where, if Labour was somehow re-elected, the consequence would be massive tax rises to try and fill it.

I conclude, as my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton started, by asking the Financial Secretary which taxes Labour would put up to fill the black hole. Would it put 2p on the basic rate of income tax, would capital gains tax be levied on principal properties, would VAT be imposed on food, or would there be a 10 per cent. increase on national insurance contributions to blow away the upper earnings limit once and for all, as many of us have suggested the Chancellor has long wanted to do?

The British people will have a clear choice at the general election. They can vote for a high-spending and high-taxing Labour Government who would almost certainly raise taxes to fill their black hole, or they can vote for a Conservative Government who have identified £35 billion of savings, of which £23 billion would be reinvested in public services, £8 billion devoted to filling the black hole, and £4 billion returned to the people in tax cuts. That is a clear choice for the people of this country. They can have tax and spend socialism with Labour, or value for money under the Conservatives. I am confident that they will choose the latter, and I commend our motion to the House.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): In 1997 Britain's public services were in a state of crisis. For years, all the energy of Government had been focused on spending cuts. The view was being spread that the time for public provision was past and that the way of the future was cuts and privatisation. This week, we discovered that the Tories have learned nothing in the eight years since.

In 1997, everybody could see that the public services faced enormous challenges. There had been growing demands but inadequate investment, and new pressures but old answers from the Tory Government, who were unable to provide the resources to meet the new challenges. Many people believed the Tory propaganda that high-quality public services were incompatible with a successful modern economy. They thought the Tories were right that the only way forward was cuts and privatisation, that there was no alternative and that public provision was doomed to underinvestment and decline.

In the eight years since 1997, we have proved that the Tories were wrong. We have shown and the British people have seen that rising investment to rebuild our public services has gone hand in hand with the strongest economy that any of us can remember. Between 1979 and 1997, the UK was the least stable economy in the G7 except for Canada, with all the problems for the British people that were caused by boom and bust. Since 1997, we have been the most stable economy in the G7, bar none, and we have benefited from unprecedented investment in services.

As a consequences, we see better results in our schools—more children doing well at 11 and at GCSE. There have been more than 28,000 more teachers since 1997, there is more equipment in classrooms, school buildings have been repaired and refurbished, as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) and others pointed out, and there are more resources for higher education and colleges. For the first time in their careers, many people in education are confident that they have the resources they need to deliver in the circumstances of modern Britain.

In the health service, the number of people waiting more than six months for in-patient treatment is down 78 per cent. since 1997, and the number waiting more than 12 months is virtually nil; it was 30,000 in 1997. Waiting times in accident and emergency departments are down. There are 77,000 more nurses, 19,000 more doctors and more in training than ever before.

Crime rates are down 30 per cent. since 1997, and there are 14,000 more police officers. Police numbers are at record levels, and there are already 4,500 community support officers. As a senior police officer in my constituency told me before Christmas, the Labour Government have given him and his colleagues for the first time in his career both the powers and the resources to do the job that Britain needs. That has been the value that we have delivered for taxpayers' money. Britain does not want to go back to the bad old days of cuts and underinvestment. Instead, we need to build on the historic improvements that we have seen in the period since 1997.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): On the question of value for taxpayers' money, can the Financial Secretary assure me that the Treasury will give detailed scrutiny to the unfolding financial scandal of the Paddington health campus?

Mr. Timms: I am certain that those who are following that development will give it the scrutiny that it needs.

[Mr. Timms]

The progress that we have made has been because of, not despite, the remarkably successful, prudent stewardship that the economy has benefited from since 1997—inflation down, interest rates at historic low levels, and unemployment today lower than at any time under the Tories. From the day the Tories were elected in 1979 until the day they were ejected in 1997, unemployment was never as low as it has now been for the past four years. Who wants to go back to 3 million unemployed?

Mr. Quentin Davies: The hon. Gentleman talks about good stewardship. How was it that the National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts gave away £7.3 million and incurred administrative costs of £5.9 million? Is that good stewardship?

Mr. Timms: I hope that I will have the opportunity to comment on what the hon. Gentleman said about the James review. He made some interesting points. He praised some parts of it and spent rather longer criticising other parts of it, describing one as bizarre. He spent some time on the James report. We have seen the PowerPoint presentation available on the Conservative party website with 174 slides, 12 of them identical referring to the James review of taxpayer value and accompanied by a rather fetching photograph of Mr. James. I hope, for the sake of the Conservative party Front-Bench spokesmen, that there is the detail behind that PowerPoint presentation that a work of that kind requires. We gathered from the Front-Bench spokesman that the Conservative party will not publish that detail, and, indeed, callers to Conservative central office on Monday were told that it would not do so because that would give too much ammunition to the party's critics, which is probably absolutely correct.

Independence for the Bank of England, the symmetric inflation target, the golden rule, the sustainable investment rule—

Mr. Davies: Will the Financial Secretary give way?

Mr. Timms: No, I will not give way again.

That framework has delivered not only unprecedented stability, but the resources for investment, long overdue and desperately needed under the Tories, delivered under Labour. We now need to build on those achievements, to maintain the investment and to reap the benefits for Britain—

Mr. Davies: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Can you discover whether something is wrong with the microphone system in the Chamber? I intervened, at the Financial Secretary's invitation, to ask a question a moment ago. He took the question, but appears not to have heard it.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Timms: This has been an illuminating debate. We still do not know the detail of the Conservative party's plans; it has published only the bullet points. But we do know that the numbers do not add up and that they fail the credibility test. As yesterday's leader column in the Financial Times said:

"The tax plans unveiled by the Tories fail the credibility test."

It is worth reading a little more. It says:

"The White Queen in Lewis Carroll's Alice in Wonderland claimed she had believed as many as six impossible things before breakfast. The Conservatives are less ambitious in wanting voters to believe in only three".

One thing we do know is that even on the basis of those numbers that fail the credibility test, the Tories claim only that they will release £4 billion a year for tax cuts by 2007–08, but they have announced that there will be tax cuts in their first Budget after being elected. The money can come only from more borrowing, putting at risk exactly the remarkable stability in the economy that has been priceless for us over the past eight years.

We also know that the Tories want deep cuts. Even all those cuts that we can glean from what we have seen in the James review—scrapping the new deal, increasing unemployment by privatising and reducing funding for jobcentres, halving the Food Standards Agency, scrapping support for small businesses, scrapping NHS Direct, scrapping NHS improvement targets, even closing the National College for School Leadership, a particularly spiteful proposal—gets us less than half way to the cuts that they have announced that they will deliver by 2012. Yesterday, the Institute for Fiscal Studies rightly pointed out that the Conservative party has announced only one third of the spending cuts that it plans to make by 2012. We know where those cuts lead, because we have been there before, and they would be a disaster for Britain, which will be the verdict of the British people.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House believes that economic stability is the foundation for continued investment in public services; welcomes therefore the lowest inflation since the 1960s, lowest interest rates for 40 years and the longest period of economic growth for 200 years; further welcomes this Government's record investment in public services; believes that it is important to ensure taxpayer value for money and therefore welcomes the fact that the Government is making efficiency savings to release resources into frontline services; further welcomes the fact that Sir Peter Gershon has identified over £20 billion efficiency savings across the public sector and notes that he said that to go further than the efficiencies he identified would put at risk the delivery of frontline public services; and further believes that any proposal to make cuts in public spending would not only damage frontline public services but the economy as a whole.

Farming and Rural Communities

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I inform the ouse that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment ibled by the Prime Minister.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) Con): I beg to move,

That this House regrets that self sufficiency in indigenous food nd drink products has fallen significantly since 1997; supports the rinciple in CAP reform of decoupling support from production ut believes that the Government has failed to consider the nplications for the countryside and food security of its inept nplementation of this reform by creating a complex system of ntitlements and cross compliance wholly contrary to the bjective of simplification whilst failing to reduce the current urden of regulation or to enable farmers to compete with mported food not produced to British standards; laments the fact hat there are now more officials in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs than there are dairy armers in Britain, and that the workforce in agriculture has fallen by 15 per cent.; recognises that many landscape features of the English countryside were created by historic farming practices and believes that the promotion of biodiversity and care of the countryside is best achieved by a profitable agricultural industry; and considers that the continued attacks on the countryside through unacceptable levels of development, an obsession with wind farms and the closure of rural services are the actions of a Government with no instinctive understanding of the needs of farming and rural communities.

For 57 years, successive Governments of Britain have encouraged British farmers to produce more of our food. By 1997, those farmers, together with those responsible for the genetic improvement of our crops and livestock and for pesticide development, had almost tripled domestic food production. Of course, there has been a price to pay for that success. In parts of the country, the landscape changed as hedges were removed and fields were drained, and some of the early pesticides proved to have serious consequences for our wildlife. However, almost all of that stopped at least 20 years ago. Indeed, since 1980 the woodland area of this country has increased by 29 per cent. and many species of birds have recovered, although I accept that not all have done so.

There has been a further price to pay, involving money. We now have higher food prices and higher taxes. Since the early 1980s, there has been an increasing clamour from all political parties for reform of the common agricultural policy. That reform began in earnest in 1992, but the changes that came in on 1 January this year are far more dramatic. Before I address those changes, I want to reflect on what has happened in the past seven years under this Government.

After that tripling of farm output, it has now fallen by 5 per cent. Farming incomes have fallen by 8 per cent. in real terms and the labour force has decreased by 15 per cent. Self-sufficiency is down by 4 per cent. We have had an outbreak of foot and mouth disease, but we still do not know how that disease got to Burnside farm. Apparently, it arrived in swill, but there has been little or no effort to find out. Bovine tuberculosis has rocketed by 65 per cent. and is destroying our cattle herds in many parts of the country while the Government sit on their hands paralysed. Only last week, the Minister said that this did not affect dairy profitability. It was this Government who broke up Milk Marque, and the dairy industry is now on its knees with an income last year of just half the minimum wage.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way so early in his speech. Is he aware that more than a dozen major milk producers in my constituency have stopped production in the past two years? Almost every month, there is a dairy herd for sale. On self-sufficiency, we have a balance between sugar production and sugar consumption in this country. Does he agree that that should be the target for any negotiations on the reform of the sugar regime?

Mr. Paice: I am sure that virtually any Member who represents a rural constituency will be able to tell a similar story about the decline of dairy herds. It is happening across the country. Of course, all of us understand that things must change and, as I shall say in a few minutes, they cannot go on as they were—

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Paice: In a moment.

The dramatic decline of our dairy industry poses potentially huge problems for our rural communities and the rest of the country. Later, I shall suggest measures that a Government with a real interest could take to try to improve things.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Paice: In a moment.

I also want to touch on the issue of sugar, which my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) raised, and which I had intended to raise later. He referred to it in the context of self-sufficiency. He is absolutely right that the sugar regime needs to be reformed, and I made it clear in the House last week that we accept that. That reform, however, must allow the most efficient producers and processors in Europe, which includes British farmers and British Sugar as an organisation, to compete with the less efficient producers in Europe. He referred to the fact that we only produce 50 per cent. of our requirement in this country. Traditionally, we have imported the other 50 per cent. from the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries, which puts our market roughly in balance. There is no reason why our sugar beet industry should be forced to take unnecessary quota cuts if those cuts are not first imposed on those responsible for the surpluses that are dumped on the world market.

I was extremely disappointed, and I believe that the whole sugar beet industry will have been disappointed, that when I asked the Secretary of State in the House last Thursday whether she would stand up for British sugar producers and oppose the change in the mechanism that the Commission has proposed—which would mean that quota cuts would hit British farmers unfairly, instead of attacking those who produce the surplus

—she categorically refused to confirm that the Government would resist those proposals. That was a derogation of responsibility for the British industry.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk) (Con) rose—

Mr. Heath rose—

Mr. Paice: I will give way first to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath).

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman is extremely fair. He knows that I and many other Members who represent dairy farming areas have spoken repeatedly about the difficulties that dairy farmers face and the loss of profitability. I had thought that he entirely agreed on that, and I think that he has indicated that he does. I am surprised, however, to read that one of the proposals in the Conservative party's James review is to recover the entire costs of the Rural Payments Agency from hard-pressed farmers. How will that help dairy farmers in my constituency?

Mr. Paice: I am not often fair to Liberals, and perhaps that will teach me a lesson for being so. The short answer is that the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the proposal in the James review, which is that the whole of the Rural Payments Agency should be outsourced. The responsibility for managing the whole framework of payments is ridiculously expensive and complicated, and I shall refer later to the bureaucracy that is now involved. That needs to be outsourced, and it will be.

Mrs. Shephard: I had thought that my hon. Friend was going to be fair to everyone else, and now he is just being fair to me, for which I am grateful. I want to refer back to his remarks on sugar. It is one thing, of course, for the Government, as the Secretary of State apparently did in the House last week, to stand by while the sugar industry goes to wrack and ruin, but it is quite another not to plan some kind of strategy for the future of those farmers who, in the past, have successfully grown sugar beet. Will my hon. Friend comment on what might be put in place so that the land could still be farmed and people still profitably produce a crop, in the light of the Government's total inaction?

Mr. Paice: Yes, my right hon. Friend is absolutely right to stand up for sugar producers in her constituency and across the country. It is a very important crop, both in rotational terms, for example biodiversity, and, as I said earlier, in relation to food security. What we must do is reform the sugar regime to allow, wherever possible, the less developed and ACP countries to continue to send their sugar into the European market at a slightly higher price than they would otherwise get on the world market—or there is no advantage to them in doing so—but at the same time allow our producers to continue if they are efficient enough to do so.

We all accept that there must be an element of price cutting, although nothing like the percentage originally proposed by the Commission. That would mean a number of producers going out of business, particularly in some of the high-cost European countries. The Commission should be working with those countries on a restructuring programme to remove their quotas from the system. If the sugar quotas of the high-cost producing countries were cancelled, the need for any further quota cuts would diminish dramatically. If cuts are needed they should, as I said earlier, be imposed on those responsible for the surpluses that are being dumped on the world market and are destroying the sugar trade for other producers. I hope that that is helpful to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Hoyle: Obviously, the hon. Gentleman is right—dairy farmers are struggling all over the country. Part of the problem is that a fair price is not being paid by the supermarkets. The processors are holding the price down, and it is continually being pushed down. That is a major barrier to the success of the dairy industry. What we should be doing is seeking a way to ensure a fair farm-gate price, which would enable the dairy industry to survive. I remind Ministers that we should have more meetings with supermarket representatives and put more pressure on them. Does the hon. Gentleman agree with that?

Mr. Paice: I have a lot of sympathy with that, but I hope the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not go into much detail now because I want to deal with the whole issue of supermarkets later.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman mentioned the James review. Will he confirm that it recommends cuts of £894 million in the DEFRA budget, £112 million in the Rural Payments Agency budget—that cannot be achieved merely by outsourcing—and £47 million in the Environment Agency's budget, when we ought to be cleaning up the environment and tackling pollution? Those are big cuts that will affect front-line services. The hon. Gentleman has got a cheek calling for this debate today.

Mr. Paice: What the Government seem to have completely overlooked in the James report—probably intentionally—is that it is not just about cutting bureaucracy, although that is critical. It issues a challenge: it asks whether Government are doing things that Government should not be doing, and whether by doing those things they are imposing extra costs on farmers and every other sector of society.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Environment Agency. I know that he takes an interest in such matters. He should go and talk to all the farmers in his constituency who are constantly afflicted by inspectors for this, that and the other, many of them from the Environment Agency, imposing new rules and regulations that will not actually help to improve the environment. The hon. Gentleman and I agree about the need to do everything possible to improve the environment, but that causes unnecessary extra cost, which is what we are trying to weed out of the system.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Paice: I hope that my hon. Friend will allow me to make a little more progress.

Behind all the failings that I have described has been a very regrettable attitude from the Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale mentioned food security, which is perhaps best put in context by a statement issued by DEFRA at the time of the 2003 royal show. DEFRA said

"National food security is neither necessary nor is it desirable."

That, I think, underlines the absence of Government thought processes when it comes to the importance of farming and food production.

It is not just a case of the direct farming issues that the Government have neglected and the damage that they have caused to the countryside. The motion refers to other issues, including the erosion of the green belt and the absorption of villages into our conurbations, while the Deputy Prime Minister's proposals could mean the building of another 1.2 million houses on our greenfield sites. Some 58 per cent. of rural households have no regular bus service, and bus journeys outside London have declined. Our woods and forests and our timber industry have also declined. Funding for private woodlands stands at just over £18 million, compared with more than £300 million for state sector woodlands.

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Paice: In a moment.

The Government are obsessed with wind power as the sole source of renewable energy, even though it would leave a huge environmental footprint on the countryside. Yet they have done virtually nothing to promote the real contribution that the countryside could make to renewable energy through biofuels and biomass. The 20p per litre reduction in duty on biofuels is simply not enough to trigger the industry, notwithstanding the Government's commitment to achieving 0.3 per cent. of fuel from renewable resources this year. That figure has to be increased or supplemented by a renewables obligation. On biomass, there has been a deafening silence for the past seven years—until the setting up of a taskforce just two months ago.

Mr. Clifton-Brown rose—

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con) rose—

Mr. Todd rose—

Mr. Paice: I give way first to the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd).

Mr. Todd: The hon. Gentleman and I have talked many times about rural issues, and he will concede that we often agree on them. He mentioned bus services in rural areas. In South Derbyshire in 1997, 17,000 passengers were carried on community transport, which in essence serves the rural parts of my area; now, 72,000 are carried. Perhaps that experience is reflected more widely, or perhaps my area is unique.

Mr. Paice: That is not reflected more widely. I shall not dispute the figures for the hon. Gentleman's constituency as one would expect him to know better than others about such matters, although that is not always true of certain Members. The national statistics clearly show a considerable decline in the overall distance travelled by buses and in the number of passenger miles travelled outside London.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I declare my interest in this subject, as listed in the register. Does my hon. Friend agree that part of the problem in farming today is DEFRA Ministers' lack of understanding of how the industry works? They have come up with one of the most complicated schemes that could possibly be imagined for the single farm payment—the historical and regional systems mixed together—and they have still to come up with the final details. Yet crops need to be planted urgently, within the next few weeks.

Mr. Paice: My hon. Friend is entirely right and I hope to discuss that issue in due course.

Mr. Bellingham: Is my hon. Friend aware that British Sugar has put in a planning application for a bioethanol plant to be installed in the beet factory in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard)? British Sugar has made it clear that if the duty differential were more favourable and sensible, it would make such planning applications in respect of all its factories.

Mr. Paice: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding me that, as he rightly says, British Sugar has put in a planning application for a bioethanol plant. However, it has made it clear in public statements that such applications are dependent on further Government action to ensure viability as far as possible. As I said earlier, the simple 20p duty reduction is not enough on its own. Further surety is needed and the Government have more than one option: another duty reduction or the introduction of a renewables obligation on fuel retailers. If we are to develop bioethanol and, even more urgently, the biodiesel sector, which is wide open to exploitation if the market can be created, we need to be certain that such a market will exist in a few years' time, not just tomorrow.

In the past seven years, we have witnessed a catalogue of neglect of, and disdain for, our rural communities and values, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) suggested. Yet now the countryside faces its biggest economic change since 1947. Let me make it absolutely clear that the Opposition entirely endorse the principle of decoupling support from production, but very few people—be they farmers, politicians or commentators, let alone the general public—fully appreciate the scale of the change taking place. As my hon. Friend has just said, the Government's introduction of the new arrangements has been a shambles. They have introduced an extremely complicated, hybrid scheme without really understanding the complexities of the situation. The entitlement rules have been trickled out over the past few weeks, right up to 1 January when the scheme commenced.

Many of the rules are still unclear. For example, many farmers traditionally lease land for the growing of one crop, usually a root or other vegetable crop on a rotational basis, from different farmers. They still do not understand whether they get the entitlement or whether the farmer who owns the land gets it. It is likely that the entitlement will fall down the middle, because neither party will satisfy the 10-month occupancy rule. That is one example of the ridiculous and absurd situation that has arisen.

Instead of a simple system of payments linked to the environment, we have a system that leaves some people farming without a payment and others not farming but receiving a payment. Only a Government ignorant of what farming business is really about could have introduced such a scheme.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I admit that it is a spatchcock of a proposal, but the difficulties arose because even the NFU was greatly split over it, let alone the other farm organisations. It could be argued that the Government could have shown greater leadership, but the proposals were bound to upset someone. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we have the best of what could have been proposed?

Mr. Paice: The term "a spatchcock of a proposal" deserves to be put in bold capitals in Hansard. It sums up the situation. It is not the fact that we have a hybrid scheme that is the problem—it is the fact that the Government announced it in March 2004 without any understanding of the complexities of sorting out who would be entitled to it and how it would work. Despite all that, they insisted on introducing the scheme on 1 January. They fundamentally misunderstood the task on which they had embarked and that is what has caused the shambles, the dismay and the distress felt by so many farmers.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman's analysis that the competence of DEFRA is in question, given that it made an announcement without at the same time making clear its assessment of its impact. Nor did the Department properly lay out how it would overcome the obvious complexities involved in delivering the new scheme. What is the view of the Conservative party and which options, of those available to the Government, would it have chosen?

Mr. Paice: The hon. Gentleman is not keeping up with the real world in which we live—

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is a Liberal Democrat.

Mr. Paice: Well, I suppose it is hardly surprising, then.

The fact is that the Government made their decision back in March and, like it or not, we are lumbered with it. That is the system that we are going to get. If the hon. Gentleman wants to ask me questions about what we would do, he must also say what the Liberal Democrats would do if, by some unbelievable circumstance, they were to be able to do something. As always, of course, the Liberal Democrats can say what they like because they know that they will never have to do it.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Paice: I will give way to the hon. Lady and then I will move on.

Kali Mountford: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his generosity in giving way. I have listened carefully to his speech so far and am fascinated by it. However, will he now move on to such schemes as the rural bus partnership scheme, the rural train partnership scheme, the village renaissance scheme and the market towns initiative? Will he discuss village schools and other aspects of our rural communities?

Mr. Paice: I intend to move on, and I am grateful to the hon. Lady for inviting me to do so.

As a result of the complexity of the scheme that we have just discussed, it was widely believed that the Rural Payments Agency could not make any payments until well into 2006, despite the target of December 2005. We know now, because it was announced literally two or three hours ago by the agency, that that will be delayed until February 2006 at the earliest. That is a direct result of the complexity of the system that the Government introduced. We need a specific undertaking by the Government that those delays will be recognised and, if necessary, an interim payment made. The cash-flow implications for farmers of the 14-month delay originally envisaged between their last integrated administration and control scheme payment and their first single farm payment were bad enough. If the gap is going to be 16, 17, 18 months or more, the cash-flow implications are entirely unacceptable.

Cross-compliance and what farmers have to do to receive payments are another feature of the new system. Farmers must obey a huge list of statutory requirements. That sounds fine—of course people should obey statutory requirements—but farmers will pay twice. They will pay the penalty for breaking the statutory requirement and they will also lose their single farm payment. The Minister must explain the justification for that double whammy. Perhaps the starkest example of the Government's gold plating of regulation is to be found in the rules on cross-compliance, including the rules on good agricultural and environmental condition. Annex IV of the European regulation defines good agricultural and environmental condition in just 13 short lines. The Government's statutory instrument consists of 700 lines. Last week, farmers received three books on cross-compliance, including 36 pages on soil management and 44 pages on habitat and landscape. That illustrates more than anything the Government's contempt for farmers and their complete failure to understand that farmers know far more about managing their land than Labour Ministers.

What is going to happen now? It is widely believed that the reforms will result in a further fall in domestic production. That matters, because increasing imports of food have a damaging effect on the environment, both through global warming and through the destruction of local environments where food is produced. Equally important, we face massive increases in world demand for food because of population growth and prosperity, which will result in an estimated 50 per cent. increase in grain demand by 2025. In the short term, there is a risk of disease, and we have already seen how avian flu in south-east Asia has suddenly removed supplies of poultry meat from our market.

The Government do not seem to care. They have not made any assessment of how much production will fall or what will happen to our land when it is taken out of production. How much of our food manufacturing industry will move abroad if raw material is not produced here? That sector employs another 500,000 people. Some people estimate that hundreds of thousands of acres of grass will not be cut or grazed. No doubt, the Government will point to the entry level scheme, which is fine as far as it goes. However, £30 per hectare will barely cover the costs. Ministers say that the scheme requirements are little more than things that most farmers have been doing anyway. They are right, but farmers have being doing those things as part of profitable farming. If there is no profit in farming and no margin in ELS payments, they will not be done.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend is quite right—we should produce food in this country. However, we have one of the worst balance of payments records that we have ever had. In the dairy sector alone we have a £700 million deficit. Is that not a disgrace, as we could produce that food ourselves?

Mr. Paice: It is indeed. I shall take one more intervention and then I shall move on to that very point.

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will cover in his speech the greatest capital cost to be borne by farmers over the next year—the implementation of the nitrates directive. In Northern Ireland alone, for 22,000 farmers managing 32,000 farms it will cost £237 million, with only £30 million available through the farm waste management scheme. That massive capital cost will be imposed on farmers throughout the United Kingdom during the next year. What will the Conservative party recommend that the Government do, or what will the Conservatives do if they are in power to alleviate that massive capital cost to our farming communities?

Mr. Paice: I was not intending to refer to the nitrates directive, simply because there are so many things that I want to mention, but the hon. Gentleman is right to raise that point. It is another huge imposition on farmers. The answer is clear: we must press for much longer derogations from the directive and ensure that its implementation does not cause the massive capital cost to which he refers. That relates to my overall point about the gold-plating of regulations.

We need a real vision of what we want from our farming industry and of what we expect in the countryside, but that vision is woefully absent from the Government. In contrast, the Conservatives believe that domestic food production is important and that our rural environment is best cared for by working with the farmers who occupy it. As a result of the changes, some farmers may decide to stop farming and others will refocus their business on leisure, but for those who continue the most important feature of change is the need to get nearer the market and to produce for the customer. For some, that will mean direct sales to the consumer, and for others it will mean adding value either individually or co-operatively—but for all of them it means being able to compete. British agriculture cannot continue to carry the superstructure of regulatory cost that it has borne in the past. Nor can it compete with producers who do not face those regulations.

What is the point of our egg industry becoming salmonella-free if we then import Spanish eggs stuffed full of the disease? What is the point of encouraging farmers markets if our abattoirs are being forced to close because of red tape? Last week, I visited a butcher who has his own small slaughterhouse—exactly the sort of enterprise that we all, on both sides of the House, want to support. He is licensed to kill, cut and retail meat, but if the animal belongs to someone else—perhaps another farmer—who wants to sell the meat at a farmers market, he is not allowed to kill and cut the beast, even though it would be going through exactly the same process as the meat he sells in his shop. A Minister with any real concern, and who wanted farmers markets to develop, would sort out such an absurdity.

What was the point of our healthy livestock being slaughtered during the foot and mouth epidemic when the Government do nothing to stop the illegal importation of perhaps 11,000 tonnes of meat, 200 kg of which even DEFRA accepts may be infected with the disease?

What about food labelling and the deceit that allows, for example, pigmeat grown abroad to be labelled British because it is sliced in this country, or that allows food to be labelled organic even if it is not produced to British organic standards? The Government have repeatedly refused to change the law, but we will—not just for farmers, but for consumers. We are not advocating trade barriers, but when we import food that is produced using methods that are banned in this country, the consumer has a right to know. Our farmers could then exploit our higher environmental and welfare standards, but without honest labelling they are operating with one hand tied behind their backs.

Market strength is also an issue. As we have heard already, many farmers complain about the power of the supermarkets. We must face up to the fact that supermarkets have provided a massive increase in the diversity of food available to the consumer—of course, that is in all our interests—but they dominate the buying chain. For example, 65 per cent. of liquid milk is sold by supermarkets. Clearly, the code of practice is not worth the paper that it is written on. It needs to be much tougher and transparent. The Office of Fair Trading is carrying out an audit—it would be wrong to presume its conclusions, which I await with interest—but, clearly, the present situation is entirely unacceptable.

Farmers need to work together. There is a need to change both the corporate and tax treatment of our farm co-operatives to enable them to become more effective and to make vertical integration possible, but even that is of little help if co-operatives are not allowed to become the serious players that they are not only elsewhere in Europe, but in the United States, Canada, Australia and New Zealand. All the other countries that advocate the free market allow their co-operatives to grow and become serious players in the industry. The Government's forcible break-up of Milk Marque has placed a large black cloud over the future of the co-operatives' ability to represent farmers' interests in the marketplace.

The countryside has many functions. It is home to 23 per cent. of our people. It produces 64 per cent. of all our food. It is the landscape that attracts millions of visitors each year—a landscape that has evolved over the centuries, much of it as a result of past farming practice. The people who live there have many interests and many careers, but they are being short-changed by the Government. They receive lower levels of service, fewer buses, fewer police officers and less standard spending assessment funding than their urban counterparts.

Agriculture is at the centre of our rural communities and it is far more important than its contribution to our gross domestic product suggests. It underpins many other rural businesses and much of our rural tourism, as well, of course, as the whole food industry. The Conservative party believes that agriculture can have a prosperous future producing food and energy crops, while caring for and constantly improving our rural environment.

Rural areas can again become thriving places to do business, rather than just dormitories, but they need a Government who have an instinctive understanding of rural life and of the interaction between its many parts, rather than a Government who impose their urban views. The Labour Government have shown that they cannot provide that—we can and we will.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"welcomes the Government's commitment to farming and rural communities set out in the Strategy for Sustainable Farming and Food and Rural Strategy 2004; applauds the Government's commitment to invest more than £500 million over three years in sustainable food and farming; commends the reforms of the Common Agricultural Policy secured by the Government in June 2003, which will be implemented at the earliest possible opportunity in 2005; congratulates the Government's record on public service delivery in rural areas; further commends the £239 million allocated over six years to 2003–04 through the Rural Bus Subsidy Grant for new and improved rural transport services; further applauds the increase in the resources available for regional development agencies to regenerate the rural economy; further welcomes schemes in place to provide affordable housing in rural areas; praises the efforts to retain the rural post office network; further congratulates the Government's action to protect and enhance the rural environment; and calls upon the Government to continue pursuing a strategy based on long term policies to regenerate British agriculture, improve rural services and revitalise the rural economy as a whole."

Today's debate gives us an opportunity to rebut the doom and gloom purveyed by the Conservative party. The future of our rural and farming communities is enormously important for this country, and this is a timely opportunity to remind the House of the considerable progress that we have made since 1997 in ensuring that those communities have a sustainable future—a future that would be taken from them if the cuts envisaged by the Conservative party were made.

The current CAP reform—the most significant change in the subsidy regime for 30 years—presents real opportunities for farming. Our economists estimate that, on average, farm incomes could rise by about £100 million relative to what would happen in the absence of the single payment scheme. Current farm incomes have shown welcome signs of recovery in the past four years and are now 80 per cent. above the low point in 2000.

It is clear from the opening speech that the Conservatives want to return to subsidised farming, instead of developing the sustainable future for farming that we are helping to bring about. The Conservative threat to the rural economy is spelt out in the James report. The Opposition propose a massive cut of £112 million in the budget of the Rural Payments Agency by 2007–08, just when the agency is about to deliver the new single farm payment. How much good will that do for farmers? As the RPA made clear today, it hopes to make the single farm payments in February 2006. Our promise is that that will be done as early as possible in the payment window. Of course, payments depend on a complex IT system, whose delivery timing depends on when the fully detailed information comes from European Commission. There is now massive investment in the streamlined system, and in following years farmers will get their payments at the earliest date within the payment window. The cuts envisaged by the Conservative party—it is not just outsourcing, so let us have none of that nonsense—would wreck the programme that is being designed and delivered in partnership with farming organisations.

The Conservatives want to save £47 million in the Environment Agency, but that would severely hamper its work to support businesses, especially small and medium-sized businesses, in acting against illegal polluters, such as fly-tippers, and pursuing deregulatory measures. Barbara Young, the agency's chief executive, made those points clear yesterday.

The figures keep changing in the drip feed of the James report, but the Conservatives must answer two questions, although the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) failed to do so in response to hon. Members' interventions. First, how can they claim to care about farming and rural areas if they are prepared to slash services, as the James report recommends? Secondly, how have they done their sums? Let us have chapter and verse on how they have worked out their figures. What do they intend to cut, and from where? We know only the total figures, which appear to be ill judged and dangerously threatening to the countryside. Such information is even not detailed on their website, and the hon. Gentleman could not answer those questions when he took interventions. Let us hear from Opposition Front Benchers exactly where the cuts will fall, or they will stand condemned by their silence. Our farmers need to know.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does the Minister intend to deal with the future of the Food Standards Agency under the proposed cuts? The scale of its activities would be halved, which would have a serious consequential effect on public health and almost certainly a knock-on effect on international confidence in the quality of British food.

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The Conservative party is dangerously slack in its approach to not only farming, the rural economy and the environment but the health of the nation.

Let us get the facts straight about the rural economy. It is vital that we do not confuse rural communities with farming communities. Farming remains at the heart of many communities, but it is by no means the dominant economic activity in the countryside, and we must keep that in perspective.

The majority of rural England is thriving. It is true that unemployment has fallen by 24 per cent. in urban areas since 1997, but it has fallen by 26 per cent. in rural areas. Rural communities generally are benefiting from the same economic prosperity as urban communities, with low unemployment and interest rates—the lowest for 40 years—and real growth of nearly 3 per cent. a year since 1997. The rural economy has benefited from our national economic success, not least because businesses of all types increasingly feature in rural as well as urban areas. Employees in our rural areas are more likely to work in sectors other than farming. Some 17 per cent. work in manufacturing, some 15 per cent. work in wholesale and retail, and some 9 per cent. work in hotels and restaurants, while only 7 per cent. work in farming.

Farming is now well placed to respond to the changes that it faces. Through the strategy for sustainable farming and food, the industry, consumers and the Government are working together to help farming to increase its competitiveness and reconnect with the market. I shall return to farming issues in a moment.

Rural services have been enhanced since 1997 due to the Government's concerted action. Let me give a few examples. The number of schools closing in rural areas was running at 30 a year between 1993 and 1997, but that has come down to an average of six a year since 1997. We are supporting more than 2,000 bus services a year through the rural bus subsidy grant. Such support would be slashed under the Conservatives, yet they have the cheek to talk about fewer buses. We are providing £150 million a year to support the rural post office network, so the number of closures has fallen from more than 300 a year to about 100 a year. As we promised, there are now more than 100 primary care one-stop or mobile units providing care to people in rural areas.

We are neither satisfied nor complacent because many rural communities face real challenges and problems. Farmers are not having an easy time—I shall address some of the problems in a moment—but let us debate these real issues on the basis of evidence, rather than myth and misrepresentation, which was all that we heard from the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: The Minister is aware that many of the jobs being created in the countryside are seasonal with a very low cost base. That is what is happening in places such as Exmoor. Does he not understand that we are looking for a long-term commitment and long-term jobs, not seasonal jobs?

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. There are low-paid jobs in urban and rural areas, but the Government's success in delivering broadband access to rural areas is giving a wide range of businesses that previously could operate only in urban areas the opportunity to operate in rural areas. That is happening because there are many intelligent entrepreneurs in rural communities—men and many women who are opening the sort of business that has never before been seen in rural areas. I say to the hon. Gentleman, with great respect, that he has not connected with the type of change that is occurring in our rural areas.

Mr. Hoyle: Is it fair to say that the rural economy has benefited from the minimum wage, without which there would have been a lot of poverty in rural areas? It was the Labour Government who took that brave stance.

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In addition, the working families tax credit has helped people in rural areas. There is a problem of low pay in such areas, but if the Labour Government are removed and a Conservative Government arrive, my God, it will affect the low paid and the unemployed in rural areas, and many now in employment will be unemployed.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Will the Minister address a specific issue affecting livestock producers—the disposal of fallen stock? Livestock producers in my constituency face a difficulty in that only one organisation tendered to dispose of fallen stock under the Government's fallen stock scheme—the Isle of Wight Foxhounds. As I am sure he is aware, that group is likely to have far less income after 19 February and it will therefore be unable to continue to cross-subsidise the disposal of fallen stock. No other organisation is willing to dispose of fallen stock on the Isle of Wight. What reassurance can the right hon. Gentleman give farmers in my constituency on that important matter?

Alun Michael: We are aware of the specific fallen stock issue on the Isle of Wight and we are addressing it. The Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), might have more to say when he winds up the debate.

Mr. Gray: The Minister is enjoying himself at the Dispatch Box. Before he moves on from the minimum wage, will he tell us whether he would abolish the agricultural wages boards, as we propose under the James report?

Alun Michael: Certainly not. We believe that the AWBs continue to support the wages of agricultural workers, and I am sure that all of them will take note of the threat to their income that the hon. Gentleman offers.

Kali Mountford: A year ago in one ward in my area, the lowest wage was £18,000 a year and the highest was £30,000; now, the lowest is £22,000 and the highest is £35,000. Our economy is growing, but we want to be able to plan the local economy. We are working with the local regional development agency, Yorkshire Forward, on a market towns initiative. Are there any plans to give further support to such initiatives, so that rural communities such as mine can have planned development?

Alun Michael: Yes, indeed, there are. Following on from the announcement made in July by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, we are massively increasing the money that we put into RDAs and devolving finances to them, so that they can work with partners in their region and drill down to local areas, particularly rural areas, to support initiatives that we believe will create not only a healthy economy—we already have that in rural areas—but a vibrant one.

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): Earlier, the Minister defended Government spending as though it were a sacred cow, yet in the next few years his Government will spend £1 billion and more on culling cattle that have bovine tuberculosis. Why does he not accept that he will fail Somerset's dairy and cattle farmers in the coming years by not resolving the problem of bovine TB?

Alun Michael: We want to spend less and waste less money on unproductive measures. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will pick up on that point, which comes within his portfolio, in his winding-up speech.

I want to make one point clear for the Opposition, because it is about time they got in touch with reality. They portray people in rural areas as being not only disadvantaged but dissatisfied, yet the facts tell a different story. When we asked rural people whether they were content with services in rural areas, more than 90 per cent. said they were satisfied with their GPs, NHS dentists, opticians and pharmacists; 79 per cent. were satisfied with the quality of education provided locally; 85 per cent. were satisfied with the location of bus stops and train stations; and 85 per cent. were satisfied with the quality of child care offered. We can hardly argue with what the rural public—our customers—tell us. Opposition Members seem to talk to each other. The satisfaction expressed by rural people is the result of 180 Labour MPs doing so well in representing rural and semi-rural communities, or perhaps I should say that that figure is now 181.

Let me outline some of the key steps that the Government are taking to address the issues facing farming and rural communities. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State outlined to the House her vision of sustainable rural communities and a fair deal for rural England when she launched the rural strategy 2004 on 21 July. Sustainable rural communities, and in particular affordable housing, are at the heart of our five-year strategy, because it has been raised with us by Labour Members who represent rural communities. I shall come to housing later.

The rural strategy encompasses all three pillars of sustainable development. First, it is about economic regeneration in rural areas. To help farm and other rural businesses be competitive and diversify, the Government are allocating an extra £2 million this year to improve business advice. We are also increasing the amount of money from DEFRA in the regional development agencies' finances from £46 million to £77 million next year.

Secondly, the strategy is designed to tackle rural social exclusion wherever it occurs and to provide fair access to services and opportunities for rural people. We are pushing more of our money down to the community to help communities have a place to meet, an effective representative body such as a parish council, and access to a community development worker. Thirdly, the strategy is about protecting and enhancing the natural environment. We are creating an integrated agency to address the natural environment, biodiversity and our landscape in a co-ordinated way so as to get maximum social and economic advantage from its work, as well as benefits in terms of conservation and biodiversity.

Whitehall does not always know best, so we are devolving decisions and funding closer to the people—the public, the customer, the community. Last October we launched a series of rural pathfinders across the country to pilot innovative ways of joining up service delivery at the local level, with local authorities taking the lead role. That counts: it matters to people. Yesterday I met representatives of the rural pathfinders from every region of England, and the enthusiasm with which they are responding to the opportunity is palpable.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that Ministers believed that Whitehall knew best in the matter of right to buy? When the Conservatives were in power they forced rural local authorities to sell their council houses: Will the Minister produce some action, rather than words, on the matter by enabling planning authorities in areas such as mine in Cornwall to constrain the amount of housing stock that goes into the second homes market by planning control?

Alun Michael: Indeed, in the planning field we are helping rural housing authorities and those who are concerned to provide housing and to make sure that it is sustainable, not just a house for the short term. I will return to the matter.

I mentioned the enthusiasm about rural pathfinders in every region of England. It is also important to note that we are carrying out a major streamlining of our funding stream, from over 100 separate streams of funding to three broad funding programmes. That will make it simpler for everybody. To test whether the new arrangements are making a difference and to promote best practice, the Government are setting up the New Countryside Agency, whose role will be to assess how much impact Government policy and action are having. It will focus particularly on disadvantage and provide a powerful independent voice for rural people, advising Government, collecting views and experience across the regions and helping us to drive up quality and delivery at the local level.

It is interesting to note some of the issues that the Opposition did not raise. It is important to get the facts about crime in rural areas straight. Crime across the United Kingdom has fallen by 30 per cent. since 1997, and that is one of the Government's biggest achievements. People in rural areas are much less likely to experience burglary and vehicle-related theft, and rural adults are much less likely to suffer from violent crime than their non-rural counterparts.

Furthermore, fear of crime has remained considerably lower in rural areas than it is in urban areas. The British crime survey clearly shows that anxiety and worry about crime is less in rural areas compared with urban and inner-city areas, but we recognise that crime and the fear of crime continue to be a major concern for many people in rural communities. Only yesterday in the Standing Committee on the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill we agreed clause 1, which embeds environmental damage into the work of the local crime and disorder reduction partnerships. The Conservatives are so out of touch that they think that graffiti, litter and fly-tipping are urban problems that do not matter in rural communities. They are wrong.

Mr. Paice: Who said that?

Alun Michael: Has the hon. Gentleman not read the Opposition's reasoned—or rather, unreasoned—amendment last week in which, in opposing the introduction of the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, they said that the Bill focuses predominantly on urban issues while neglecting rural areas: their mistake, not ours.

Paddy Tipping: Clearly, the Opposition have forgotten. I need not remind my right hon. Friend that there were just two contributions from the Conservative Benches, neither of which addressed not only environmental crime but the equally important issue of animal welfare.

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and his was one of the 18 excellent contributions that we heard from Labour Back Benchers. In contrast to the Opposition, which is interested only in slash and burn in public services, the Government recognise the different needs of rural and urban communities. The rural policing fund has therefore been maintained for 2005–06 at £30 million, and I am pleased about that, not just as the Minister with responsibility for rural affairs, but because as a Home Office Minister I commissioned the research that led to that money, which addresses the particular needs of the 31 forces with the most widespread populations.

When listening to rural residents, one theme dominates—the need for affordable housing that will allow their children, and people with a connection to the area, to stay in their community. The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), who intervened on that point, was absolutely right, as are those of my hon. Friends who have raised the matter time and again. The Government have responded to that call through a number of measures. Before Christmas we announced specific measures to help local planning authorities allocate sites in villages for 100 per cent. affordable housing. That complements the rural exception site policy, which will be continued and which allows affordable housing to be built on sites that would otherwise not be available for development.

Through the Housing Corporation's rural programme we are funding sites that would otherwise not be available for development. Our target is 3,500 homes for the two years from 2004–05, but we are on target to exceed that number by producing over 4,000 affordable homes in rural areas.

But providing sites is only part of the story. In 2003 and through the Housing Act 2004, we introduced measures that retain a supply of affordable housing in rural areas by placing restrictions on the right to buy. In many villages where the supply of new social housing is limited, exercising this right has led to a diminished pool of affordable housing, and there are some who have exploited the scheme by selling on quickly to people with no local connections. That addresses precisely the point made by the hon. Member for North Cornwall. Hence, we introduced restrictions on the resale of right to buy homes in the seven national parks, the 37 areas of outstanding natural beauty and the 35 areas designated as rural for this purpose.

In addition, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister recently gave local authorities scope to reduce the council tax discount on second homes from 50 per cent. to a minimum of 10 per cent. Authorities can use this money for affordable housing or for other services in line with local priorities. In Devon, for example, this income is being used to build more affordable housing where it is needed in rural areas. These are real measures helping real people. My own belief is that shared equity is the model that we should support and encourage with as much enthusiasm as possible, because such models of co-operative housing provide the opportunity for people to benefit from affordable housing and to get on the first step of the ladder of ownership, and allows that unit of affordable housing to be recycled to the next family that needs assistance.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: The Minister is aware that North Yorkshire national park made an announcement on the subject a couple of days ago, and Exmoor national park has been examining the issue for some time. If the national parks go down that route, will the Minister look to support their aspiration to keep low-cost housing for local people, and will the Government put a bit of backbone into the policy?

Alun Michael: We will certainly examine the details of the national parks' proposals, and I am delighted that they are engaging with the issue, which, as the hon. Gentleman knows, is an important matter in our national parks, as it is in many other rural communities. The issue is important in the national parks because of the need to limit developments that damage the local environment. It is possible to go too far, and we must examine the detail of the proposals, but I am happy publicly to encourage the engagement of national park authorities with the issue.

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend commend the shared equity scheme introduced by Lovells, the private house developers, in conjunction with Gwerin housing association? I welcomed the first tenants to use that scheme in Monmouth. Does the Minister think that such a model could be applied to rural areas as well as to small towns?

Alun Michael: I note my hon. Friend's point. I am not aware of that specific scheme and would like to hear more about it. It sounds like the sort of scheme that we should encourage.

Turning to farming, the strategy for sustainable farming and food remains our key policy. It is a comprehensive, long-term plan for the future development of the industry. It identifies how we can all work together to help farming to improve its economic performance and individual farmers to access the right training and advice for them, and to improve farming's impact on the environment. It is designed to support the farming industry through the current period of change and leave it well equipped to succeed in the future. The UK farming industry has a major role to play in meeting this country's food requirements, providing an attractive, well-managed countryside and contributing to the rural fabric, and we want a viable and sustainable farming industry that can do that.

The implementation of the strategy is underpinned by our approach to the groundbreaking deal on common agricultural policy reform in June 2003, which committed us to seeking the best and the most sustainable approach to farming not only in England, but in the UK generally. Decoupling—breaking the link between production and subsidies—is the main prize from the CAP reforms, and it will allow the industry to shape its own future. In other words, the industry will depend on its own initiatives rather than on the Government.

The real benefits that farmers can gain is why the new system will be delivered this year, which is the earliest possible date. The reforms and the delivery arrangements, which are based on a flat-rate area system, will help to reconnect farmers to their markets and will be free of many of the bureaucratic rules associated with production-linked subsidies, benefiting not only farmers and consumers but society as a whole.

Overall, the CAP reforms will deliver significant economic benefits to not only farmers, but everyone in the UK. The benefits are estimated at £400 million to £500 million a year at present exchange rates. Payments under the new single payment scheme will depend on meeting a number of environmental, animal health and welfare and food safety standards. Those measures are expected to improve the environmental performance of British agriculture. In addition, we have decided to introduce an additional rate of national modulation in England, which will provide additional funds for agri-environment schemes and, by protecting the countryside and its environment, a more sustainable farming industry.

We have adopted cross-compliance measures, which contain a mixture of common-sense farming practices and support for existing legislation, to bring all farmers up to the same minimum level. In addition to pillar 1 of the CAP, we are putting in £1.7 billion through the England rural development programme over the period 2000–06. Help is being provided on a variety of matters, including diversification, skills training and marketing. That means that we are making available £240 million a year compared with £56 million a year between 1993 and 1999, which is a fourfold increase in support.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): On red tape, which was mentioned by the Opposition spokesman, does not it follow that with one single farm payment there is one single system for applying for forms and one single system for inspecting farms? Is not that better than the 10 or so schemes that we had before?

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend is right—I am certain that that improvement will indeed benefit farmers.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD) rose—

Alun Michael: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, then I must conclude.

Andrew George: The Minister will no doubt have noticed that under the Conservatives' proposals their changes in outsourcing the Rural Payments Agency will, according to the James review, be "funded by a handling charge based on subsidies paid".

Can the Minister reassure farmers who are anxious about late payment? Under the simplified system, if there is a late payment to farmers beyond 1 December this year, will farmers receive payments up-front where possible, and if it is not possible, will they be compensated for their loss of earnings as a result of delayed payment?

Alun Michael: Let me make it clear to the hon. Gentleman that we have said that we will pay as early as practicable within the payment window, which, as he knows, runs through to June of the following year. We want to bring the payments forward to the earliest possible point within the payment window. In the first year, that depends partly on the timing of information that comes from the European Commission. The hon. Gentleman, with his knowledge of the farming industry, knows full well how complex some of the delivery arrangements are. We try to make them as simple as possible for our farmers, but there are complications involved. The benefit will be our undertaking to make payments as early as possible within the payments window, which is not just for next year but for future years. We are in discussion with the industry, the banks and others to try to ensure that the situation is understood, and there is a promise to deliver. Farmers will know where they stand in the course of the coming months, well in advance of the December to June period. It is currently estimated that the payment will be made in February. It will be as early as we can possibly make it within the payment window, not only next year but in each successive year.

Of all the rural issues, I turn finally to one that has been much debated in this House—hunting with dogs. The Countryside Alliance, with Conservative Members following in its footsteps, has consistently misrepresented hunting as a town-versus-country issue, which it is not, and claimed that it shows that we are out of touch, which we are not. What I have said demonstrates the Government's achievements for the countryside. The facts speak for themselves.

Let me set out the main points of what is in truth a minor issue for rural communities. Members of Parliament, having voted 10 times in 10 years for a ban on hunting—

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): The Minister seems to be fixated on hunting. Why is he talking about hunting when the motion does not refer to it, my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) did not mention it and it has not been raised at all during the debate? Why is he so fixated on banging on about it?

Alun Michael: Is the hon. Gentleman now embarrassed by his opposition to the Hunting Bill and his comments during its Second Reading? I turn to this issue particularly because Conservative Members have made a lot of song and dance about its impact on the rural economy. They have banged on about it time and again over many months. Indeed, the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) might like me to quote some of his comments. He said:

"There is no question but that the Bill will result in the deaths of perhaps 30,000, 40,000 or 50,000 dogs as soon as it comes in."

He went on to say:

"The same applies to many horses. They can more easily be reused for hacking, but many lower-grade horses are kept exclusively for hunting."

He also said,

"they are putting 8,000 people out of work."—[Official Report, 15 September 2004; Vol. 424; c. 1365–1368.]

In recent days, we have seen a statement from the Countryside Alliance indicating that we should not expect to see such a removal of dogs. Therefore, there is no threat to the people who are employed in that activity. It is interesting to see how that has disappeared from the agenda of Conservative Members.

Having shot the fox of the hon. Member for North Wiltshire, clearly to his great embarrassment, I want to say that I am pleased that the debate has been on farming and rural communities. The priority is to make the best use of the money that is invested in agriculture to reform farming and give it a sustainable future. The problems will not be solved overnight but we are working on them with the industry, farmers and those who represent rural communities and business in our rural areas.

Farming remains at the heart of many communities, despite being only part of the rural picture. We must balance our priorities for farming, for those who live in rural communities and for the nation. That is the Government's commitment and we will continue to deliver it.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) on using precious time to debate an important subject that will affect many hon. Members. He raised some important issues in his presentation.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman about many matters but I was somewhat disappointed, given the fanfare of publicity with which the Conservative party announced the James review, that he failed to answer a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath). He asked why, if the Conservative party was so concerned about red tape and cost to the industry, overhead No. 63 in the James committee's main proposals about the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs stated that a Conservative Government would deliver the outsourcing of the Rural Payments Agency,

That will clearly be a cost to the industry.

Mr. Paice: Let me make it clear that that does not mean a charge on farmers, as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) implied. [Interruption.] I shall tell the Minister exactly where the money will come from. The outside agency will be paid a percentage of the total payment. At present, as the Minister knows, running the RPA costs 4 per cent. of the total payments. We believe that it can be done for half that amount. That money would go to the outside agency.

Andrew George: I am grateful for that clarification. If the charge is based on the company outsourcing, I am sure that farmers will be relieved. However, the proposal requires clarity. If we find from studying further Conservative announcements that that is genuinely the intention, we will welcome it.

Mr. Kidney: The hon. Gentleman is performing a great service, because we ought to get to the bottom of the matter. I do not believe that the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) has provided a reassurance that we should accept. There would be a saving only because the taxpayer would stop paying for running the RPA. It is neither here nor there whether the total running cost is 4 per cent. or 2 per cent.—a fraction of the amount of subsidies paid. The important question is who will foot the bill. The hon. Members for St. Ives (Andrew George) and for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) discovered that the bill would pass to farmers, who will be flabbergasted by that, because the money would come out of their subsidy. They would get the money net of the payment instead of the total payment that they receive now.

Andrew George: I am worried that the reassurances that the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire gave may unravel. That is why it is vital that the Conservatives make further clarifications and announcements. Perhaps they will try to clarify the issue further when winding up. At least they have taken on board the fact that there will be anxiety in the farming community if they propose such additional charges.

Mr. Paice: I think that the hon. Gentleman accepts what I said earlier: there is no intention that the payment for the outside agency would come from the payments made to farmers. It is simply a question of reducing the totality of the cost of running the Rural Payments Agency, and we would pay the outside agency a percentage of the total, which is exactly how the RPA is funded at present. Farmers will not pay.

Andrew George: The hon. Gentleman says that I accept his earlier explanation. Of course, I do not accept everything that he says, because he earlier claimed that the Liberal Democrats were not in Government. Of course, we are in Government in Scotland, where we are implementing common agricultural policy reform. The Agriculture Minister, Ross Finnie MSP, is highly thought of in the farming community, and his implementation this year of the single farm payment north of the border is going ahead very steadily indeed. So the rather cheap remarks made by the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire earlier were quite misplaced. Given that he is defending himself in this way, I worry that he doth protest too much. Perhaps, later on, we shall find out exactly what the Conservatives are proposing. Farmers will be concerned that their proposals would involve top-slicing the payments due to farmers, and I hope that we shall receive further clarification on that as the debate proceeds.

We could spend time going over the Conservatives' pre-1997 record on farming, but it probably is not worth while doing so now. I have just put down a sheaf of papers containing reminders of BSE and of the fact that we have IACS forms twice as long as those of other European nations because the Conservatives were gold-plating directives in the UK. I hope to keep my contribution to the debate relatively short, because I know that many others wish to speak, and I want to cover issues relating to farming and to DEFRA's management of schemes. I also want to look at the impact of the power of supermarkets on the market—as the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire rightly did—and to follow up some of the Minister's remarks on affordable housing in the countryside. These issues are all important to people living in rural communities and to those involved in farming.

I and others have expressed concern that DEFRA Ministers appear to act as managers, observers and bystanders in regard to what is happening in rural areas, and that whenever we want a clear vision of the Government's rural policy, we often find it out from Lord Haskins in another place. I am not alone in dubbing him the real Secretary of State, the one who is providing leadership and vision for the Department. However, when he comes out with controversial quotes such as he rather undermines the Government's claim to be fighting for all farmers. It is inevitable that farms will get bigger over time, as they always have done, and that farmers will leave the industry; but the fact that that seems to be welcomed by the Government is a matter of concern to those involved in farming. Farmers have been leaving the industry at an astonishing rate, and since Labour came to power, they have been doing so at a higher rate than at any time since the second world war.

"Farms will get bigger, and that's a good thing",

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: The hon. Gentleman is making a valid point. That is certainly happening in Cornwall. People are selling up in London and elsewhere and buying an enormous amount of farmland. This is forcing farmers out because they cannot afford to pay for the land. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Government have not addressed this problem in any way?

Andrew George: I agree that there is such a trend in many parts of the country. Farmers, especially dairy farmers in my part of the country and the hon. Gentleman's part of the country, are leaving in droves. The Government's figures demonstrate that the number of dairy farmers has fallen from 37,300 in 1997 to below 25,000. Approximately a third of all dairy farmers have gone out of business since 1997, which is clearly a catastrophic change to the countryside. In many parts of the country, farmhouses are being sold, and a small piece of privatised green belt, if we want to call it that, is being bought with it, possibly for hobby farming. Often, if not always, a change of culture also happens.

The nature of traditional farming communities is changing. The traditional farming community that I remember, from my boyhood and upbringing in the far west of Cornwall, was one in which farmers were engaged in the local community and in which people could walk the land, irrespective of where local footpaths were. That was an interchange between the local community and farmers because they were very much one and the same. In many rural areas, a lot more private signs are being put up, with a lot more effort to try to redirect footpaths away from areas that have traditionally been walked in the past, as new people come in who do not understand country ways. That is sending shockwaves through many rural communities and causing unnecessary and unwelcome conflict in the countryside. I agree with the hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) on that point.

The Minister rightly raised the issue of CAP reform. This is the biggest and most momentous challenge to rural communities. On balance, the Government made the right decision. Inevitably, we will have to move towards area payments at some stage, and the transitional approach taken by the Government gets the balance pretty much right. The decision taken north of the border, for example, was right for Scotland.

It is important, however, that the CAP and single farm payments be delivered with greater transparency and simplicity. With that greater transparency, and perhaps with freedom of information, I predict that taxpayers and the general public will ask increasingly what benefit they are getting from the payments being made to farmers, given that they will be less complex.

Mr. Gray: The hon. Gentleman has a charming way of being all things to all men, all the time, on almost every subject. A moment ago, he said that Ross Finnie was doing well in Scotland with historic payments, and now he says that the approach in England is also going well. Can I ask him one quick question? In the unlikely event that he were the Secretary of State—let us imagine that for a moment, although I grant that it is not very likely—what would a Liberal Government have done?

Andrew George: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman needs to go on a learning curve: devolution results inevitably in differing policy in different places. The decision taken for Scotland was therefore right for the Scottish situation and the Scottish farming industry. He asks about what I would do were I Secretary of State—I think that he and I have about the same chance of becoming Secretary of State, and our chances are possibly greater than the Conservatives' chances, given their performance in the polls. I have already told the House that I think that the Government got the balance pretty much right. Certainly, over a seven to 10-year period, we need to move towards area payments. Clearly, in a 10 to 15-year period, it would be absurd and bizarre to find ourselves in a situation in which farmers were being paid on the basis of what they were doing 10 or 15 years previously, and they could be doing anything at that stage. There must be a transitional period. We must move in that direction and, inevitably, Scotland and Wales will have to do the same—but at their own pace, in their own way and on the basis that they make decisions at a time that suits them, rather than their being instructed by our Parliament.

I want to remind the Minister of issues that have undermined the confidence with which the farming community views the Department. There is concern, which I think he has picked up, about the date when farmers will receive their payments under the single payments system. Confidence is not encouraged by the way in which the Government handled the release of Jim Dring's report on Burnside farm in Northumberland at the beginning of the foot and mouth epidemic in February 2001, or the way in which they handled video evidence that arrived in the public domain towards the end of last year—by the lack of knowledge of that evidence, and the fact that it was not involved in the various foot and mouth inquiries that the Government commissioned.

Nor is the industry encouraged by the way in which the Government handled the regulations replacing the Animal By-Products Order 1999, failing to lay them before the House in 2003. They promised to implement a fallen-stock collection scheme in January 2004. Following further announcements, we were eventually presented with a scheme that is only just getting off the ground now, some 18 months after it was required to start. That too does not help.

I said that I would say something about the power of the supermarkets. As the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire pointed out, the supermarkets can dictate market conditions to farmers. Their actions, and those of their chief executives and buyers, are of course entirely rational: if they do not put pressure on their suppliers and their competitors do, they will be at a disadvantage. We need a code of practice that distinguishes clearly between appropriate use of power and inappropriate abuse of power in the market.

The Government have not paid proper attention to that, although they have instituted inquiries. Since the first inquiry conducted by the Competition Commission in 2000, there have been others conducted by both the commission and the Office of Fair Trading. We are still awaiting the publication of the OFT's audit of the food supply chain, undertaken since the OFT reported on the operation of the supermarket code in February last year. The farming industry, however, wants action rather than further inquiries and reports. It wants a system with real teeth to ensure that farmers have a say, and can have an impact throughout the food chain.

According to yesterday's Tesco report, over the Christmas period Tesco had 29 per cent. of the grocery market. When the OFT examined the role of convenience stores last year, it concluded that if there is a discrete market in convenience stores there will be a discrete market in supermarkets as well. That gives Tesco about 40 per cent. of the supermarket sector—a much larger proportion of the market than was held by Milk Marque in 1999, a year before the Government decided to abolish it. At that stage, so far as we could tell, Milk Marque had some 29 per cent. of the market.

Mr. Hoyle: There is clearly great concern within the farming industry about the way in which supermarkets react, and the hon. Gentleman is right: the problem is that when one supermarket drives the price down, its competitors have to continue to do so. What does he believe is the answer to ensuring fair play and a fair price at the gate for farmers, so that they can have a livelihood and make a profit? At the moment, that is not happening.

Andrew George: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman and we Liberal Democrats would deal with the problem by, for example, strengthening the code. Far too much emphasis is placed on the use of rather grey terminology, as evidenced in appearance of the word "reasonable" throughout the document. That is very good for lawyers and the courts, but the use of much more measurable language would help those using the system.

The OFT's report of last February made it clear that farmers, farmers' co-operatives and suppliers are not using the code for fear of retaliation. We need a food trade inspector—operating within the OFT—to undertake in various sectors of the food supply chain the kind of proactive inquiries that the OFT currently undertakes, in order to identify and investigate malpractice, perhaps on the basis of information provided by the industry.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I commend to the hon. Gentleman the supermarket Waitrose, which has direct contracts with British dairy farmers and beef producers—indeed, it makes great play of such contracts—so that its sources can be fully validated. If other supermarkets were to follow the same line, the British agricultural sector would do much better.

Andrew George: That is an interesting point. I have heard from all the main supermarkets and all claim that they are treating British farmers fairly. I do not mind the hon. Gentleman's using his intervention as a commercial for a particular grocer, and it is true that Waitrose has a good name in many circles in British farming. Even so, this is a major issue across the piece, and it needs to be tackled.

Mr. Edwards: I have been following the hon. Gentleman's argument carefully and I commend the efforts that he and others have made to strengthen the supermarket code of conduct. Has he seen the recent report in the Farmers Guardian suggesting that the National Farmers Union, Farmers For Action and supermarkets such as Tesco are collaborating in order to get a 3p increase in the price of milk, half of which could be distributed to the producers and half to the processors? Does he commend such an initiative?

Andrew George: I certainly do. The last time Farmers For Action protested and erected blockades outside dairies and supermarkets, it achieved a 2p increase in the price given by Asda, at least, but as the hon. Gentleman well knows, it is questionable whether that benefit reached the farmers themselves. Moreover, one cannot simply establish and peg farm gate prices on the basis of protesting every six months or so; we have to have a system that is robust in the long term. That said, I entirely agree that the current farm gate price for milk is unsustainable for the majority of dairy farmers. Action is required to ensure that they are given fair protection in the market, which does not happen at the moment.

I do not want to take up too much of Members' time, but before I finish I want to emphasise a couple of points about housing. I was concerned on behalf of many people living in rural areas following the publication last year of the Kate Barker review. It pointed out that, as the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire argued, large swathes of the countryside could be swamped by many thousands of houses, the prices of which would be well out of the reach of people on rural incomes, and that there is a consequent need for affordable housing in such areas. However, such an observation does not help people living in the countryside. As long as green land in the countryside has a hope value, people will not put their land forward for affordable housing. The only way to provide affordable housing in the countryside is to have strict control on planning and development. I know that that sounds counterintuitive, but that is the only way to deliver the exception—land that is strictly for affordable housing. Those sites will not be made available if we take a flexible, laissez-faire approach that allows any sort of development. People will not make land available for affordable housing in the countryside because they would inevitably receive a fraction of the value that they would otherwise receive for an unfettered permission to develop.

The Minister raised the issue of, and responded to concerns about, second homes. That issue certainly affects my constituency and many others. I campaigned for many years for the removal of the 50 per cent. council tax discount for second homes, introduced by the Conservatives, which meant that many millions of pounds was spent subsidising the wealthy when many thousands of rural folk on low incomes could not even afford a first home. I am grateful that the Government have mostly removed that unfairness by allowing local authorities to charge 90 per cent. of the tax for second homes. In my constituency, we have recently cut the ribbon on a new scheme—as the Minister said—which was entirely funded by the money raised by the additional charge on second homes.

Is the Minister aware, however, that in April next year his colleagues in the Treasury will introduce, through the self-invested personal pension, a system that will permit those with personal pensions to invest that money in second homes? I received some reassurance after a debate last year that that would not happen, but all the financial press is now promoting the scheme and saying that the tax advantages of the scheme could be used for the purchase of second homes. Many people in areas with large numbers of second homes will be very concerned by the potential impact of that scheme, and I hope that the Minister will consider it further.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage) (Lab): This is my maiden speech as the first Labour Member of Parliament for Wantage. I am delighted to make it on a subject that is important in my constituency—farming and rural affairs. It is agreeable, I must say, to be sitting in my old place on these Benches.

I am just old enough to remember the respect and affection in the farming community for Tom Williams, the agriculture Minister in the post-war Attlee Government and the architect of the deficiency payments system, by which farming in Britain was supported until 1973. As the European common agricultural policy evolves away from the market intervention methods of the classical CAP towards the same sort of direct payments system adopted by Tom Williams, I observe that British farmers have nothing to fear and much to hope for from a Labour Government.

I first learned to understand the importance and value of farming in British life when I served as a Member of the European Parliament between 1979 and 1984. Ever since those days, I have had regular meetings every few months with local farmers. Indeed, I had such a meeting only last Friday night. I developed a custom of writing a detailed letter to the Minister after each of those meetings, reporting on them and posing the questions that had been raised. I am glad to say that I have always had full and helpful replies to those letters from Ministers in both Conservative and Labour Governments, and I thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for his contribution to that.

In a fit of over-excitement in the mid-1980s, I even wrote a pamphlet with the dramatic title, "From Boom to Bust? The Implications of CAP Reform for British Farming." As so often in politics, the reality turned out to be less dramatic. The argument that I want to make today is that while much has changed in the 25 years in which I have been interested in the polities of the rural economy much has also remained the same. There is strikingly little correlation between changes of Government and the trends, both positive and negative, in the rural economy.

For instance, no one involved in farming would deny that the biggest single factor in its changing fortunes is the exchange rate between the pound and the euro or, before its introduction, the ecu. That has not been mentioned in our debate, but a farmer once told me—correctly, I think—that it is always 60 per cent. of the problem. There is no doubt that British farming would benefit from stabilising that critical exchange rate by joining the euro. Perhaps I may be allowed in passing to make the party political point that the Labour party wants Britain to join the euro, while on this issue, as on so many others, I am afraid, the Conservatives have settled definitively into the politics of "Neverland". The fluctuating pound-euro rate is a critical factor that has continued to operate across the divide represented by the change of Government in 1997.

More positively, another factor of continuity is the United Kingdom's broad approach to reform of the common agricultural policy and to the wider issues of agricultural trade in the Doha round. Governments of both parties have pursued essentially the same policy of "decoupling" farm supports from production, ending export subsidies and promoting trade liberalisation.

I have always supported those policies, and I have always found that my farming constituents understood and supported the principles involved, although not necessarily the details of implementation. Both parties in government have shown a lively awareness of the special problem of British farming in the European setting—our relatively large farm-size structure. Both have sought tenaciously, as far as possible, to resist CAP reforms that are biased against the interests of larger producers.

One of the biggest changes in the rural economy since I first became involved in the late 1970s is the relative decline in farming's contribution to the total economy, which has gone down from about 3 per cent. in 1973 to 0.8 per cent. today. Again, that relative decline has continued across the divide of 1997. That is also true of efforts by Governments of both parties to promote the diversification of the rural economy, in which my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) took a particular and welcome interest when he was Minister for Employment. One of the results of the study that he carried out on the Government's behalf was the important market towns initiative. To be party political again for a moment, I wonder how many of these efforts to support rural diversification would survive a Conservative Government planning a £35 billion cut in public expenditure?

Beneath those broad continuities of policy between Governments over time there is, of course, a host of current issues that come and go. For instance, at my constituency meeting with farmers last Friday I was asked to raise four issues—farm waste disposal and the local operation of the national fallen stock scheme; the threat of bovine tuberculosis; the "Discovering Lost Ways" project, which has not been mentioned yet in our debate; and the increasing burden of regulation. I shall write to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality in detail about those issues, but I hope that the Under-Secretary will say something about them in his winding-up speech. In particular, would he comment on the fact, relayed to me last Friday, that there has been no bidder for work in my area under the national fallen stock scheme? Could he also say something about how the Government intend to grasp the nettle of bovine tuberculosis and prevent it from spreading into Oxfordshire?

Before I conclude, let me briefly address two of those current issues. There is genuine concern in the local farming community about the possible negative implications of the "Discovering Lost Ways" project. We are all familiar with the way in which existing rights of way can be abused. Indeed, I take this opportunity publicly to thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for his active engagement with the problems of abuse, by 4x4 vehicles and motor cyclists, of the great, historic Ridgeway, which runs through my constituency. I suggest that the Government go easy on discovering lost ways, at least until the new regime under the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000 settles down properly.

The second point is about regulation. We should remember the background. The most important events in the recent history of British farming were the emergence of BSE, followed by the foot and mouth disaster. I note in passing that in both crises the Government of the day, Conservative and then Labour, followed closely the advice given by representatives of the farming industry. Indeed, some would say that they followed that advice too closely. I have told farmers in my constituency frankly, and I say it again, that after two such disasters on their watch—so to speak—it was inevitable that farming in Britain would be subject to a barrage of regulation, both from Brussels and from Whitehall. Equally, there is no doubt, as I am sure my right hon. Friend will accept, that some of that regulation is ill thought out, that sometimes there are inconsistencies between different elements of it, and that there are all sorts of glitches in its implementation, even including, sometimes, the coming into force of schemes before the details of how to comply with them has been vouchsafed.

The Government are currently carrying out a review, aiming for a strategy for better regulation of agriculture to be published in November. I shall do what I can from these Benches to encourage Ministers to take that issue seriously, as it is currently one of the biggest bugbears in the rural community.

At the beginning of my speech, I referred to Tom Williams and the way in which the post-war Labour Government won friends in the rural community. My speech has, I think, amply shown that on the big questions of policy those with a stake in the rural economy have much for which to thank the present Government and much to hope for from them. However, as I have acquired a perhaps undeserved reputation for speaking my mind, I say to the Minister in conclusion—I am sorry to end on this note—that some of that heritage of rural good will has been forfeited by the hunting ban. Of course, it was a free-vote issue, and support for the ban and opposition to it has always been on a cross-party basis. I attended a meet of the Old Berkshire hunt at Goosey on Saturday morning where I found admiring recognition of the contributions of my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) and of Bernard Donoughue and Ann Mallalieu in another place.

The story has not yet reached its denouement. The experience of Scotland has shown that it is possible for lawful riding to hounds to continue even after a ban on hunting with dogs. I am pleased that the Government are taking time for the matter to be addressed by the courts, and I note that all sorts of detail about the implementation of the policy remain to be resolved. I believe that somehow a way can be found for the honourable traditions of the countryside to be preserved, and I look forward to making whatever contribution I can from these Benches to that worthy purpose.

The fact is that the Labour party, too, has a honourable place in the annals of the countryside, which the Government, with their wide-ranging policies for the rural economy as a whole, are doing well to maintain.

6.3 pm

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) for at least one thing in his speech—the support of hunting. It is a pleasure to hear someone on the Labour Benches putting forward a sensible view on that sport. I agree with him about one other thing. He mentioned Tom Williams, a formidable Labour agriculture Minister.

[Mr. Peter Atkinson]

Mr. Williams was also a staunch defender of hunting and for many years resisted attempts by Labour party members to ban it. For such small mercies, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we are grateful.

The last debate in the House in Government time on the serious issues of agriculture and farming was on 12 December 2002. It continues to be a matter of regret that dealing with something of enormous importance to this country is constantly sidelined by the Government and has to be debated in the House in short Opposition and Adjournment debates. It is wrong that the whole practice of holding a substantial debate on agriculture has been abandoned by the Government. For me and, I think, for the farming community, that reflects the Government's view of agriculture.

My hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) quoted DEFRA officials saying at the royal show that agriculture was neither necessary nor desirable for this country. Those comments underline a great deal of the thinking that exists in government about the problems that face agriculture.

We have experienced one of the most dramatic changes in agriculture since the Agriculture Act 1947, and we are debating that change and all that flows from it not in a proper full-scale debate, but in a short Opposition day debate. The introduction of the single farm payment has been marked by chaos. Today is 19 January—a significant date in the life of my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow)—and we are well into the new year, but farmers still do not know exactly what they should do. For example, livestock farmers in my constituency in Northumberland are still awaiting a host of details about their cost-compliance arrangements, which are fundamental to some of the decisions that they must make.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I do not know how many farmers in my constituency or in the vale of Aylesbury as a whole have their birthdays today, but I can only say that I am intimately conscious of the fact that, such is the self-preservation of my hon. Friend, many people might reasonably conclude that I am 20 years older than he is.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sure that there is general rejoicing at the birthday of the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) and for the fact that his intervention today was rather shorter than the one yesterday.

Mr. Atkinson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister looks puzzled. It is a rather private joke, but we will enlighten him with a note later.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): I hope the Minister will be able to enlighten us. Fallen stock has been mentioned, and I am curious to find out what would happen to a sheep with an ear tag that fell into a river and was washed a long way downstream. Would the responsibility for dealing with that dead animal lie with the Environment Agency, or would it seek to trace the owner using the ear tag and get him to pay for the incineration of the dead animal?

Mr. Atkinson: That is a good question. I hope that the Minister can answer it—I certainly cannot—and it shows one of the confusions that exist.

Returning to the serious subject of livestock farmers in the uplands, we think that, according to the cost-compliance regulations, the use of round cattle feeders will not be allowed because of the danger of the excessive poaching of the ground around them. If those things are not allowed under the cost-compliance regulations, the cattle will have to go inside much earlier in the season, which will have a profound effect on the economy of those beef-rearing farms. Clearly, the farmers will have to feed their cattle inside much more intensively as a result. That is one example of why it is important that farmers know the answers as quickly as possible.

The DEFRA roadshow, which will be launched any day now, will not reach the north country until the end of March. It first arrives at Carlisle on 17 March, which is St. Patrick's day—far too late for farmers to know exactly what to do. The beef sector will continue to struggle until farmers are clear about how they can develop their herds, and to do so, they need to know the details of how the cost-compliance schemes will work.

We have touched on the dairy industry. Where I live in north-east England, we are now down to a handful of dairy herds. Most of the farmers with dairy herds have either given up and gone away or turned to other things. That is amazing in this country. One thing that God gave this country was the ability to grow grass. We are located on the west of Europe; we have a brilliant climate for dairy farming, yet we face a £700 million deficit in the balance of payments on dairy products. A serious aspect of the problem is the fact that a substantial number of the new modern products that consumers want—such things as yoghurts—are produced abroad and imported into the UK, which leaves our farmers to supply the liquid milk and cheese markets. That is nonsense because we will not be able to encourage the food processors and manufacturers that create such new products to come to this country unless we have a proper supply of milk, and we will not have a proper supply of milk if more dairy farmers simply go out of business.

The Government seem unwilling to address the crucial problem of how to make smaller dairies more economic. We need to bring the profitability of those dairies up to that of the biggest, but that will not be encouraged while dairy farmers are battered from head to foot by supermarket competition, which is endlessly driving down the price of milk to such an extent that most dairy farmers would be losing money if they properly factored their labour costs into the equation.

Bovine tuberculosis is another major crisis facing the dairy industry. The Irish have been studying the effect of badgers on bovine TB since about 1997 and have recently reported. I am sure that the Minister is aware that in areas in which there was a substantial cull of badgers, the number of herds reporting TB reactor cattle dropped dramatically. There might well be criticisms of the methodology of the Irish survey, but it is the best evidence that we currently have to suggest that bovine

TB can be controlled, albeit only with a programme of culling infected badgers. The Government stand accused of considerable complacency on the matter.

I shall be brief because I know that other hon. Members wish to speak. The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality seemed to dismiss agriculture as a declining and unimportant aspect of rural life. Of course it has been overtaken by tourism and commuter jobs, but agriculture and farming still underpin the essence of rural life. The Government have a duty to maintain an important industry for the benefit of the countryside and the people who live in it.

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth) (Lab): It is a pleasure to speak in the debate and I am especially pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson). I welcome him to these Benches and commend him on his courage for doing what many people in this country have done, especially in areas such as mine—realising that the Conservative party that they supported in the past does not represent the values that they think it should and changing the habit of a lifetime by coming over to the Labour party. My hon. Friend is welcome to speak to farmers and others in my constituency because his thoughtful contribution would be well acknowledged.

I do not agree with my hon. Friend's view on hunting. I represent a rural constituency in which there has been a tradition of hunting, but hunting is a fundamentally moral issue. I think that it is morally wrong to hunt with dogs for the purpose of sport, and remain of that view despite the fact that I fully acknowledge the need to remove foxes that are a threat to livestock and appreciate the contribution that the hunting community has made on fallen stock—that is one of the great challenges that remains.

My constituency of Monmouth is very rural. It was badly hit by the foot and mouth outbreak a few years ago, but there has since been a notable improvement in morale. Livestock prices in the beef and sheep sectors have increased, but there is no doubt that there is a continuing crisis in the dairy sector. The Usk valley used to be rich in dairy farms, but the number has diminished considerably. I commend the efforts of those who are trying to get a better price for milk producers. The Welsh Affairs Committee undertook an inquiry on prices in the livestock sector a few years ago and one of its recommendations led to the introduction of a code of practice. The code needs strengthening, however, so I commend all those who are doing their best to achieve that.

I recently met some tenant farmers in my constituency who told me that the price of raw milk is still only about 17 or 18p. They cannot make any profit from that. As tenant farmers, they face other difficulties, not least that of finding housing when they retire. Traditionally, they would have sold their stock when they ceased to trade in order to buy themselves a country residence, but that has become virtually impossible because of the price of housing in rural areas. Schemes such as shared equity schemes, which were mentioned earlier, should be encouraged. After the Housing Act 1919, clusters of council housing were developed throughout the countryside. Sadly, much of that has been sold as a result of right to buy. I was not fundamentally opposed to the policy, but I was against the failure to replenish social housing using the receipts from the scheme.

I come to the sale of woodland, an issue that has particularly concerned me recently. I commend Members on both sides of the House who have recognised the threat of the subdivision and sale of agricultural land. The hon. Members for Wealden (Charles Hendry) and for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) have taken up the matter. In my constituency it is the sale and subdivision not of agricultural land, but of woodland that is causing concern. As a result of the initiatives taken by the Government in England and now in Wales, local authorities have been given guidance to inform them of the scope that they have in planning regulations to introduce what are called article 4 directives, and thus ensure that they can override permitted development rights where there is a threat of the sale of woodland.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House will, as they travel through their constituencies and elsewhere in the land, have seen signs saying "Woodland for sale". I urge them to look at the website of the company selling the land so that they can see what might happen if such woodland was subdivided into small plots and sold to people who are led to believe that they can use the land for bonfire parties, parking their caravans and undertaking other activities that would not normally be acceptable in a rural area, and certainly not in an area of outstanding natural beauty such the Wye valley in my constituency.

My constituency has suffered as a result of the crisis in farming in the past 10 years. There was a time when I was summoned to angry meetings of farmers. I have not seen such meetings in recent years—I think that morale in the farming community has risen. I notice that a recent Farmers Guardian reported a new year and a new era of optimism, saying that there is a general feeling of optimism for the coming year throughout the industry, and that although accepting the introduction of CAP reforms on 1 January will represent the biggest challenge facing the industry for years, many look on it as a great era of opportunity. That is a more optimistic outlook for farming than is contained in the Opposition motion, which is particularly depressing and pessimistic.

The farmers in my constituency want to see new investment. I hope that we will get a new livestock market in or around Abergavenny in my constituency. That would be an important boost to the industry's infrastructure in Monmouthshire, in neighbouring areas of Wales and over the English border. Such an investment would be very welcome and I hope that the decision to invest in such a facility will be taken at the earliest opportunity.

I say to my hon. Friend the Minister that many of us on these Benches represent rural constituencies. We may take a certain moral view on hunting, but fundamentally we want to do our very best to help the farming communities in our constituencies.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards), who is one of the few sincere Labour Members who really understand farming.

[Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown]

I was particularly impressed by the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice). He is one of the most knowledgeable people in the House on agriculture and he made some telling points, not least of which was when he, spurred on by my intervention, criticised the overly complicated hybrid system on single farm payments that the Government are introducing. I have a table here showing that the UK is the only country introducing such a complicated system—it is even more complicated than those of Luxembourg and Sweden.

We have different systems for England, for Scotland, for Northern Ireland and for Wales. Although I concede some regional differences, that strikes me as unnecessary complication from a single Brussels directive. To introduce such complexity at a time when the way in which the Rural Payments Agency works is being reformed seems like a recipe for chaos in the agricultural industry.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: Because Scotland has adopted a different system from England, farmers in Northumberland on the border will be at a disadvantage. Initially, beef farmers in Scotland will get bigger payments and will therefore be able to pay more for pedigree cattle.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I entirely concur with my hon. Friend's point. He has great knowledge of agriculture, and I understand the difficulties he faces living on a border between two different systems. My hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire held up the number of leaflets involved in this overcomplicated system. Just imagine what French farmers would do if they received so many leaflets.

In an intervention, I mentioned the balance of payments deficit in the dairy industry. The problem is that we export the cheap dairy products—milk and milk powder—and import the expensive, value-added products such as butter, yoghurt and, in particular, cheese. That is a tragedy because we should be producing those value-added products in this country, instead of which we have a £700 million balance of payments deficit in that sector contributing to this country's £33.6 billion overall balance of payments deficit. Agriculture should not be adding to that problem.

On 1 January, in a move that we broadly welcomed, the Government abolished various subsidies to the beef industry, including the over-30-months scheme subsidy. The problem is that £300 a beast in subsidy is to be taken away. When we consider that a farmer has to get £720 a beast to make a profit, we begin to see the distortion affecting the market. I am not sure how that will settle down.

I want to discuss how the Government have allowed food processing to move out of this country. Almost no pig slaughtering is left in this country because the industry has moved to Holland. A big dairy co-operative was formed in Holland recently, at a time when the Government have weakened our co-operative efforts by weakening Milk Marque's ability to maintain a broad presence in the dairy sector.

I urge the Government to support the British sugar beet industry. We produce only 50 per cent. of the sugar that we consume, so there is no case for a disproportionate cut in European Community support for our sugar beet industry.

I also urge the Government strongly to support the biofuels initiative. The 20p per litre reduction in duty is welcome, but the present position is crazy: our wheat is sent across the channel to be processed into biofuel, which is then brought back to this country. We should be helping the biofuels industry and the jobs that it can create in this country. If Wessex Biofuels could get its useful initiative off the ground, it could use 375,000 tonnes of wheat.

In the context of sustainability, we should examine the supermarkets' actions carefully. I know that the Under-Secretary is very keen on sustainability. Tesco's biofuel is produced in part using palm oil derived from trees cut down in the rain forest. It would be far more sensible to have a home-bred biofuels industry than to rely on imported products.

The Government talk about the rural economy in their amendment, but in the past seven years I have seen in my constituency, which is highly rural, the closure of several post offices. Two Crown post offices closed only the other day, and a third, in Wotton-under-Edge, is now threatened with closure. They talk in glowing terms about their rural bus subsidy grant, but although they give £300 million to all the rural areas of England and Wales, they give a £1 billion subsidy for buses in London. Where is the fairness in that?

The Minister made a great fanfare about rural housing, but the fact is that the Government are building only half the number of affordable housing units that the Conservatives were building when they left office in 1997. They have no record to crow about there. Under a Labour Government, we have the highest number of homeless people that this country has ever seen, so there is nothing to crow about there either.

Far from farmers' morale being high, as has been asserted, they are being bogged down with unnecessary paperwork from the Government. They cannot see a sustainable future. The Government need to be clear about what they want farmers to do. Farmers ask merely to make a profitable livelihood, not to be bogged down in overcomplicated paperwork.

I am grateful to be called to speak in the debate. It is useful to be able to discuss the problems of rural areas. In my constituency morale is not high, it is sinking.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), and it is a pleasure to follow my new hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), who spoke earlier in the debate.

In so far as we pose in the debate the question, "Is there a future for UK farming?", I sincerely hope that the House will unite and answer that there is indisputably a future for British farming. I hope that we will work together to establish what still needs to be done to ensure that our farmers feel secure. If hon. Members will forgive me, I shall deal only with farming in my short contribution.

I begin with the CAP reform agreement last June. Surely the Conservatives accept that although in government they talked a good game on CAP reform, it was a Labour Government who secured an historic agreement that enables us to help farmers. The most important part of the agreement is the decoupling, at last, of the subsidy—the public payments to farmers—from production. The distortion of prices arising from that has caused many of the problems in farming in this country and around the world.

Now that decoupling has been achieved, we can press on with the recommendations of the Curry commission for reconnecting farming businesses with their markets. That is the important job for us to do. It will be a worrying time for farmers, having that prop taken away from them and having to focus on their markets. Our job in Parliament is to reassure them through the changes and make sure that they get to those markets. No more will there be butter mountains and wine lakes at public expense in the European Union.

In the agreement, the Governments of the member states had a choice of start dates. We chose the first possible date—1 January 2005. That is an indication of our determination to do the best for our farmers. Of course, implementation is different in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, but that is the beauty of devolution. We should be glad of it, not disappointed.

The hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) asked what taxpayers would get for their public subsidy. It is an excellent question, which now has an excellent answer. First, with single farm payments there will be cross-compliance, leading to some highly desirable public goods such as land management and the maintenance of rights of way, which are benefits to all taxpayers. With modulation and an enhanced stewardship scheme—the entry level and the higher level—we will be able to achieve much more in terms of biodiversity. I predict that growing attention will be paid to land management and flood defences. In future, conditions will be attached to stewardship schemes so that farmers can help the rest of us to avert floods such as those at Boscastle and Carlisle through the way that they manage their land upstream, so to speak.

I thank the officials at DEFRA who, at the end of last year, held a technical briefing for Members. I also praise DEFRA Ministers for that growing practice of the new Department. That briefing was the third that I have attended. In the past there were briefings on the control of illegal meat imports and on what the Government were doing about bovine TB. At the third briefing, Members were able to pursue in detail their questions about the new scheme for single payments, which I found extremely helpful.

Common agricultural policy reform did not harm the growing diversification of energy crops. In my constituency there is a very large biocrops scheme, which benefited in the past from grants from DEFRA and the Department of Trade and Industry, and will continue to benefit from payments under the single farm scheme and the set-aside scheme, as a result of the agreement. All those are benefits.

I want to say a word about how what we do for our farmers affects the rest of the world. At the moment, we are all paying a lot of attention to the help that rich countries can give to poor countries. Everybody knows about cancelling debt and giving aid, and most people are now convinced that trade is the best way to help in terms of liberalising access to markets for producers in poor countries, and agriculture forms an important market for them. However, as we learned with the EU's announcement of the "Everything but Arms" initiative, if such measures are rushed they cause great dislocation and harm to farming inside the EU. Sugar beet was a good example of jumping in and having to rescue the situation afterwards—and, as we heard from interventions during the opening speech today, it has not yet been rescued.

The sugar beet industry is keen on diversification, having seen what is coming, and bioethanol is an important by-product in which it is interested. As has rightly been said, the reduction in duty is helpful, but on its own it is not enough, and I support that industry and its calls for capital allowances and some kind of renewables obligations specific to the industry that will be helpful.

Another example of the effects on world trade of decisions taken inside the EU is provided by the egg industry, which yesterday hosted a reception on the welfare standards being set inside the EU and their effect on future imports from countries outside the EU that do not meet those higher welfare standards. It is very concerned about becoming more and more uncompetitive against people who obtain ever greater access to our markets. That is an important issue that it wants us to take into account. It is important for us in this House and in the EU to balance welfare issues with competitiveness issues for our farmers.

Just to repeat the point that I made in an intervention earlier with regard to the challenges about red tape, I accept that DEFRA's rule strategy is a great attempt to reduce red tape at every level, with more than 100 funding streams reduced to three, but basically the agreement that we have reached in the EU about the single payment scheme reduces 10 previous schemes to one, with one single system for application and one single system for inspection. If we can link that to what we are trying to achieve in Britain in terms of the whole farm approach to holding farms to account for the public subsidy that they receive, we will do a good job for farmers.

6.32 pm

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): Is the Minister aware that the National Bee Unit is under threat? Does he realise that the bee unit is about to lose 20 per cent. of its income. Its funding comes from the Government and the loss of 20 per cent. will make a massive difference to it.

There are two types of bee inspectors—a regional bee inspector, whose job it is to look after the south-west, the north-east, or wherever—

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The big bee.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: He is the big bee, as my hon. Friend points out. The second type is the seasonal bee inspector, whose job it is to go round all the hives. At the moment the bees are dormant and doing nothing other than hibernating, I hope, although it is warm enough for them to go out. He is responsible for checking the bees and their quality in that period. The noble Lord Haskins has not got this seriously wrong.

The Minister will probably not be aware that a 20 per cent. cut in the income of the bee unit means that half the inspectors will go. Their number cannot be sustained. What does that mean for the bees? The bee inspector's job is threefold—first, to check swarm purity; secondly, to ensure that the quality of the hives is what it should be; and, thirdly, to check for bugs in the hives.

It may not come as any great surprise to Conservative Members that most of the diseases that we try to combat come from Europe, which is where the inspectors spend most of their time. But the Minister should be aware that the crying shame, or the disgrace, is that the Government put in £125,000, with the rest of the funding coming from Europe. The importance of the bee in agriculture, horticulture and just about every other culture, cannot be underestimated. Surely the Government should be championing good quality, healthy bees. The problem is petty-minded, stupid bureaucracy. What is the point of cutting money from a unit that safeguards something that is so important to agriculture?

The Government probably do not know that bees bring £120 million a year into agricultural industries through not only honey and beeswax, which is used for all kinds of different things, but importing and exporting different swarms. I have received a letter from a constituent, Rev. Ivan Selman, about that matter. He makes the point that the private benefit to beekeepers is estimated to be only £11.3 million and that many hobby beekeepers make little or no profit. Surely this is the crux of the matter: the people who produce honey do so because they want to and because they enjoy doing it; they do not do it because they make a fortune. We cannot expect to have healthy animals in this country if we do not have inspectors, and the Government, who have banged on about inspectors, must address the matter urgently.

Given the short time that remains, I shall turn to Exmoor national park. The Minister knows the effect of the ban on hunting on Exmoor. The ban will make a difference, it has made a difference and it needs to be addressed. This Friday, my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Flook), the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey) and I will have our quarterly meeting with the national park, at which we will discuss the problems that the park will face due to the hunting ban.

The Minister knows Exmoor national park's concerns, and I hope that he will manage to address some of them. They have been raised by not only hon. Members but members of the national park, the county councils, the district councils and the parish councils. The ban will cost up to £9 million across the park, which is a lot for an area such as ours, and we cannot sustain that loss. The Government intimated that they would examine the introduction of some form of financial inducement, and I wonder whether the Minister is prepared to expand on that point.

Somerset gets very little objective 2 funding: Cornwall receives objective 1 funding; Devon receives objective 2 funding; and Somerset receives a little bit of objective 2 funding. One of the problems in rural areas is that we cannot match such funding. The Minister is aware of that point, which we have discussed before, but we have not resolved how rural areas can raise match funding. The Government have been asked the question time and again, but we are still waiting for answers. The Government have not listened, because we have the same problems as Cornwall—in most cases, incomes are lower in Somerset than in Cornwall because of the housing crisis in rural areas, which many hon. Members have already eloquently discussed.

British Telecom is removing phone boxes, which it claims are not being used, from rural areas. Mobile phones do not work in many parts of Exmoor because one cannot get a signal, which is partly due to planning restrictions, but mainly due to the type of ground. The Minister says that he is looking to put money and help into rural areas. What is the point of rolling out broadband if homeowners in such locations cannot make phone calls? We prevailed on BT to try to reverse that decision, and I know that the Government have been involved, but the removals are still occurring. We are losing phone boxes across Exmoor and the Somerset Levels as we speak. Will the Minister consider intervening to try to persuade BT, which I accept is a private company, to stop that practice so that we can get back communication in our local areas?

Finally, may I draw the Minister's attention to the piece in this week's Farmers Weekly on bovine TB, "Call Time on Brock", which reports on the experiment in Ireland? It makes good reading and seems eminently sensible. I am sure that the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, who has responsibility for TB, has examined the matter, and, given that the solution in the article seems sensible, perhaps he will mention it.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): As so often in agriculture debates in this House, we have had a sensible, useful and relatively well-balanced debate with a great deal of expertise on both sides of the House. Leaving aside the Minister's introductory speech, which was slightly sullied by party politics, Government and Opposition Members have contributed a great deal to the debate.

The hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) pointed out that more farmers have left the industry under Labour than at any time since the last war. He then got rather muddled, however, about how he supports the area-based payments under the mid-term review in England and the historic payments in Scotland. He is a Liberal, and he is all things to all men.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards), because in our index of the rurality of seats, Monmouth is the second most rural Labour seat, at 63rd. I shall return to that in a moment. He knows what he is talking about, especially with regard to the subdivision of farmland and the problems facing woodland.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson), who knows farming inside out and back to front, highlighted a topic that has arisen throughout the debate—the threat to the beef and dairy industry from the complex introduction of the single farm payment. His comments were echoed by those of my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) and several other hon. Members.

The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) said that he hopes that there is a great future for British farming, although he did not explain where it was to come from, and he seemed uncertain about whether Labour's promise to bring in the mid-term review might come back to haunt it in the fullness of time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) made some useful and interesting comments about bees—an extremely important, if comical, issue in the countryside.

Before I say anything else, I want to lay to ground a perfectly absurd spin that the Labour party is always coming out with—

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gray: I fear that I do not have time to do so.

Labour Members are always saying that Labour is the party of the countryside. Indeed, I have here a rather good quote from none other than the Prime Minister, who declared in 1996:

"I love our countryside, I love the variety . . . for me it is the open spaces, the closeness to nature".

That sounds a bit like Monty Python's lumberjack sketch, although I have every confidence that the Prime Minister does not like to put on women's clothing or hang around in bars. It is all talk. Labour Members love the soundbite, but, as a farmer friend of mine said recently, "Soundbites don't butter no parsnips." There is a great deal of truth in that old Wiltshire saying.

The Minister claimed that Labour has 180 rural and semi-rural seats. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), who, some time ago, did a huge amount of work to calculate which are the most rural seats in Britain, using population density, the number of people employed in agriculture, and a variety of other indexes. I have the list here. Of the top 200, two are represented by Labour—Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley and, at No. 63, Monmouth; the rest are exclusively represented by Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members of Parliament. The notion that Labour is the party of the countryside works only if one includes places such as Reading, East, Reading, West and Swindon. No doubt Exeter claims to be a rural seat, but it ain't. It is absurd to suggest that the Labour party represents rural areas. Happily, the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings has been published and is available in the Library for all to look at. The truth of the matter is that rural areas are overwhelmingly represented by the life-long friend of the farmer—the Conservative party.

Labour Ministers, in particular, know little about farming and seem to care less. That was amply demonstrated by the Minister's opening speech. He calls himself the Minister for rural affairs, but when he ventures into the countryside, which is rarely enough, he is about as popular as myxomatosis in a rabbit hutch. That, of course, was the expression used with regard to the arrival on the Labour Benches of the Minister's hon. Friend, the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson). I hope that his strong support for the war in Iraq and top-up fees, his views on the European Union and the single currency and his strong support for hunting make him very welcome on the Labour Benches, but I suspect that the description, "about as popular as myxomatosis in a rabbit hutch", applies as much to him as it does to the Minister.

The contrast with my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) is stark. He knows about farming; he was a farmer for many years; he has looked after this portfolio, in different guises, for a very long time; and he speaks with care, knowledge and balance on the issues—something that I myself would not necessarily claim to do.

Today's debate has had to answer a fundamental question: do we want to produce our own food? Do we believe that the Government have a duty to maintain a reasonable supply for the British people? Or are we content to become increasingly dependent on overseas countries: beef from Argentina, milk from France and Poland and chicken from Thailand? That is the way we are going. Our self-sufficiency in food has declined by 4 per cent. since 1997. We now have more DEFRA civil servants—14,460—than dairy farmers, of whom there are only 14,300.

The world's strategic reserve of food is at a historic low of 63 days compared with 104 when we left power. We have 63 days worth of food in the world today. Britain could contribute to that, but are we? The fundamental questions that arise from our debate are: can we carry on as we are? Is farming in terminal decline? Are we content to become ever more reliant on overseas producers, whose standards of animal welfare and human hygiene would often not be allowed in the United Kingdom? Any focus group would reply with a resounding no. We want to eat British food and we want to know where it comes from and how it is produced. However, under the Labour Government, the questions about the source of food and the method of its production are becomingly increasingly difficult to answer.

The Government's botched implementation of the single farm payment risks making matters even worse and turning our green and pleasant land into an urban playground or letting it decline into untended scrub land. There is a genuine risk of that and I call on the Government and the Under-Secretary to tell us how they will avoid that unwelcome consequence of the single farm payment.

The Government have not only failed on farming. We must remember that 14.1 million people live in rural districts and that the debate is not all about farmers but about rural life in general. The Government have failed to preserve village and rural life. Homelessness in rural areas has soared by 13 per cent. since they came to power. Rural property prices are 15 per cent. above national averages so that people on low wages cannot possibly afford to live in rural areas. Fifty-eight per cent. of households in rural areas have no access to any form of public transport and rural crime costs farmers £100 million a year when 98 per cent. of rural parishes have no permanently staffed police presence. Three thousand rural post offices are closed and continue to close at the rate of three a week, assisted by the ghastly Government.

[Mr. Gray]

The Deputy Prime Minister's changes to planning laws will, if anything, ensure that especially the south-east and the south-west will suck in businesses and houses from the north of England and ensure that the most environmentally sensitive and beautiful parts of at least the south half of the island will be concreted over as quickly as he can possibly achieve that.

The Government have failed to maintain villages. Funding from the national lottery for the village hall, so central to village life, has disappeared. They have done away with it and village halls will suffer. They have failed to preserve the rural way of life, abolishing hunting and now threatening shooting. Not only farming but the way of life is in crisis because of the Government. The entire way of life for 14.1 million people who live in villages and market towns is under threat. The villages, the churches, the halls and the whole approach to life will go. The Labour Government will turn the countryside into some sort of dormitory for their urban friends.

By contrast, our vision is of a living, vibrant countryside, with real people doing real jobs and living real lives. It is of a profitable farming industry, thriving rural businesses and a traditional way of life, which people in the countryside so badly need. All of that is fundamentally undermined by a quintessentially urban Labour Government.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): The hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) began by describing the debate as constructive and bipartisan, but he did not follow the tradition that he lauded.

It is a great pleasure to be winding up in our important debate. It is especially pleasurable to reply to a debate in which my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) made what he described as his maiden speech as the Labour Member of Parliament for Wantage. I should like to think that my hon. Friend was a friend of mine before he crossed the Floor, but he certainly is now. His speech was refreshingly unpartisan. It had historical perspective and drew on his experience as a former Member of the European Parliament.

My hon. Friend mentioned the issue that dare not speak its name in many debates on the state of the agricultural economy: the role of the exchange rate and the euro. He made an important point, and many of the most sensible commentators and, indeed, people involved in agriculture realise that the stability gained from joining the euro would mean enormous benefits. That is almost never debated.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wantage also rightly reminded the House that issues such as CAP reform and trade liberalisation have traditionally been bipartisan issues that have been progressed by Governments of both political colours. He pointed out that, whether we like it or not, under successive Governments the size of the agricultural economy as a proportion of the overall economy has shrunk from 3 per cent. in the early 1970s to 0.8 per cent. now. Another bipartisan issue that he raised was the balance that always has to be struck between regulation and food safety and animal health. That is a difficult balance for any Government to strike. He warned me that he was an assiduous letter-writer on behalf of farmers, and I look forward to receiving letters from him.

If I do not have time in the few minutes that remain to address all the points raised in the debate, I promise to write to hon. Members on those subjects. My hon. Friend the Member for Wantage mentioned the impact of the fallen stock scheme on his constituency, and I will certainly look into the suggestion that there might not be a collection service available in his area. I am assured by Michael Seals, the chairman of the fallen stock scheme—an industry-run scheme—that there is a nationwide network that extends even to the Isle of Wight. I shall write to my hon. Friend with the details that he has requested.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) was right to say that there were particular challenges in his constituency. Following negotiations, the fallen stock scheme and the local hunt have agreed a collection price and the collection scheme will go ahead. As the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality said in his opening speech, there is no reason for the hunt on the Isle of Wight to disband. The Countryside Alliance has said that, as long as hunts stay within the law, many will be able to continue and to generate more income by taking part in the fallen stock scheme.

Mr. Wiggin: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Bradshaw: No, I am terribly sorry, but I have only 10 minutes in which to wind up, and the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) did not take interventions either.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wantage and the hon. Members for Taunton (Mr. Flook), for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) and for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) raised the serious issue of bovine TB, on which I do not intend to spend a great deal of time, but it is important to say that this has been our first opportunity to discuss the issue following the publication, finally, of the results from the four area trials in the Irish Republic. We will of course take seriously any lessons to be learned from those trials, but it is important that hon. Members recognise that the situation in Ireland is rather different from that in the United Kingdom.

The scientists who conducted the Irish trials have said that the proactive culling that achieved the reduction in TB breakdowns in cattle is not a viable policy for the Republic of Ireland, so whether it would be viable in the UK is also open to question. I have asked the Independent Science Group to examine the results of the Irish trials to see whether anything can be learned from them. I accept that those trials have changed the debate. They have taken us away from the debate on whether culling badgers can help to tackle TB. We must now ask whether culling badgers in the way that was done in the Irish trials would be viable, cost effective and politically acceptable. Those are questions that all parties in the House will have to grapple with over the next few weeks.

Several hon. Members talked about the general state of farming, and it is important to recognise that it has gone through a difficult time for a number of reasons, although incomes have, in fact, risen by 80 per cent. from the low that they reached in 2000. We recognise that there are particular pressures on the dairy industry. Those problems were raised by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George), and my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards) talked about them in some detail. My hon. Friend quoted an articie from this week's farming press, saying that he felt that there was a new spirit of optimism in the industry. I think that he is right, although we should not overlook some of the serious challenges faced, especially by the dairy industry.

The hon. Member for St. Ives pointed out that we are awaiting the outcome of the latest Office of Fair Trading report into supermarkets. We will study that report with interest. The Government have certainly not ruled out the need for further action if the report shows that there are problems that need to be addressed, although previous reports of this kind have not done so. In fairness to the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice), I should mention that he pointed out the positive role that supermarkets play in rural areas. They provide a service to rural people and offer them a much greater choice than previous generations ever had. I am as keen as he is, however, to make sure that they do not use their powerful position to the detriment of the farming industry.

One of the important statistics to remember when we debate the state of the dairy industry is the extremely big difference in profitability between some dairy producers and others. My constituency is urban, not rural, but I know farmers outside Exeter, and have friends who are farmers outside Exeter, and they tell me that there are huge differentials in the success of dairy farmers, both in terms of added value and costs. The differential that dairy farmers experience is 12p per litre, which does not indicate to me that this is just a problem of supermarkets and price. It is also a challenge to the industry to get to the level at which all are making those sorts of profits.

Several hon. Members talked about CAP reform. It is right to point out, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), that although there was a lot of talk in the Conservative party, over many years, about the importance of CAP reform, this Labour Government delivered that historic CAP reform back in the summer of 2003. It has been an incredibly complex issue, but we have discussed it with the farming community all along. One of my other hon. Friends pointed out that the farming industry was not united on how it wanted CAP reform to be implemented, but we have gone out of our way, all along, to take the farming industry with us, to listen to those voices and to try to devise a system that we thought was fair and that would deliver the public goods that were mentioned.

It was characteristically generous of the hon. Member for St. Ives to say that he thought that we had struck the right balance. His questions about the timing of the implementation of the single farm payment have been dealt with. We are confident that we can still do that early in the window that we have set out. I also note that, as was pointed out, in all the criticisms from the official Opposition on the single payment and the way in which it has been implemented, I did not hear a coherent alternative, and I never have done. We have heard such criticisms time and again in the House, but we are still waiting for a coherent alternative.

A number of other issues were raised, to which I have not got time to respond in detail now, but I will write to the Members concerned. The hon. Member for Bridgwater mentioned bees, and the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire referred to reform of the sugar regime and the important area of biomass and the future of biofuels, to which the Government are committed.

In general terms, however, I was astonished that in a debate that was supposed to be about rural communities, the hon. Members for South-East Cambridgeshire and for North Wiltshire said almost nothing about employment, the environment, biodiversity, the health service, crime, schools, housing, poverty, transport or the overall economy. Are not those issues important for people who live in rural areas, as they are for people who live in urban areas? My region, the south-west, is largely rural, and has been perhaps disproportionately dependent on agriculture historically. It has also been the fastest growing region in the whole of England in the last three years. Nothing was said about the success delivered by this Labour Government to the economy and public services in rural areas.

In the constituency of the hon. Member for North Wiltshire, there are now 2,365 more nurses, and 849 more doctors, in his strategic health authority area. North Wiltshire has 290 more teachers than in 1997, and Wiltshire has 63 more police officers. Unemployment has fallen 63 per cent. since 1997. None of that was mentioned in the criticisms that he levelled.

That comes on top of announcements this week in the Conservative party's so-called James review, the Conservative Front-Bench's failure to stand up to their party leader and shadow Chancellor, unlike some other shadow Ministers, and to defend the savage cuts that the Conservative party now proposes to make in DEFRA's budget—

David Maclean (Penrith and The Border) (Con) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Resolved,

That this House approves the recommendations in paragraphs 5 and 8 of the Fifth Report from the Procedure Committee, Session 2003–04, on Public Petitions (HC 1248).—[Mr. Watson.]

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With the leave of the House, I will take together motions 5 and 6.

Ordered,

EMERGENCY SERVICES

That the Fire and Rescue Services (National Framework) (England) Order 2004 (S.I., 2004, No. 3217), dated 7th December 2004, be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT FINANCE

That the Non-Domestic Rating (Small Business Rate Relief) (England) Order 2004, (S.I., 2004, No. 3315), dated 14th December 2004, be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.—[Mr. Watson.]

School Playing Fields

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

7.26 pm

Mr. Liam Byrne (Birmingham, Hodge Hill) (Lab): I thank the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Derek Twigg), for attending this debate on the sale of school playing fields, and I welcome him to his place. This is his first Adjournment debate, as it is mine, and I have no doubt that his many years of service to the people of Halton, as well as his former career at the then Department for Education and Employment, will stand him in excellent stead for his new role, and I wish him every possible success in that job.

I am grateful to the House for the opportunity to speak on the six-months anniversary of my arrival in the House. We have achieved a great deal in Hodge Hill in that short time. We have quadrupled the number of actions taken against antisocial behaviour. We have won two extra teams of police. We are now one of just 50 Home Office action areas for the Together campaign. Most important of all, we have created a new partnership within our community in Hodge Hill that has already identified five possible crack houses, 10 gang hot spots and 30 neighbours from hell. However, I fear that, after all our work, certain forces are about to move us backwards on an issue that lies at the heart of our community: the sale of the Brockhurst road playing fields to Tesco, thus creating one more megastore for that organisation and involving the possible highway robbery of up to 80 per cent. of the cash to spend elsewhere in the city.

I must give credit where credit is due: the Government have transformed horizons for our young people in this country. They have tightened the rules on the sale of school playing fields not once, not twice, but four times. That agenda is matched by the new vision of offering children at least four hours' sport every week in and out of school. Moreover, that vision has been backed by cash: more than £1 billion is flooding into physical education and school sport between now and 2006. However, I can only wish that the Government's commitment was matched by that of Birmingham city council, and I need to give the House a very brief history of the development of the dangerous scheme to tarmac over the green fields on the Brockhurst road.

The development was first proposed some 12 years ago, but the local action plan for Hodge Hill was clear that only one large food store should be built. It said that there should not be a megastore, that nothing should be built on playing fields and that such fields should not be declared surplus to requirements. Indeed, the plan set out clearly:

> "Any future applications that incorporate part or all of the playing fields in development proposals are likely to be refused".

That was the position until last year, when after 12 years of the community successfully resisting change, the new Tory-Liberal administration gave the green light for a new local development plan that provided for a 55,000 sq ft megastore that swallowed up nearly a fifth of the playing fields. It backed that up with a cabinet commitment to declare the fields surplus to requirement after the simple presentation of a satisfactory plan from Tesco. Did the new cabinet ask the local residents action group for its advice? Did it call local councillors to ask their views? Did it talk to one local resident? Not a bit of it. It even refused to table the report from the residents action group at the meeting at which the deed was done.

I do not want to overstate the case, but I do not need to. The fields in question are technically detached educational playing fields. Following decades of underinvestment, local schools have been reluctant to use them due to the lack of changing facilities on site. Additionally, the proposal will not swallow all the pitches. However, the pitches are rough diamonds because they are of fantastic quality. They are dead flat, never waterlogged and so good that the Aston Villa ladies team considered training on them at one point. That explains why the pitches are in heavy demand from local sports clubs such as Sporting FC, which is exactly the sort of community organisation that is crucial if the Government's out-of-school sport agenda is to be delivered. Its club secretary, John Abbey, has worked tirelessly to oppose Tesco's application.

A second argument against the proposal is the fact that the overwhelming power of Tesco could wipe out all the local traders in the neighbouring Fox and Goose shopping centre. My inquiries to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister before Christmas uncovered a stunning report. It was unequivocal in saying that such megastores undermine traditional businesses such as food shops, newsagents, off-licences and clothing and footwear stores. Those are exactly the kind of stores that currently make up the Fox and Goose. What chance will such local stores, rich in goodwill, stand against a company that makes nearly £4,000 profit every single minute of every day?

A further argument against the proposal is its impact on local roads, which are already some of the most dangerous in Birmingham. Communities throughout the country have interesting stories to tell about promises on traffic that are never delivered, but although local councillors in Hodge Hill proposed a neighbourhood renewal fund initiative to study the traffic impact independently, it was stopped by the new Tory-Liberal administration when it froze NRF projects throughout the city.

Worse still, today a new report on air quality in Birmingham shows that our community is on course to fail targets on nitrogen dioxide levels because of traffic. As Councillor John Clancy, who has ably chaired the local Fox and Goose focus group for several years, rightly says, at a time when we want to cut fumes and protect our green spaces, it is odd that we are trying to suffocate one of our green lungs.

I know that the Minister has not received a planning application and that he is not in the business of speculating, but I think that this is a clear case of a development that is not in a community's interest, so I want to flag in his mind the fact that there are strong reasons why he should oppose the proposal, if and when he sees it. I know that under new PPG17 guidance, planners must show that land is surplus to requirements, but paragraph 10 of the guidance says that developers must consult the local community and show that "their proposals are widely supported by them."

In Hodge Hill, the city council might be prepared to declare that the fields are surplus to requirement, but the developers certainly cannot show that the plans have widespread support. Council polls show that 55 per cent. of people support the idea, but I dispute that figure because my polls show that 58 per cent. are against it. It would be useful if the Minister would clarify the metrics for community support that must be demonstrated in such cases.

No Minister in this country is above the law, so if my hon. Friend says that Birmingham city council must decide and he has no power to stop it, I will say that the law is at fault. I would not want him to break it, however, especially so early in his post. However, if that is the scenario, I ask for his help to ensure that the proceeds benefit the local community. The Minister's predecessor told the House on 8 December 2004 that 80 per cent. of playing field sales that did not involve school closures led to the provision of much better local facilities, but that is not Birmingham city council's game plan. I have learned that the sale proceeds from the deal will total between £2 million and £3 million, with section 106 money on top of that, but will that be spent in the locality? Not a bit of it. When Councillor John Clancy put that question to Birmingham city council in the regeneration scrutiny committee last week, the council said that not only would the capital receipts be going elsewhere, but a portion of the section 106 money would be placed "into an accrual account and would remain there until called upon" to be spent

"in those areas where there was a shortfall in service provision".

That is from a council that is sitting on a single capital pot fund of £233 million. That is from a council with a prospective section 106 pot of £70 million, of which £23 million is already in the bank. In other words, that is from a council with zero stars for children's services and a triple A bank balance, and that is why we need the Minister's help.

Last year, the Minister's predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg), helped me with an answer to my questions about any proceeds from the sale of the Brockhurst Road playing fields. He said "that any sale proceeds must be used to improve outdoor sports provision wherever possible"; in other words—I would welcome the Minister's confirmation of my interpretation—100 per cent. of the proceeds must be earmarked for sports provision. His predecessor went on to say that "there is no requirement to use the proceeds from the sale of school lands to provide local community facilities."

I would argue that that is the opportunity for progress tonight.

I would welcome the Minister's exploring whether he could consider the following simple three-point plan: first, to require, where he sees fit, the local authority and the local police to present their assessment of the adequacy of services for young people in a community before deals such as this are approved; secondly, to acquire the right for the Minister to stipulate where money is spent if it is clear from the assessment that youth services in a community are not up to scratch; thirdly, to update regulations on the sale of playing fields to bring them into line with restrictions on the sale of school-owned playing fields. As the Minister knows, although we have been tremendously successful in reducing the sale of school playing fields, down to just 14 last year, the level of sales of playing fields is still quite high. The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport told the House last March that there had been 807. Many of those sales helped to contribute about £200 million to new investment in sport, but many did not.

I suspect that the Minister can already hear the howls of protest from the Local Government Association, but that is a £15 million lobbying organisation. The people of Hodge Hill have only me to speak on their behalf in this House, and they will not abide a gain drain from our community where deals are done with developers and the money banked away to make good service failure elsewhere.

I recognise that that is an ambitious agenda, and I do not expect or ask the Minister to give definitive answers tonight, but I would be grateful if he undertook to consult colleagues in the DFES, the Home Office, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, and come back to the House with a considered view. One opportunity to do so may well arise from the forthcoming youth Green Paper. This morning at half-past 10, the Minister for Children, Young People and Families, my right hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Margaret Hodge), underlined the Government's commitment to young people and reminded us that if we talk to any mum or dad, we find that what they say would most improve family life is the provision of places to go and things to do. If we talk to any teenager, we find that they voice the same plea. That is the broader point of principle, which is why I bring the matter to the Floor of the House.

Sport is not only vital in our war on yobs; it is vital to the future of our young people. Seven million adults and 5 million children play football in our country, but FA research shows that we need £2 billion of investment in grassroots facilities, such as the fields of Brockhurst, just to keep up with the current demand to play the game. If we are to be successful in prosecuting our war on antisocial behaviour, we have got to give young people more to do, and sport is one of the most effective ways known to policy makers of diverting youngsters away from crime.

Moreover, when I talk to head teachers, and great educationalists such as George McHugh, the outstanding head teacher of Washwood Heath technology college, who I very much hope will serve our community for some years to come, they say to me that sport is vital to the development of our children's characters. Our young people deserve our investment. This is a Government who have made great strides in the last seven years. I urge the Minister to finish the job and, in so doing, to stand on the side of our community in Hodge Hill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Derek Twigg): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne) on securing this debate on an issue that is important nationally and locally. In the short time that he has been here he has already proved himself a strong advocate for his constituents and a hard-working MP.

We have not yet received an application from Birmingham city council in respect of the Brockhurst playing fields. Even so, I am sure that my hon. Friend realises that I could not, in any case, comment on the merits of any particular application before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills has had an opportunity to consider it, as decisions on such applications may be subject to challenge in the courts.

However, an application is required only if the land has been used as playing field by any maintained school in the 10 years before the date of the proposed sale. I understand that there may be some doubt about whether the Brockhurst playing fields have been used as school playing fields in the last 10 years, and that Birmingham city council is looking into the question. If they have been used, Birmingham city council will require permission from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills before it can sell them. Any application to sell the playing fields will be considered against the same criteria as all similar applications.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to set out the Government's position on the protection of school playing fields. I believe that the Government's record is exemplary. Before 1998, there was widespread concern about the indiscriminate sale of school playing fields. There was no protection—nothing to stop local authorities selling off school playing fields and using the money for whatever they wanted. No one even bothered to monitor how many were being lost, so we will never know the true extent of the folly. By contrast, we recognised and shared the widespread concern about school playing fields, which is why in October 1998 we introduced the first ever legislation to stop the indiscriminate sale of school playing fields. Authorities must now seek the consent of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State before they can sell off any school playing field.

Contrary to what many people appear to believe, we never promised to stop the sale of school playing fields altogether. What we said was that we would bring to an end the policy of forcing schools to sell their playing fields. We have fulfilled that commitment. There has been a massive investment in school buildings—it has increased from £683 million in 1996–97 to £4.5 billion in 2004–05, and it will increase further, to £6.3 billion by 2007–08. It has increased sixfold in real terms over that period. Direct capital funding to all schools will exceed £1 billion by 2007–08, when a typical secondary school will receive about £113,000 and a typical primary about £34,000. All local education authorities and diocese will benefit from substantial delegated funding for their local priorities and needs. Schools therefore no longer have to sell off their playing fields to pay for repairs.

However, not every part of every school playing field will always be needed. Some fields are genuinely surplus to school and community needs, particularly if the school has closed. In such circumstances, it makes sense to permit the sale of such surplus or unwanted assets and to reinvest the proceeds in better sport and education facilities. In July 2001 we set up the School Playing Fields Advisory Panel to provide expert advice. That independent panel is made up of key organisations with a keen interest in playing fields: it includes representatives from the National Playing Fields Association, the Central Council of Physical Recreation, the education organisation Learning through Landscapes, the National Association of Head Teachers and the Local Government Association.

The panel provides independent advice on the extent to which applications to dispose of school playing fields meet the published criteria. All applications are considered against three main criteria: first, that playing field provision and curriculum requirements at the school making the disposal and at other schools in the local area are met; secondly, that community use of a school's playing fields is taken into account, with alternative facilities made available if necessary; and, thirdly, any sale proceeds must be used to improve outdoor sports provision wherever possible. No application will be approved unless it meets all three criteria.

The result has been a steady year-on-year decline in the number of applications to dispose of school sports pitches, down from 41 in 1998–99 to only 17 in 2003–04. I mention sports pitches because that is what most people see when they think of school playing fields. The sports pitches that we talk about in our figures refer to those school playing fields capable of forming at least a small football pitch of only 2,000 sq m. I understand that that is the smallest size of sports pitch recommended by the Football Association for children under 10.

Between April 2003 and March 2004, which is the last complete financial year, the Department received only 17 applications that would result in the loss of playing fields capable of forming at least one of those small sports pitches. In nine cases, schools no longer used the playing fields. Of the 17 applications, three have been withdrawn and 13 approved. We are still scrutinising the remaining application. Of the 13 approved applications, six concerned redundant playing fields at closed schools that were not wanted by any other local schools. In six of the other seven cases at operating schools, the sale proceeds are to be used to provide new or improved sports facilities, such as all-weather pitches, new sports halls or better grass pitches. In one of these cases, the land itself is to be used for improved sports facilities. In the remaining approved case at an operating school, the proceeds are to fund better education facilities at the school.

Last year, in partnership with the National Playing Fields Association, we strengthened the criteria yet further to make it crystal clear that the sale of a school playing field should be a last resort, that proceeds must be used to improve outdoor sports facilities wherever possible, and that new facilities must be sustainable for at least 10 years. That provides the greatest ever protection for school playing fields. In the current financial year, only 10 applications have so far been lodged, compared with 41 in 1998–99 and the hundreds or perhaps thousands that were lost in the 1980s and early to mid-1990s, before we acted.

The Government's school sports strategy, jointly led by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education and Skills, is to build a national infrastructure investing in human capital, to transform PE and sport; to make a step change improvement to school sports facilities; to deliver professional development to enhance expertise and subject knowledge; to strengthen links between schools and clubs to create a culture that supports children's participation in sports clubs and offers young people leadership and volunteering opportunities to improve their skills and employability; to ensure better support for our most talented young athletes—our future Olympians—to help them excel in sport and education; and to provide the strongest ever protection of school playing fields.

School sport has a proven and essential role to play in raising standards and improving the health of the nation, not least by tackling childhood obesity. That is why protecting school playing fields is a major factor in our strategy. However, there are still concerns about even the small number of school sports pitches that are being lost. People should remember that almost half the cases being approved involve playing fields at closed school sites. These are unused by schools, and it is far better to release the capital investment put into them by schools and education authorities and to put that funding back into better, modern school sports and educational facilities that are fit for the pupils of today. Sale proceeds are ploughed back into providing all-weather pitches, better grass pitches, modern sports halls, multi-use games areas, and modern playgrounds for younger pupils. Where schools already have access to first-class facilities like these, the proceeds must be used to provide better educational facilities, such as new schools, new and better classrooms, and language and science suites.

I take the opportunity to dispel another myth. We have never allowed any operating school to sell off all its playing fields. Where applications involve pitches at operating schools, the land must be genuinely surplus. We do not allow schools to sell land that they need. They must keep at least the statutory amount set out in the Education (School Premises) Regulations 1999.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): I am loth to intrude on my hon. Friend's excellent presentation of policy, which is no less than we would expect, but when considering the loss of school playing fields, will he consider the Dixie Dean field in my constituency, which he knows well and which is being sold off for the purpose of building a new academy?

Derek Twigg: I shall speak to my hon. Friend outside later.

We are often asked why so few applications to dispose of school playing fields are rejected. The answer is that local authorities and schools pursue only those that they consider meet the tight rules that we have put in place. There is no point in their putting forward applications that they know do not meet the criteria. The main point is that the number of applications has declined, not that the number of applications rejected is low. We should not, therefore, read anything into the fact that few applications are rejected.

In conclusion, a great deal has been done, and continues to be done, to protect school playing fields. We are also investing heavily to support PE and school sport. Between 2003 and 2008, we will have invested more than £1.5 billion to boost PE and school sport. We are promoting a massive expansion of the specialist sports college and school sport partnerships programmes. We aim to have 400 sports colleges or academies with a sports focus by 2006—that is one in nine of our secondary schools. Clustered around each sports college we are establishing a network of school sport partnerships—families of schools that receive additional funding to enhance sports opportunities for all children. More than 50 per cent. of schools in England are already within the network of created partnerships.

More than 1,700 secondary co-ordinators and 10,300 primary and special school link teachers have been appointed and are in place within the partnerships. They are sharing best practice, organising competitions and activities, and building and strengthening subject leadership, particularly in the primary sector. By 2006, all maintained schools in England will be within a school sport partnership.

PE and sport have an important role to play in raising standards. Work undertaken by the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority has shown how placing PE and sport at the heart of a broad and balanced curriculum can improve attendance, behaviour and attainment. PE and school sport build self-esteem, teamwork and leadership skills. PE and sport are also important because they can help build an inclusive society, raise levels of participation in sport after pupils leave school and positively affect the health of the nation.

That is why PE is compulsory within the national curriculum at all key stages for all pupils, and that is why there is a statutory duty on education authorities to provide access to at least a minimum amount of team game playing fields, based on the type of school and the number of pupils. That is also why we put so much emphasis on protecting the playing fields that schools use and re-investing proceeds whenever possible into giving schools first-class sports facilities.

Our policies not only ensure that schools keep the playing fields they need to meet their own future needs, but the needs of their neighbouring schools. We will continue to work with our partners in the education, voluntary and local government sectors to keep our policies under review to ensure that all pupils have access to the best school sports facilities that schools and authorities can provide.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Truancy (East Anglia)

1. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): What plans she has to reduce the levels of truancy in schools in East Anglia. [209673]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): This is the first Government to put school attendance at the heart of policies for improving standards and pupil achievement. Our measures provide both support for pupils and their parents, and sanctions to reinforce parental responsibility. In 2003–04 school attendance increased for the third consecutive year to a record high of 93 per cent. On average 40,000 more pupils are attending school every day than in 1996–97.

Mr. Bellingham: I congratulate the right hon. Lady on her well deserved promotion and wish her well in her task ahead. Will she join me in thanking and paying tribute to all the head teachers in my constituency who have been working tirelessly to reduce truancy levels? They are doing their level best and working with Mrs. Val Creasy, the new education officer dealing with attendance. What progress are the Government making in reaching their targets? Does the right hon. Lady agree that today's school drop-out is all too often tomorrow's criminal?

Ruth Kelly: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind words and pay tribute to him for the seriousness with which he approaches the subject. He is right to say that we must tackle absence. If we are to have an effect on the next generation, we must make sure that children get to school. We are the first Government to have invested directly in anti-truancy measures. The hon. Gentleman is also right to draw attention to the fact that there is a stubborn, persistent number of children who are serial truants. We have to tackle that. The proportion has remained about 0.7 per cent. since records began. It is clear that schools are cracking down, and the number of authorised absences has fallen dramatically. Again, I congratulate the teachers and the local authority in the hon. Gentleman's area, who are doing everything they can to make sure that children attend school and are ready to learn.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (Con): I, too, congratulate the Secretary of State on her promotion. As she and I have something in common, in that we both have young children, I am sure that our commitment to raising educational standards for everybody is shared, and is total. On the subject of truancy in East Anglia and elsewhere, does she agree that one of the measures necessary to reduce truancy is to give children a disciplined environment where they feel safe? I am sure that parents in East Anglia and elsewhere will agree with what she said, as reported in one of this morning's newspapers:

"Head teachers must be able to exclude difficult pupils."

Why, then, earlier this week, did the Minister in her Department block an amendment in the other place that would have given head teachers the final say on exclusions?

Ruth Kelly: I thank the hon. Gentleman, too, for his kind words. As a parent, I share his objectives of good discipline in the classroom and good teaching, and children learning in a good learning environment. Over the next few weeks and months I intend to draw attention to Conservative policies, which would wreak havoc on our plans for school discipline, on our measures to tackle truancy and open up university access for all children, and on our support for working parents in East Anglia and elsewhere. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) is drawing attention to them, too.

The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) is right to say that children are entitled to a good disciplined learning environment. I am surprised that he criticises Labour's measures to ensure that there are fair admissions procedures, which are supported by Kent and Surrey county councils, among others, and head teachers in those Conservative councils are saying the Government are doing exactly the right thing. Yes, we must back head teachers in making disciplinary decisions, and in the decisions that they take on exclusions. We must also ensure that parents take their responsibilities seriously and get their children into school, with respect for learning and ready to learn.

Mr. Collins: One gathers that the Secretary of State wants to back head teachers on expulsions, but does not want to give them the power to take the final decision. That is very disappointing, but exactly in line with her predecessors. With reference to truancy in East Anglia and elsewhere, does she agree that head teachers wanting to raise standards will give a wide welcome to her statement, again reported in one of this morning's papers:

"We want popular schools to expand more quickly"?

Why, then, under her Government, have only four schools in eight years been funded to expand?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have tried to give a little leeway, but that goes far beyond the question before us.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): I, too, begin by welcoming the new Secretary of State and wishing her every success. It is no advantage to any hon. Member if a Secretary of State fails in such a key policy area. Now that she has launched the general election campaign on East Anglia schools, does she agree—judging by her comments at the North of England education conference, I hope she will—that one of the key groups for increasing student attendance and dealing with truancy is parents? Parents in East Anglia and elsewhere must be able to be involved in what happens in schools. Can the Secretary of State therefore explain why the number of parent governors in the new foundation-status schools will be reduced from one third of the governing body to one, and why academies will have no parent governors—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call Andrew Mackay.

Ruth Kelly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker—I am enjoying these questions already.

Bullying

2. Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): What measures the Government are taking to tackle bullying in schools. [209674]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): We take all types of bullying seriously, and attach unprecedented importance to tackling it. In November 2004, the first ever national anti-bullying week was launched, featuring a variety of events including a Radio 1 campaign and a new public information film. From November this year, anti-bullying week will become an annual event. We have also launched the anti-bullying charter and a programme of regional conferences for head teachers and local education authority representatives.

Mr. Mackay: As there is nothing more unacceptable in our schools than bullying and there should be zero tolerance of it, does the Secretary of State really think that having an anti-bullying week or an anti-bullying charter is sufficient? Do we not need to do much more? Does she agree that a high level of bullying is a clear sign of a poor and failing school?

Ruth Kelly: Hon. Members may be surprised to hear that I agree with the right hon. Gentleman to a large extent. We must tackle bullying and create a culture in which every child is valued; indeed, we must have zero tolerance of bullying. There is a clear link between schools with a good record on bullying and attainment in those schools, as well as between LEAs with a good record on tackling bullying in schools and attainment in those LEAs. We have to create a new culture. I pay tribute to the work led by the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis), who has personally taken charge of this programme. Pioneering work is taking place. Head teachers, and indeed pupils themselves, are telling the Department that they now realise that bullying must be tackled, and that they will stand up and fight it wherever it occurs.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on her richly deserved new position, and I am pleased to see her in her place. My right hon. Friend takes a keen interest in the welfare of children during the school day. Is she concerned, as I am, that some schools' approach to bullying is inconsistent with that of others that are more successful? The kind of school day that children have affects their home life, and can lead to truancy if they are too miserable to continue to go to school. Is it not important that we take a consistent and sustained approach to ensure that all schools engage with the problem, particularly through peer mentoring and other approaches that gather all pupils into the fold?

Ruth Kelly: I completely agree with my hon. Friend. Children tell us all the time that this matters to them. Not only do they not want to be bullied themselves, they want to learn in an environment where there is no bullying, and no toleration of bullying. That is why we are trying to change the culture, and learning mentors and support in the classroom have an important role to play. As a Government, we have secured a broad consensus across groups, working with teachers organisations as well as the voluntary sector and the Anti-Bullying Alliance. Many schools are signing up to the anti-bullying charter, and I should like that to be widespread across the country.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): But should not head teachers have the right to expel children who are bullying, without being second-guessed by another body?

Ruth Kelly: Head teachers do that. If the hon. Gentleman is referring to Conservative proposals to get rid of independent appeal panels, may I remind him that only 149 out of 9,290 permanently excluded pupils were reinstated by that process? Everyone can see that the facts speak for themselves.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I join others in congratulating my right hon. Friend on her promotion. Is she aware that there have been problems with bullying, and wider disciplinary problems, in some Northampton schools, partly as a result of reorganisation? I agree that heads should be able to exclude pupils, but should there not be facilities outside schools so that children who are excluded can be picked up, receive a good education and return to mainstream schooling as quickly as possible, which is in their long-term interests?

Ruth Kelly: I thank my hon. Friend for her kind words, and I entirely agree with her question. We are making real efforts to tackle bullying and I think that that is having an impact on schools, but of course there is much more to be done. For instance, teenagers should be able to engage in activities not just at school but outside. I shall return to that subject in due course. I recently looked at evidence from surveys in which parents were asked what they wanted, and top of the list were things for their teenage children to do. This Government are prepared to do something about that, whereas the Conservatives refuse to take it seriously. They would slash local education authority budgets, and they say that they would not protect any of the money that goes into such programmes.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): I, too, welcome the Secretary of State to her new post. Most schools take bullying very seriously, and their policies enable victims to report incidents on a confidential basis. They also provide staff and pupil mentors to counsel both victims and bullies, which is important. The most insidious form of bullying, however, is unseen and sometimes occurs outside school. Does the Secretary of State acknowledge the important role of parents in tackling this problem? Without that role, policies implemented in schools would be hampered. In the interests of ensuring that parents accept responsibility for their children's unacceptable behaviour and for trying to modify it, will the Secretary of State give teachers the freedom and flexibility to draw up enforceable home-school contracts and to have the final say on exclusions, by scrapping independent appeal panels?

Ruth Kelly: We have come to the independent appeal panels at long last! I have quoted authoritative figures showing that head teachers have the power to exclude pupils. The hon. Lady is right, however: we must take every child seriously. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Children, Young People and Families has been promoting that agenda, and we have published proposals entitled "Every Child Matters". In future, the role of local authorities will be to ensure that the needs of every child are met, both academically and in terms of their overall welfare. I should like the hon. Lady to confirm, now or later, that the Conservative party would keep education welfare officers at local authority level—or would it scrap them?

Apprenticeships

3. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): What proportion of apprenticeships have been commenced in the manufacturing sector in England in each of the last three years. [209675]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): The Learning and Skills Council collects data by broad area of learning. Of the apprenticeships started in 2002–03, 17 per cent. were in the engineering, manufacturing and technology area of learning. In 2003–04, the proportion was 18 per cent. Data for previous years are not available on a consistent basis.

Mr. Kidney: I am delighted to welcome my right hon. Friend to her new position. Tomorrow in Stafford I shall host, with Perkins Diesel, a seminar on apprenticeships in manufacturing. Does my right hon. Friend agree that after the Tories in government devastated manufacturing and apprenticeships, Labour in government restored both to good health? Manufacturers attending tomorrow's seminar can be confident that British manufacturing has a bright future, and that they therefore can and should invest in apprenticeships.

Ruth Kelly: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend and to the work that he does with representatives of the manufacturing sector in his constituency, which I have had the pleasure of visiting twice. He is right to pay attention to the role that apprenticeships will play, particularly in the manufacturing sector. The Government have set up sector skills councils, which will take forward a programme to ensure that the vocational education, training and apprenticeships that we are delivering are relevant to the employment that young people will later enter. Overall, the number of young people participating in apprenticeships has risen from 75,000 in 1997 to 242,000 today.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): The national employers' skills survey found that 2.4 million workers lacked the necessary skills to do their job. Does the Secretary of State agree that we need to focus on providing more support for modern apprenticeships? What will she do to provide more training places for plumbers, electricians and other trades in Essex, where there is a dire shortage of such skills?

Ruth Kelly: I agree that there are skills shortages, particularly in the manufacturing and engineering sectors. We need to raise skill levels so that we can compete on the basis of quality, not of price. We will not be able to do that unless more young people aim not only for level 2 but for level 3 and the specialised level 4 skills. I do not want to pre-empt any announcements that I shall make in the House in the weeks to come, but we intend to prioritise vocational skills and apprenticeships in response to the Tomlinson report on 14 to 19-year-olds' education, and we shall seek to take that even further in the forthcoming skills White Paper.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I join other hon. Members in welcoming my right hon. Friend to her post. It is certainly richly deserved. I acknowledge the progress that has been made on the recruitment of modern apprentices. Does she agree, however, that in trying to fill the skills gap that still exists in manufacturing industry, it is necessary to raise the level of interest in manufacturing industry among high-quality young students in schools at a much earlier stage? Will she undertake to support initiatives that are designed to do just that?

Ruth Kelly: I completely agree with my hon. Friend. We need not only to raise the interest of young people in manufacturing as a career, but to give them experience of what it is like to work in the sector, if they feel attracted to it. That is why, in our response to the Tomlinson report, I shall seek to achieve just that, by ensuring that we put the same emphasis on vocational education and workplace experience as we do on the academic side. It is really important to the future of our economy that young people are allowed to raise their aspirations, so that they think it is worth continuing to learn and raise their skill levels, and end up with skills that are recognised and valued by employers.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): The Secretary of State will be aware from her previous jobs that manufacturing industry is one of the main sources of sustainable non-inflationary economic growth. There is a college in my constituency that works in conjunction with BAE Systems and is known to be a centre of excellence for aerospace studies. I fully support the question that the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) has just asked the Secretary of State. What further initiatives are the Government prepared to take to encourage young people to go into manufacturing and to undertake the apprenticeships that are so vital to the manufacturing sector?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend the Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education, who is sitting beside me, tells me that the facility in the hon. Gentleman's constituency is indeed a very good one. Perhaps I shall have the chance to visit it at some point. I know that the hon. Gentleman shows a consistent interest in manufacturing, and he is right to draw attention to its needs and to say that we need to encourage young people into the sector. The Government are setting up sector skills councils, which bring together employers to identify the appropriate skill needs and to think of ways of tailoring to their needs courses that will be appreciated by young people.

The sector skills agreement, reached by the sector skills council—which, unfortunately, I believe the hon. Gentleman's party is set to abolish—provides a means for employers not only to shape training, but to challenge each other to work together and put funding directly into training, which is relevant to industry's needs and also offers ways into employment and future career progression for young people.

Higher Education (West Cumbria)

4. Tony Cunningham (Workington) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the development of higher education in west Cumbria. [209676]

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Dr. Kim Howells): The Higher Education Funding Council for England has been undertaking a review, in consultation with interested bodies, of higher education provision in Cumbria, including west Cumbria. Sir Howard Newby, chief executive of the funding council, met with local partners last week to discuss the outcome of that work and I expect that an announcement will be made soon on new plans for higher education in Cumbria, along with a timetable for implementation.

Tony Cunningham: A big thank you to my hon. Friend for that very encouraging reply. West Cumbria is one place in the country that does not have easy access to a university. Progress is being made in that direction, but will my hon. Friend and the Secretary of State take a personal interest in ensuring that the dream of a university in west Cumbria, which has long been held by many people, becomes a reality?

Dr. Howells: I take great pleasure in assuring my hon. Friend that I will take a personal interest in that matter, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will, too. There is no doubt that universities are great economic drivers, and regions that do not have universities are the poorer without them. In view of the great manufacturing and extractive industrial history of my hon. Friend's constituency and the surrounding area, the potential for a university there should be tapped, and we must ensure that it is. That applies especially to parts of industry that are in decline, such as the nuclear industry. It could provide a great research base for a university in Cumbria.

Foreign Languages

5. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What proportion of A-level candidates took at least one foreign language in 2003–04. [209677]

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Twigg): School and college performance data collected by the Department show that in the 2003–04 academic year, 9.8 per cent. of 16 to 18-year-old A-level candidates took at least one modern foreign language.

Hugh Bayley: Does my hon. Friend agree that we need to encourage more students who are doing A-levels in science subjects to continue to study a modern language? We live in a globalising world, and in a typical career nowadays, a scientist or engineer is likely to work in several different countries. We need to find more flexibility in the sixth-form curriculum to allow scientists to continue to study languages.

Mr. Twigg: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend. When we look at the A-level figures, it is quite striking to see that there has been a slow decline in the number of young people taking A-levels in modern foreign languages. At the same time, however, the number going into higher education to study modern foreign languages has been broadly stable, and the number combining languages with other subjects in higher education is increasing. There are lessons to be learned from that positive experience of higher education, which we can apply to A-level study, as my hon. Friend suggests.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): Is the Government's decision to remove a modern foreign language from the core subjects of the national curriculum likely to improve the situation? The Minister has already admitted that the situation is fairly dismal, with the number of students opting for foreign languages at A-level declining year on year.

Mr. Twigg: I believe that we took the right decision, because languages are an option that many young people do not want to take at 14. If they have to, they may not only lose out themselves, but hold back other young people who are motivated to learn languages. The key to whether the hon. Gentleman is right lies much earlier in our schools system. That is why we are placing such great emphasis on primary school language teaching and learning.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Should we not be ashamed of the poverty of our foreign language teaching? I encourage the Minister to follow up what he said at the end of that answer. There is a great deal of evidence to show that the neurological development of children makes it much easier for them to learn foreign languages at infant and junior school level. That is buttressed by evidence from Welsh language schools, Scottish Gaelic schools and Gaeltacht in the Republic of Ireland, showing that people who learn foreign languages at a very early age prove more successful across the whole range of academia. We should therefore be teaching French, German and other languages in our infant and junior schools for children of all abilities. That is where we need to make progress.

Mr. Twigg: My hon. Friend is right. In 2001 only one in five primary schools provided any foreign language teaching. I am delighted to inform hon. Members that the most recent survey suggests that that figure has doubled; indeed, it is now 44 per cent. That is not good enough, but it constitutes major progress by primary schools in the past three years. By 2010, we want every seven to 11-year-old to have the opportunity to learn at least one foreign language in classroom time, and we are working hard to achieve that.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): We are a pretty lazy nation at learning languages. We think that everyone else should learn English and that we can simply sail along. When the Minister encourages young people to learn foreign languages so that they can go on to take A-levels and perhaps go into businesses afterwards, will he examine the teaching of Mandarin? China will be vital to the younger generations, and we need to train teachers now so that young people can learn Mandarin at an early age.

Mr. Twigg: This is a very consensual discussion; the hon. Gentleman is right. We are doing specific work on Mandarin now. When the languages strategy was first published, we talked about enabling children to learn a European language. We have revised our definition for several reasons, including the persuasive case for Mandarin to be part of that strategy. We would like that to be extended across the board.

6. Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the teaching of modern foreign languages in schools. [209678]

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Twigg): Since launching the languages strategy in 2002, we have trained more than 1,200 new primary language teachers and committed around £10 million to supporting early language learning initiatives. At secondary level, the key stage 3 strategy continues to have a positive impact on pupils' language attainment, while the alternative qualifications and vocational options at key stage 4 allow pupils more flexibility in their language studies.

Mr. Dismore: Two weeks ago, I joined French, German and Japanese classes for a day at Hendon school, a specialist language college. The teaching quality was excellent and teaching methods were in a completely different league from when I was at school. The teachers engaged students of all abilities effectively. Does my hon. Friend agree that learning a language is not only for able and enthusiastic linguists but that it provides a key life skill to enable all students to become effective world citizens? It should not be limited, because it enriches horizons and aspirations and has a positive impact on all aspects of the curriculum.

Mr. Twigg: I agree with my hon. Friend and I am delighted to join him in congratulating Hendon school on its success. We have 207 specialist language colleges, which are critical to providing the highest quality of language teaching and learning, not only in language schools but in others, including primary schools. I gave the figures for the increase in the number of language lessons in primary schools. Part of the explanation for that increase is that teachers from schools such as Hendon not only teach in their own schools but go out to neighbouring primaries and teach there.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim) (UUP): We in Northern Ireland, on a small island, have realised for a long time that we must pay attention to foreign languages. Indeed, in many primary schools foreign languages are exciting for our children. We must get away from the stiff, academic approach. Does the Minister agree that the involvement of assistants from overseas plays a big part in making foreign languages real? Can we do more to encourage more schools to involve foreign language assistants?

Mr. Twigg: Yes, the hon. Gentleman is right to talk about making language learning exciting. Part of the reason for our action on language teaching for 14-year-olds was because of the number of young people who were demotivated and switched off. We need to start teaching and learning earlier, but we must also use work force reform as an opportunity to bring others into the classroom, including the language assistants to whom the hon. Gentleman referred. I have seen some great examples of schools in this country being twinned with schools in Spain. There is a positive process for the development of the teachers' skills and for better learning opportunities for the children and young people.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating Montgomery high school in Blackpool? It is a language college, is actively engaged with primary and secondary schools across the whole town, and is also twinned with schools in other countries. With the council, it has embarked on an exciting initiative to send pupils to Bottrop, Blackpool's twin town, for a week's work experience. That means that students have to use their language skills in a work placement in a foreign country.

Mr. Twigg: That is excellent. I am delighted to congratulate Montgomery high school in my hon. Friend's constituency, which offers a really good example of what I referred to when I spoke about the 207 specialist language colleges. We must encourage schools to have direct links with schools and communities in other parts of the world. That is why, late last year, we launched the "global gateway", which is a very good way of promoting more understanding and of breaking down barriers between people. It is also a way to encourage the excitement about language learning that a number of hon. Members have mentioned.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I speak some foreign languages, which I found immensely useful in my legal practice work in Brussels and in the European Parliament. Will the Minister reverse the Government's decision to end compulsory language teaching for 14 to 19-year-olds? It has had a dire effect on the number of people studying languages and, as a result, on the business community around the country. Is he concerned that the students who drop out of school foreign languages classes tend to be boys rather than girls?

Mr. Twigg: I am concerned about the second point that the hon. Lady raises. We intend to address the problem, but there is no intention to reverse the proposal to which she referred. We want there to be more choice and flexibility in the phase of education for 14 to 19-year-olds. We do not want to return to greater compulsion being placed on schools and learners, and I do not think that the way to improve our country's very poor record on languages is to force young people aged 14, 15 or 16 to do them against their will. We must do it by tapping into the excitement evident at a younger age, which is why our strategy deliberately focuses on primary school language teaching and learning. That is where we are putting in resources, and our approach commands very wide support.

Planning and Co-ordination

7. Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): What structures are in place to assist liaison between learning and skills councils and local education authorities in planning and co-ordinating 11 to 16 and post-16 education and training. [209679]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Derek Twigg): There is a range of locally agreed mechanisms to support such collaboration. Local authorities are represented on local learning and skills councils. Many areas have 14 to 19 steering groups, normally jointly led by local education authorities and local LSCs, in particular to oversee the development and implementation of area inspection action plans. Local LSCs are required to consult all stakeholders, including LEAs, in strategic area reviews of post-16 provision. LEAs are required to consult LSCs in school organisation and capital planning.

Mr. Watts: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his appointment to the Front Bench, and thank him for that response. Two reviews are taking place in St. Helens at present, one of schools and the other of post-16 provision. What advice can he offer about how organisations can ensure that they work together and produce the best options for parents and young people?

Derek Twigg: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind comments. I can give a clear example of what he seeks. The increased flexibility of the programme for 14 to 16-year-olds is an excellent example of how local LSCs and LEAs work together constructively in local partnerships to improve learning opportunities for young people. The scheme is in its third year, with about 300 partnerships in existence. There are some partnerships in every LSC area, and they involve more than 90,000 young people from 2,000 schools.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I, too, welcome the Minister to his post. Will he look again at the changes being made to the Connexions service, especially in respect of careers advice in schools? Real problems are being caused in many of the schools in my constituency, and I suspect that the same is happening elsewhere. I understand the concentration on helping pupils of modest achievements, but all the students in a college like Frome community college need careers advice. However, the college has lost its specialist careers adviser, which means that it has lost an essential ingredient in ensuring that young people are directed towards the right training and higher education after the ages of 16 and 18, and towards the right future career paths.

Derek Twigg: The hon. Gentleman raises a very important matter. We are reviewing the situation, and will make an announcement shortly.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend on his promotion. He may be aware that Luton recently had a difficult 14 to 19 inspection, but that is countered by good news, because Barnfield college and Luton sixth form college in my constituency both received grade 1 in their inspection and are both now beacon status colleges. Also, two high schools have now left special measures and are making strong progress. Does my hon. Friend agree that the problems in 14 to 19 education derive mainly from problems in primary education 10 and more years ago, now that that cohort has reached the 14 to 19 stage? The Government's correct emphasis on primary education will feed through and lead to improvements in the future.

Derek Twigg: I congratulate the schools in question, which have obviously done a very good job. We have to get the basics right, and our literacy and numeracy strategies have been working well. Standards are at their highest ever. Starting with Sure Start, we are making sure that that goes right through schooling.

Tuition Fees

8. Mr. David Rendel (Newbury) (LD): If she will make a statement on tuition fees for postgraduate certificate in education courses. [209680]

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Dr. Kim Howells): In the context of the fascinating discussion that we have heard this morning about the use and importance of modern languages, I apologise in advance for the hideously opaque language of the answer I am about to read out. Tuition fees are currently remitted for eligible trainees on postgraduate certificate in education courses. Other forms of support are also available. For the future, providers of initial teacher training will be able to charge variable fees to PGCE trainees, but we are working on the basis that when variable fees are introduced the first £1,200 of the £2,700 maintenance grant will be non-means-tested for PGCE students. That matches the current grant for PGCE students and if, in the light of the "Gateways to Professions" report, we decide to make changes to the support arrangements, they will be announced in due course.

Mr. Rendel: I am grateful to the Minister for that slightly complex answer. At least we now know a little more about what will happen. Does he agree, however, that given that those on the graduate training programme do not have to pay for the costs of their training, there will be an anomaly with those who are on the PGCE course and charged variable fees, even if part is remitted?

Dr. Howells: I think that the graduate training programme has been an enormous success so far. The news today is that lots of quite senior professionals are going into teaching. They have decided to take up teaching as a career—and it is a great career. I can reassure the hon. Gentleman that we will take every precaution to ensure that anomalies do not exist and that we see a good take-up of PGCE places, with a good supply of teachers in the future.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that the other side of the tuition fee argument is the restoration by this Government of the student grant? He will have seen yesterday that my constituency sends the fewest youngsters to university of any in the United Kingdom. In a poor constituency such as mine, 60 per cent. of youngsters would qualify for a full grant and an additional 36 per cent. of youngsters for a partial grant. That is the best way to crack the problem of getting young people from deprived backgrounds into higher education.

Dr. Howells: Yes, and I know that my hon. Friend is passionate about working with all the bodies in his constituency and the wider region to try to increase applications to university. He knows, as I do, that the task is very complex, because it means addressing the most pernicious problem of poverty of aspirations in so many of our communities in areas such as the one that he represents. That is the great task before us, but I am convinced that all of the measures we have introduced will help.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): This is bad news for our student teachers—fourth-year students who have already run up the costs of three years at university, and who will now see a significant increase in their debt. That means that fewer people will come forward to do those courses. Where will it stop? Will it be radiographers and doctors next? Do the Government plan to remove all the concessions on fees? When will the Government understand that it is our public services and recruitment to teaching and national health service jobs that will suffer from their ill-thought-out policies on fees? I say to all those student teachers who will suffer from this measure that the Conservatives in government will reverse them.

Dr. Howells: I know that we all have problems with language from time to time, but that was speaking with a forked tongue with a vengeance. That lot want to cut the number of teachers and cut public services, and they will do it. Let nobody be taken in by their weasel words of sympathy for teachers and those in education. The Conservatives will cut public services; they always do. They did it in the 1990s and they will do it if they are ever elected again.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my hon. Friend on getting angry about that issue; it is vital that we bring more people into teaching. As the balance has changed and more people are coming into teaching through the PGCE route, will he assure me that he will keep an eye on the situation and undertake detailed research so that people are clear about what they are sacrificing by coming into teaching—the balance of funding in terms of the jobs given up as more and more mature students go into teaching and the costs of going into the profession? Will my hon. Friend assure me that he intends to undertake that detailed research?

Dr. Howells: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance, but I must tell him that I do not think that it is a sacrifice to take part in higher education and to invest in one's own future. Frankly, a lot of drivel is talked about that. When people take part in higher education they do so in the good knowledge that it will cost them something, but that it is the best investment they will ever make and that they will be given the best help they are ever likely to get in their lives. We shall keep a close eye on the situation, but we will also ensure that people are not put off either by scaremongering stories or by misconceptions about what entering higher education entails and that they know the good it can do for every individual in the country.

League Tables

9. Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): If she will make a statement on the relative performance in the value-added league tables of education authorities that operate selective and non-selective policies. [209681]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): Between key stage 2 and age 15, pupils in wholly selective local education authorities made more progress than pupils in partially selective or non-selective authorities. On average, that extra progress equates to pupils in wholly selective LEAs achieving approximately two grades higher in one GCSE than in non-selective LEAs. However, between key stage 3 and age 15, there was little difference between LEAs. Value-added measures currently take no account of the proportion of pupils in schools who are especially vulnerable, including children with special educational needs and children in care.

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to the Minister for confirming that selective areas perform better than comprehensive areas on the value-added measures. In fact, five of the top 10 LEAs use selection. Grammar schools perform much better than comprehensive schools and secondary high schools perform as well as comprehensive schools. Is not it true that for those of us who did not have the advantage of the expensive public school education of the Secretary of State for Education and Skills and the Prime Minister, selective schools and selective education areas offer better results to children throughout the country? Is not it time that the Government dropped their mindless opposition to grammar schools and allowed them to expand in the same way as other good schools?

Mr. Lewis: The real issue is that the education policies of the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister are about supporting every child in fulfilling their potential, in stark contrast to the Conservatives when they were in government. Of course, we celebrate the achievements of all schools in this country, but I am disappointed that the hon. Gentleman did not focus on the big story that is emerging from our education system: inner-city schools are performing at the levels we have wanted for decades, directly as a result of the Government's investment and reform programme. We shall accelerate that programme, for the development of foundation specialist schools and new city academies and to reform the curriculum and qualifications for 11 to 19-year-olds.

Let us be clear about the dividing line between the two parties on these issues. The Conservatives want to introduce selection at five and reintroduce selection—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call Dr. Iddon.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Is not it true that in a selective system certain values can never be added for the children who fail 11-plus education, because in local authorities that operate selective systems better resources are concentrated in the grammar schools? By that, I mean things such as better science facilities, better science and language laboratories and even better sports facilities. I speak from personal experience.

Mr. Lewis: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. The Government's vision is that parents in every community should have a choice of high-performing, diverse schools and that high standards and high expectations should to be applied to all students, not just a few. That shows the difference of vision between the Labour party and the Conservative party in respect of the education system and the best interests of young people and the knowledge economy.

School Meals

10. Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): What recent assessment she has made of levels of nutrition in school meals. [209682]

The Minister for Children, Young People and Families (Margaret Hodge): The Department for Education and Skills and the Food Standards Agency assessed secondary school lunch standards and reported their findings in July 2004. As a result, we have invested £1.1 million to tighten up current secondary school lunch standards to reduce sugar, salt and fat intakes; to evaluate primary school lunch standards; to improve training and support for school catering staff; to support head teachers and governors to purchase in a better way a healthy lunch service; and to set standards for other school food.

Ann Winterton: Does the Minister agree that, although the primary responsibility for children's nutrition should lie with parents, that principle should be followed in both primary and secondary education? Is she aware that many primary schools already provide fresh, home-cooked meals that are healthy and nutritious, often with ingredients such as locally sourced meat and fresh vegetables, thus aiding pupils' ability to concentrate and therefore to learn?

Margaret Hodge: We can end this set of questions with total agreement. I agree with everything that the hon. Lady says about the role of parents and schools and about the importance of healthy food in stimulating and supporting children's good development in every sense.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

The Solicitor-General was asked—

Animal Rights Extremism

20. Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): What powers are available to prosecute those involved in activities linked to animal rights extremism. [209665]

The Solicitor-General (Ms Harriet Harman): Where animal rights extremists commit criminal offences, they will be prosecuted. They are mostly prosecuted for violence, threats of violence, offences under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, criminal damage and public order offences.

Mr. Chapman: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that, in a report published yesterday, the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry listed 177 cases of damage to company, personal and private property and 100 threatening phone calls to companies engaged in animal research? Although we all accept that testing on animals should be carried out only when there is absolutely no alternative, does she agree that it is high time that those thugs and criminals were brought to book? They are terrorising hard-working, sincere people and threatening our science base.

The Solicitor-General: I absolutely agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said. We strongly support people's right to express their views, to demonstrate and to protest, but that does not extend to committing criminal offences against perfectly lawful and, indeed, important industries—the pharmaceutical and biotechnology industries—and we will protect them in carrying out their lawful and important work against criminal acts.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): The Solicitor-General knows that those who carry out such acts are extremely adept at working their way around the system, switching from primary to secondary targets often on the fringes of illegality and, sometimes, stepping well over the line. What steps are being taken to ensure a uniformity of approach by Crown prosecutors and, in particular, in the role of special prosecutors in dealing with such activities? I understood that the Government were going to place such things in the hands of special prosecutors, but the evidence that is coming back to us shows that there is still a great deal of patchiness across the country in the way in which those problems are being approached.

The Solicitor-General: The Attorney-General has taken the chair of a national policy forum on animal rights extremist crime that brings together the police, the prosecutors and Departments such as the Department of Trade and Industry, the Treasury and the Home Office, precisely to ensure that we have a national strategy to deal with what the hon. Gentleman rightly suggests is highly well-organised, sophisticated crime. It is also important that the Crown Prosecution Service plays its part nationally and that all the areas are involved. Such work is under way, and I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman about the approach that we need to take.

Crime Prevention Partnerships

21. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What role local offices of the Crown Prosecution Service play in crime prevention partnerships. [209666]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service works on crime prevention through its membership of the local criminal justice board in each area. In addition, depending on the local situation, it works with local councils, the voluntary sector and other criminal justice agencies on issues such as tackling antisocial behaviour, domestic violence and crime caused by drug abuse. Its officers attend community safety partnerships on an ad hoc basis.

Hugh Bayley: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the local criminal justice board in North Yorkshire has started working systematically with crime reduction partnerships in the county, including of course the Safer York partnership, to ensure that the work of courts and prosecutors complements and supports the work of other agencies fighting crime? Does she think that encouragement should be given to Crown Prosecution Service officers in all parts of the country to do such work?

The Solicitor-General: I agree with my hon. Friend that the Crown Prosecution Service needs to be encouraged to work closely with other criminal justice agencies, and beyond that to work with local authorities and engage with local communities. The CPS is of course a member of local criminal justice boards, but the specific pattern of work will depend on each area. The principle exists that it should work closely with others to prevent, as well as prosecute, crime.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Is the Solicitor-General aware that there is close co-operation between the criminal justice board and Crown Prosecution Service in North Yorkshire, which will be consolidated when they move into joint offices in Clifton Moor in the Vale of York? Will she also pay tribute to the work of not only neighbourhood watches, but farm watches to prevent rural crime in areas throughout North Yorkshire? What formal discussions are taking place between the CPS and farm watch schemes in North Yorkshire?

The Solicitor-General: I am afraid that I do not know the answer to the question about the connection between farm watch schemes and the Crown Prosecution Service, but I undertake to find out and get back to the hon. Lady. There is obviously close liaison between the CPS and her local criminal justice board because the chief Crown prosecutor chairs that board.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): My right hon. and learned Friend will know that one of the most important elements of bringing a successful prosecution is ensuring that there are witnesses who not only provide an initial statement, but stand in court. We sometimes lose many such witnesses because of intimidation in their local communities or simply because they find the whole justice system difficult. What is the Crown Prosecution Service doing to ensure that more witnesses stand in court?

The Solicitor-General: My hon. Friend makes an important point. If people do not have confidence in the criminal justice system, they will not report crimes, give statements, or come to court. If that happens, a prosecution cannot occur, so the perpetrator gets away with the crime and is free to reoffend. A great deal of activity is going on throughout criminal justice agencies and especially in the Crown Prosecution Service to ensure that witnesses are told what is going on and not passed from pillar to post without knowing their position. It should be ensured that witnesses who are intimidated are protected with special measures in addition to police protection, and things should be geared around witnesses, without whom there can be no justice.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton) (Lab): Does the Solicitor-General agree that while partnerships need to be in place, justice must be seen to be done? Will she listen to representations that I may make to her about the length of a sentence given to an offender who was found guilty of raping a 12-year-old child? He received only six years for that offence, so will my right hon. and learned Friend join me and probably the local Crown Prosecution Service to ensure that that sentence fits the crime more suitably?

The Solicitor-General: I shall ask my office to liaise with that of my hon. Friend to get the details of the sentence. As he will be aware, if a sentence is unduly lenient, I can refer it to the Court of Appeal to ask for it to be reviewed, so long as that happens within 28 days. It is possible for me to examine the sentence and take action to reinforce the public's confidence that sentencing levels are appropriate.

Crown Prosecution Service

22. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): What plans she has to increase the number of special prosecutors in the Crown Prosecution Service. [209667]

The Solicitor-General: The CPS has specialist prosecutors in a number of areas, including child abuse, rape, antisocial behaviour, domestic violence and recovering the proceeds of crime. It is also building on specialist activities, such as its work on animal rights extremists—I apologise because I failed to answer the earlier question from the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve). A specialist cadre of prosecutors to work with the new Serious Organised Crime Agency is being established.

Julie Morgan: What plans does my right hon. Friend have to increase the number of specialist prosecutors for antisocial behaviour? In south Wales, we have experienced the benefits of having a successful specialist prosecutor for domestic violence. I welcome the fact that we now have a special prosecutor for antisocial behaviour, particularly in view of the large amount of antisocial behaviour that has recently been occurring in my constituency.

The Solicitor-General: Because of the number of representations that I have received from hon. Members on both sides of the House, I am aware that antisocial behaviour and the need to respond to it are problems in almost every constituency. My hon. Friend knows that her city, Cardiff, has a specific antisocial behaviour prosecutor who specialises in such work, and the number of specialist prosecutors will no doubt be expanded as their work develops. I thank her for her comments on the specialist domestic violence prosecutor in her area, who does a marvellous job, and I want to place on record my thanks to the specialist prosecutors for their work.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): The CPS areas have no specialist fraud prosecutors, and the de minimis level at which the Serious Fraud Office investigates and a possible prosecution occurs is very high. White collar crime is not getting the attention that it deserves from the CPS. Will the Solicitor-General ensure that specialist fraud prosecutors are included in each CPS area?

The Solicitor-General: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that fraud is an area of criminality that must be taken seriously. Fairness should exist across the criminal justice system, and one should not be less likely to be prosecuted because one has committed a white collar crime. The Serious Fraud Office has specialist prosecutors who deal with fraud, and the headquarters of the CPS also has specialist fraud prosecutors. Specialist fraud prosecutors are not used in every area, and I recognise the concern that greater co-ordination should occur between police and prosecutors in that area, which is often difficult and technical. The Attorney-General and I refer unduly lenient fraud sentences to the Court of Appeal, because we want the public to be sure that people do not get off lightly just because they are city business men.

Business of the House

12.32 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House please give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 24 JANUARY—Remaining stages of the Gambling Bill.

TUESDAY 25 JANUARY—Opposition Day [3rd Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on implementation of the Licensing Act 2003, followed by a debate entitled "Renegotiation of the Food Supplements Directive". Both arise on an Opposition motion.

WEDNESDAY 26 JANUARY—A debate on sitting hours and other House motions, followed by remaining stages of the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs Bill.

THURSDAY 27 JANUARY—Remaining stages of the Railways Bill.

FRIDAY 28 JANUARY—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 31 JANUARY—Consideration in Committee of the Constitutional Reform Bill [Lords].

TUESDAY 1 FEBRUARY—Continuation of consideration in Committee of the Constitutional Reform Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 2 FEBRUARY—Motion on the Police Grant Report (England and Wales) 2005–06, followed by motions on the local government finance report.

THURSDAY 3 FEBRUARY—Remaining stages of the Child Benefit Bill.

FRIDAY 4 FEBRUARY—Private Members Bills.

It may be helpful if I inform the House that, because of the holocaust memorial day events taking place on 27 January, the sitting of the Westminster Hall Chamber on that afternoon will be held in Committee Room 14. The sitting will be between 2.30 pm and 5.30 pm, with time added as usual for Divisions in the House.

It may be of further help if I notify the House that the explanatory memorandum to accompany the debate on sitting hours is now available in the Vote Office. It explains the principles behind the amendments to Standing Orders, which are complex.

Mr. Heald: I thank the Leader of the House for the business and I certainly welcome the explanatory memorandum, because anyone who has seen the Order Paper will realise how complex those motions are. I also thank him for agreeing to my request that the whole of the Committee stage of the Constitutional Reform Bill be taken on the Floor of the House, in line with convention.

Can the Leader of the House report any progress concerning my request for a foreign affairs debate, so that we can discuss Africa and the middle east, or on my request for the timetable for the Bill on the European constitution? When will it be published? When does he expect to be able to give us the date for the Budget?

Following my question last week about 24-hour drinking, the Leader of the House seemed to support staggered closing times.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Staggered?

Mr. Heald: Staggered or staggering. Since then, a well-meaning citizen has pointed out to me that page 73 of the Government's guidance to local authorities states:

"licensing authorities should . . . not seek to engineer staggered closing times".

The guidance goes on to suggest that "all the public houses in a single street could open until 3 am".

May we have a statement on this issue before next week's debate? Do Ministers understand that local residents who are already being troubled at 11 pm do not want such problems at 3 am? Is it not time for the Government to launch a serious attack on binge drinking, instead of what we have at the moment, which is a lot of Government binge talking?

May we have a statement on the figures due to be released by the Office for National Statistics, which show a massive increase in state jobs? Does that not show that the Chancellor is making empty promises about cutting back while in fact indulging in binge hiring?

It is more then a year since the European Scrutiny Committee asked the Leader of the House to change the relevant Standing Orders to enable it to deliberate in public. Will he now table such a motion for next Wednesday, when we will deal with House business and, if not, will he explain why he is dragging his heels over this sensible proposal?

Finally, may we have a statement on the timetable for the former Home Secretary leaving his grace and favour residence, which is provided at the taxpayer's expense? It is said that there are security procedures to be completed but, given the cost of those facilities, are not the public entitled to know how long this process will take?

Mr. Hain: On the last point, it has been said that the former Home Secretary will stay for a while in the Home Secretary's official residence, which has been allocated on the basis of security requirements. The Prime Minister has made that decision and I am sure that if the hon. Gentleman were, like me, in the Cabinet, he would understand the reasons for it. I deprecate the harassment campaign against the former Home Secretary, and frankly, the hon. Gentleman should come up with better questions.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for thanking me for providing the explanatory memorandum. As he knows, the motions have been produced in this form because we have to amend the Standing Orders to make permanent the decision of the House next Wednesday. The principles are simple. Provision is made for maintaining the existing hours but for starting an hour earlier on Thursday, so that we can take Government legislation and Opposition debates then and have a full working day. To help the House, given the very divided opinion on the question of sitting on Tuesday evenings between 7 o'clock and 10 o'clock, my hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House has tabled a motion that will enable those who wish to return to a 10 pm finish on Tuesday to vote for doing so. That is the reason for the complexity of the motions, but the principles are essentially the same.

I am also grateful to the hon. Gentleman for, unusually for him, offering a second thank you, on the Constitutional Reform Bill. We reached agreement on that issue and I understood the arguments that he and the rest of the Opposition made. We are still considering a foreign affairs debate, but he will understand that the legislative programme is very busy, with Second Readings and remaining stages of various Bills. There is important legislation to get through, including on tackling crime and drugs.

I fully expect the Bill on the European constitution to be introduced sooner, rather than later, with its Second Reading to follow. It is a complex piece of legislation, but, obviously, it is a very important Bill.

Information about the Budget date is guarded carefully by the Chancellor. When he can give that information, the House will know as soon as is possible.

I enjoyed the hon. Gentleman's soundbite on licensing hours, but the fact is that that Act followed more than five years of consultation, and in typical opportunist fashion, the Conservatives supported it when it went though Parliament. Now that there is a hue and cry about it, they flip and jump on the bandwagon. The important truth about this legislation, which is why, when the fuss has died down, it will prove popular with local communities harassed by binge drinking and violence from yobs pouring out of pubs and other licensed premises, is that it hands control to local authorities, which are accountable to local residents, and to the local police, instead of the bureaucratic and long-winded process of going through magistrates courts. The legislation puts the decision with local communities. If local communities feel that licensed premises are encouraging abuse, yobbery, binge drinking and violence, they can either shut them down for 24 hours or ensure that their licences are reviewed. That will ensure that the problem is brought under much better control than has been the case up to now. He knows that that problem has gone on for years and years, and this will help to solve it by putting the power in the hands of local communities, local residents and the local police to crack down on those pubs and clubs that encourage binge drinking and the violence that follows.

On Office for National Statistics figures and public sector jobs, we are proud that, under a Labour Government, there are 77,500 more nurses, 19,000 more doctors, 12,500 more police officers, 29,000 more teachers and 106,000 more school support staff. Under our investment plans, there will be more nurses, teachers, police officers and other front-line service workers to care for and support the public if we win the next general election. Let us compare that with the massive cuts that will follow if a Conservative Government come in, with a return to boom and bust and all the risk to living standards, mortgages and jobs that will follow.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, a request for the European Scrutiny Committee to meet in public has been made and it is fair to point out that it was made a while ago. It is being considered by the Modernisation Committee, on which he sits, and we hope that that report will be ready in a month or two, and that the subject will be addressed. He will also be aware that a delicate balance has to be struck between an obvious desire for openness and transparency, which is a principle that I support in general, and the fact that in that Committee, officials and Officers of the House give a lot of detailed advice on complex matters in relation to heavy business. It is also a case of bearing in mind their situation, so that they can do their proper professional job and advise the Committee appropriately.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Last July, my friend the Prime Minister disappointed me by saying that he would not end the practice of awarding hereditary knighthoods. Is not there a case for an early debate on the honours system after the scandal of Mark Thatcher, who has been convicted in the South African courts, but whose knighthood is apparently inviolable? Should not we strip Mark Thatcher of his baronetcy, which is a hereditary knighthood?

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): Just say yes.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman suggests from a sedentary position that I say yes. Mark Thatcher is a baronet, and it would require primary legislation to remove a baronet's title. The Government have no plans to introduce such legislation.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): In the context of the debate on licensing next Tuesday, can we have a more measured Government response on the issue—from the Home Secretary, I presume—than we have just had from the Leader of the House? Has he noticed that the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, who I presume is not just an opportunist, has this morning appealed for the changes in licensing to go slowly? A full report in the Evening Standard today has the headline, "Our cells overflow with drunk yobs". What is the Government's response to that? It is not just politicians but the police who are asking for the process to be slowed.

The Leader of the House said that legislation on the European constitution would be introduced sooner rather than later. Can he be more specific? When does he anticipate that the Committee stage, which will presumably take place on the Floor of the House, will be completed and, after a necessary delay, when does he expect Third Reading? What date has he written in for completion of proceedings in the House of Lords? If he thinks that that is all going to be completed before 6 April, which many of us have in our diaries as a possible date for the Dissolution of Parliament, surely he has got another think coming. What advice has he given the Prime Minister on those dates?

Finally, did the Leader of the House notice that this morning an important decision was made about trans-Europe co-operation on serious crime? He may recall that a schoolgirl from my constituency, Caroline Dickinson, was murdered in Brittany nine years ago. Her father, mother and I have been pressing ever since for better co-operation across Europe, particularly on issues of DNA. This morning, an important development took place, and that co-operation is guaranteed in future. That is good news, but it has taken nine years to get there. Can the Leader of the House ask the Home Secretary to give us a statement on that issue?

Mr. Hain: I understand the predicament of Caroline Dickinson's family and I know that they appreciate the consistent support that the hon. Gentleman has given them, as do his constituents. The Home Secretary will want to consider the issue in the light of his intervention.

On licensing and binge drinking, the Metropolitan Police Commissioner told the Evening Standard today:

"If 24-hour drinking came in, we would need to reinforce staffing levels in the early hours."

The proposals are not for 24-hour drinking in every pub and club across the land. They put sensible flexibility in the hands of local authorities and local police, so local residents can apply immediate pressure if they think that there are abuses. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman, as a Liberal Democrat who believes in decentralisation and empowering local communities and residents, would be right behind the measure, instead of jumping on the Tory bandwagon. When the fuss has died down, people will realise that they not only have more power under the legislation for flexible and sensible licensing hours so that, for example, theatre-goers can pop in for a final pint or a glass of wine before they go home, but more power to crack down on yobbery and the drunken, violent minority who all come out of our pubs at the same time of night. I am sure that he will want to review his apoplectic intervention in the light of that common-sense advice.

On the European Union Bill, I cannot be more specific, but the hon. Gentleman made an intriguing observation about the coming months. I do not know where he got 6 April from—perhaps he is better informed than the Leader of the House. I do not think that there would be a problem from the Liberal Democrats, but it would be interesting to know whether the official Opposition would give a cast-iron guarantee to speed the Bill through the House. If they did so, they and the shadow Leader of the House would have an opportunity to keep pressing me every week on when the referendum will take place. However, there is no such offer from Conservative Front Benchers to help with the passage of the Bill.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I hope not.

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman and his anti-European supporters, who want to take Britain out of Europe, will want to obstruct the progress of the Bill when it is introduced.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): In the run-up to the debate on sitting hours next Wednesday, is my right hon. Friend aware of a rumour that has been circulating among some right hon. and hon. Members? It is suggested that, if the House votes for a return to the dark ages and later hours on Tuesday, that will automatically mean that Members will be free to leave at 5 pm on Thursday. Would he like to set the record straight?

Mr. Hain: I have heard lots of rumours in the past few days, including that one. The proposal that I am tabling would allow the House to sit an hour earlier on Thursday at 10.30 am but keep the finish time at 6 pm, when there is usually a vote. That would have two benefits. It would allow people to continue to return home to Scotland, the north of England and the far west that evening, but it would also allow us to complete a full day's business with a vote. All too often—for all I know, it may well have happened last night—the place thins out on a Wednesday evening, because it is not easy to take whipped business, legislation or Opposition debates on a Thursday. If there were any attempt to encourage part-time membership of the House by moving the time forward to 5 o'clock, and if that were suggested as an inducement to do something else, as my hon. Friend described, that would be wrong, and I would resist it strongly.

Mr. Forth: May we have an urgent debate on procedure in courts martial? Was the Leader of the House as alarmed as I was about the publication of what can only be described as very prejudicial pictures during the course of a judicial and legal proceeding? Does he think that that was wrong, is he worried about it and can something be done about it? Does he think that this will leave the whole process wide open to appeal?

Mr. Hain: For once, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman. The point that he makes is very important, which is why the Attorney-General wrote to the newspapers last night about this matter. It is very important that there is a fair trial, and we should do nothing to jeopardise that.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House give us an opportunity to discuss the conduct and stewardship of our police forces, against the background of concern among Members across the political spectrum about the professional standards department—it used to be known as CIB3—of the Metropolitan police? It is felt that there are police officers who have been suspended for an inordinately long time, often unjustly, and that some police officers who are innocent are in prison and that some people who have put them there are guilty. This is an unspoken and unrehearsed issue, but it needs to come out into the open, because there is widespread concern not only about the Metropolitan police, but about two decades of very poor stewardship of the Sussex police, for example, and systemic failures there.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend always raises important and serious matters, as he has just done. The Home Secretary will want to pay careful attention to what he said, and my hon. Friend will have the chance to question the Home Secretary on Monday week.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): May we have an early debate about access to the Post Office card account system? Serious issues remain in relation to the inability of many people, but especially the elderly, to operate the system properly and to get through when there are difficulties and get proper answers from customer services. Members of Parliament are not given a direct line through to those involved to help constituents in these important issues. May we have an early debate to try to air some of the problems, get answers and get the problems fixed?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman will have a chance to raise that matter in Department of Trade and Industry questions on Thursday, but I recognise his point. In my constituency, there are pensioners who have been issued for the first time with a card and personal identification number, but who have never used a PIN before and have lost it, and have therefore been unable to draw the pension to which they are entitled. I know that the Post Office has been alerted to the problem. In some cases, at least in Neath, emergency procedures were put in place. This is a serious issue of which the authorities are aware.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for a debate about economic regeneration and the important role played by regional development agencies? I know that he is aware of the significant regeneration that has taken place in the lower Don valley in my constituency since 1997, including the building of the largest printing works in Europe, which I drew to his attention a few weeks ago. He may not be aware of a masterplan now being developed by the council and British Land with the help of the RDA, Yorkshire Forward, for further significant regeneration, thousands of jobs and 4,000 new homes. Does he agree that those plans and others throughout the country would be put at risk if the Opposition had their way and abolished the regional development agencies, which would be a false economy that would endanger regeneration and jobs throughout the country?

Mr. Hain: I strongly agree with my hon. Friend. The more the public and the media look into the fine print of the proposals published earlier this week, the more they will see them fall apart. In the case of regional development agencies—this would effectively massacre the work of Yorkshire Forward—a £365 million saving would be made. That means cuts in regeneration and job creation programmes and in the regeneration of communities, and the devastation of regions such as South Yorkshire, which suffered mine closures under the previous Government and have needed more investment to create the enterprise economy that is now taking root. All those measures, including that regional development issue and the Opposition's proposed abolition of the new deal, would result in massive cuts and the return to high unemployment, boom and bust, risks to mortgages and all the rest of the Tory economic misery that the Opposition plan for us yet again.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Is the Leader of the House concerned about the unfair treatment being meted out by the Government to local authorities that have responsibility for housing, as they are being denied the resources given by the Government or the ability to retain for themselves the money that they get from the rent from municipal property, as against the treatment of registered social landlords, who are treated much more favourably than housing authorities? Macclesfield, which is debt-free, is being forced to dispose of its housing stock through large-scale voluntary transfer against my wishes and the wishes of the council and council tenants. It is being forced to do that because it is not being allowed to keep the necessary sum to maintain and refurbish its council housing stock.

Mr. Hain: I think that the hon. Gentleman will find that there is a debate on those matters the week after next, on Wednesday 2 February. If he has a chance to intervene or speak in that debate, he may wish to take it.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): When the shadow Leader of the House asked perfectly reasonably about a foreign affairs debate, the Leader of the House replied that the legislative programme was very difficult. Well, it is not 1 per cent. as difficult as the position of the coalition in Iraq. What sort of impression do the Government imagine is given of the House of Commons if we can find time for debates on gambling, drink and aspects of constitutional affairs that might wait, and a whole day on our own hours, while there is apparently no time to discuss the immensely important situation in Iraq? Some of us think that, after the election, we may have to make a choice as to whether we are in Iraq for five or 10 years, or whether we go headlong into a Vietnam situation. Surely there is a case for a proper debate on an amendable motion.

Mr. Hain: Obviously, we will want to assess, as will the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary, the situation after the Iraqi elections on 30 January. I am sure that my hon. Friend will want to applaud the fact that recent polling in Iraq shows that more than 80 per cent. of Iraqis intend to vote if they can and that 111 groups with almost 8,000 candidates are standing in the national elections and a further 11,000 candidates are standing in the provincial and Kurdish regional government elections, and a third of all those candidates are women. That provides an opportunity for a major democratic advance in Iraq out of the tyranny that was overthrown when Saddam was deposed and out of the new investment that is now taking place. I accept that the situation is very difficult and that the insurgents and terrorists are seeking to destroy that prospect of democracy, but I should have thought my hon. Friend would want to support it and to hope and work for the success of the elections on 30 January. I am sure that after those elections the House will be informed by the Foreign Secretary of the outcome and where future policy might go.

Sir Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (LD): Will the Leader of the House acknowledge that since the publication last March by Sir Michael Lyons of the public policy programme of civil service dispersal and relocation, the Government have published a plan to reduce dramatically public sector employment, particularly in Departments such as the Department for Work and Pensions? Will he acknowledge that it is time the House discussed public sector relocation so that communities that are suffering job losses, such as Galashiels in south-east Scotland, which is subject to DWP cuts, can be considered as priority cases for civil service relocation in future?

Mr. Hain: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point about his constituency, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions will want to consider it carefully. That Department and others have initiated a huge redeployment out of the overheated London and south-east area to the regions and nations of Britain, Scotland and Wales included, where there are the skills and the sites.

Efficiency savings are also being made to divert resources from back-room staff to front-line services. That is very different from the massacre of public sector jobs that will take place under the Conservative plans published earlier this week, which mean that 250,000 people are set to join the dole queue.

Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): On 17 January, the closure of a company, Lubrizol, in my constituency was announced on the internet. I was not consulted, nor was the local authority or the Northwest Development Agency. The decision was made because the US parent company thought that production could be better located elsewhere. The UK company was not a lame duck. It was an efficient company that had won many awards, most recently on Tuesday this week. Will my right hon. Friend arrange for the subject of arbitrary closures to be debated? Will he draw the matter to the attention of the Department of Trade and Industry to see whether it was consulted, whether it regards this as the proper way for an inward investor to behave, and whether the workers and unions were appropriately consulted? Will he also draw the matter to the attention of the Department for Work and Pensions so that the workers who will be affected by the closure, both senior and more junior workers, are given appropriate assistance, should they need it?

Mr. Hain: I am astounded at that account. I have heard of workers being texted to be told that they are redundant, but I have not heard of workers discovering it on the internet, if they have access to it. It is a very bad way for an employer to behave, and I will make sure that Ministers at the Department look into the matter and write to my hon. Friend about the points that he has raised.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): Has the Leader of the House begun to reflect on how he might persuade people in Neath to re-elect him at the next general election? If he has, he will realise that no meaningful decisions can be taken about that campaign until we know what our elections expenses will be. The Electoral Commission made recommendations to the Government on that. Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm that it is the Government's intention that the next election be fought on the basis of those new recommendations? If so, when will the Government lay the necessary order?

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman has made a plea on behalf of all of us, but I can assure him that my spending will come well under the expenses limits. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs will want to reflect carefully on the point that the right hon. Gentleman made and will, I am sure, respond to it.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): Can time be found to discuss the work of the small business unit, in particular the small business unit in west Yorkshire, which is supporting plans by a consortium of local businesses to break into new markets in China and eastern Europe? We should debate any vulnerability to which the small business unit might be exposed, especially a £500 million cut, and how that would affect trade into my area.

Mr. Hain: I am alarmed by the plans to axe the Small Business Service, as the Opposition propose. We will not do that, partly for the reason that my hon. Friend gives—it provides vital support for small businesses, which are the engine of our future economic competitiveness. They need the support that the Small Business Service provides. Another proposal is to cut massively the resources and staffing of UK Trade and Investment, which provides important support for exporters who find it hard to gain openings in a very competitive international market. I notice that in the list of cuts proposed earlier this week, nobody, let alone the shadow Chancellor, proposed a cut in the £3 million Short money that the Conservatives get from the taxpayer—very bad value for money, I might add. All the other cuts listed have been added up, but the £3 million of taxpayers' money going to the Conservative party will stay ring-fenced, protected and guaranteed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): May we have an early debate on the statement on the continued detention in Belmarsh of a number of people held under the terrorism legislation? The Leader of the House will bear in mind that it is now a month since the House of Lords declared that that was unlawful, and a year since the Newton committee report recommended substantial changes in the terrorism legislation. It is quite wrong that those people should be held unlawfully. They are entitled to know their future, as is the House.

Mr. Hain: I understand the point that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has raised. The ruling in the House of Lords on 16 December raised a number of complex issues, and the Home Secretary, as he has explained to Parliament, needs time to consider fully the implications of the judgment, while being mindful of the need to act as quickly as possible on the matter. I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman will find in due course that his request has been satisfied.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I know my right hon. Friend is aware of the widespread concern among local government workers about the planned changes to the local government pension scheme, due to be introduced in April. When will we have the opportunity to debate the issue? I have been approached by many local government workers in my constituency. When will we have the opportunity to discuss the raising of the retirement age and the impact on current members of the scheme? Will the Government consider postponing the proposals until there has been more consultation?

Mr. Hain: I am sure that many local government workers and their trade union, Unison, have approached her, as they have approached me and other Members on the matter. Perhaps it would be helpful if I explained that the changes coming into effect this April, as the Chancellor announced in his pre-Budget report, are necessary now as part of a wider package to reduce pressures on local authority budgets and thereby to help protect front-line services and keep council tax levels in 2005–06 under 5 per cent. If the changes were not implemented, local government would face increasing pension costs of about £300 million per annum over the next three years, which would mean possible cuts in services and front-line jobs and pressures on council tax levels. We all know that public sector pensions must be reformed. Indeed, we have reformed our own pensions as Members of Parliament. The changes for local government workers are part of that process.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): On the day of the inauguration of George W. Bush as President of the United States once again, has the Leader of the House had an opportunity to look at a BBC World Service poll, which shows that the British people and the people of practically every other nation believe the world is a less safe, less secure place because of the President? Can we therefore have a debate about our special relationship to examine it, put forward the true views of the British people on that relationship and warn Americans about any future action in Iran during the President's second term?

Mr. Hain: That was a constructive intervention for the purpose of influencing American foreign policy. No doubt the hon. Gentleman does not intend to be Foreign Secretary at any stage in his future career.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Unlike you!

Mr. Hain: As always, the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) makes helpful interventions and is a bit of a joker. The hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) raises an important point. Why has the middle east peace process—which the Prime Minister has made a priority for many months, if not years—been retriggered? In part, because of that special relationship. As a result of the Prime Minister visiting Washington and meeting President Bush very soon after his re-election, the middle east peace process suddenly entered a new dynamic phase. We need that process to succeed, and maintaining the special relationship will help it to do so.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): Setting aside the question of licensing hours, Britain has a serious alcohol problem now, and if there had been no Licensing Act 2003, it would still have a serious alcohol problem that must be addressed, with high levels of addiction, high death rates from cirrhosis of the liver, rising levels of heavy drinking among young women and, most worrying of all, a high incidence of foetal alcohol syndrome. Will my right hon. Friend make time for a full debate on all aspects of Britain's alcohol problem, including factors such as price, advertising and health warnings on alcoholic drinks?

Mr. Hain: I know that that issue was raised in Health questions. My hon. Friend makes a serious and considered point with which I am sure we all agree. That is why the Secretary of State for Health has taken forward a plan for tackling the alcohol problem. There is a culture in this country that is almost unique among comparable countries, and is very disturbing. If one goes to France or Spain, where there is the same flexibility in licensing laws that we intend to bring in, one does not see this phenomenon: young girls, let alone young boys, are not paralytic and fighting each other on the streets. We have to work together to tackle that.

Mr. Mackay: The Leader of the House will be aware that Peter Sutcliffe is rightly incarcerated for good in my constituency. Is he also aware that there is grave concern in my constituency and in Yorkshire that the Home Secretary allowed him to leave Broadmoor hospital for a day, which is unacceptable? Can he ensure that the new Home Secretary comes to the House to explain himself, because this very bad start for him makes it clear that he is not serious about law and order and crime prevention?

Mr. Hain: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's concerns. He may wish to consult the statement that the Home Office made this morning in which the Home Secretary made the background to this matter absolutely clear.

John Cryer (Hornchurch) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the widespread concern about the apparent intensification and growth of Islamic and Christian fundamentalism. Recently, as a result of the screening of "Jerry Springer—The Opera", a Christian fundamentalist group decided to publicise the names and home addresses of BBC executives. That was absolutely disgraceful. Some of those groups are keen that the blasphemy laws should be extended to cover their own particular beliefs. Some of us believe the opposite: that the existing blasphemy legislation should be abolished, if only to make it absolutely clear that we are not going to give way to these fanatics. Could we have a debate on that legislation?

Mr. Hain: I am not in favour of fundamentalism of any kind, whether Christian, Islamic or Tory. I understand my hon. Friend's point; that is why we are bringing in a new offence to ban discrimination on the grounds of religion.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): The Leader of the House will understand that not every Member of the House can be present at this statement to hear the business for the following week, and that many rely on access to the parliamentary video and data network to garner that information by e-mail or by looking at the official record. This weekend, we are to be denied access to the full facilities of that network. That will affect not only information about this business statement, but our ability to transact business on behalf of our constituents, which will be heavily constrained, if not made impossible. Will the Leader of the House postpone whatever work is to be carried out and try to find a more convenient time for it to be done, so that Members can maintain access to this vital communication network?

Mr. Hain: I understand the point that the right hon. Gentleman reasonably makes. I am advised that the difficulty is that the system needs an upgrade, and if it is not done sooner rather than later the problem will develop into a bigger one. It is better to do it over a weekend than during the working week. However, I will bear his comments in mind, and I am sure that the Serjeant at Arms will want to take careful note of them.

Richard Younger-Ross: The Government recently published a document called, "Iran's Nuclear Programme—a Collection of Documents". Skipping over the fact that I always thought that a collection of documents was called a dossier—perhaps we are not allowed to use that word any more—will the Leader of the House ask the Foreign Secretary to make a statement on that? In particular, can the Foreign Secretary tell us whether the UK would give assistance to the US in relation to any military intervention in Iran, and whether the Prime Minister will make it clear to Mr. Bush after his "do" today that we will not support any such action?

Mr. Hain: Both the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary have already made it crystal clear that such action is not on the British agenda at all. In respect of the document, the Foreign Secretary will be here to answer questions on Tuesday.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): Would it be possible for the Leader of the House to arrange for a statement by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland concerning the statement made on RTE by an elected Member of the Northern Ireland Assembly, Mitchel McLaughlin, that the murder of Mrs. McConville, who went out to help a British soldier who was shot and did what any woman would have done to comfort him in his last moments, was not a crime because it was sanctioned by a court martial of the IRA? Does not it further corrupt the body politic when such things go unchallenged?

Mr. Hain: Criminality and murder must be no part of a democratic future in Northern Ireland, and any groups that want to be part of that future must eliminate it from their practices and beliefs. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will want to take careful note of the points that the hon. Gentleman raises.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): May I remind the Leader of the House that on 13 October the Scrutiny Committee recommended a debate on a Commission document on the fight against fraud in the European Union, and that on 12 January the same Committee recommended a debate on another document relating to the so-called European Anti-Fraud Office? Are we failing to have those very important debates because the Government condone fraud and malpractice in the EU or because they do not care about public expenditure?

Mr. Hain: As the hon. Gentleman knows, most of this fraud, which is a scandal but has been tackled much more energetically in recent times than previously, takes place in member states rather than in Brussels. He will be aware that a debate on fraud in the European Union is taking place in Westminster Hall next Wednesday, and he will have an opportunity to make his points there.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): On the subject of our sitting hours, may I gently point out to the Leader of the House that to this particular Scottish Member it makes not a whit of difference whether we finish at 5 o'clock or 6 o'clock on a Thursday, because neither time will allow me to get home on a Thursday night?

I associate myself with the call by the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) for a statement on the operation of Post Office card accounts, and bring to the House's attention the situation that recently faced a post office in my constituency that was flooded after the very high tides resulting from the bad weather and had its electricity supply knocked out. As a result, pensioners in that part of Orkney were unable to get their pensions because they had access only through the computer system, which was obviously not available to the post office. Surely that situation is not acceptable.

Mr. Hain: Clearly not. I am sure that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will want to pay careful attention to the hon. Gentleman's comments and to look into the matter.

On sitting hours, I appreciate that even if we stopped at lunchtime on a Thursday, the hon. Gentleman still might not get back that evening. I am sorry, but I cannot change the geography of the Orkney islands.

Mr. Bercow: May we please have a debate in Government time on the long overdue and much needed further reform of the House of Lords? Given that a cross-party group of Members of Parliament, including my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), and the hon. Members for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) and for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright), has called for a predominantly if not overwhelmingly elected Chamber—a view with which I happen to agree, as does, I suspect, the Leader of the House—does he agree that it is vital, not least in the name of self-respect, that we should have an early debate, reach a conclusion and proceed accordingly? Surely that is in the interests of parliamentary scrutiny and democratic legitimacy alike.

Mr. Hain: I strongly agree with the hon. Gentleman's general point—he invited me to agree with him, and I do. I have long supported such reform of the Lords, as he acknowledged, although I am not sure how long he has supported it.

Mr. Bercow: For a long time.

Mr. Hain: That is excellent. We need to reach a conclusion not only on the composition of the Lords but on its powers. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman agrees with that. The proper role of the Lords is that of a revising, improving Chamber, not a vetoing Chamber on the decisions of the House of Commons, which is how it has acted for the past few years in particular.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Does the Leader of the House recall the double act by the two

[Dr. Julian Lewis]

Chancellors—of the Exchequer and the Duchy of Lancaster—at an election poster unveiling, an event that featured all the humour but none of the charm of the Two Ronnies? May we have a statement about the use of Government cars by Ministers and their flunkies attending events of that sort, as they are evidently going to become more and more frequent in the weeks ahead?

Mr. Hain: We will add a discussion of the Short money to that debate, shall we?

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the rules governing these matters are very strict, and need to be observed. Anyone who has enjoyed the privilege of ministerial life is aware of that.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): May we have a debate on the state of the United Kingdom film industry? Last year only 27 films were made solely in this country and solely by UK producers, 40 per cent. fewer than last year, and a number of productions scheduled for this year have already been shelved. The main reason that has been given is a change introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the tax relief that the film industry used to enjoy. It is pointless Ministers' rubbing shoulders with the glitterati and celebs on the red carpet if they will not ensure that film producers and their technicians can shine by backing the industry.

Mr. Hain: As I am sure the hon. Gentleman will realise if he looks into the matter in detail, a loophole was being exploited and abused. It has now been closed, but the Chancellor has also provided separate and quite proper targeted relief to support the film industry, which now enjoys the prospect of a very bright future.

Speaker's Statement

1.21 pm

Mr. Speaker: I am aware of the interest in the actions of British servicemen in Iraq, stimulated by the publication of photographs in the press yesterday. While passing reference may be made to the general standards of conduct of British forces, the Chair will not allow any comment on cases before a court or a court martial, which are clearly covered by the House's sub judice rule.

Points of Order

1.22 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I welcome your statement, but the point of order is about a different matter. Have you received a request from any senior Minister, perhaps even the Prime Minister, to come to the House and make a statement that the Labour party will not accept Short money when it loses the general election?

Mr. Speaker: No, I have received no such approach.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It relates to your statement.

In the past, various Speakers have come down on me like the proverbial ton of bricks for infringing a sub judice rule. I think I understand your reasons for telling me yesterday that it was not your business, Mr. Speaker, but could we clarify the distinction between "sub judice" as recognised by the House of Commons and the sub judice rule that has apparently been infringed by the press in recent days?

Mr. Speaker: What I say to the hon. Gentleman is that the question he asked yesterday was not about the sub judice rule. What I say about the press report is that we in the House of Commons have higher standards than the press.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, further to your ruling. This morning I studied the rules on the treatment of prisoners of war, and I was proposing, if called, to speak about their treatment in general terms—without, of course, referring to any current cases. Can you confirm that that would be in order?

Mr. Speaker: I can tell the hon. Gentleman, whose standards are very high indeed, that that would be perfectly in order. My concern is for Members not to be drawn into a discussion or debate about any court martial or civil action that may currently be under way.

Armed Forces Personnel

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Ainger.]

1.24 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): This debate on personnel issues takes place against a backdrop of intense public scrutiny of the alleged misconduct of some soldiers in Iraq. I am sure the House will appreciate—this is in line with your ruling, Mr. Speaker—that it would be inappropriate for me to comment on the current case, or on other ongoing investigations.

The Prime Minister was right yesterday to draw a distinction between tyranny and democracy and to speak of the way in which we in this country seek at all times to bring wrongdoers to justice. He was also right to echo views expressed by the Chief of the General Staff, General Sir Mike Jackson, drawing attention to the fact that some 65,000 British soldiers have served in Iraq with distinction. They have done so with courage, exhibiting the highest levels of professionalism in helping to deliver the peace and stability so earnestly sought by the Iraqi people.

Another issue is currently exciting the minds of some hon. Members and the media. It relates, of course, to the accusation that Ministers are indifferent to our serving soldiers and other personnel who have been injured in conflict. The charge that Ministers are uncaring and unmindful of the needs of personnel as they recuperate is, in my view, an unwarranted slur that could not be further from the truth. I have personally met soldiers, both in theatre and back at their home bases, who were recovering from their injuries. I have also visited field hospitals to pay tribute to the sterling efforts of our medical personnel, who work in what are sometimes difficult circumstances but still deliver the highest level of care to our injured troops—and, on occasion, provide medical care for injured civilians.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has visited the Ministry of Defence hospital unit at Selly Oak hospital, and the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin), is due to go there shortly. The visit was planned some time ago, well before the recent furore.

I intend to deal later with the general issues relating to the Defence Medical Services, but I want to make it clear at the outset that the consequences of conflict, whether death or injury, weigh heavily on the minds of those who commit the armed forces to action. To suggest otherwise is ill-judged, misplaced and, not to put too fine a point on it, offensive. Having said that, I should add that today's personnel debate is timely.

The pace of change across the globe is clear for all to see and shows no sign of slowing down. That offers special challenges to our armed forces—challenges to which they have risen magnificently—and places a special responsibility on the Government to ensure that our services are properly structured to face the world of tomorrow. The focus of our people policies is on providing better trained and more flexibly deployable forces. Together with our continuing investment in new platforms and technology, they will deliver the military capability that we need today and in the foreseeable future.

[Mr. Adam Ingram]

Current threats to international peace and security are obvious to us all. In recent years, terrorist groups who respect neither international borders nor the sanctity of human life have aspired to inflict even greater levels of destruction to achieve their warped objectives. In weak and failing states, mismanagement and corruption can lead to poverty, hunger, disease and the collapse of law and order. They pose significant challenges for the international community. In some cases, they provide safe havens from which terrorist groups and those involved in organised crime can easily operate and recruit. The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction remains a serious concern and a serious threat to international security.

With our allies and partners, we must confront and tackle the causes of instability in the world, as well as its consequences. That means working with our European, NATO and United Nations partners to resolve conflict, build peace and lay foundations for democracy. That is what we have been doing in the Balkans, Afghanistan and Iraq.

To ensure that we are best placed to meet those challenges, the Ministry of Defence has embarked on an ambitious modernisation and rebalancing of the armed forces. Each of our services needs to prepare its men and women to meet changing security challenges in less predictable and more complex operational environments. We need the right number of people available in the right place and at the right time, equipped with the right skills. That is how we will deliver military effect.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): What support has the Minister received for his proposals to restructure the Scottish infantry—apart, perhaps, from that of General Sir Mike Jackson—from veterans, regimental associations and forces families?

Mr. Ingram: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman and his party do not support our proposals. Indeed, they have called the Union flag "the butcher's apron", and I have not heard that being repudiated from the nationalist Benches. We are not hiding from that fact that what we have sought to achieve has created considerable debate. We must take account of the needs of the future, however, as well as trying to understand the sensitivities of the past. The hon. Gentleman, who is perhaps a bit of a specialist on one particular regiment, should also recognise that we have been through these iterations before in Scotland. Regiments have been amalgamated before and they are, of course, subject to further changes.

I have met some of the associations involved and I have to respond to many inquiries from members of the public who are genuinely interested in this issue—people who really have the interests of the regiment at heart, rather than those who are interested only in political point scoring. We try to get across that the demographics in Scotland present difficulties for recruitment. I have explained before, from the Dispatch Box and elsewhere, that those demographics are such that it is not only the armed forces that come under pressure when recruiting—this applies right across the public services and certain parts of the private sector. We have to deal with that, look to the future and decide how best we can marshal the available resources, in people terms, to leave us best placed to deal with any future threats. I am also conscious that the hon. Gentleman, in opposing what we are doing with the armed forces, does not actually want to use them. Perhaps he just wants them to stand outside castles and be a tourist attraction, but that is a matter for his party and its supporters.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): On recruitment, I have here an answer given by the Under-Secretary on 18 November to a question from the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton), in which she asked whether there had been a cap on recruitment for the infantry in the last three years. The Minister answered:

"There have been control measures placed on all levels of the Army . . . to meet adjustments to funding allocations."—[Official Report, 18 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 1824W.]

Does that not suggest that there was a recruitment freeze in place, and would not such a freeze have had an impact on recruitment?

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Lady has not been listening to the other answers that have been given on this issue. In recent times, we have been very successful in our recruitment campaigns overall. That means that we have had to adjust the training structures to meet the increased numbers of recruits coming in. That involves taking experienced personnel away from the front line and putting them back into the training environment at a time when the front line in certain key areas is exceptionally busy. To pause is therefore the way to get the best adjustment. It was not a freeze, although I know that the hon. Lady will keep using that word no matter how many explanations she is given.

I am trying to explain how our success has meant that we have to ensure that we get the balance right between the training environment and our front-line demands. If we look back to the exercise known as "Front Line First", which took place in the 1990s, there was a thinning out of the training environment resulting in a significant reduction in the ratio between instructors and trainees. We have had to address that. During my time, we have put a considerably more money back into the training environment and increased the number of instructors, in order to strike a better balance.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): That is not true.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister—

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) made a sedentary comment that that was not true. I shall give way to him.

Mr. Blunt: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. As far as I can recall, there were no studies in "Front Line First", with which I was intimately associated, that resulted in a thinning out of the number of instructors per trainee. That was not a product of "Front Line First". Indeed, its result was to release resources to increase training, such as flying training for the Royal Air Force. That was a direct benefit of the process.

Mr. Ingram: We were talking about infantry and the Army, but there are certainly variations within that answer. The hon. Gentleman should go back and look at just what happened as a result of "Front Line First". He should also study the reports that have been produced on the back of the tragic incidents at Deepcut and at the investigations that the Army conducted, which looked at some of these issues. We can exchange history lessons from that period, but if the hon. Gentleman looks at what happened in the training environment he will see that the ratios were changed, not because of an increase in the number of recruits, but because of a reduction in the number of instructors. The ratio reached a level which then had to be adjusted. If that had not been the case, I would not have had to put in additional resources to increase the number of instructors. I believe that what I was saying was true, but I am not disagreeing with some elements of what the hon. Gentleman said.

Mr. Bellingham: Does the Minister agree that, when service personnel put their lives at risk, they do so not only for Queen and country but for their comrades and their regiment? Obviously, the ethos and history of a regiment is very important. Does it not worry him that, by scrapping every remaining English county regiment, he will undermine that key ethos?

Mr. Ingram: Well, there is always a possibility of anything, I suppose. I tried to explain in my preamble that this is about trying to reshape and restructure the Army for the future. That has gone on through the 1950s, the 1960s, the 1970s, the 1980s and the 1990s. Over recent decades, something like 44 regiments have come out of the line under Conservative Administrations, and 22 under Labour. I am not trying to make a cheap point here. I am simply saying that previous Governments have had to deal with changing environments and to restructure accordingly. Only time will tell whether that restructuring has been effective and can deliver for those who approach this issue from a military, as opposed to a political, perspective and who have to help those honourable men and women who serve Queen and country to deal with the challenges that they face. This is about military advice and military assessments, and about matching resources to those needs. Previous Governments have done the same.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Will the Minister confirm that there is a need for fairness in recruitment across the United Kingdom? That being the case, does he think that the 10 counties that traditionally recruit to the Royal Anglian Regiment, and which have a population of 2 million more than the entire population of Scotland, are being unfairly represented in the new structure that he is proposing?

Mr. Ingram: No, I do not. In the early examination of what we are seeking to do, there was a view that the four battalions coming out and the redistribution of certain posts would strengthen the capability of the Army. At the same time as doing away with the arms plot, it was mooted that two regiments should go from Scotland because of the recruiting profile. A judgment was made, however, that to do that would be wrong because it would have left a bit of the United Kingdom from which we did not draw soldiers into a regiment and/or a battalion. We were trying to get an equal distribution, so the debate then turned to four battalions coming out—one from Scotland and three from England. The hon. Gentleman will be aware, however, that in a sense only two have been taken from England, because of the determination to look at utilising 1 Para as a core base of a tri-service support battalion for special forces. There was, therefore, a process of change as all of that got under way. We tried to examine how best to lay down the footprint across the whole of the United Kingdom, so I do not think that "unfairness" is a word that I recognise. I think that the process has been well judged but, as ever, only time will tell whether we have got it right.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): I speak as someone who congratulates the Department on having the courage to rebalance our armed forces to meet future challenges and enhance capability. Nevertheless, does the Minister agree that the names of the new regiments are important, particularly because history and tradition affect recruitment? Will he confirm that the Secretary of State is carefully considering the names of the new regiments? The Royal Welch Fusiliers and the Royal Regiment of Wales have a 300-year tradition and it is very important that we get the new names right.

Mr. Ingram: I believe that it is important to get the names right. That is why the Army spent so much time examining the issue. There was a whole process of consultation within the Army, which the Army Board took into account. Not everyone agrees with what we are doing—[Interruption.] It is a big change. History shows that there is always a great debate whenever that happens. It was the same when the Conservatives decided to integrate the Gordon's into the Highlands. There was a big furore in Scotland about that, but a brave and, I think, justifiable decision was taken because of the need to bring about that effective change.

As to the Secretary of State becoming involved, we have said consistently that it is a matter best left to the Army, and we should tread warily and not become over-involved. That is particularly true when many people believe that this is an election year. That may or may not be the case. We should not be seen to be playing with this matter for political purposes, but I recognise the strong feelings expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) and others in Wales. Their representations will be made available to the senior military personnel who deal with these matters. It will be for them to decide. As I said, it would be wrong to bring political pressure into the debate because we would then be criticised for over-interference.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con) rose—

Mr. Ingram: I am not giving way to the hon. Gentleman. He can enter the debate later if he wants to.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Ingram: I have given way quite extensively already and I want to make some progress.

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Ingram: I have just said no. I am generally willing to give way to my hon. Friends and I may provide her with an opportunity to intervene later.

[Mr. Ingram]

It would be wrong to assume that better armed forces equal bigger armed forces. Our emphasis is on providing agile and flexible forces, utilising 21st century technology, to ensure that they are structured with a pattern of operations that they are most likely to undertake. More people do not necessarily mean more capability. By shifting resources from lower priority capabilities and delivering maximum efficiencies where possible, we will make the best use of our people. We will also provide better support and better equipment to our people. Those are essential factors in taking care of our people.

For the Army, particularly the infantry, those organisational changes are essential to addressing the new challenges. They will mean that we have more deployable troops and that our troops will be better balanced in respect of the branches and trades required for modern operations. Ending the arms plot will increase the availability of the infantry for operations. Capability will no longer be lost through the need for battalions to move location or re-role.

No matter how good our infantry, it needs top quality support to be effective. That is why we will reinvest people freed up by normalisation in Northern Ireland in key areas such as engineering and logistics, which have been in great demand in recent operations. By boosting capacity in those areas, we will also make a real difference to the lives of hundreds of key specialists and their families.

Similarly, the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force are embracing change and delivering force structure changes in line with our operational requirements. For the RAF in particular, that will mean a reduction in numbers, but the result will be forces better suited to the challenges that they will face in the future rather than the conflicts of the past.

There will, of course, be an impact on our people. For some, it will be unsettling in the short term. To maintain a balanced force structure, there will need to be a limited number of redundancies. That is essential so that we do not repeat past mistakes that left gaps in our force structure. It does not imply, however, any less commitment to continue recruiting high quality people or to offering young people a wide variety of challenging and rewarding careers.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD) rose—

Mr. Ingram: I am not giving way.

We recognise that the restructuring of the armed forces has not been welcomed by everyone, but we believe that it is necessary to ensure that our forces can meet the challenges that they will face tomorrow in the same way as they are succeeding in the challenges that they face today. Let me spend a few moments on those challenges. We currently have some 32,000 personnel deployed in 10 countries around the world.

Mrs. Betty Williams rose—

Mr. Ingram: I am about to move on to a different subject, so I shall be generous and give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Mrs. Williams).

Mrs. Williams: I am very grateful to my right hon. Friend for that. In view of his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith), would he and his team in the Ministry of Defence be prepared to meet a delegation from the parliamentary side? He will be aware of the considerable disquiet in Wales concerning the proposals for restructuring.

Mr. Ingram: Throughout the whole process, the Secretary of State, the Under-Secretary and I have met interested parties extensively across the board. My answer to my hon. Friend's request is yes. I understand that a letter from hon. Members based in Wales is on its way. I have not yet received it, but I have been notified of it.

Mr. Hancock rose—

Mr. Robathan rose—

Mr. Ingram: Let me say to the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) that he will have an opportunity to enter the debate later and I suggest that he does so. As to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), I know that he is a member of the Select Committee and that he has been highly critical about the subject that we are discussing now. I was rather surprised that he did not attend the meeting to put me on the rack. That is what Select Committees are for, so I do not know why he was not there. He has had plenty of opportunities to raise issues with me. If he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, perhaps he can enter the debate later.

Mr. Hancock: The right hon. Gentleman is afraid to take my intervention.

Mr. Ingram: One thing that I certainly can say to the hon. Gentleman is that I am not afraid.

Since the tragic Indian ocean tsunami, UK personnel have acted quickly and effectively to provide assistance to those affected. Working closely with the Department for International Development in support of the UN, our personnel have provided much-needed skill, expertise and equipment. A C-17, TriStar and five C-130 air transport planes have been made available to DFID to assist in delivering new UN aid and heavy equipment to the region. I visited Brize Norton earlier this week to thank the air crew, ground crew and planning staff for all their efforts over recent weeks.

In addition to the RAF contribution, HMS Chatham, which has two Lynx helicopters, and Royal Fleet Auxiliary Diligence, which is co-operating closely with a reconnaissance team on the ground, are providing assistance in restoring livelihoods, schools and medical facilities to villages on the east coast of Sri Lanka. Engineering support has also been deployed to the Maldives to assist in repairs to generators and desalination equipment. Instrumental in co-ordinating the military response with DFID and regional government and military representatives have been the three military observation, liaison and reconnaissance teams deployed to the region. I know that the whole House will pay tribute to all of those engaged in the massive humanitarian effort and to those members of the armed forces who have made such an invaluable contribution.

More than 8,000 personnel are deployed on Operation Telic. In difficult conditions, they are successfully providing direct security assistance to the Iraqi authorities and building the capacity of Iraqi security forces to take on that role. The relatively stable security environment in our area of operations is a testament, I believe, to our armed forces' achievement. It has enabled progress to be made on the reconstruction of schools and hospitals and the restoration of water and power. Our people are making a vital contribution to building a peaceful, stable and democratic Iraq. We should take pride in what they have achieved to date.

Mr. Ingram: I suppose I shall have to give way to the hon. Gentleman, although I am breaking the rules.

Mr. Robathan: I am most grateful. I want to bring the Minister back to the tsunami. He is right that HMS Chatham and RFA Diligence are doing excellent work. However, will he confirm that the Diligence is, unfortunately, to be scrapped next year rather than replaced, and that the Chatham is one of 31 frigates and destroyers that are to be reduced to 25 over the next few years? That will lead to a considerable shortage of ships to assist in future disasters.

Mr. Ingram: That does not necessarily follow. I am conscious that the Conservative party has recently announced its back-of-a-fag-packet approach to defence expenditure. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could tell us in his winding-up speech—

Mr. Robathan: I shall be happy to do that.

Mr. Ingram: Oh good. I look forward the analysis of the way in which the Conservatives will keep every legacy system at the same time as continuing with expensive procurement streams. The scale of the spend on all that could mean that the hon. Gentleman might have to tackle some matters later. He also claims that he would keep all the regiments. I believe that he intends to achieve all that through cutting 25,000 extra personnel from overall staff in the Ministry of Defence. That is on top of the 20,000 that we announced and towards which we are progressively working. I shall certainly return for the winding-up speeches if I am going to hear all that detail, but I doubt whether I shall hear it. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will give way to me when he starts looking at the back of that fag packet.

Afghanistan has already made huge progress. President Karzai's victory in a free and fair election last autumn is testament to that. Our forces, currently some 800 strong, contributed to that success. Whether serving with the international security assistance force in Kabul in the north or with the coalition, our forces have made a genuine impact, helping the Afghan people to bring greater peace and stability to their country.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): Did my right hon. Friend see the headline in today's Daily Express about the Queen's being angry about the treatment of the wounded? Is that not clearly unfair to Ministers? Is it not extremely doubtful whether the Queen expressed any view at all on the matter? Does he have any figures about the number of wounded who have returned from Afghanistan and Iraq? I ask for only a rough figure, because the report was outrageous.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I must remind the hon. Gentleman and the House that it is not correct or proper to bring the name of the Queen into debate.

Mr. Ingram: I am grateful for that ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was going to comment accordingly. I do not always believe what I read in the newspapers and I believe some newspapers even less than others, although I had better not rank them. When I read glaring and lurid headlines, I sometimes wonder why newspapers report in that manner.

My hon. Friend asks an important question, however, because there is a charge that we have somehow been hiding the figures, and that is not the case. The figures are not currently available but such information can readily be made available to the House. I shall write to my hon. Friend and place the content in the Library. Of course, he could have asked a parliamentary question to ascertain the information.

When we talk about the injured, we must acknowledge that, sadly, some people are seriously injured but that injuries can be caused in many different ways. For example, road traffic accidents are sometimes serious; some people become ill through picking up a bug, and injuries can even occur in training in theatre. We must balance all that. I am happy to help my hon. Friend to gain a better understanding of what we have published not only for Iraq but for Afghanistan and perhaps other theatres.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): On the deployment of our forces in Afghanistan, will my right hon. Friend update us on the international contribution alongside our forces? The Secretary-General of NATO has made strong pleas in recent months for larger contributions to assist the ISAF. Does my right hon. Friend believe that other countries are doing enough to assist the Secretary-General and stability and progress in Afghanistan?

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend has a good knowledge of those matters. Although the Secretary-General has made such comments, my hon. Friend knows that there are also continuing discussions with allies to consider different formations that could be used in Afghanistan. Our allies are individually and collectively considering, for example, taking on provincial reconstruction teams and with which phase—1, 2 or 3—of the PRTs they engage. It is a matter of getting the right combination of countries to make an important impact in key areas as we progressively move into others. Again, I shall write to my hon. Friend to outline the current position. I hope that it will aid him to understand which countries have made a contribution, which are considering making a contribution, and the possible combination of such contributions. Clearly, we must acknowledge the sensitivity of some discussions, which can take place between Defence Ministers and, indeed, at prime ministerial level, to try to develop force generation. Those individual representatives have to report to their democratic forums. That means that sometimes we can divulge what is happening and at other times we cannot. However, I shall give my hon. Friend as much information as possible.

In the Balkans, UK forces continue to assist with achieving self-sustaining peace and stability. Their efforts were brought into sharp relief last year when our people were instrumental in helping to restore calm after the March violence in Kosovo. In Bosnia, the UK took leadership of the EU mission, launched last December, which aims to move that country forward towards its Euro-Atlantic goals.

Those operations have meant a major strategic evolution in the employment of our reserve forces. We are moving from a large but little-used reserve to a smaller and more effective force. Since 1995, the reserves have consistently provided 10 to 15 per cent. of manpower deployed in the Balkans. They have deployed to Afghanistan and, since January 2003, nearly 11,000 have been mobilised to support Operation Telic. Some 5,300 took part in the combat phase.

Our reserves and their employers have responded magnificently and I thank them for that. Indeed, such have been reservists' contributions to operations that we intend to integrate them still further into our force structures. As already announced, that will involve some reorganisation and re-roling to achieve the optimum operational capability that we seek.

In parallel and in recognition of reservists' contributions, we shall continue to explore ways in which to improve the support that we provide to them and their employers.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Is the Minister conscious that many reservists have given up to six months' service? Many can do that only once in their career without its being detrimental to their families or their jobs. How can we ensure that the strength of the Territorial Army is maintained and that we do not lose the service of those who have already made serious commitments? If we do not achieve that, people will tend not to volunteer for fear that they will simply fall out.

Mr. Ingram: That is a genuine problem. We have undertaken the review because of the intensity of the effort and of the demand that we have made on the reserve and TA forces recently. We are therefore considering how better to organise them so that they are better integrated into work alongside the regular forces. The close integration of the reserve forces with the regular forces is nevertheless amazing. I witnessed that in Iraq and it was impossible to tell them apart. However, concern was expressed that the engagement of such a large number of reservists would mean some disjointedness and disconnection. That was not the case.

We have learned valuable lessons from the deployment. There was also a worry that employers would say, "Hold on a moment, this is too big a commitment. You're taking away key personnel." Some reservists are unquestionably key players in their companies. We have to consider the whole matter, which relates to my earlier point that size does not deliver quality of itself. Getting optimum strength and the right structure, with the right resources, commitment and use is vital. That should be presented up front so that people know to what and for what they are joining up, and what the demand on them is likely to be. We want to give them a future horizon of utilisation. That may not be easy, or possible, but we want them to have confidence that they are being used in a balanced way. That work is under way, and valuable lessons can be learned from recent experiences.

I would also like to recognise the contribution made by our civilian staff. Many are currently living and working alongside their military colleagues in operational theatres, providing advice on policy and on financial, legal, contractual and other issues. Indeed, several of our deployed civilians were recognised in last month's special honours list for Iraq. I am sure that the House will join me in paying tribute to the contributions that our civilians make, in the field and behind the scenes, to our success on operations.

The excellent achievements of our regular and reserve forces are testimony to the degree of preparation provided by high-quality individual training and education throughout their careers.

While physical and mental challenge is an integral and essential part of military training, the services are very conscious of the need to treat people as individuals, taking full account of varying abilities, needs and aspirations. Even so, we have been criticised as the result of tragic incidents in some training establishments. We have taken this criticism seriously and have made—and will continue to make—strenuous efforts to correct shortcomings and put in place robust systems to ensure that best practice is recognised and spread, that the highest standards are maintained, and that our training process is open to professional scrutiny.

As the House will be aware, the adult learning inspectorate is currently undertaking a detailed survey as to the manner in which the MOD discharges its duty of care to young people in training. This important work, which sits alongside the current inquiry by the Defence Select Committee, will report before Easter, and it is my intention to bring their findings, and our response, to the House at the earliest opportunity.

The MOD is one of the largest single providers of training and education in the UK. The lifelong learning process maximises individual potential through professional and personal development, and requires the active participation of both the organisation and the individual, supported by best-practice quality assurance systems. It captures education, academic and vocational learning activity, delivered through career and beyond. It includes, but is not limited to, modern apprenticeships, national vocational qualifications and higher education, including post-graduate training.

A fundamental premise is that, where possible, relevant defence training will be accredited towards civilian qualifications. Qualification, knowledge and experience gained through lifelong learning benefit both the Department and the individual. We also ensure that our people have access to the best available medical care at home, on exercise and on operations.

At home, our regional rehabilitation units have greatly reduced waiting lists and inappropriate referrals to secondary care for musculoskeletal injuries. The MOD is a leader in this type of initiative. In mental health, we have pursued a modern, community-based care approach. We have established, with King's College London, a mental health unit to keep abreast of the latest thinking. The Royal Centre for Defence Medicine is also a key element in our modernisation and the nucleus of a centre of military medical excellence in the midlands.

We have a successful partnership with the Department of Health and we work hard to ensure that our two Departments and the NHS work together effectively. Initiatives include the possible joint procurement of drugs, and we have already delivered improvements in reception arrangements for military casualties from overseas. On operations, and particularly recently in Iraq, regular and reserve personnel in the Defence Medical Services have played a vital role and provided high standards of clinical care in difficult circumstances.

I am sure that hon. Members will join with me in acknowledging the debt that we owe to those who have been killed or injured in operations or other circumstances, and in expressing our sympathy for the price paid by them, their partners and their families.

We continue to support those families to minimise any further distress. For example, we have reviewed our policies regarding the provision of living accommodation to bereaved spouses and their children. We will ensure that they have somewhere to live close to their families while they come to terms with their loss, and we aim to react quickly, sensitively and effectively to accommodate injured personnel in modified housing where there is a need.

We have also reviewed our boards of inquiry process to ensure that they are instigated more quickly – within 48 hours – and that Ministers are kept informed of progress. In addition, we have taken action to establish a single point of contact for next of kin, to ensure that they are briefed clearly, comprehensively and regularly so that they understand the stages in the process. We continue to keep these and associated policies under regular review, to ensure that bereaved families and injured personnel are provided with the support that they deserve.

Looking to the future, we must ensure that we have the people policies in place to deliver people who are motivated, multi-skilled and adaptable. We will need recruits with greater potential and we must be able to offer rewarding careers to succeed in a highly competitive job market. Our terms and conditions of service must remain attractive overall, and at least comparable with the private sector. Currently, there is a shortfall of just over 3,000, or 1.6 per cent., against our trained requirement. That figure has been adjusted to reflect the force structure changes announced last July.

We need between 18,000 and 19,000 personnel to join the trained strength of the three services each year, after completing basic training. Typically, that requires annual recruitment of up to 24,000 suitably qualified, fit and motivated young people of the right calibre. Success in recruitment is fundamental to the delivery of the people component of operational capability. To recruit and retain the required number and calibre of people, we must continue to provide attractive terms and conditions of service, and efficient, responsive and modern personnel support processes that meet the changing expectations of people, today and in the future.

Mr. Bellingham: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: No, as I have given way to the hon. Gentleman already.

Mr. Bellingham: It is a separate point.

Mr. Ingram: I should hope so, as I have spoken on about three different subjects since the hon. Gentleman's previous intervention. However, I am conscious of the time and of the fact that other hon. Members want to speak in the debate.

We have developed a service personnel plan to deliver sufficient capable and motivated people, in a co-ordinated, coherent and effective manner. The plan analyses the strategic environment for at least the next 15 years, and uses the latest academic and business techniques. The result is an ambitious, and widely supported, personnel change programme with clear milestones for delivery. It also provides a risk analysis mechanism, and performance metrics led by senior programme champions.

The armed forces are determined to ensure that they become more representative of our diverse society in the UK, through harnessing the wealth of talent and skills of individuals from different backgrounds. We aim to create an environment in which everyone is valued and respected, and encouraged to reach their full potential. I should highlight the fact that, as recently announced by my hon. friend the Under-Secretary of State, we are extending the range of chaplaincy provision currently provided from the Christian and Jewish faiths by appointing the first chaplains from the Buddhist, Hindu, Sikh, and Muslim faiths.

Improving the retention of personnel is a crucial factor in sustaining our desired manning profiles. It also helps to provide an effective return on the substantial investment we make in training our people. Our overall "people package" is a factor when people choose whether to continue service or to seek alternative careers.

The need to recruit, retain and motivate suitably able and qualified people lies at the heart of the independent Armed Forces Pay Review Body's work, with the unique circumstances of service life being a key consideration. I am pleased that last year, for the sixth year in succession, we were able to accept the review body's recommendations in full, including increases to those allowances specifically designed to compensate for separation from families.

The review body's latest report was submitted on 17 January to my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Defence. As always, the Government will give the most careful consideration to the recommendations.

Our forces continue to be deployed on operations and other tasks around the world. I understand the potential impact that this has on families. Family issues are central to our personnel policies. The service families taskforce brings together Ministers and officials from across Government with representatives of the Service

[Mr. Ingram]

Families Association. It plays a vital role on issues affecting communication with families, housing, education, children and health, and I pay genuine tribute to that work.

With the end of the arms plot, battalions will, in future, be fixed by role and largely by location. That will mean that the infantry is able to offer much greater stability for soldiers and their families. It will also allow the career development of soldiers to be much more carefully planned, while keeping the variety, opportunity and challenge of new roles and locations open to soldiers in the large infantry regiments.

All that provides peace of mind for our people while they are away from their partners and families so that they can concentrate on the job in hand. At other times, it allows them to plan their lives with confidence, knowing that they will be able to establish roots in one place, if they want to. That, in turn, supports separate careers for spouses and the schooling and employment of their children. We remain committed to providing good quality accommodation for service personnel and their families.

Bob Russell: Annington Homes.

Mr. Ingram: Well, that charge cannot be levelled against this Administration. I joined the hon. Gentleman not long ago in a major initiative for a big development in his constituency—the beginning of many such projects. I shall leave it to him to score political points against those on the Benches to his right—

Bob Russell: Politically.

Mr. Ingram: Well, one never knows with the Liberal Democrats. However, they are probably on the right side in this instance.

Our housing strategy aims to provide greater choice through a mixed economy of service, rented and privately owned housing. Perhaps the hon. Member for Blaby will tell us when he winds up whether he will reverse the actions taken to sell off service accommodation. Would he spend even more money clearing up the mess his party left behind? He shakes his head: it does not surprise me that he will not rise to the bait.

We aim to provide high-quality single and family service accommodation in the right locations to support mobility. We are also providing better advice and assistance to those who seek greater stability and a stake in the housing market.

We value and support the well-being of the service community, because it is good employment practice and it contributes to operational capability. We have learned lessons from Operation Telic on the availability of welfare services and we are reviewing welfare and well-being issues more widely, including strategies for stress, care of vulnerable people, and the coverage of existing welfare provision.

This April, we introduce new pension and compensation schemes that provide equal terms for officers and other ranks, and compensation better focused on the more seriously disabled. Where possible, the schemes include changes sought by service personnel and ex-service organisations. Notably, we have introduced a major increase to widows' benefits, provided pensions for unmarried partners, improved death-in-service benefit and extended the time limit to claim for compensation. The new arrangements should better meet the needs of the armed forces for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: No, I will not give way. The hon. Gentleman may wish to intervene in the speech by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State later, because he has the specialist knowledge of the matter. I never shy away from taking on a challenge, but I have enough respect for the hon. Gentleman to know that he will take the opportunity to make his contribution in his own way.

We also take the problem of ex-service homelessness very seriously. We have a duty of care to ensure that service personnel are given as much assistance as possible to make a successful transition to civilian life, and when things go wrong, for whatever reason, we provide assistance through ex-service charities. Of the estimated 5 million veterans in the UK, research shows that the vast majority found service life a positive experience and made a successful transition to civilian life.

All service leavers now receive some form of resettlement assistance, regardless of time served or reason for leaving.

Pete Wishart: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman because I enjoy the knockabout with the SNP. Will he apologise for the comment about the butcher's apron?

Pete Wishart: I will ask the question, if the Minister does not mind. How many of the veterans' associations that he consulted in his survey welcome General Jackson's plans for the Scottish infantry?

Mr. Ingram: I have dealt with that point. I have had enough knockabout on that point for now. I offered the hon. Gentleman an opportunity when he intervened. A representative of his party made an outrageous slur on the armed forces and, time and again, I have asked SNP Members to condemn it. They have not done so and, therefore, I can only assume that they share that view. Perhaps I should not have given way, because it has led us into consideration of other issues. However, I repeat the point that we genuinely listen to the views of veteran and regimental associations. I have met several of them, as have my ministerial colleagues. We view the associations with respect and we understand their sincerely expressed point of view. They are not involved in political point-scoring because they have the interests of the regiment at heart. I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman falls into that category.

Mr. Hancock: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: No, I have already dealt with the hon. Gentleman.

The MOD provides general housing advice to all service personnel as well as identifying service leavers at risk of homelessness. For the latter, we provide additional preventive assistance as necessary. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, will speak further on veterans and resettlement issues later in this debate.

Our service and civilian personnel have continued to do a remarkable and widely applauded job in difficult circumstances. But we cannot stand still. We must ensure that our armed forces are organised and equipped to meet the challenges that we will face in the foreseeable future. Our people policies must continue to provide us with the right number of well trained and motivated people, ready to undertake the most demanding operations. I am confident that the work we have in hand now, which I have set out, and our plans for the future will allow us to achieve that goal.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): I welcome this opportunity to speak on behalf of my party in this debate on armed forces personnel. The Government, the Opposition, members of the Select Committee and Back Benchers have all rightly emphasised the importance of our armed forces. Their quality and professionalism are central to our defence and security. In all the debates we have, all hon. Members rightly praise our armed forces, who frequently respond rapidly and decisively to the orders of the day, despite those orders increasingly coming at short notice, sometimes with less than adequate equipment, and involving deployment worldwide.

We take it as a matter of course that our armed forces have the ability to move seamlessly from war fighting to peacekeeping. Relatively few armed forces have the ability to do that. Some can just do war fighting and some can just do peacekeeping. We should be grateful for the professionalism of our armed forces over many years and their leadership, which have meant that they are able to do both.

What our armed forces do and say is now examined in minute detail by 24–7 media, by Parliament and by the public. Their families, as much as they themselves, are now in the firing line. The task we politicians face is to provide the legal basis on which they operate, to provide them with the necessary resources, to give them our support and, at the same time, to hold them to account. It is against that background that we must consider in the course of this debate some of the problems relating to our armed forces in operations overseas.

Earlier, Mr. Speaker rightly said that he would not consider any comments or discussion of the case involving the recent allegations about members of the armed forces. My party actively and absolutely supports that ruling. However, I have some general questions to put to Ministers, which the Under-Secretary may be able to cover at the end of the debate. I put the questions on the grounds that many misleading comments have been made in the press and it is possible that if some factual information is put into the public arena, it will benefit the debate and provide reassurance and confidence to the members of our armed forces, their families and the public.

First, does the Under-Secretary agree that the military do not see themselves as above the law, but that hard lessons have to be learned about how they operate within the law, given military constraints? Is he able to tell the House how many other cases of alleged abuse are being investigated and/or are coming to trial? Some figures have been put by the press into the public domain. Will he clarify, if possible, whether there may be any further repercussions, such as civilian convictions, for any soldier put on trial by court martial who is not found guilty. In other words, is it possible that the case could then come before a civil court? Can he confirm that the Army reviewing authority has the right to overturn a finding of guilt, and amend it and/or the sentence that has been imposed? Is he fully satisfied that proper, timely and full briefing, including the individual training directive briefing, was offered to all our soldiers deployed to Iraq? I hope that we can have some factual information about those problems.

Mr. Bellingham: Many of our constituents have expressed much disquiet about how some cases have been looked at by the Attorney-General before the Army legal people examined them in great detail. Does my hon. Friend agree that those cases should be left to the Army legal services, not to the Attorney-General?

Mr. Simpson: My hon. Friend reflects the concern not only of our constituents but of a number of Members on both sides of the House. To many of us, including those of us on the Front Bench and possibly even Ministers, at times, there appears to be a lack of real clarity about some of the legal aspects, and indeed about the type of legal opinion that not only Ministers but senior officers have to take. I look forward to the Secretary of State coming to the House at some stage and making a full statement about the legal aspects of that problem and of the problems experienced by service personnel as to when they have to, or do not have to, use force on operations, and the consequences if, on the spur of the moment, they make a mistake.

Reductions in training have a progressively damaging effect on the fighting power and ethos of the armed forces. At the highest level, combined arms collective training at formation level and above may look like a quick fix for making savings, but it may take years fully to recover the standards and combined training that have been lost. Being heavily committed to operations can offset some of the disadvantages. At the end of the day, our armed forces are not just on operation as bandbox armed forces. They are there to be used and they have a considerable amount of experience, and I concur entirely with the Minister of State in his criticism of SNP defence policy. I always hate to get in the middle of what is obviously an old family feud that only those with Scottish blood—although with a name like Keith Robert Simpson I have a little Scottish blood—

Pete Wishart rose—

Mr. Simpson: As I mentioned the SNP, I shall be generous and allow the hon. Gentleman to come back on that point.

Pete Wishart: Have the Scottish Conservatives given up the fight to save the Scottish regiments? This is the third time that the one and only Conservative Member with a Scottish constituency has missed an important and crucial debate about the Scottish regiments. Where on earth is he?

Annabelle Ewing: I think he is in my constituency.

Pete Wishart: There we have it. The one and only Scottish Conservative is traipsing around somebody else's constituency instead of being in the Chamber putting the case for the Scottish regiments. The Scottish Conservatives may have forgotten about our regiments but the Scottish National party certainly has not.

Mr. Simpson: Unlike the Minister of State, I welcome the SNP intervention because of the sheer cheek of people who are the greatest political ambulance chasers in the United Kingdom. That statement should be examined and taken at face value.

In a debate on defence in the other House, Lord Guthrie said:

"It is important that our service men and women are properly trained. It should be of great concern that soldiers are now being deployed less well trained than they should be and less well trained than they have been in the past. The defence budget is so tight that training suffers. That affects all parts of the Army. Individual soldiers are less skilled than they were; training standards are too low; gunnery and field firing camps are cancelled; training between infantry, tanks, engineers and those parts of the Army that may have to co-operate and fight together rarely take place."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 January 2005; Vol.668, c. 564.]

In the past when such quotations were used by Conservative Members or even, to be fair, by Labour Back Benchers, they were usually dismissed by Ministers on the grounds that they came from retired military dinosaurs in the other place. No one could refer to General Lord Guthrie as that. He is a man who served all Governments with great loyalty and professionalism and has always been constrained about what he says in public. He reflects publicly the deep concerns about training felt in many parts of the serving armed forces, who rightly do not put their reservations into the public domain.

I have a question for the Under-Secretary about language training. As we prepare our armed forces to fight constantly overseas, developing capability in language training for our military personnel should have considerable priority. Currently, relatively small numbers of our armed forces attend courses at the Defence School of Languages: 363 in 2001–02; 271 in 2002–03; and 380 in 2003–04. Will the MOD consider putting greater emphasis on language training, and is it considering ways of encouraging personnel to undertake further such training, possibly through financial inducements or educational qualifications? Language skills should be given great priority.

I want to turn to the overall situation in Iraq. Our armed forces personnel, as citizens as much as members of the armed forces, have a right to know in detail what Government policy will be over the next few months. With the Iraq elections two weeks away and no signs that the deadly insurgency is abating, the Government should be thinking of and beyond the election date. The imminent Iraqi elections have brought to the foreground calls for an early US withdrawal. Brent Scowcroft, national security adviser to George Bush Senior, predicted "an incipient civil war" and suggested that "the Iraqi elections, rather than being a promising turning point, have the potential for deepening the conflict."

Does the Minister agree with the US Secretary of State designate, Condoleezza Rice, who acknowledged that problems of absenteeism and desertion among Iraqi forces are endemic? Is her assessment that there are 120,000 trained Iraqi troops more realistic than the suggestion of Senator Biden, who claimed after his recent visit to Iraq that the number was closer to 4,000? What is the British Army's assessment, in its area of southern Iraq, of the number of insurgents and the number of trained Iraqi security forces who are available and effective?

We know that the Netherlands will pull out its troops on 15 March, along with the Portuguese contingent, sticking to a decision made in June. What plans are there for increasing the number of other coalition troops in Iraq? Perhaps the Minister will be able to enlighten the House as to whether other countries have been approached and whether there are any positive signs. What are the MOD's plans for additional deployment of British troops to and beyond Multi-National Division (South-East)? Can the Minister shed any light on the report in The Daily Telegraph today that Britain is urging America to announce a timetable for withdrawing coalition troops from Iraq over the next 18 months?

Mike Gapes: In view of the hon. Gentleman's remarks about possible withdrawal from Iraq, can he clarify the position of the Conservative party? Does he believe that we should stay in there and finish the job or that we should cut and run?

Mr. Simpson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that highly partisan point. He knows that we have supported the Government in their attempt to bring law and order to southern Iraq. We support the election. I have been asking the Government specific questions about the situation beyond the election. The Select Committee, of which the hon. Gentleman is a member, has also asked such questions—but answers have we none.

I now turn to MOD support for civilian contingencies, which the Minister touched on. We very much welcome the efforts made by the MOD and by military and civilian personnel who continue to offer support to those people affected by the tsunami in the far east. Can the Minister cast any light on the reasons behind the offer of 500 Gurkhas to Indonesia, and why the Indonesian Government rejected it? Did the advice to offer the Gurkhas come from the Foreign Office or the MOD? Why was the civil affairs group not mobilised and deployed, given the amount of study and work that it has done in the past?

On civil contingencies, may I also press the Minister on homeland security? What plans exist for the use of regular forces stationed in the United Kingdom to react to terrorist incidents in this country, or will that be left entirely to those units of the reserve forces that have been specifically set up to deal with it? Clearly, even if plans exist for regional brigadiers to call for regulars in their commands to assist local authorities, it is difficult to predict whether units will be available while the current overstretch in operational deployments continues. Has the problem with the number of reservists who are double-hatted—those who have a commitment to serve overseas but have also been allocated to Territorial Army units for home defence—been sorted out?

Deployments over the past seven years have included continuous operations in the Balkans and additional operations in Sierra Leone, Kosovo, Afghanistan and Iraq. Commitments have fluctuated from a peak of 44 per cent. of the Army on operations in 1999, falling to 22 per cent. in April 2001, with 31 per cent. committed to operations in November 2001, falling back to 23 per cent. by December 2002, but rising again to about 40 per cent. during the height of the Iraq conflict.

General Lord Guthrie said in the debate in the other House:

"It seems extraordinary to many of us—at a time when there is so much uncertainty in Northern Ireland, where it sadly appears that the situation could again deteriorate; when Iraq needs reinforcing; when Afghanistan needs additional troops; when the Balkans, in particular Kosovo, could erupt; and when the tragedies of Darfur and elsewhere are clear for all to see—that we are actually reducing the size of the Army and in particular the number of infantrymen, who are the very people we need on current and future operations. Cessation of arms plotting certainly will help, but the Army will still be too small for what the Government expect it to do. They expect the Army always to succeed on operations, but they also expect it to sort out the foot and mouth crisis, to fire-fight and to undertake disaster relief."

Mr. Ingram: Just for the record, although this has been said from the Dispatch Box before—I have the utmost regard and highest respect for Lord Guthrie—it is worth the hon. Gentleman reflecting on the fact that the Regular Army is about 2,500 bigger today than when Lord Guthrie was Chief of the Defence Staff.

Mr. Simpson: The Minister's problem is that the Army is deployed more frequently and more of its personnel are now on operations. Unfortunately, as he said, size is not everything, and Lord Guthrie, who has considerable experience, makes the point that, at the end of the day, the Army's critical mass is too small. In particular, the fact that the Government intend to cut four infantry battalions will damage the Army's operational effectiveness.

"Ministers sometimes infer that the Chief of the General Staff, Sir Mike Jackson, and the Army Board approve the measures that are planned. We should be very clear that if adequate resources were available, they believe, as many of us do, that the Army should be increased in size. The Army Board is loyal to Ministers, as it should be—they make the best of it—but that does not mean that they are happy with a smaller Army. I hope Ministers recognise that. It is wrong for them to hide behind the Chiefs of Staff."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 January 2005; Vol. 668, c. 564.]

The current Chief of the General Staff said in an interview to a newspaper on 16 November 2004:

"I would much prefer increasing the size of the Army but that's simply not on offer. I can either accept what's on offer—a reduced size of the Army—or go . . . The debate about the Army's future is not simple. It is time to make some hard decisions."

Mr. John Smith: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman could remind me of the last time a retired Chief of the General Staff said that we had enough Army personnel, or indeed that we had too many.

Mr. Simpson: The hon. Gentleman should know that any professional organisation always requires more, but to my mind and to those who have nothing to do with politics, to have provoked General Lord Guthrie of all people—he is very considered and has worked very closely with the Prime Minister and has been careful not to appear parti pris—into saying such things shows that the matter is one of considerable concern and worry.

Let me turn briefly to Army restructuring, regimental cuts and the reorganisation of the infantry, about which we have had many debates and many statements, and hon. Members on both sides of the House have expressed their concerns, as has the Defence Committee. It is extraordinary that, when we sadly have a stalemate in Northern Ireland, when Iraq may need reinforcing, when there could be other problems in Afghanistan and elsewhere, we are actually reducing the number of infantry battalions—the very people whom the Army and the other services recognise that we need on current and future operations.

The ending of the arms plot has been broadly welcomed—few people in the armed forces or outside would say that its continuation is necessary—but the kind of regimental cuts that Ministers came up with was not such a purist package as they made out. A number of options of one kind or another were on offer. The Minister rightly said that, from a purist, academic, or indeed a civil service point of view, there could be a good argument for reducing further the number of Scottish infantry battalions. Quite rightly, he said that a footprint of one kind or another must be borne in mind.

To any outsider and certainly to those in the Army, the absurdities of the infantry reorganisation, in which the Scottish regiments managed to get their names up front and the English regiments behind, appears to be the most amazing piece of military theology and tautology. I see the Minister smiling. The only point that I would make is that there was a template that the MOD could have used. One part of the infantry that it was decided not to touch were the Guards infantry regiments. The MOD director of infantry's briefing paper said that they were not touched because they have a ceremonial and national profile.

I would not disagree with that view, but the Guards infantry regiments represent the model that could have been used. They are effectively a larger regiment—a Guards regiment—and they retain in that regiment individual infantry regiments, with their history, battle honours, badges, recruitment and so on. They operate effectively, and in respect of arms plotting, they are able to post and cross-post between them. They are a national institution: the Grenadiers, the Coldstream, the Scots, the Irish and the Welsh. I should be fascinated to know why that model was not used—it seems a blinding glimpse of the obvious. That question will not go away, and I tell all hon. Members that I suspect that the reduction in infantry battalions may have to continue, as much as anything else, not just because of financial pressure but because of the pressure of reconfiguring the Army at large.

Not only has the Army been affected. The other two services at times rightly resent the fact that so much emphasis is placed on the Army. RAF trained strength will be reduced from the current figure of 48,500 to approximately 41,000 by April 2008. There may be a major reduction of RAF air bases and facilities throughout the country as part of that configuration. The process will be painful and will raise legitimate questions about the levels sufficient for the RAF to carry out its functions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) will touch on the Royal Navy. There will be a reduction in the strength of not only its manpower but its platforms. As Admiral Lord Boyce has pointed out on numerous occasions, today we can have only one naval platform in one part of the world at any one time. There is incredibly limited flexibility, and if some of the cuts go ahead, operational limitations will be imposed on the Royal Navy, and its ability to assist in disaster relief will also be affected.

Has the average interval of 24 months between tours for the Army been achieved? The Minister rightly highlighted people policies and welfare, and I know that he and his predecessors have put a lot of time and effort into that. I am grateful for his comments about the treatment of our wounded and injured military personnel on operations, because rather lurid comments have been made in the press. I would not infer in any way that either he or his colleagues are insensitive to the situation.

I have some specific factual questions. How many personnel are currently receiving medical attention in the UK? Is there a breakdown between those suffering from physical injuries and stress-related injuries? I welcomed the Minister's comments about the work being done at King's college, London. How many of the servicemen who have been physically or mentally wounded in the past few years have been able to take up their former military careers? How many have been discharged, and what measures have been taken to compensate them financially and enable them to seek civilian employment? The Minister rightly touched on the problems that the Government, and indeed previous Governments, have faced regarding homeless ex-servicemen, which is often highlighted before the holiday season. Does he have any statistics showing many ex-servicemen are homeless today compared with a year ago, and is there a trend?

During our consideration of the Bill that became the Armed Forces (Pensions and Compensation) Act 2004, on which my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) ably led for the official Opposition, the Ministry of Defence refused to address the inability of most members of the armed forces to earn a full career pension. Although we welcome benefits of the new scheme, such as the increase to the death-in-service benefit, it should be noted that the early departure scheme means that those who leave mid-career will be materially worse off than they would have been under the existing scheme. Such important manning and retention tools act as a pull through for members of our armed forces who would ordinarily have left earlier.

Owing to the heightened risks of military service and the requirement for those serving to have high levels of physical fitness, the compensation arrangements under the war pensions scheme have always been generous. The standard of reasonable doubt, which has traditionally been applied in the absence of a time limit on claiming, reflected the exceptional nature of military service and led to the awarding of many claims that would have been unlikely under comparable public service schemes.

Figures provided by the British Legion on claims made in 2002–03 suggest, however, that 60 per cent. of claims would fail under the new criteria following the introduction of the balance of probabilities and the five-year time limit. On Third Reading, the Under-Secretary confirmed that the change to the new scheme would result in a saving of £300 million over 10 years. What else can that money be except that which would otherwise have gone to those injured in the line of duty? Does that affect the Government's concept of a duty of care?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin) rose—

Mr. Simpson: If the Under-Secretary is able to respond to my point now instead of at the end of the debate, I would be grateful.

Mr. Caplin: I shall say what I said before. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Ministry of Defence contests the 60 per cent. figure. We have held discussions with the British Legion to examine the information in greater detail and are happy to work with it. He also knows that we were not looking at a figure for savings. The pensions and compensation schemes are separate, but both are cost neutral.

Mr. Simpson: I thank the Under-Secretary, and I look forward to hearing further representations from those affected.

The Minister of State touched on the problem of accommodation. Progress is not being made on improving service family accommodation. We understand that the target of bringing all core stock SFA in the UK up to standard 1 for condition will not be achieved by 2005. Why will it not be achieved, and will there be a new target date? What progress has been made on Project Slam to improve single living accommodation for members of the armed forces? I fully appreciate that new recruits in today's world—both men and women—much prefer, and indeed want, single accommodation rather than old-style barrack accommodation.

The Minister knows that about 8,900 troops have been affected by the failure of the "Pay 2000" computer software. What measures are being taken to address the problem, and what is the date by which he expects it finally to be rectified? I understand that he has to face several computer problems, as do Ministers across the board.

The Government have made much of their claim that the defence budget is growing by 1.4 per cent., but they have failed to point out it is about 2.2 per cent. of gross domestic project, which makes it lower in those terms than any defence budget for the past half century. There is frankly little confidence that the present defence programme can be achieved with 2.2 per cent. of gross domestic product. Conservative Members do not think that the Government are prepared to meet the financial demands of our front-line soldiers. According to a recent internal survey of the MOD's personnel, fewer than one in five—only 19.2 per cent.—agreed that the armed forces were well-equipped. A series of important decisions looms in the future about major items of kit and equipment and smaller, but nevertheless crucial, items of kit for individual servicemen and women on active service.

The Conservative party's commitment on defence, which was announced last October and reaffirmed at the beginning of the week, is to spend more money in the defence budget on the front line. We will also produce money from savings in other Departments to go to the front line.

I always think that the Minister would make a good music hall act because he changes between being serious and becoming a knockabout Scottish comedian—he is the Harry Lauder of the Ministry of Defence. [Interruption.] Harry Lauder was a much-loved figure with a knighthood. The Minister and other Ministers have suggested that the Conservative party's figures on defence do not add up. They said last October that we would cut defence spending, but now they say that according to their figures, ours do not add up. Let us have a look at examples of what they have done.

Since the Labour party came to office, £118 million has been wasted on the defence stores management system. Some £77 million was spent on a new radar for the Sea Harrier before the decision was made to take it out of service. The defence staff in Washington wrote off £8 million "to regularise various control accounts used to manage Foreign Military Sales".

The Defence Procurement Agency was subject to a £40 million claim for "delays in supplying design information and equipment".

Some £6.5 million was wasted on new aircraft lifts for the current aircraft carriers that were never installed. As a result of a change in accounting procedures relating to the submarine facility at Devonport, a write-down of £287 million occurred.

A National Audit Office report states that the total cost overruns in major defence projects was £170 million in 2000–01. This year's figure, £1.7 billion, is nearly 10 times greater than that. According to the NAO, the total slippage in time for major defence projects was 27 months in 2000–01. In the worst year to date, 2002–03, major defence projects overran by £3 billion. And the Government have the cheek to question our figures, which are based on information extracted from civil servants and military people from within the MOD who have been prepared to talk to us, experts from the City, and our own experience. The Conservatives intend to reallocate £1.8 billion of savings from within the MOD and to provide another £1.7 billion through extra spending. Those realistic figures are laid out in public and have been available to the Under-Secretary for the past year.

When the Minister and the MOD say that they are incapable of reorganising either the Defence Procurement Agency or the Defence Logistics Organisation, I think back 20 years to when Lord Heseltine, who was Secretary of State for Defence, introduced a chief of defence procurement. The howls of anguish within the MOD, let alone the total opposition from the Labour party on the grounds that the position would never work, were proved absolutely wrong. The next Conservative Government will do the same thing, and it will be better for our armed forces.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The 15-minute limit on speeches by Back Benchers now begins to operate. Bearing in mind the length of the opening speeches, if hon. Members stick to the full allocation decided by Mr. Speaker, it will be very difficult to recognise everybody.

2.52 pm

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North) (Lab): I will heed your comment and try to keep my remarks well within the time limit, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I am pleased that we have this debate, which has happened for a number of years, on personnel policies in the armed forces. All Members of Parliament have experienced people who serve in the forces or their families telling them, "You come up with the high-falutin' policies on world politics, but we have to implement them and our families must live with that." The armed forces serve us proudly whenever they are asked to undertake a task and we owe it to them to consider their situation and that of their families. Serving officers and soldiers can also read reports of what is said in Parliament, which allows them to campaign and make their point, if they feel that that is necessary.

The armed forces know that they operate in a world of change and that their requirements always flow from political considerations. Hon. Members know that important changes in world politics, such as the destruction of the USSR, the threat from global terrorism and the problems that increasingly flow from poverty and the alienation of people in poorer parts of the world who see the life enjoyed by people in richer parts of the world, have affected the tasks that our armed forces carry out.

The institutions on which we have traditionally relied to implement our military policies must also change. In the past 50 years, we have relied heavily on NATO, which I continue to support, but NATO itself is questioning its own purpose. Is its only purpose to protect western Europe from potential threats or does it have a wider role? Should it operate within the western European theatre or across a wider area? Whatever conclusions it eventually reaches, they will inevitably have major consequences for our armed forces' structure and purpose and in respect of with whom our armed forces must link up, of training requirements, of operational matters and so on.

I see a world of increasing change. We have paid little attention to China and its potential economic and military power and we must build strong political relationships with it. I know that the leaders of our armed forces are aware of those considerations, and, whatever decisions we take, I am sure that our armed forces will be subject to major repercussions.

Thankfully, there is more agreement on such matters than many hon. Members would admit. The G7 countries and the leaders of the armed forces in those countries and beyond agree on the tasks that we face and there is much agreement in the House. I do not support the intervention in Iraq and believe that we should set out a timetable for withdrawal. However, I support 100 per cent. the need to have the military capability to operate at a distance—an expeditionary force, if you like—on behalf of our nation or our allies. Such a capability has major repercussions for logistics and operations and, consequently, on personnel policy.

I am not a member of the Select Committee, but I have read its reports. A great deal of emphasis has been placed on the strategy of effects. I thought that the world of politics and the military were trying to convince us that they have discovered something new, but Lord Haw Haw immediately came to mind. There is nothing new in the effects strategy, but if it was important in the past, it is crucial now because of instant media, embedded journalists and so on.

We must not only secure a physical victory in theatre, but convince civilians in that theatre that we are acting on their behalf in the interests of the values that we hold. At the same time, we must hold public opinion in our own country, in our NATO allies' countries and in UN colleague countries, which requires a different approach by our armed forces. I am pleased to say that the Government recognised that point in their dialogue with the Select Committee.

We want more resources to fulfil those greater tasks. I know that Front Benchers have argued about who can deliver what, but real-terms increases in defence expenditure have occurred in recent years and, this year, the increase is 1.4 per cent., which is welcome. It is necessary to increase resources, but resources cannot be increased for ever, so it is also important to use resources more efficiently, which has consequences for personnel policies. Some areas can obviously be improved and the need to reduce cost and get better value is never ending.

There is probably room for further efficiencies in internal logistics, which will have consequences. If a technician, rather than a middle-aged major, undertakes tasks in a warehouse because of restructuring, it has major consequences for officer structures in the Army and for sub-contractors, who are not members of the armed forces and who will carry out such tasks in the future.

The White Paper, which has my support, identified the key issues. The Army is not a museum that we must keep in its current shape for ever. It has to change as its task changes, and the people who know that better than anyone else are the Army personnel themselves—this point also applies to other armed forces—both officers and other ranks. They understand that what they are being asked to do in Iraq is completely different from what the Army was asked to do in Germany 20 years ago. They know that things have to change. They know that their principal purpose, according to the mission statement, is to protect the nation, our values and our way of life, and to carry out any tasks that they are asked to do. They know more than anyone else that there has to be change.

The Scottish nationalists raised earlier the names and structure of the regiments, and such issues are indeed important. I support the Government's proposed reorganisation of the regiments and there is a case for reducing the number from 40 to 36. Northern Ireland is part of that story, as is the need in the modern Army to diversify skills. Crucially, this is a relatively minor issue compared with the main one, which is how we protect our nation. We must also consider the purpose of NATO and how we deal with future expeditionary forces.

Annabelle Ewing: The hon. Gentleman says that restructuring is a minor matter compared with the bigger context that he describes, but perhaps he could explain that to the six Scottish regiments, which regard it as far from minor. Scrapping the entire Scottish regimental system surely cannot be described as a minor matter.

Mr. Henderson: I disagree with the hon. Lady. To my mind, restructuring is a relatively minor matter. It is important that we get the answer to it right, but compared with the question of whether a major threat to this nation or its allies exists in some other part of the world, it is not the main issue. Anyone who tries to tell the public otherwise is merely creating confusion. Such reorganisation is necessary.

There is also a clear need to re-orientate training programmes. The traditional requirements of war fighting will always be the central purpose of any army. If our Army is to be any kind of deterrent, people have to know that, if we go into battle, we are effective. That must be the central purpose of training, but there are other purposes that have to be met. Peacekeeping is a very important issue. There is no point in winning a battle, only to lose the peace three weeks later. We also have to be effective in dealing with humanitarian tasks. There is no point in winning a battle and keeping the peace, if poverty or natural disaster means that everything is then ruined and no humanitarian aid can be provided. Such an outcome renders those efforts purposeless, which is why our forces must be trained to deal with all those eventualities.

There is little disagreement over ending the arms plot. When I had to deal directly with such issues some years ago, I could not understand why everybody clung to it. I am glad that a different view is now taken and that a consensus has developed. My doubts about the arms plot arose from talking to soldiers' husbands and wives. They said, "It is unnecessary. We understand that our spouses have to be away and that there must be some disruption, but we don't understand why we must move camp to meet some general statistical plan." Ending the arms plot is a good move and it will win support among forces families. For working spouses, giving the family as much support as possible is important. Moreover, those with children do not want their education disrupted.

Many changes are ahead of us. Some are the consequence of changes in the European theatre, and others of technological advances. Some are the consequence of the increasingly significant role of the United Nations and the demands placed on it, and others of the ever increasing need for specialist staff. Other important issues—we have been shy of tackling them in the House today—will also have major repercussions, such as how we replace our existing nuclear weapons and how we deploy such weapons. From the technical and operational point of view, that issue has to be faced. I have always believed that a nuclear deterrent is an important instrument in defending our country at home. It is perhaps not as important in dealing with overseas issues—I am glad that it is not—but it still has a role.

The armed forces have always responded to what we as a nation have asked them to do, and I am absolutely confident that they will do so in future. They deserve our support.

3.6 pm

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): I welcome this timely debate, not because it comes in a week when some of our armed forces are unfortunately in the media spotlight, but because it gives us an opportunity to remember and to pay tribute to those personnel still serving in Iraq, and to recognise the magnificent support that our armed forces provided in response to the devastating tsunami on Boxing day. A tremendous amount of work has been done and it reflects the huge variety of tasks that we ask our armed forces to undertake at a moment's notice.

Mr. Caplin: The hon. Gentleman rightly mentions the tsunami, but we should also consider matters closer to home and reflect on the work undertaken by the armed forces in particular in Carlisle and in Boscastle, which is of course in his own county. That shows the considerable contribution that our armed forces can make in dealing with crises at home arising from natural disasters.

Mr. Breed: Quite so, and the Minister will know how important it was that the helicopters used in Boscastle were very close to hand. I hope that he will reflect on the suggestion that they might not be there in the immediate future and think carefully before taking a decision.

We have heard this afternoon about our armed forces' various commitments and we have also heard that, unfortunately, there will be redundancies. All three of our armed forces will be subject to cuts and it is necessary for us to question the balance that is being struck between manpower and technology. Achieving the right balance is a difficult thing, as I have always accepted. It is a perennial problem for any Government. However, we have to weigh the demands of operating at the high end of the war-fighting spectrum against the equally demanding humanitarian and stability-related tasks that we are asked to carry out around the world. We recognise that technology is expensive, but manpower is invaluable. It is widely known that our troops on the ground are greatly admired for their flexibility, training and professionalism, which they can display in a variety of circumstances. We never underestimate their value, but we should also never overstretch their capabilities.

It is tempting to believe that fewer fighting troops are needed when technological advances are made in weapons and communication equipment, but it is clear from the events of the past few months that technology alone does not win battles. It therefore seems astonishing, as the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) said, that even though our troops are still required in a variety of situations—be it Northern Ireland, Iraq, Afghanistan or the Balkans—we are seriously contemplating reducing the Army's size. In particular, a reduction is being considered in the number of those infantrymen who are a crucial component for many such operations.

I was surprised to read that, at a time when we are cutting our manpower despite our considerable commitments, it appears that the United States army is likely to increase its forces by another 20,000 or 30,000, despite its already huge numbers. We have indicated that we support the ending of the arms plot, which has been welcomed across the House, but we do not see why that should necessarily lead to a reduction in numbers. Cutting personnel numbers is a dangerous game, especially in the current climate, as there seems little likelihood of any major reduction in our commitments throughout the world, at least in the immediate future.

Recruitment and retention of our armed forces personnel are therefore even more crucial, as the Minister said in his opening speech. We must ensure that we have a continual recruitment process and that the forces have a promotional structure to retain our best servicemen and women. I was particularly pleased to hear of the continuation of the upgrading of family housing, which is crucial to retention. I shall listen with interest, however, to hear why there has been some slippage in that programme, which was welcomed by everyone when it was announced. I hope that the slippage is not too great.

As for reserve forces, reservists called up to serve in Iraq are said to be a little more unwilling to go again. At the moment, only a small fraction of trained reservists are immediately available. Clearly, some are untrained, some are unfit, and others are already stationed out in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere. The considerable pressure on our reservists continues. Will the Minister comment on what progress has been made in recruiting and retaining reservists?

The ability to deploy and move around sufficient numbers of personnel who are suitably trained and appropriately equipped is vital, but the resources available and manpower levels in the Army are becoming dangerously low. The Minister will remember that the MOD's internal survey last year revealed that two thirds of those questioned were spending their money on extra equipment because they did not have enough confidence in that which was issued by the MOD, and nearly half our soldiers in Iraq had no confidence in their fighting kit. That same survey revealed that 39 per cent. of soldiers do not feel valued by the Army and that 35 per cent. felt that morale was very low. When asked whether the MOD looked after its personnel, only 3 per cent. of respondents agreed strongly, and 32 per cent. somewhat agreed, leaving a rather damning 62 per cent. who either did not know or did not believe that the MOD looked after its staff. Those figures are worrying. I hope that the Minister will provide some evidence of efforts made by the MOD to try to address some of the matters raised as a consequence of that. We need to address what our troops say in such surveys, as they are not just carried out for statistical reasons and I hope that there will be some evidence that the MOD has addressed some of the issues that underlie these views.

We must ensure that our forces have the best and most effective equipment. The alarming figures from the survey suggest that they do not. The amount spent on basic kit and equipment, as a proportion of total expenditure, cannot be large. The situation must be remedied so that no member of our armed forces feels compelled to purchase additional kit with their wages in order to feel more confident in any dangerous situation to which we send them. They are protecting us, so surely we must ensure that we protect them.

Training is causing some concern. We are witnessing signs of overstretch and it appears that some soldiers are being deployed who are less well trained than used to be, and perhaps should be, the case. I want to praise HMS Raleigh, which happens to be in my constituency and of which I and the community in South-East Cornwall are proud. It has undertaken some incredibly good training work, over many years, and it is an absolute joy to see many young men and women going into that training establishment and coming out as confident and effective young men and women going into the Navy. Training establishments such as HMS Raleigh are vital to our personnel and defence. Whatever budget calculations take place, our training establishments must be protected to ensure that they get exactly the right resources, so that training standards are not affected and we do not see any failures and incidents in training organisations such as those at Deepcut.

In our last debate on this subject, the Minister offered several Members the opportunity to visit a number of establishments. I took up that offer and was pleased to go. I do not know whether we were allocated a Chinook with a window missing, which allowed us to endure previously unknown temperatures, in order to demonstrate that the cuts were hitting. The visits to establishments were extremely worthwhile and we all came away much more impressed in the sense that there was a more proactive approach to recruits. The training officers, voluntary services and chaplaincies were all working effectively together to address some of our underlying concerns. I for one felt that that day was well spent and I want the Minister to recognise that those of us who made that visit felt that it was a worthwhile exercise.

It was interesting to read through the defence debate in the other place earlier this week, which was clearly attended by a considerable number of senior retired gentleman—five former chiefs of staff, I think. Although we might feel that they do not say now, when they are retired, what they might have said previously, if we reflect on that debate, I hope that the Minister will accept that they have a great wealth of experience from which they were trying to make constructive points.

This week, figures—to which the Minister referred in his opening statement—were revealed on the high number of soldiers who have been wounded and are now hospitalised. I hope that the sort of detailed analysis that was offered earlier, and which the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk called for, becomes available. Some categorisation is important and I recognise that the hundreds mentioned could cover a wide spectrum of injury. It would be helpful if the MOD could provide some analysis of the figures. I hope, and I am sure that the MOD and Ministers will recognise, that those troops who have been brought back because of casualties demand our attention. I am sure that they will get that and hope that they will receive regular visits.

Perhaps more worryingly, the same newspaper report, although I agree that we should not always accept what we read in the newspapers, seemed to suggest that those who had been wounded, and their relatives, should not talk to the media, and should be careful of what they were saying and to whom they said it. That sends a worrying sensation through us and our constituents. We owe a significant amount to these men and women, and we should not deny them the opportunity to speak to Ministers and to their constituency MPs, if they wish to visit.

Finally, I am sure that the issue of voting is uppermost in people's minds. It is ironic, when we send our troops to places such as Bosnia, Afghanistan and Iraq to help promote democracy, that they should effectively be disfranchised. The number of registered service personnel voters has dropped dramatically since 2000, when there was a change from a single lifetime registration to a requirement to register every year. I am not certain why the system changed, so perhaps the Minister can explain. In some areas, only 10 per cent. of servicemen and women have registered, which is worrying. We have heard that they should understand what Government policies are and so on, but being able to vote is more important. I hope that the Government will ensure that our armed forces personnel do not lose their right to vote and will provide every opportunity to promote registration.

Mr. Caplin: I might be able to assist the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) secured a Westminster Hall debate on the matter and I explained in detail all the changes stemming from the Representation of the People Act 2000. Unless my recollection is incorrect, I am sure that I answered questions on this in Defence questions only 10 days ago, and that the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) became excited. There is a great deal on the record about the issue, but the simple fact is that it is not as bad as it seems.

Mr. Breed: I am delighted to hear that and hope that it is the case. It would be helpful if the Minister gave us an idea of the number of people who have registered, and whether it is 10, 20 or 50 per cent.

In summary, we are extremely fortunate in the quality of our armed forces, which is the product of many years' work. I hope that we can further improve the career prospects of people who join the armed forces and enhance the training available to them. I hope that we can supply them with the equipment that they need and look after their welfare needs, as well as those of their families, so that we can repay them in the very best possible way.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): Bearing in mind the earlier ruling by Mr. Deputy Speaker on speeches and the number of people who wish to speak, I will confine myself to one or two personnel issues.

I welcome our debate because it gives us an opportunity to pay tribute to the excellent work that our servicemen and women do throughout the world. Hon. Members who have the privilege of serving on the NATO Parliamentary Assembly regularly see examples of such work. We see our servicemen and women doing a tremendous job, often in grave circumstances. Whatever is taking place elsewhere today, it should not cast a shadow on the record of our service personnel. As an ex-serviceman myself, I am concerned about the effects of being put under the microscope by the media and of the 24/7 coverage. There is a certain naivety and a lack of realism in attitudes towards military conflict. Warfare is a brutal, cruel and bloody business, and anyone who thinks otherwise makes a grave mistake. My view is that mistakes take place in those difficult environments—there but for the grace of God go I. It may not be popular to say so—unfortunately, however, it is true—but in my limited military experience I saw some terrible things that make current activities pale almost into insignificance. We live in a democracy and members of our military forces who make mistakes will face justice and be made accountable if necessary.

The Government's record on personnel matters is particularly good, and the policies introduced since the strategic defence review are a credit to them. We have not implemented all those policies by any means and we will probably have to review a great many, but the Government's intentions are good as they are trying to change personnel policies in response to the dramatic change in the military's role since the end of the cold war. There has been an attempt to train, recruit and organise personnel to meet threats and challenges outside this country but there have also been dramatic internal changes. Earlier, we had an exchange about recruitment and retention in the armed forces. I remind Members that being able to recruit and retain servicemen and women when there is almost full employment is a hundred times more difficult than trying to do so when there are 3 million to 5 million unemployed, as was the case not very long ago. That is a major consideration. If we do not offer attractive terms and conditions, as well as support for service personnel and, in particular, their families, we will find it increasingly difficult to recruit and retain the best people to serve in our armed forces.

I therefore welcome the personnel policy that we have introduced and warmly welcome, as do most hon. Members, the abolition of the arms plot. In future, larger units will be located in an area for a much longer period, which will improve training, expertise and continuity. When I was in the forces a long time ago, my wife did not work. Now, however, practically every service wife, husband or partner wants to work, so we need an environment that allows them to pursue a career. Their children should all be able go to the same school. I have a large military base in my constituency, so I am aware of the problems, especially the educational problems, that affect families who move on every two years—for example, their children have to move to a different school. I am glad that those issues have been addressed.

I am also glad that we are rebalancing our forces and I welcome the restructuring that will allow us to meet the challenges that we face. I think that all in the House, if they are honest with themselves and assess what we need to do with the resources that we have, will recognise that restructuring the infantry regiments is inevitable. What is the point of having 40 infantry battalions if they cannot be deployed to carry out the tasks that we now face, rather than those that we faced 15 or 20 years ago during the cold war? It is much better to have 36 battalions that can be deployed at very short notice.

Annabelle Ewing: How do the hon. Gentleman's comments square with the fact that—to take one Scottish regiment—the Black Watch was recently deployed on its second tour of duty within a year in Iraq? The Royal Highland Fusiliers have just been sent out for their second tour of duty. I do not understand how that squares with what he is saying.

Mr. Smith: It does in fact square up because we want to share that burden of deployment so that more battalions can deploy in the front line and in difficult situations around the world. We have been unable to do that, partly because of the arms plot and partly because of the gaps that still exist in logistics and other areas, which do not allow us to mobilise those forces.

The way in which we conduct the process is very important. In Wales, we have seen the merger of our historic regiments. I support that move, although I know that it is not popular with everybody. We must do things the right way, however, and I believe that we have made a mistake in the names that we have chosen for those historic regiments, which have a 300-year history of excellence. The Royal Regiment of Wales has received battle honours such as the wreath of immortals, which was awarded to it after its heroic defence at Rorke's Drift. Playing about with its name after the Government have proposed restructuring is a mistake. The same policy should be adopted in Wales as has been adopted for the Scottish regiments in putting their historic titles first within their new names. That should be done in the new Welsh regiment, and failure to do it is a slight to the Welsh regiments.

Mr. Robathan: I think that I am right in saying that it was the South Wales Borderers who were at Rorke's Drift, after which they were incorporated in the Royal Regiment of Wales. Names are important, but I would like to get one thing absolutely straight: is the hon. Gentleman saying that he supports the reduction of the infantry by four battalions?

Mr. Smith: I certainly support the restructuring of our regiments to make them more usable and more deployable to face the challenges that are ahead of us. Anybody who denies the need for that restructuring has his head in the sand and is unaware of the problems that we face. There is still a debate to be had about the exact numbers of units and personnel, but there is no doubt about the need for restructuring.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): If we are going to quibble over titles, I point out that it was the 24th of Foot who were involved in Rorke's Drift. They were then entitled the Warwickshire Regiment, but they were recruiting in the south Wales area and went on to become the South Wales Borderers, who were in turn incorporated in the Royal Regiment of Wales.

Mr. Smith: Both those interventions are right, but we must be careful or we will lose the very argument that we are trying to put. The regiments that have been mentioned have been amalgamated in the past, which proves that tradition and loyalty can be maintained. Nevertheless, we must get the message across about the Welsh regiment. The Prime Minister referred to the matter yesterday in Prime Minister's questions, and I hope that the Ministry will have another look at it.

In the time that remains to me, I want to focus on one very important personnel issue that relates not to the Army, but to the Royal Air Force. It is crucial that we get our personnel policies right. We must not only enable our forces to do the job that they were recruited for, but give them appropriate resources. The changes that are now taking place present us with a big challenge, which is why it makes no sense whatever that we have decided to give the Royal Air Force a role that has no military relevance. Following an announcement on 16 September last year, which was confirmed on 16 December, Royal Air Force personnel will now be asked by the Ministry of Defence to undertake depth support of our front-line offensive fighter jets at RAF bases in central and eastern England—something that they have not done for some years and that involves carrying out a function that they do not have the capability to carry out.

Depth support for Tornadoes and Harriers does not exist anywhere in Europe other than where such work has been done for the past 50 years, obviously with other front-line aircraft. It has been done by military personnel—including RAF personnel in the past—as well as civilians at RAF St. Athan. The reason why the RAF has not done that work for some years is that there is no military requirement for it to do so. There used to be such a requirement, but the Government have reached a conclusion that is somewhat bizarre and runs counter to the whole argument about rebalancing forces and outsourcing as much support for our front-line forces as we can to allow our military to get on with the job that we pay them to do and that they do best—fighting wars and preparing to fight wars. We now have the absurd decision by the Government to ask service personnel to do factory maintenance—deep maintenance—on those jets.

We are reducing the number of our deployable offensive jets to 64 ready at any one time. The support facilities must be available to ensure that those aircraft are repaired, maintained and overhauled correctly, as they have been for many generations in south Wales, at St. Athan in my constituency. The Government have decided to renationalise that function within the Ministry of Defence and to ask RAF personnel to carry it out. That is a dangerous move, which threatens front-line capability and is demoralising for the RAF.

I have a letter from a senior NCO stating that that is an appalling decision and recommending that one of the Ministers go to RAF Cottesmore, where the Harrier has recently been moved to be repaired in that way, and speak to some of the NCOs in the crew room—off the record, of course, and away from their commanding officers—and ask them what they think about doing such irrelevant work in the 21st century. There was a case during the cold war for our military personnel to undertake such factory maintenance, but since "Options for Change", aspects of which we picked up as a Government under the strategic defence review, all non-essential military work has been taken away from service personnel and given to the private sector or, as in the case of the Defence Aviation Repair Agency, outsourced to a trading agency made up entirely of civilians who operate in an exclusively commercial environment and who have done a fantastic job for the past five years.

Having built an £80 million military hangar that will open in three weeks—the size of six football pitches, it is the largest and most advanced military hangar of its type in the world—instead of repairing the prime of our front-line jets in that wonderful facility, the Government are to transfer the work to remote air bases in the east of England. When I say remote, I mean remote. I am old enough to have been stationed at one of them, RAF Marham—a delightful posting, as I recall it, nicknamed when I was there "the el-Adem with grass". There are probably not many hon. Members who can remember the RAF base in el-Adem, which happened to be in the middle of the Libyan desert. We are seriously proposing that the entire front-line fleet of the Royal Air Force is repaired in the middle of nowhere, with all due respect and apologies to any hon. Member who represents that area. I had a lovely time at RAF Marham, and they were lovely people, but it is not the place to repair the RAF front-line fleet.

I can tell my dear friend the Minister that that demoralises military personnel. They know more than most that what they are being asked to do is nonsense. The work that is to be done at RAF Marham was done by RAF personnel at St. Athan five years ago—4,500 military personnel were doing the work that 1,500 civilians do now. Anybody who has had service experience knows that there is no great mystery about that. Military personnel join the forces because they want to play a part in defending our country. They want to work together as a team, doing something relevant in that defence. They are the first to spot it when they are asked to do something that is not directly relevant to that role. They know damn well that what they are being asked to do in respect of maintaining the front-line fleet is wrong.

I make a prediction: the RAF will be unable to meet its in-service date for the Harrier after giving that work to the RAF. The front-line capability of our Royal Air Force is placed at risk by such work being given to the RAF. The RAF will do it, and do it to a very high standard—there is no such thing as not getting the job done—but it is not noted for doing it within fixed budgets and efficiently. If they had wanted to be aircraft engineers in big factories, they would not have joined the Royal Air Force.

It is no good my coming back in five years' time and saying, "I told you so." I plead with the Government to look at this issue again. I ask them to give this work to the people who can do it—either the civilians who currently do it or others—and for goodness' sake do not waste vital pounds of our defence budget on unnecessary work.

3.40 pm

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): I hope that the Government listen to the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith), who speaks with passion and has right on his side. It goes against the stream of Government decisions to bring work back from a specially designed, skilled organisation and allocate it to service personnel who are more expensive to maintain. I really think that the Government are going down the wrong route on this issue, and the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to campaign on it.

It is always a pleasure to listen to the Minister, but I regret the absence of the Secretary of State. One might say, "The House is rather thin, and why should the Secretary of State spend his time in a thin House?" But what about cause and effect? If Cabinet Ministers were shown to be taking account of debate in this House, where many of the speeches are made by people with very specialised skills and knowledge, the House might fill up and the Government might learn something.

At their best, the armed forces are absolutely outstanding. Right at the top, they are commanded by people who have usually been to the Royal College of Defence Studies to take a one-year course that gives them a rounding and a generalisation that armed forces chiefs in many other countries do not have. The RCDS is outstanding and contributes very much to the exceptional and rounded skills of our leading generals, admirals and air marshals. Likewise, Shrivenham staff college is exceptional in providing ranks at the level of major across the three services with broadening experience. I will never forget the last day of the Shrivenham experience—it was devoted to the realities of war, and people with experiences ranging from the D-day landings to being shot down over Iraq came to speak about the reality of being involved in war.

The Army, Navy and Air Force provide the largest single amount of training for 16 to 20-year-olds in this country. As a member of the Defence Committee, I visited several training establishments when we carried out our study on the duty of care to those who are undertaking training. We found that they, too, are responsible for producing very well-rounded people. It is a remarkable fact that these young men and women, some of whom have pretty rough edges, can be facing fire after as little as eight months. The armed forces have an exceptional ability to train people and to bring them forward. A corporal commanding a patrol will take decisions with very little time and very little experience other than the training that he has been given. The ability of those young people to accept responsibility is remarkable. It is amazing that they can be given responsibility for using sophisticated and expensive equipment, including weapons that can kill. The armed forces do an exceptional job from top to bottom.

There have been various discussions about overstretch—a word that tends to be used a great deal. The 1999 defence White Paper referred to the need to retain the edge of skills and "to solve the deep-seated problem of overstretch".

Even in 1999, the Government were looking forward to solving that problem. Overstretch means that more tasks are being given to armed forces personnel than they can do well and safely on a resilient, continuous basis. The Chief of the Defence Staff recently told the Defence Committee that the armed forces could not undertake another operation the size of Telic—the operation in Iraq—until the end of this decade. He said that we will not "be able to get to large scale until . . . 2008 or 2009".

Overstretch means that there will be more deployments and that individuals will have less time between deployments, more time overseas, more time away from their families, less training and less preparation. That can cause problems.

I want to discuss three aspects of overstretch. First, the reserves are now more committed than ever before to being involved with the regular armed forces. Their role in providing infilling for the regular forces is very important, but there is one role that they do not currently have. They do not have the ability to reconstitute a much larger Army should there be a need to expand the Army rapidly. That has always been the role of the Territorial Army: to provide a framework around which it is possible to reconstitute a much larger armed force. During the last war, units with the framework of a Territorial Army unit were much more effective than units created from scratch. Asymmetrical warfare may lead to threats that we cannot currently anticipate. What might the unexpected be? I do not know, of course, because it is unexpected, but I think it is an unwise Government who fail to maintain the ability to reconstitute much larger armed forces.

The second aspect of overstretch that I want to discuss is the treatment of prisoners of war. I am extremely conscious of Mr. Speaker's ruling and nothing that I say should be interpreted as a comment on current events, but current events did cause me to look into the manner in which prisoners of war should be treated and the way in which the rules came about. It is quite a touching story.

In 1841, a Swiss who had been on a battle site went back to Geneva, and with four colleagues from Geneva created, in 1848, what became the International Committee of the Red Cross and the first four Geneva conventions. The first is the convention for the amelioration of the condition of the wounded and sick in armies in the field. The second is the convention for the amelioration of the condition of wounded, sick and shipwrecked members of armed forces at sea. The third relates to the treatment of prisoners of war, and the fourth is relative to the protection of civilian persons in times of war. It is laid down clearly that people who comply with the conventions are "especially required to ensure that the implications" of the Geneva conventions

"are clearly understood by members of their Armed Forces and by the civilian population. In order to assist this process"

the conventions

"place an obligation on signatories to disseminate the text of the Conventions to appropriate military and civilian personnel."

My reading on this subject included a Ministry of Defence publication dated March 2001. I read about commanders' responsibilities. Commanders in military campaigns are instructed that prisoner-of-war issues should be taken fully into account. Paragraph 202 states:

"In recent military campaigns PW issues were not taken fully into account as a planning factor. This resulted in UK forces being faced with the problem of handling very large numbers of PW for whom little provision had been made in terms of accommodation, food or clothing. Fortunately, in recent operations the problems of dealing with such a large number of PW coincided with the collapse of the opposing forces and the end of hostilities. Had this not been the case and had operations continued, the problems posed by the presence of large numbers of PW and the requirement to administer them would possibly have had a profound influence on the conduct of operations."

It is clear from my reading that there is a heavy obligation on all those planning any military operation to take advanced notice of the manner in which prisoners of war are to be handled. There are strict rules about the escorting of prisoners of war and the work that they are allowed to undertake. Paragraph 3G9 of the MOD publication states:

"PW working conditions are to be guided, as far as is possible within the constraints of operations, by the provisions of the UK Health and Safety at Work legislation. Conditions must not be of a lesser standard than those enjoyed by members of the UK forces or of UK civilians engaged on similar work."

I was not aware, until I studied these regulations, of the extent to which it is an obligation on every power to plan for prisoners of war and to take all proper provision to ensure that they are looked after in a decent manner.

My third point on overstretch relates to Defence Medical Services. This is another area of undoubted weakness. The current military plan is that the Army should be capable of producing 14 field hospitals—three from the regulars and 11 from reserves. In fact, the regulars are capable of producing one and a half field hospitals, while the reserves could produce two and a half, making a total of four. That shortfall is extremely serious and it is merciful that we have been spared from having extensive casualties in recent military operations.

A recent press report, the accuracy of which I do not know, suggested that 790 casualties had come back from Iraq. They would have to be spread among the civilian hospitals around the country. The Government decided in December 1998 to close the remaining military hospital, the Royal military hospital Haslar, which is in my constituency. I am delighted to say that it is still in service and I hope that the Government will rethink their plans. The Government's strategy was to move to a new centre of defence medicine in Birmingham, based at Selly Oak hospital, at a cost of £200 million. However, they ran out of money and cancelled the £200 million that was intended to go to Selly Oak. As a result, the new centre of defence medicine is based loosely around Birmingham university hospital, but it does not have its own centre for the purposes of ethos and morale. It does not have its own mess arrangements or sporting facilities, for example.

While the Government take great pride in the fact that they are recruiting quite well into Defence Medical Services at the moment, the level of retention is extremely bad—there is very little to keep someone at consultant level in the armed forces. The result is that Defence Medical Services will recruit people from school and university but will find it very difficult to retain them at consultant level. That will lead to an even greater loss of defence medical personnel than we are experiencing at present.

The Under-Secretary knows, because he and I have debated this many times, that there is already a critical shortfall in the key faculties of anaesthetics, general surgery, orthopaedic surgery and general medicine. That will get worse unless the Government rethink their proposals. We in south Hampshire continue to believe that the right way ahead would be to realise that Selly Oak is not working and instead to work for increased facilities where the armed forces tend to be based, which is in the south Hampshire area. This work could certainly be done in hospitals around Southampton and Portsmouth.

My concern about the Government's personnel policy in the armed forces is that they are trying to deal with existing issues, but that there is very little in reserve to deal with the unexpected. We ask a great deal of our armed forces and we should treat them accordingly. Our treatment in terms of pay, pensions and conditions is not as good as that of many of our allies, including the Germans. We should take account of that and do rather better for our armed forces.

3.53 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): It is fortunate that the Minister on the Front Bench should be the Under-Secretary responsible for the one topic that I wish to raise: Gulf war syndrome. I should like to acknowledge the work that has been done on this subject by Lord Lloyd of Berwick, whom I have known for 60 years. He was a Lord of Appeal in Ordinary from 1984 to 1993, and Chairman of the Security Commission from 1992 to 1999. I also acknowledge the work of Lord Morris of Manchester, who, as Alf Morris, was my close friend and mentor in all matters relating to the disabled for a third of a century.

Frankly, I am not a newcomer or a Johnny-come-lately to this subject. On 2 May 1995, I asked the Secretary of State for Defence what concrete evidence he had of Gulf war syndrome. This reply was given by Roger Freeman:

"To date, we have found no convincing scientific or medical evidence from our investigations, or elsewhere, to suggest the existence of a Gulf war syndrome."—[Official Report, 2 May 1995; Vol. 259, c.158.]

Subsequently, some of us went on a delegation to him. I have to say that he was a listening Minister and I believe that he did his best. On many occasions, and particularly on 18 June 1996, Alf Morris followed the matter up with Nicholas Soames, who told him:

"The Government take seriously the health concerns of all service personnel, and we are committed to ensuring that those who believe they are ill as a result of their Gulf service receive the best possible treatment."—[Official Report, 18 June 1996; Vol. 279, c. 412W.]

I fear that that is not the view of many of the people affected.

On 20 December, the Under-Secretary wrote to me:

"As you are aware Lord Lloyd published his report on 17 November. I have studied the report carefully. However, the MOD view is that it contains no new substantive or scientific evidence to support its conclusions and recommendations. It also fails to take into account the large amount of either substantive or scientific written material provided by the MOD to Lord Lloyd to help inform his investigation."

That is outrageous. Ministers say that the Lloyd report produced no new scientific evidence, but why should Lord Lloyd be required to produce new scientific evidence when it is already there? Is the work of Simon Wessely on the Gulf war health effects and that of lady Professors Doyle and Cherry—world experts in this matter—to be viewed as worthless? Is it being denied that soldiers and civilian personnel who went to Iraq are twice as likely to have symptoms as those who did not?

The brutal truth is that many people have become ill over the past 15 years precisely because they did go to Iraq. Are the ill veterans satisfied with the way in which they have been treated by the MOD since their return from the Gulf? No, they are not. They feel let down and rejected. Those are not my words, but that is how they feel—let down and rejected. I am using the words of Lord Craig, the general officer commanding at the time of the Gulf war and, indeed, a member of the war Cabinet. Those words were echoed by Lord Bramall.

Lloyd set out some of the reasons behind those feelings. He quoted extensively from the relevant reports of the House of Commons Defence Committee. In relation to the MOD's delay in commissioning epidemiological research, the report states:

"In responding to the allegations of a Gulf War Syndrome, the MOD have been quick to deny but slow to investigate . . . in the Committee's view the MOD's response had been reactive rather than proactive and characterised throughout by scepticism and defensiveness and general torpor".

In relation to the organophosphate pesticide-saga, the report highlighted "the culture of resistance that pervades much of the MOD. There seems to be a deep-seated reluctance to respond positively to external stimuli . . . Despite all the outside signals, parliamentary questions, press articles, letters from veterans, etc, the MOD continue to assume blithely that everyone else was wrong."

Indeed, I fear that torpor is not an unfair description because on 17 January, I asked the Secretary of State

"whether he has discussed with his US counterparts the findings of the Report on Scientific Progress in Understanding Gulf War Illnesses of September 2004 commissioned by the US Secretary for Veteran Affairs; and if will a make a statement."

The answer was:

"No."—[Official Report, 18 January 2005; Vol. 429, c. 835W.]

That was curt and rather rude. I am not pompous about being Father the House of Commons, but the Ministry of Defence might have provided a more decent answer to a parliamentary colleague.

Why has the United States evidence from Texas been ignored? Why has not the work of Professor Robert Haley of the Research Advisory Committee, including paragraphs 430 to 444 of his medical appendix, been taken into account? The paper contains the combined expertise of US experts. The US has been far better on the matter than the British Ministry of Defence. I do not know why the issue has been dismissed here.

The recommendations of the Lloyd report should be taken seriously. First,

"The MOD should acknowledge publicly that the veterans who have made claims (other than the 272 who have had their claims rejected) are indeed suffering injury or disease as a result of their service in the Gulf."

Secondly,

"Since the name of the injury or disease is only a label for wrapping the symptoms from which the veterans are undoubtedly suffering, the Ministry of Defence should accept the name favoured by the veterans, that is Gulf War Syndrome, as the most convenient label."

Thirdly,

"The MOD should set up a fund out of which ex gratia payments should be made on a pro-rata basis to all those who have made successful claims."

Fourthly,

"The 272 Claimants who have had their claims rejected should have those claims reviewed in the light of this report."

There are further claims from the National Gulf Veterans and Families Association.

Mr. Caplin: My hon. Friend will recall that, at Defence Question Time shortly after the publication of that report—I think it was 29 November—I announced that we would examine the 272 cases. In fact, 100 or 110 cases need review. That work is happening now at the Veterans Agency.

Mr. Dalyell: Yes, but what is the time scale? To put it bluntly, such action has been greatly delayed. It has taken years. My hon. Friend will forgive us for being extremely angry about it. The Under-Secretary is dealing with people such as Lord Morris, Lord Lloyd, Lord Craig and Lord Bramall, and I simply do not understand why the British Ministry of Defence has been so tardy.

Last night, I spoke again to Dr. Graveston of the National Gulf Veterans and Families Association. He says:

"There needs to be recognition that the Gulf Veterans illnesses are due to, and attributable to service.

Recompense" should

"be awarded to reflect the ruined lives and families, the lost careers, the physical and mental suffering."

He also said that there should be

"Proper well directed research into GWS like that done in the USA.

Effective medical treatment for ill Gulf Veterans by educating health care professionals about GWS".

and

"Implementation of the statutory right for war pensioners to have priority medical treatment."

As a Labour Member of Parliament, who has been here for a long time, I am ashamed of the seven years of Conservative lack of action but even more ashamed of seven years' inaction by a Labour Government.

4.4 pm

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): My hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) spoke earlier about the treatment of prisoners of war. I want to make two comments about that, and I hope that they do not infringe the correct ruling given earlier by Mr. Speaker.

I hope that, over time, the wider world will accept that the humanitarian relief extended to the shattered communities devastated by the recent tsunami in the Indian ocean and the work being done to help rebuild them, will be regarded as more typical of the conduct and professionalism of the British soldier than the alleged abuse of prisoners in Iraq, about which we all feel such shame. I have some personal experience of the treatment of people in custody, which I gained all those years ago during my police career. I shudder to think that this year it is 40 years since I joined the force.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): How long is it since my hon. Friend left?

Mr. Greenway: It is 35 years since I left. My experience is that men of the utmost good character and capable of acts of great courage can—in the heat of the moment, or as a result of provocation or out of a false sense of triumphalism—lose all sense of what is right. They can lose the self control and discipline—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. I am conscious that the hon. Gentleman prefaced his remarks by saying that he would be careful, but I think that he is already starting to veer into dangerous territory. The whole House needs to think very carefully about this matter now that so much has been said about it. Mr. Speaker made his statement earlier today, and I shall listen carefully to what the hon. Gentleman says, but he ought to steer away from that line now, for the sake of safety in this matter.

Mr. Greenway: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, I wanted to conclude this section of my contribution by saying that my concern centres on the remarks made in the other place on Monday by General Lord Guthrie, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) referred earlier. Lord Guthrie said—and he should know better than anyone—that he believed that people were being sent to Iraq without proper training. That is a very serious issue, and we must consider it in the context of the current situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There are imputations in the words that the hon. Gentleman is using. I do not want to cut him off altogether, but I hope that he will now move on to another topic.

Mr. Greenway: I certainly will, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk made the point that Lord Guthrie also made it clear that the Chief of the Defence Staff and the Army Board would prefer the Army to be increased in size, and that they are generally unhappy about the cuts being made in the infantry. It is on that point that I wish to focus my remarks.

The Army has obeyed the Government's decision. All those who take a close interest in this matter understand the philosophy that commands are given and must be obeyed. However, although many of us have tried to be extremely constructive in our approach to the potential outcome of the Government's decision to reduce by four the number of battalions, to restructure all the regiments and to reduce the overall number of infantry soldiers, that does not mean that we agree with it. My view, which has already been expressed in this debate by other hon. Members, is that we should not be reducing infantry numbers at this time, or making the cuts on which the Government have decided.

In this debate, and in Monday's debate in the other place, a number of speakers have emphasised the degree of overstretch faced by the Army. They have also noted that we ask the Army to attend to any problem that might arise. Very often, that involves the relief of problems in our own society, such as those arising out of the atrocious weather of recent days.

I have said that we have tried to be constructive, but I want to draw the House's attention to the remarks made by General Sir Mike Jackson to the Defence Committee last week. The Chief of the General Staff praised the way in which Yorkshire's three regiments were willing to bite the bullet and get on with the job of transforming themselves into a new regional super-regiment. However, as the Under-Secretary knows, it was a close-run thing. From the letter that the Chief of Staff sent to all commanding officers on 16 December, it can be seen that the original intention was for two out of six regiments from the King's Division to be scrapped, which meant that one of the three Yorkshire regiments would have been scrapped. I am pleased that the case that I have made in this House and, particularly, in Westminster Hall in November—that if there were to be cuts in the number of battalions, the Army should stick with the three battalion cuts that it had identified and put the fourth to one side—has been accepted. That has sensibly been done by moving sideways the 1st Battalion the Parachute Regiment to a support battalion for our special forces from 2007.

Great relief is felt in Yorkshire that the three Yorkshire regiments will form the only future county regiment, the Yorkshire Regiment, but we still have some considerable concerns. The first fear is that the individual identities in the new structure, especially the Green Howards and the Duke of Wellington's, will be relegated into brackets. Several hon. Members have mentioned the way in which the new names have been crafted, which means that they could be airbrushed out at any time. The new structure will basically result in the Yorkshire Regiment, with 1st, 2nd and 3rd Battalions. At some convenient future date, one of those battalions could be dropped.

Several hon. Members have referred to the situation in Scotland and contrasted it with England and Wales. Scotland is being treated differently. I have read what the Chief of the Defence Staff said and I have spoken to the Minister of State. I understand that in Scotland six regiments will, in effect, be reduced to one and that there was therefore a case for putting the old names of the regiments ahead of the new names for the battalions of the Royal Regiment of Scotland. I do not understand the advantage of doing that. What is the reason behind it and what difference will it make? If it makes a difference to Scotland, surely it would make the same difference in England and Wales. However, if it is completely worthless and does not mean anything, why not do it anyway, given that many of us feel so strongly about it? The suspicion is that the Scots will largely retain the old regimental system within a regiment, whereas we in England and Wales will not.

Pete Wishart: It takes more than a name, whether in brackets or before a divisional name, to make a regiment. What makes a regiment are things such as cap badges, traditions and local recruiting areas. All those will be lost to Scottish regiments. It will make no difference if a name survives in front of a new title.

Mr. Greenway: Well, we think that it will. The colonel of the Green Howards has made clear the utter determination of the three regiments to make the new Yorkshire Regiment a great success and to be the very best in the British Army. The Under-Secretary knows that that is the case. One would expect nothing less from a regiment that has faithfully served the Crown since 1688.

I want to use this debate to explain a dimension to the argument that is often overlooked by people outside Yorkshire. It is a big county, more than 100 miles from north to south and almost 100 miles from west to east. In many respects, it is three if not four counties in one, with people still having strong links to and feelings for the old ridings. The Green Howards was a nickname adopted in 1744 to avoid confusion with another regiment commanded by a Colonel Howard; the soldiers had green facings on their uniforms and their colonel was the Hon. Charles Howard, the second son of the third Earl of Carlisle, who built Castle Howard in north Yorkshire. The regiment has been associated with the north riding of Yorkshire since 1782 and is one of only two English infantry regiments never to have been amalgamated. Similarly, the Duke of Wellingtons have always been associated with west Yorkshire. Since 1875, we have had a Scandinavian link through the colonels-in-chief; the present colonel-in-chief is King Harald V of Norway. We do not want that link to be lost.

At present, the three Yorkshire regiments have the brown beret in common. I hope that a new cap badge, fitting to the new regiment, will be one of grand design of which we can all be proud, and not based on the old Yorkshire Brigade cap badge of the 1960s. I can see no reason why at battalion level the belt buckle and rank slides of the three regiments should not be retained, nor even their mess dress, which, individually, could incorporate the new regimental insignia.

The Army may say that is none of our business, but I hope that the openness and public involvement of the past six months will prevail and that the Army does not close ranks and shut us all out. Without public support, the Army will not achieve what it wants by establishing the new single regiment.

Recruitment needs close public involvement to promote the right climate and attract the right calibre and numbers. Even in a recruitment area as small as that of the Green Howards, local contact is still necessary. The Army is not a major employer, but there are local links; for example, the Green Howards marched through Scarborough and Middlesbrough with fixed bayonets and colours flying, when they came back from Afghanistan last October.

Communications are also important. When our forces are on operations, some of which are extremely dangerous, people back home see and hear every movement and event as it happens. The stress and strain can be far harder for the families and communities left behind than for those on operations. The Chief of the Defence Staff has made it clear that families should have high priority in the future Army structure. Being in a close-knit community is a great help, just as community spirit is for those on the ground. Public support for our individual regiments over the past few months, especially for those serving in Iraq, has been tremendous. I pay tribute to the Yorkshire Post for highlighting our concerns and for helping us with our campaign. None of us wants to lose the good will that has been established.

I have told the Secretary of State in earlier debates that a Yorkshire regiment of three battalions and one Territorial Army battalion could be a real success. We must give the four battalions a chance and an edge and that will be greatly enhanced by allowing their individual identities to remain. That will give the Government everything that the future infantry structure requires and a regiment that the people of Yorkshire can continue to support and with which they can identify. The motto, "Once a Green Howard, always a Green Howard", is very much enshrined in the north riding community. I want it retained and taken forward.

None of the three battalions in the Yorkshire regiment will ever see one another in future, because they will all be posted to different places, some of them in other parts of the world. That gives rise to a question that was put earlier in the debate: why do we need to abolish the existing regimental structure? Even if one conceded—I do not—that the Government have a case for reducing the number of battalions by three, that does not mean that we should scrap all those regiments. Furthermore, we all now understand and appreciate the importance of scrapping the arms plot, but none of us can see why the ending of the arms plot should mean scrapping all those historic regiments—a central feature of the debate in the other place on Monday. However, that is what the Government have decided to do and, in Yorkshire, we will try to make a success of the new regiment.

The Minister of State said earlier that the Government and the Army Board are listening to the arguments about identities. I hope that he, his colleagues and the Army Board will reflect on what many of us have said in the debate about the importance of the names and the way the regiments are structured, and the importance of ensuring that as much of their current identity as possible is retained for the future. I genuinely believe that that is an important ingredient in the Government's achieving what they want.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): The Defence Committee—at least, most of it—is in Cyprus, and it is unfortunate that the debate clashes with that visit. It is not the first time that something like this has happened, and I am sure it will not be the last, but I hope that planners will look at such matters in the future to try to allow as many members of the Committee as possible to attend such debates.

The Defence Committee is visiting our forces in the sovereign base areas on the island. It is part of our ongoing work as a Select Committee that we visit our forces. In the past year, we have visited Kosovo, Bosnia and Iraq, twice. We have also visited British forces in other parts of the world, and we will continue to do so. One of the things that I have learned during my two periods as a member of the Committee is the high quality and calibre of our people in the MOD and our armed forces. I shall not comment on the cases that are currently before the courts, but irrespective of whether the allegations are true, they are extremely damaging to everyone's reputation.

The Defence Committee has three inquiries going on simultaneously, one of which is into the duty of care. That inquiry has taken us to the initial and other training establishments around the country and has involved various other visits. I went to Hendon police college while looking at comparator organisations. I have seen how young people are trained, how instructors do their work and how people learn not just the aspects of the military regime but how to become better citizens in the wider sense, so that they can get worthwhile employment in society when they leave our armed forces.

When we see the work that the British Army is doing in southern Iraq, with the quick-fix projects and the enormous skills that are deployed, we realise that it is continuing to have an enormous, positive impact on Iraq. Full-time military personnel and Territorial Army people are assisting with water projects, construction, administration, banking and all kinds of things that the military should not really have to do, because regrettably no one else is around to do them, given the lack of trained people.

I wish that our broadcasters in this country—particularly the BBC—would say something about what we are doing positively in Basra and elsewhere, instead of only basing in Baghdad journalists who take television footage of atrocities and incidents and then comment on them. It is dangerous for journalists—it is dangerous for other civilians—but we have stories tell about what is happening in the south of Iraq. Those stories are not getting out because the journalists are not there to report them. I make an exception for two journalists—one from the Financial Times, the other from The Times—whom I met during our visit to the police training college in December, but it is important that the media give a balanced view of what is happening in Iraq, particularly now in the run-up to the elections and directly afterwards.

In its ongoing inquiry into events in Iraq the Defence Committee has asked a number of questions about investigations into allegations of misconduct. I will not comment on any specific case, as I have said. A memorandum that we were sent in September said:

> "The total number of Service police investigations involving allegations of abuse against Iraqi civilians is currently 131. These investigations cover a range of incidents including operational engagements, negligent discharges and road traffic accidents as well as the alleged physical abuse of detainees. A number of these investigations have concluded with no case to answer. Other investigations are in their early stages".

It said that the number of personnel who had been reported for specific offences was 35 as of 31 August. Will the Under-Secretary tell us how many allegations have now been made and how many personnel have been reported for specific offences?

The memorandum also told us that 55,000 servicemen and women had served in Iraq, and the Prime Minister told us yesterday that the figure is now 65,000. It is clear that a large proportion of our armed forces have gone through Iraq over the past year and a half, and I suspect that many more will go in the coming months as we continue to assist after the constituent assembly is elected and in preparation for the referendum on the new constitution later in the year and the elections for a Parliament, which are scheduled before the end of the year. However, we also need to get many more civilians into Iraq, so the Department for International Development should do far more to assist with the projects that our military have had to carry out over recent months. That could be done safely in the area in which the British military are based, because the situation there is not as it is in other parts of the country.

The Committee's third inquiry is examining future capabilities. We recently took evidence from the Chief of the Defence Staff and the Secretary of State, and we will take more evidence before we conclude our report. We will publish our three major reports in the next few months. I am sure that we will have them out just before the general election—whenever that is.

As I said earlier, I have visited Kosovo and Bosnia, so I would like an update on what has happened following the transition of the control of forces in Bosnia from the NATO SFOR to the European Union EUFOR. Is it going well, and have we solved the problems caused by different national rules—the so-called national caveats? They prevented co-operation, because countries such as Germany had restrictions on the policing role of the armed forces, and caused other difficulties. Given that we are six weeks on from the transition, may we have an update on the situation?

My right hon. Friend the Minister referred to the situation last March when we had to intervene in Kosovo at short notice because of disgraceful violence and the fact that Albanians were burning out the homes of the Serb minority. Pressure and difficulty are increasing because the majority in Kosovo have expectations that their status will finally be resolved in 2005, but there is no easy resolution to the situation. It is reported that investigations are being held into many leading figures in the Kosovo Administration. The recently appointed Prime Minister of Kosovo, Mr. Ramush Haradinaj, has close links with some of those against whom allegations have been made and his brother has been arrested. If another upsurge of orchestrated activity occurs, I would like an assurance that the NATO forces and our own people will be ready for it and that a period of a few hours, or perhaps even longer, in which they do not intervene does not occur, which was the difficulty in March last year.

I want to move on to my final remarks and shall try to finish in less than the maximum time, to allow Opposition Members to speak. On ethnic minority recruitment into our armed forces, the MOD has published a helpful document, "Race equality scheme 2002-2005 progress report 2004", which reveals that the number of ethnic minority personnel has increased in all three services. However, it admits that progress has been slower than expected and that the percentage goals have not been met in all respects.

I ask the Government to redouble their efforts. My constituency contains large numbers of people from all kinds of ethnic minorities. In my work with the Select Committee, I have seen people from all over the world serving with British forces, which is partly due to recruitment from Commonwealth countries. I have come across Fijians, Samoans and people from other parts of the world, as well as pilots from New Zealand, in our armed forces. However, I hope that we can start to recruit British-black, British-Indian and British-Pakistani people, so that our forces more accurately reflect the diversity and nature of modern Britain.

Finally, the excellent work by British forces, which we always expect, in the relief of people who have suffered from the tsunami has already been mentioned. My Sri Lankan-Tamil constituents want me to put it on record in this House that they greatly appreciate our efforts. They are a little bit concerned that some of the aid to Sri Lanka is not getting through to Tamil areas because of the history of internal conflict, and they want the British Government to do whatever they can to facilitate that process so that aid is distributed fairly.

My Sri Lankan-Tamil constituents have nothing but praise for the help that has been given to places such as Batticaloa that were victims of the terrible disaster. We should place on record our thanks to all those involved, whether they are civilians, work in Departments other than the MOD, are on ships such as RFA Diligence and HMS Chatham or whether they are helicopter pilots, for whatever they have done to save lives and to help make at least some lives better after the terrible tragedy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As a significant number of hon. Members are still seeking to catch my eye, Mr. Speaker has decided that the order of the House of 26 October on shorter speeches will apply today. From now until half-past 5, a shorter 10-minute time limit will apply. I remind hon. Members that no added time is allowed for interventions during a period of shorter speeches.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): The armed forces reflect the esteem of the people for their way of life and the commitment of a nation to the defence of its values and culture. Any Government who neglected the interests of the armed forces and those who serve in them would demonstrate a lack of care for the way of life that the people themselves hold dear.

The subject is important, and it is sad that the Secretary of State could not be present, particularly because our armed forces have served with exceptional distinction in Iraq, where they have taken so many casualties. Soldiers have been killed and, as we have learned, wounded in very large numbers. As was said, we should also remember the sterling help given by our armed forces to the victims of the tsunami tragedy in Sri Lanka and elsewhere.

I want to address two practical themes and a further, more strategic one. Apart from the exploits of the British Army in Iraq, there has also been some unfortunate publicity. In addition, particularly unfortunate publicity was given to the suicide last year of four recruits at the Royal Logistic Corps training centre at Deepcut barracks. One theme unites both these episodes: that the discipline of our armed forces must be absolutely fundamental. We do not emphasise sufficiently in our debates the need for our armed forces to retain the very highest standards of discipline. When things go wrong, it is not the soldiers, airmen or sailors who are so much to blame: it is the officers who should carry the can and demonstrate a sense of responsibility, care and concern for those in their command, and a sense of leadership.

Officers will have those attributes only if they are properly trained, and training is the second of my practical themes. For officers, the training process these days has become too much of a sausage machine. Let us consider other armed forces of great distinction, such as those of the United States. The West Point army academy, the Colorado Springs air force academy, and Annapolis naval academy have four-year courses. Other armed forces of leading nations are not taking our path, which is to cut the length of training for officers in the early stages. That is a wrong-headed economy, which does not give the necessary basic training or the required sense of commitment, duty and above all discipline. Shortfalls in basic training and in the induction process have to be made up in the units themselves, which reduces their operational efficiency.

It has been complained that the Territorial Army, which constitutes some 20 per cent. of the British Army in Iraq, has gone into theatre with inadequate weapons training. That is absolutely inexcusable, and it re-emphasises the point that there can be no shortcuts in training. Of course, the TA's performance in theatre has been admirable and everyone has rightly praised it, just as they have praised the performance of the Royal Naval Reserve and in particular of the Royal Auxiliary Air Force's 600 City of London Squadron. The squadron, which is celebrating its 80th anniversary, is based at RAF Northolt in my constituency. The reserves have an enormous part to play in the future of our armed forces, but they need adequate training and the support of the regular element. Over time, we should pay more attention to the reserves, and the Conservatives will. Indeed, such a policy is at the heart of one of our main proposals for the future of our defence.

The strategic theme on which I want to touch is not the growing power of China. In that regard, I was interested to hear the observations of the former Minister, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson), which exemplified one thing—that we live in a greatly changing world—but the disposition of our forces does not reflect the fact. It is an anachronism that the largest single element of our Army should be deployed in Germany. Of course, we have forces elsewhere, too. We have more or less 1,000 troops in Kosovo, some 1,000 in Bosnia and Herzegovina, approximately 1,000 in the Falklands and a further 1,000 in Gibraltar. There are 3,500 troops in Cyprus, some 1,000 in Brunei and just under 1,000 in Afghanistan. But do we need 21,250 in Germany, at bases that are left over from the cold war?

The Allied Command Europe Rapid Reaction Corps, of course, is dependent on the British, as we are the framework nation and provide 60 per cent. of the headquarters personnel. I wonder, however, about keeping an armoured division, with three armoured brigades based at cold war garrisons such as Hohne, Osnabrück, Münster, Paderborn, Gütersloh, Sennelager and Falingbostel—names that will be familiar to cold war warriors such as me. Does that reflect today's reality, now that the Warsaw pact is disbanded, and NATO has expanded to encompasses the Baltic states, the Czech Republic, Slovakia and Poland? There is a buffer zone between western Europe and the east, and there is even a clear divergence of attitude between our German friends and us—the Germans sought to prevent Turkey from having Patriot missiles for its air defence before the Gulf war, and the Germans, French, Belgians and Luxembourgers had their own Defence Ministers meeting in the spring last year to try to pursue a slightly different strategy.

We ought to try to evolve a new strategy to pay much more attention than we do to expeditionary warfare. We are moving in the right direction, and the various reviews have embraced that idea. In practical terms, however, a great deal more needs to be done. The Government have announced the provision of a new C-17 heavy air-lifter to take personnel to trouble spots overseas, but we have only four others, although the amphibious forces and the Royal Marines are the best of their kind in the world today, and I wholeheartedly applaud Her Majesty's Government's attention to amphibious capability. Nevertheless, the British presence in Germany, which, I think, costs about £1.2 billion per year—perhaps the Minister will correct me on that—is an anachronism, and should be reviewed. There is no need to keep our forces stationed in Germany for them to participate in the ARRC.

I was interested to note, too, that Her Majesty's Government, and certainly the Minister of State in his speech, made no mention of the European security and defence policy, and the commitment, to which we are signing up under the European constitution that the Government embrace, to be ready to participate in the deployment of an army corps up to 4,000 km from Brussels, and to keep it in theatre for up to a year. Those are big commitments of an expeditionary kind, and I do not yet see that our armed forces have been modified sufficiently in that direction. I find it perverse that the main instrument for projective power, the Royal Air Force, should be the one sustaining the biggest cuts in the review being imposed by Her Majesty's Government.

We should spend our money more at home, deploying our forces from home bases, using instruments of power projection such as amphibious vessels and an enhanced air transport fleet. In that way, our armed forces would be better configured, particularly if they had larger reserves. I know that my party is working on many of those ideas, particularly in the field of deployment and reserves, but the stationing of such a large proportion of our Army in Germany, particularly western Germany, is questionable at the present time.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): As the MP for Perth, where the Black Watch has its regimental headquarters, I know that my constituents would wish me to make several points on their behalf today. I am therefore very pleased to have been given the opportunity to do so. This is the first time since the Defence Secretary wielded his axe to scrap the entire Scottish regimental system, further to his announcement on 16 December last year, that the House has had the opportunity to debate the matter more fully. It is just a pity that the Government have not had the courage of their convictions and allowed a vote, because if we were allowed a vote on this shameful decision, it would be interesting to see which Labour Members would be prepared to stand up and be counted to save the Scottish regiments. I fear very few indeed, if any.

That contrasts with the position of the Scottish Parliament, which had a vote on the same day as the Defence Secretary made his announcement. At present, the Scottish Parliament does not enjoy power and jurisdiction in this matter, but the House may be interested to learn that, none the less, it voted against the decision by the UK Government to scrap Scotland's regimental system, which was a rare defeat for the Labour-Liberal Scottish Executive. Since the Defence Secretary made his announcement in December, I have been inundated with messages of support for my stance on the Black Watch, the Argylls and the other Scottish regiments from my constituents, people the length and breadth of Scotland and, indeed, people throughout the United Kingdom and further afield.

That support was clearly in evidence at the "Save the Scottish Regiments" rally in Edinburgh on 18 December, when veterans, retired officers, the families of serving soldiers—the Minister of State rightly recognised that their interests are important—and members of affected communities marched proudly down Princes street. Serving soldiers even came along, but they could not wear their uniforms because they were expressly ordered not to do so. The people of Edinburgh lined the streets to support the campaign and applaud the Scottish soldiers. I was proud to march alongside them and to speak at the rally, along with my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart). While speakers from all parties came to the rally, not one Scottish Labour MP bothered to turn up or to stand up and be counted. I suspect that that will not go unnoticed and will not be forgotten or forgiven as we approach the UK general election, which is widely predicted to be held in May.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk, West) (Lab) rose—

Annabelle Ewing: The people of Scotland regard our brave soldiers as part of the fabric of the Scottish nation. They are proud of them and disgusted by the Government's decision to disband and amalgamate the Scottish regiments out of existence. Their disgust is even greater, given the fact that the announcement was made by the Defence Secretary just as soldiers from the Black Watch were returning home to their families in Perthshire, Fife, Dundee and Angus.

Mr. Joyce rose—

Annabelle Ewing: They had just served their second tour of duty within a year in Iraq, had been involved in the controversial deployment to northern Iraq and had sustained the loss of their comrades in arms.

Mr. Joyce: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not customary for a Member making a speech at least to indicate to someone who asks them to give way that they will not do so?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Whether the Member addressing the House gives way is entirely a matter for her. If the hon. Gentleman had been in the Chamber early on, he might have realised how short of time we are, which is probably why the hon. Lady is not giving way.

Annabelle Ewing: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

On the timing of the Defence Secretary's announcement, not only were soldiers from the Black Watch returning home after their second tour of duty in Iraq and a controversial redeployment but they had sustained the loss of their comrades. They had also been required to take part in a publicity shoot with the Defence Secretary, who visited them when they were safely back in Basra—he did not quite make it to Camp Dogwood. It is no wonder that there is anger not just in the traditional recruiting heartlands of the Black Watch but the length and breadth of Scotland.

People believe that the Black Watch, the Argylls and the other Scottish Regiments have been stabbed in the back. They do not accept that it is either sensible or logical to axe the Scottish regiments at a time of increasing international insecurity and military overstretch, about which we have heard much today. They rightly regard the Scottish regiments as the finest in the world, and the bravery, professionalism and commitment of our Scottish soldiers are second to none. It is cynical in the extreme, they believe, that the Government should, on the one hand, put a cap on recruitment—I think that we are supposed to call it a pause in light of what the Minister of State said in response to my intervention—while talking up recruitment difficulties, even though the Black Watch, to name but one regiment, exceeded its recruitment target. They consider the arms plot argument a red herring, because nobody has ever explained why scrapping the entire Scottish regimental system is necessary to phase out the arms plot.

What is clear to people in my constituency and elsewhere is that this was a political decision, although the Government tried in an unseemly way to pass the buck to the Army. It is also clear to people in Scotland that the decision was Treasury-driven and that the impetus came from the Chancellor. That was recognised by no less than Colonel Tim Collins. In a BBC interview of November 2004, he said:

"These reductions are about saving money for the Treasury. It is not about making the army better and it is not about fixing something that is broken."

We have heard much from the Government about operational efficiency and the need to improve it, but the fact of the matter is that scrapping the entire Scottish regimental system will not improve operational efficiency.

Our Scottish regiments are the envy of the world, for the esprit de corps that is engendered by loyalty to the regiment first and foremost is what puts Scottish soldiers in a class of their own. That was recognised even by this Government, who took the decision to redeploy 600-odd Black Watch soldiers to the US zone in Iraq because they were indispensable to the 130,000-strong US army. What my constituents still want to know is why the Black Watch is not therefore viewed as indispensable to the Government. Indeed, in recent weeks, we have seen the return of the Royal Highland Fusiliers to Iraq, with the Royal Scots held in reserve. That is another example of how indispensable our Scottish regiments are and how fit for purpose they are for doing the job that the Government have asked them to do.

Key military experts have also expressed fears about the impact on recruitment of these damaging policies. We need look back no further than the early 1990s, when the then Conservative Government launched their assault on the Scottish regiments with the amalgamation of the Gordons and the Queen's Own Highlanders, to see the devastating impact of such changes on recruitment for many years.

We have heard much about the Government's claims that serving Scottish soldiers favour the scrapping of their regiments, but they were not asked how they felt. The only poll conducted by the Ministry of Defence apparently did not even include that question. Instead, there was a Hobson's choice question about which kind of amalgamation they would prefer. Curiously, the results of that poll were not published by the MOD, as far as I am aware. Given that the soldiers have also been gagged to stop them speaking out, it is difficult to understand how the Government can state that they have evidence to show support among serving soldiers for the decision to scrap the regiments. I have received many letters from serving soldiers not only in the Black Watch, but in other regiments, and I can assure the Minister that none of them wishes to see their regiment scrapped.

In conclusion, the decision taken by the Government to scrap Scotland's entire regimental system is not only wrong, but a betrayal of our brave soldiers. It will never be forgiven or forgotten by the people of Scotland. Even at this late hour, the Government could do a U-turn. They have done so on other issues, and they could give the regiments a reprieve. That view is supported by the Adjutant-General, no less, and by the current colonel of the Black Watch. I urge the Government to think again. If they do not do so, they will deserve all that they get at the ballot box when the people of Scotland have the opportunity to say what they think.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): I am delighted that the Minister of State is back in the Chamber. I thought earlier that it was rather silly and slightly pompous of him to take the attitude that my failure to be present in the Select Committee on Defence when he was giving evidence was a basis for not taking an intervention from me. If the Secretary of State exercised such criteria, several Labour members of the Committee would be in serious trouble in future defence debates.

Had the Minister taken my intervention, I would have asked him the question that I now hope the Under-Secretary will answer. Now that we have agreed the configuration for the infantry regiments, can the Ministry of Defence give us a timing for when those decisions will be implemented? When will the full capability now being talked about be deployable? On commitments, what tasks was the Secretary of State alluding to when he said that they would no longer be on the agenda of the Royal Navy? When he was pressed to answer that question at the Defence Committee, regrettably he chose not to. Several hon. Members were concerned that he had stated on two occasions that a number of cold war tasks would no longer need to be tackled by the Navy and could be covered in other ways, possibly by other navies. He was not prepared to give straight answers to questions about timing for the Army or the commitments of the Navy.

All hon. Members who have spoken have been extraordinarily complimentary, and rightly so, about the men and women who serve in our armed forces, from the very top to the most junior recruits. We have heard testimony after testimony of the work that they are doing in their fighting capacity and in delivering humanitarian aid, which has been so apparent not only in recent weeks in Indonesia, Sri Lanka and elsewhere, but repeatedly across the world. We should recognise that and be proud of it.

We must recognise that discipline is crucial to a coherent fighting force. It must be present at all levels and there must be confidence that it will be exercised fairly and accountably. The Defence Committee is engaged in a duty of care exercise. If Ministers have not yet read the testimony of families from Catterick and Deepcut who came to give evidence, I urge them to do so. If I had been present at that evidence session, I would have asked the Minister for the Armed Forces why he felt compelled to set up the inquiry into Deepcut at that stage, when the evidence that he is now asking the inquiry to examine had been in his hands for several months before that decision was taken. The decision to hold the inquiry was taken because the Ministry of Defence, or the politicians who head it, was shamed into it by the sort of evidence that we heard in the Select Committee when those families came, and by the media exposure of the incompetence and the failure of Ministers to tackle the issue properly.

The issue is where the duty of care starts and finishes. Many reports were written. We were given evidence by Lieutenant Colonel Hais, who gave the last report on the problems relating to training and recruitment. When he started the process, he was not told that there had been previous reports. When asked where those reports had ended up, he could give no answer. When senior officers came to give evidence to us, we asked them the same question. None of them has so far given an answer. The Defence Committee is still awaiting a written reply from the Ministry of Defence about where those three or four reports on problems at Deepcut and on bullying in the Army ended up and who took responsibility for them.

If there is to be discipline, it should start at the top. Discipline and a duty of care should be exercised from the top downwards. It is beyond belief that for years the MOD was in a state of denial and thought the problems would go away. That was the failure that so depressed the families. [Interruption.] I can understand the Minister for the Armed Forces muttering under his breath that he does not want to hear it. He did not want to hear the intervention earlier. He did not want to hear what the parents of the dead soldiers had been saying— [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister must not keep chuntering. It is very disruptive of the debate.

Mr. Hancock: Thank you for that intervention, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This shows that Ministers are extraordinarily guilty about the way in which they have let these people down. They are as responsible as any non-commissioned officer or senior officer in the Army for exercising a duty of care to these young men and women and their families.

The Geneva convention, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers), does not cover many of the situations in which we now find ourselves. We do not know if a prisoner of war is a genuine combatant of the country with which one is at war, an insurgent, a common criminal, or a terrorist engaged in fighting not for a country but for an abstract issue that is not directly part of the war. That blurring of responsibilities makes it difficult for soldiers on the ground to decide who is covered by what. The prevailing situation should always be governed by how we would want and expect to be treated ourselves in a similar position. I hope that that message goes out loud and clear.

I urge the Ministry of Defence to reconsider some of the issues that it has so far identified as being at the top of its list—for example, the replacement for HMS Diligence, a ship that has served this nation well and offered a capability that will be lost when she goes out of commission in 2006. When that issue was raised by at least three hon. Members at a recent meeting of the Select Committee, the Secretary of State said, "We've moved on from replacing like with like, ship for ship." But this ship is a unique facility that is being got rid of with no way of replacing it. The Government should seriously consider the way in which it has operated over the past two years in making a significant contribution to the maritime aid and defence of the soldiers and civilians whom we want to assist.

On the capability of the Royal Air Force, the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) spoke with passion about his concerns for the work force at St. Athan. No satisfactory answer has been given to the question of why this is being done. What will happen to that multi-million pound facility? It is a similar situation to that of the military hospital in Haslar, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Gosport. The facilities were updated at the same time as the Government were considering closing it. The same thing has happened at St. Athan.

As always in these debates, Members have to balance what they say in defending the armed forces and the great work that they do and in spelling out the problems as we see them. Ministers might feel that some criticisms are unfair, but they are not listening to the men and women who work and serve in our armed forces if they ignore many of the concerns that have been expressed here this afternoon. Armed forces personnel care about how their families are treated. I urge the Minister to think long and hard about this question: when does he genuinely believe that he properly exercised his duty of care to the parents of those children who died at Deepcut and Catterick? It is about time that we had more than a face-saving device and undertook a proper public inquiry.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): I have not participated in an armed forces personnel debate before, and having listened to the speeches I rather feel that I have been missing out. We heard powerful contributions from the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith), who spoke in defence of contracting out and privatisation—one does not often hear that from a Labour Member—and from the Father of the House, the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who talked about Gulf war syndrome. I particularly enjoyed the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), who spoke with great wisdom and knowledge about the dangers of cuts to the RAF. I entirely agree with him. I am afraid that my own contribution will be much more mundane and prosaic, concentrating on a couple of issues that particularly matter to forces families in my constituency.

I apologise to the Minister for missing his opening speech. I am particularly sorry because I know that he visited RAF Brize Norton in my constituency this week. I want to take this opportunity—as, I am sure, would he—to put on the record how much we value all the work done by the armed forces and other personnel at RAF Brize Norton, not just their support for forces overseas but the help they have given with the tsunami appeal and other such things. All hon. Members say how much we value our armed forces, so it is important for us to turn words into action. The forces do so much work for us and there is much more that we should do for them.

As I have said, RAF Brize Norton in my constituency is one of the largest and most important air bases, and it is becoming more important as staff will be relocated from Lyneham to Brize Norton. When I went there recently, planes and personnel were in Iraq, Afghanistan, the Balkans, Ivory Coast and elsewhere. As the Minister will know, the base has a huge range of facilities. It has a fleet of VC10s, TriStars and C-17s, and there is the future strategic tanker aircraft to come. It includes the parachute training school, the tactical communications wing and two auxiliary squadrons supporting the RAF on the ground, as well as a number of lodge units.

Brize Norton is the funnel to convey men and materiel out of the country to wherever they are being deployed. As our role grows, as we do more, as we do what my predecessor Lord Hurd described as punching above our weight in the world, it is important for Brize Norton to have all the facilities that it needs. My point is simple: Brize Norton is becoming a super-base. It is becoming more like a Catterick or a Colchester than what it has been in the past. We must ensure that it has the facilities that go with that status, and that we treat the people who work there well. We should also look at the facilities in the neighbouring town of Carterton.

Many are far more expert than me when it comes to procurement and equipment, but there are real concerns in the RAF, often relayed to me, about whether our forces will have the planes that are necessary for them to do what is required of them. The issue is continuity of equipment—people are worried about gaps between the decommissioning of one set of equipment and the commissioning of a new set. Everyone says, and I am sure it is true, that mobility and flexibility of forces are what will matter in the future. At the heart of that lie heavy lift and refuelling, which are very much what Brize Norton is all about.

We clearly need to replace the Hercules fleet, but the A400M has not yet been built and many believe that there is no chance of its arriving on time. We also need to replace the VC10s, which are extremely old, but the future strategic tanker aircraft contract is huge and complicated and it will be difficult to deliver. I would like the Minister to tell us whether the Government are confident that continuity of equipment can be achieved. I would also like to know whether the Government have a plan B lest any of those things do not come to fruition at the intended time. As I have said, refuelling and heavy lift are essential and are at the heart of what happens at Brize Norton. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say.

I want to say something about schools and housing. Almost exactly a year ago, I secured an Adjournment debate on forces schools. A vital issue of concern to armed forces personnel is the level of education that their children are getting and whether the schools are adequate for the job. As the Minister knows, there are two types of forces schools. There are those run by Service Children's Education, which are very successful. If SCE were a local education authority, it would be one of the top performers in the country. Then there are normal schools which are part of LEAs, but admit a large number of forces children. I want to talk about the second type.

In my constituency there are five primary schools in Carterton containing a large number of forces children. I am visiting one, St. John's, tomorrow. There is also Carterton community college. The key issue is what is known as turbulence, or turnover. At some of these schools the number of children arriving and leaving within a year can be as high as 75 per cent. At Gateway school in Carterton, which I visited recently, the turnover is 45 per cent.

It does not require rocket science to work out that such a high turnover leads to problems. There is a problem with continuity of teaching, and extra report writing obviously imposes additional costs. There is the problem of integrating new children, particularly those with special educational needs, in a new school. There is a series of issues for Ofsted, which does not always understand the pressures faced by forces schools. There is also the fact that these are forces families, not just any families. Given the situation in Iraq, among others, counselling services—even bereavement counselling—are required. It should be borne in mind that while a man or a woman is away in theatres of action, the family left behind becomes a single-parent family, with all the pressures and problems that that entails.

In my Adjournment debate, the then Minister for School Standards, the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Miliband), said:

"In response to concerns that were raised, the SCE and the Department are working together to develop the National Association for State Schools for Service Children's Education into an organisation that operates more formally than at present. We hope that it will be an effective organisation representing schools with service children nationally and commenting on policy matters. The schools contacted so far have expressed support for the proposal."—[Official Report, 7 January 2004; Vol. 416, c.100WH.]

He went on to explain that a national conference was anticipated later in the year. That was all very positive stuff. My question for the Minister today is: what happened next? From what I have discovered, the answer seems to be not much.

I have here a letter from a teacher in my constituency, who says:

"In May 2004 we set up regional meetings all around the country and invited Headteachers of schools that had service children along with LEA representatives. The issues that were facing schools were noted from these meetings. We sent a letter to the Minister at the beginning of August 2004. The letter outlined the issues and made recommendations . . . In September 2004 the DfES responded to our letter. Firstly it had not been seen by the Minister and secondly it ignored many of the issues that we raised. At the meeting we asked the DfES representative to give a copy to Charles Clark. This they agreed to do. We cancelled a meeting in November because there had been no response from the Minister and here we are in January with a change of Minister and still no response. My principal concern now is that our concerns and issues may be overlooked and that we may have to start again."

This is a serious situation for the Minister to take into account. May I suggest that MOD Ministers get in touch with their DfES colleagues and try to push this matter to the top of the appropriate Education Minister's in-tray? One of the most tangible things that we can do for service families is ensure that their children get a good education. Oxfordshire county council has put some extra money into forces schools, and it is time for the national Government to take the issue more seriously.

My final point is on housing. The Minister knows that this is a long-running saga in Carterton, and we need to resolve it. The bottom line is that the forces housing in Carterton is among the worst in the UK. The prefab homes were never meant to last this long. We now have a real opportunity to provide better homes for our forces families and a better environment for the town. Almost every services family has a story to tell about the wife arriving, seeing the forces home and bursting into tears. Yet that is where they will have to live for the next few years. Some of the buildings look, from the outside, like Soviet housing in Volgograd; we really need to do better.

There is a clear answer to be found in the knock-down and rebuild programme, but this private finance initiative scheme has been beset by delays. It has required three bodies to take action: West Oxfordshire district council is dealing with planning and planning gain; Annington Homes is involved in making land available to other bidders; and, above all, the Ministry of Defence and the Defence Housing Executive that must push the process forward. I can now give the Minister an update. West Oxfordshire district council has given outline planning permission for the scheme and costed the section 106 agreements. It has done its bit. Annington Homes has made its land available to the other bidders, Riverside and Tricon, at a transparent price. It is now up to the Ministry of Defence to move things forward. I hope that this issue will get to the top of the Minister's in-tray. It really would make a huge difference to my constituents in Carterton.

The forces do a great job for us and we must do more for them. Overstretch in our armed forces is getting worse, time at home between missions is getting shorter and the stresses and strains on our forces families are getting more severe. We want to see action being taken and priority being given to these issues. Frankly, it is the least we can do.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow my neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron). I, too, want to make some Oxfordshire-related comments.

There is clearly a tension between what Ministers in the Ministry of Defence think the armed forces should be doing and what the armed forces can do within the tight restraints of their budget. To understand this tension, we need to take a few steps back to 1997, when the present Government were elected on a manifesto promise to undertake a strategic defence review. It was intended to be the biggest review of the armed forces since the cold war. It was described in a Library briefing as "a foreign policy-led review to re-assess the UK's national interests and likely overseas commitments in the post-Cold War strategic environment to 2015, and then to establish how the UK's Armed Forces should be structured and deployed in order to meet those interests and commitments."

In other words, it is a process to identify budget cuts.

We then had the terrorist atrocities of 11 September 2001, which changed the world landscape. Another chapter was hurriedly added to the strategic defence review: indeed, it was titled "A New Chapter" and was published in July 2002. It sought to re-examine the UK's defence in response to the challenges of international terrorism and the issues highlighted by the events of 11 September. The Defence Secretary told the House in a statement on 17 October 2002:

"Across Government, we have now been set new challenges by international terrorism. We have set in train work to re-examine our defence policy and plans in the light of the terrorist threat demonstrated by 11 September . . . As a result, we published a new chapter to the strategic defence review on 18 July. It shows that the strategic defence review's emphasis on expeditionary operations working with allies was right, but demonstrates—crucially—how best to use our forces against a different sort of enemy: one that is determined, well hidden and vastly different from the conventional forces that we might have expected to face in the past." —[Official Report, 17 October 2002; Vol. 390, c. 500.]

All that represented a conundrum to Ministers. On the one hand, the strategic defence review was supposed to bring significant cuts to the armed forces and the size of the defence budget. On the other, the horrific events of 11 September would lead to additional commitments that UK armed forces would need to undertake. What has happened? On 26 July last year, two years after "A New Chapter", the RAF was cut by 12,000 personnel, the Royal Navy lost 5,000 men and the Army had 5,500 troops axed. Overall, the armed forces are to be reduced by a 10th, with many ships and tanks being scrapped in what is nothing short of a political and moral betrayal.

Not only were personnel being cut, the kit was also cut. The focus on loss of equipment is especially relevant to my constituency and the MOD facilities based at Bicester and Caversfield. Ministers have been arguing that the armed forces need less kit, and that with less kit come fewer personnel. Ministers perversely claim that such cuts are being made because the UK faces a new threat and that advances in technology mean that a little kit will go a long way. That is what Ministers claim, but few have been convinced.

Let us consider, for instance, the excellent Defence Committee report late last year on the defence White Paper. It brilliantly summed up the paradox in which the Ministry of Defence finds itself. It states:

"As the post-conflict stage in Iraq has shown, a great deal more is required to achieve the objectives of an effects-based operation than advanced military technologies in the hands of numerically small forces."

In other words, a little kit does not necessarily go a long way. Armed personnel still need to be armed and properly kitted out. Despite what the Secretary of State said in his statement on "A New Chapter" about "a different sort of enemy: one that is determined, well hidden and vastly different from conventional forces", the response to combating the enemy is still strikingly conventional, as we are witnessing in Iraq.

The MOD facilities based in my constituency have been crucial to the ongoing operations in Iraq, as they were during the first Gulf war. There are two significant MOD operations in north Oxfordshire: the Defence Logistics Organisation and the Defence Storage and Distribution Centre. During the first days of the war in Iraq, the DSDC dispatched more than 2,700 International Organisation for Standardisation containers of supplies to troops. If those containers were stacked end to end, they would cover the whole length of the M40.

The DLO, the DSDC and all those who work there are crucial, and continue to be crucial, to UK operations in Iraq and elsewhere in the world. Furthermore, the DSDC was able to deploy more than twice the amount of kit in half the amount of time during the Iraq conflict in comparison with the previous Gulf war. The DSDC and all who work there are clearly demonstrating greater efficiency and effectiveness, but Ministers want their operations severely cut back. They are suggesting savings of 28 per cent.—a huge amount. If Ministers said that they wanted the equivalent cuts of 30 per cent. to social services in Oxfordshire, the community would see huge chunks of services vanish overnight.

I took a delegation last year from the DSDC in Bicester to meet the Secretary of State, who gave a commitment that any in-house bid put together at MOD Bicester would be fairly considered against bids from just the private sector, but nothing in the defence White Paper or the Secretary of State's subsequent statements to the House suggest that a trading fund for defence logistics has a genuine chance. Yet there are genuine benefits in undertaking a trading fund—it could make the substantial efficiency savings that the MOD wants and preserve jobs at Bicester. Those who advocate a trading fund are confident that it can meet the 28 per cent. savings that the MOD wants.

The situation at the Defence Logistics Organisation is bleak. No job is safe. The Minister for the armed forces wrote to me at the end of last year to say that the MOD is exploring,

"best value for money for the taxpayer . . . more efficiency ways of working . . . improving the service provided".

When Ministers use words such as "efficiency" and "best value", it is often code for cuts being on the horizon.

Ministers are being coy about how significant the job cuts will be, but we know that there will be cuts and that jobs will be lost. Indeed, in the same letter the Minister made it clear:

"Based on the work done so far, we estimate we could save"— which is synonymous with "cut" in that context—

"up to 950 posts across the DLO by changing working practices in these functions by April 2005 and at least a further 2,000 posts by 2008."

That is a large number of jobs to axe. Almost 3,000 lost jobs would wipe out the DLO at Bicester, although I accept that not all the job losses will necessarily happen in my constituency.

There is a genuine fear that almost all the jobs will be lost in and around Bicester. That is underscored by the Minister's comments about the work that the MOD is undertaking. He said that "further work will look at options for incremental collocation, using the existing Abbey Wood site in Bristol as the hub of the MOD acquisition community, and the extent to which the DLO retains staff at other sites".

None of that is reassuring for local people that jobs are safe. Rather, it suggests that jobs may be secured at Bristol, but not at Bicester. There is a suspicion in the community that Ministers are preparing local people for a soft landing on those job losses.

In less than four months, we will know the extent of the job losses. The signs are that, overall, more jobs will be lost at Bicester than anywhere else in the country. Ministers have indicated neither how many jobs will be transferred—very few I suspect, given that Bristol already has an extensive DLO operation—nor how long it will be before the jobs are phased out. They have not said what assistance will be given to those who will definitely lose their jobs at Caversfield.

Why are not Ministers considering whether savings can be made without widespread job losses? The Defence Committee's report stated:

"We are left wondering whether the Defence White Paper is properly set in the strategic context of Britain's security circumstances, or whether it is more a reflection of what the UK has actually been doing for the last three years, and the existence of a number of legacy systems of whose continuing importance the MoD is uncertain. In other words it is far from clear whether the review process has actually been effects-led, or rather resource driven."

I suspect that it was entirely resource driven. That description can be applied to almost every aspect of the MOD since the start of the SDR, and certainly to developments at Bicester.

Much attention has rightly been paid to the bravery of our armed forces in Iraq and there is—again rightly—considerable dismay about the number of regiments that have served in Iraq and the Gulf and are now under threat. However, there are also unseen heroes, who have worked very hard for long hours, often through the night, to make sure that our troops overseas in the middle east and elsewhere are properly kitted out. They have done that without fuss, at great speed, effectively and efficiently. Many of those unseen heroes work at Bicester and Caversfield, yet their jobs are now under serious threat.

There is a long-standing convention that Ministers do not make controversial announcements around the time of a general election, so if there is to be a poll on 5 May, perhaps Ministers hope that they can delay any announcement until after the election. However, I hope that, whenever such an announcement is made, it is not sneaked out. That is the least those unseen civilian MOD staff at DLO and DSDC deserve.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): It is a great pleasure to contribute to a defence debate—the first since I joined the armed forces parliamentary scheme. I should like to put on record my gratitude and, I am sure, that of everyone who participated in it, to those who set up such an informative, varied and educational programme, which was also enjoyable.

We went to various Army establishments throughout the UK, from basic training in Bassingbourn to visiting the most senior officers in the British Army. We were all impressed with the enthusiasm, skill and quality of the people whom we met and their determination to play their part in ensuring that the British Army could deliver for the nation and that peace and stability was achieved throughout the globe.

As well as visiting establishments in the UK, we also visited Brunei and Kabul. We met the Green Howards in Kabul, where it was clear that the international force of which they were a part held their peacekeeping work in high esteem. In Brunei, we met a company of Gurkhas just returned from Kabul, and we went into the jungle with them.

It is obvious that the Gurkhas will remain a potent and able element in the British Army when it comes to jungle fighting. We were overjoyed to hear that they remained untouched by the reorganisation facing other infantry battalions and regiments. One Gurkha major told me that fighting in the jungle is wet but hot, whereas fighting in arctic conditions is cold but dry. However, Sennybridge in my constituency is both cold and wet, and one needs a high level of personal organisation to survive there.

I decided to enter the parliamentary scheme to which I referred earlier because there are various important Army establishments in my constituency, and I want to say a few words about them before I move on to the fate of the Welsh regiments. Indeed, 160 Brigade Wales is based in Brecon, and I want to pay tribute to Brigadier Ian Chalerton and his predecessor, Robert Aitken, who have done so much to build bridges between military and civilians in the area. It is in the interests of both communities that the brigade should be successful.

The most important establishment locally is the Sennybridge range—the Eppynt, as we call it. The facility had a very unhappy beginning, as people had to be moved out to allow the British Army to use the 34,000 acres there for training. Local people still talk to me about the farms and homes that they left behind, but things have moved on now. The facility's contribution to the local economy is well established, with more than 80 civilians working there. Unfortunately, they are no longer MOD civil servants, and now work for Landmarc Support Services. The TUPE reorganisation and the resulting transfer has gone moderately well, but some people are still worried about their pensions and the transfer of pension entitlement. I hope that the Minister, when he winds up, will say something about that.

I also want to pay tribute to the Eppynt site land managers. They put together a very effective scheme and at the same time maintained grazing rights for farmers in the surrounding area. They also worked to promote conservation locally, and a circular path call the Eppynt way is to be opened shortly. That will be a valued tourist facility in the area. As in other ranges maintained by the MOD, it is clear that an approach that involves people working together is achieving results.

The very important Derring Lines facility provides tactical training for junior officers and NCOs. I guess that almost every infantry NCO will have undertaken that training there at some time. A recent innovation is that 50 young cadets from Sandhurst will complete their officer training on the Sennybridge ranges rather than in Wiltshire, and I am sure that the test that they will undergo there will make them more than ready for the challenges that they will face in the Army proper. I also want to put on record my appreciation of how the company of Gurkhas permanently based there as a demonstration unit have integrated into the local community.

As the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan and other Welsh Members have said, there is a great deal of concern about the reorganisation of the Welsh regiments. The amalgamation might have been anticipated, and we appreciate that it did not touch the Welsh Guards. But the Royal Regiment of Wales and the Royal Welch Fusiliers feel that their ability to recruit and retain men may be affected by the new title.

Since I wrote to the Secretary of State on 12 January, he has agreed to meet a cross-party delegation of Welsh MPs, including the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Wiggin), who has an interest in this matter. I have no wish to belittle the contribution that has been made by the Scottish regiments, which have done more than anybody could have asked of them, but I wish to note the contribution made by the Welsh regiments. The Royal Regiment of Wales was in Iraq from April 2003 to April 2004. The Royal Welch Fusiliers were in Iraq from April 2004 to October 2004. The Welsh Guards went to Iraq in October 2004 and will be there until April 2005, and the Royal Regiment of Wales will return to Iraq in April or May 2005 until October 2005, after only 12 months back in this country. The Queen's Dragoon Guards, often known as the Welsh cavalry, have also made a significant contribution, alongside the Black Watch, in areas north of Basra.

The issue is not only about tradition and crotchety old soldiers harking back to their day. It is about the future and the ability of the British Army to recruit satisfactorily in Wales. We ask the Secretary of State to consider the case that has been put forward that the names of the Royal Welch Fusiliers and the Royal Regiment of Wales be put in front of the new name of Royal Welsh Regiment. It would do a lot of good to relationships in Wales if, when the cross-party group meets the Secretary of State, he could reward us with some good news. That would ensure that once again the British Army was able to recruit the very finest young men and women from both north and south Wales.

5.32 pm

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): An encouraging number of hon. Members have taken part in the debate. I am sure that we all accept that the attention we give to the armed forces in the House of Commons is, inevitably, intermittent. However, the job done by the British armed forces is constant and around the clock. While we are fast asleep in bed tonight, they will still be working and defending our interests on the streets of Afghanistan, Northern Ireland and Basra.

This Government have placed unprecedented demands on our armed forces while pursuing a combination of policies that will weaken the traditions and capabilities on which the worldwide reputation of British soldiers and our armed forces is based. That reputation is sadly threatened at present by what I consider to be disgraceful and hysterical media coverage of one court martial in Germany. Of course, we are all shocked by the photographs that we have seen in the press of what happened at Camp Breadbasket, and the behaviour shown is absolutely unacceptable. However, three soldiers have been brought before a court martial—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman of the points made by Mr. Speaker at the start of this debate. There can be no reference to the individual cases.

Mr. Robathan: I have no intention of commenting on the individual cases, Madam Deputy Speaker, except to say that the disciplinary processes of the British Army have brought those soldiers there and we await the outcome and the verdict of the court martial. Those young men are innocent until proven guilty and that is why I think that the media coverage has been disgraceful and hysterical.

I was the chief of staff for the prisoner of war guard force in the first Gulf war, when the circumstances were very different. The problem we had with soldiers then was the fear that they would not be tough enough with the prisoners of war. We were worried that the guards might be overwhelmed if there was any form of rebellion, because they showed far too much sympathy for the prisoners of war, who had of course been fighting us only a few days earlier.

Today we debate this Government's policies on armed forces personnel. As Members of Parliament we have a duty to say what we believe to be right in the interests of our country and of our servicemen and women. We have a duty to question Government policies that are self-evidently not working. The Government have eroded public trust in their policy on Iraq and led people to distrust their intentions for our armed forces.

Before I proceed, I want to cover some of the points raised in the debate. Given the time restraints, I cannot comment on all the speeches. The Minister of State, as ever, made a robust speech. He took a few interventions. However, any speech lasting more than 30 minutes, plus a bit of time for interventions is rather long, and the Minister went on for 51 minutes. Perhaps he could raise the matter in his private office and ask his speechwriters to be a little more concise and less verbose.

The hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) made an important point about electoral registration to which I want to return. The hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) created some confusion on both sides of House about the history of regiments at Rorke's Drift. My son, who is 8, has a video of "Zulu"; I shall re-watch it and lend it to the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Gentleman made a much more important point when he talked about the £80 million hangar being built at St. Athan. The Minister has been talking about waste; we can identify £80 million of waste at St. Athan.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) made an excellent point about the lack of depth in the reserve, which was echoed by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson). I want my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) to know that I used to take parachute and free-fall courses at Brize Norton—[Interruption]—a long time ago. I know that Carterton has next to no facilities and that the armed forces housing is dreadful, so I was appalled to discover that it had not been renewed over the 20 years since I was last there.

I turn to the disgraceful cuts in the armed forces. The Government pretend that their manpower cuts are sensible, reasoned stages in an inexorable process towards a high-tech, 21st-century defence policy. Absolute rubbish. The manpower implications chapter of last summer's "Future Capabilities" White Paper airily begins:

"Transforming and restructuring the armed forces to meet the challenges of the 21st century will inevitably lead to reductions in manpower."

Why is it inevitable? The document certainly does not go on to say so. I remind Ministers that the USA is currently increasing the number in its Army by more than 20,000 because it realises the needs for boots on the ground. Those "reductions" are, and always will be, cuts. They have taken place against a backdrop of undermanning in the armed forces and of hugely increased international commitments in a time of conflict. Technology cannot replace real men and women on the ground.

Advances in technology have permitted the Royal Navy to reduce the size of crews on its ships, but I want to give the House the comments of the First Sea Lord on that score. He said:

"We are no longer able to drive those numbers down as much as we want to in our ships and our platforms because we need sentries, we need people to go on board and search ships, we need to leave, for want of a better word, prize crews on board . . . All of this adds to the numbers."

Personnel cuts mean that the fewer remaining sailors are required to spend more time at sea, which places increasing strains on their family life, making it increasingly difficult to stem the haemorrhaging of skilled personnel from the naval service.

The latest naval manning agency report reveals that the Royal Navy has a current personnel deficit of 6 per cent. It speaks of a "failure to retain highly trained and capable sailors" and says that the Royal Navy faces

"a total trained strength deficit for the foreseeable future".

That is before the current planned cuts of 1,500 personnel from the Navy's ranks.

As Lord Craig pointed out on Monday, we sent more ships to the Falklands in 1982 than we currently have left in the whole Royal Navy. The crews of HMS Chatham and HMS Diligence, who have been doing excellent work in Sri Lanka following the tsunami, know well that our traditional ability to give humanitarian assistance will be impaired by the fate of ships such as Diligence, our only forward repair ship, which is shortly destined to sail quietly into the pages of history when it is decommissioned in 2006. It will be followed shortly afterwards by six frigates and destroyers and many other ships.

In the Royal Air Force, 7,500 personnel are being axed, with all the implications for pilots, as well as boots on the ground—sentries and so on—and greater pressure on those who remain. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) described that as a hollowing out of the RAF.

[Mr. Robathan]

Although the cuts in the infantry battalions at a time of overstretch are absolute lunacy, which has been mentioned by various Members, the Army's trained establishment will be reduced by 6,500 by 2008. How can such cuts be justified? The Government are asking our forces to do more with fewer personnel—soldiering on the cheap. As Lord Guthrie warned only on Monday in the other place,

"the Army will . . . be too small for what the Government expect it to do."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 January 2005; Vol. 668, c. 564.]

The Government's tour interval target for overseas deployment is still 24 months, but we heard last week that the Royal Highland Fusiliers are deploying back to Iraq, even though they were there back in June or July, so that does not make 24 months so far as I am concerned. We must have more troops to fulfil the huge number of tasks that the Government keep piling on our troops.

I should like to turn briefly to the reserves, to which a couple of my hon. Friends referred. The purpose of having reserves and reservists in all three services is so obvious that it should not need spelling out, but the men and women of our reserve forces currently provide 20 per cent. of our ground forces in Iraq. The fact that they are being used means that they are no longer in reserve. My hon. Friend the Member for Gosport raised this issue. Let us suppose that the current situation were to escalate, that the problems in Northern Ireland were to flare up again—as the Minister will know, that is very possible—and that there was some unforeseen conflagration, where are the reserves in all three services that every military strategist would always say are a fundamental necessity?

The Government have made it clear that the Territorial Army will play an integral role in all our future military operations. In the light of that, what are the Government doing to enable the reserves to meet the demands placed on them? Members of the TA have been sacked from their civilian jobs while they have been serving in Iraq. How can the Government expect members of the TA to join and serve overseas if they have to worry that they will be unable to support themselves and their families when they return home? Furthermore, from speaking to members of the TA, I am told that officers and non-commissioned officers in particular are unwilling to remain in the TA, especially when they have done one tour in Iraq, because their reserve service threatens their civilian careers.

Almost 140,000 service voters were registered in England and Wales in 2002, but the following year that figure had fallen by 65 per cent. to 49,000—similar falls have taken place across the country—as a result of the Representation of the People Act 2000. In a response to the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall, the Under-Secretary said that the situation was not as bad as it seemed. I hope that he will address that issue when he stands up to speak in a minute or two, because we owe it to those who are risking their lives for this country to ensure that every effort is made so that they have the opportunity to exercise their democratic rights and, indeed, to comment on the Government's policies.

Will the Under-Secretary give a commitment that all members of the armed forces at home and abroad will be given the opportunity to register themselves and their families in time for a May general election? It is not good enough to witter on about Defence Council instructions, of which there are thousands each year. A simple instruction, perhaps a DCI, needs to go down the chain of command that every soldier, sailor and airman is to be given a service voter registration form within the next month. When the Under-Secretary rises to defend himself on this matter, I hope that he will tell us that that will happen. Incidentally, he wants to try to visit the MOD website, where it is almost impossible to find out how servicemen might register to vote.

Finally, I should like to turn to the operation in Iraq—where we are, of course, the junior partner—and to echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson). The Daily Telegraph reports today that the Government are trying to get President Bush to produce a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq. That is very sensible. We must ask what is our long-term strategy in Iraq. How long will it go on?

As someone who used to write essays on this at staff college, I should like to ask why we have ignored the lessons that we learned so painfully over the years in Malaya, Northern Ireland and elsewhere. In particular, why have we ignored the lessons on counter-insurgency that were summed up by Sir Robert Thompson's five principles following Malaya? Those basic principles should be followed even though the operation is American-led, but they have not been followed.

If the operation is part of a war on terror in which we are a junior partner, what is the long-term strategy for the war and what are the next steps? Will we broaden the war to other countries, whether they are referred to as outposts of terrorism or instability? Will the Under-Secretary tell the House the road down which we are proceeding? The armed forces, hon. Members and the general public want to know exactly the long-term aim of the Government's policy on the war on terror and Iraq.

5.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): May I say how much I have enjoyed our debate on personnel? We have heard 12 Back-Bench contributions. The hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) inevitably mentioned Haslar, and the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) talked about the Yorkshire regiments. I shall come back to the speech made by the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) later. We heard from the hon. Members for Perth (Annabelle Ewing), for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) and for Banbury (Tony Baldry). We also heard what one might call new contributions from the hon. Members for Witney (Mr. Cameron) and for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams), who are both welcome in joining what has become a rather exclusive club of hon. Members who speak in defence debates.

May I also say how much I enjoyed the speeches made by my hon. Friends the Members for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson), for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)—I shall return to his speech later—and for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes)? My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) was inevitably in the Chamber, as he always is for such debates.

I want to try to answer several of the questions put to me by the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson), although I hope he will accept that I cannot possibly answer them all in the time available. I begin by welcoming his comments on behalf of the official Opposition about how the Secretary of State, the Minister of State and I regard the troops who have been injured. Like both my right hon. Friends, I always make seeing troops who are recuperating from injuries a key priority of any visit to Catterick, Cyprus or anywhere else.

This week's press has been thoroughly misleading, so I want to clarify the situation for the House. The latest available figures show that 790 service personnel have been evacuated from Iraq, but that number includes the full range of injuries from relatively minor shrapnel wounds and sprained ankles through to broken limbs and more serious injuries caused by enemy action. It is worth noting that some injuries resulted from road traffic accidents and sport. Our priority is for our personnel to make the speediest possible recovery, and I am glad that all parties have recognised that important fact this afternoon.

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk asked a general question about investigations. Our troops in Iraq continue to perform outstandingly, but they are not above the law. It remains Ministry of Defence policy to scrutinise for evidence of criminal wrongdoing every instance when the actions of British service personnel might have led directly to the death or injury of Iraqi civilians. As at 6 December 2004, the number of investigations into such incidents that had been launched by service police since the start of the conflict stood at 160. The majority of those cases involved incidents in which United Kingdom forces had returned fire after being attacked. Only 19 cases related to alleged incidents involving Iraqis in British military custody, and only seven of those 19 contain any evidence of deliberate abuse. Let me say again that more than 65,000 service personnel have served in Iraq, yet only 36 have been reported for offences in connection with specific incidents by the service police, and only seven have so far been charged.

I hope that it will be helpful if I make a series of updates on personnel issues. I shall start by updating the House on operational effective military discipline and service law, and the new Bill to which I referred in our previous personnel debate.

As hon. Members know, we have been working for some time on modernising and harmonising the separate systems of service law governing our three services. Subject to parliamentary time being available, we intend to introduce legislation in the next Session to create, in place of the present three systems, which are sometimes different, a single system of service law that will better serve the armed forces in the years ahead as they increasingly train and operate together. In advance of that, the Defence Committee is currently examining our proposals, and I am grateful for its constructive interest—indeed, I shall appear before it next month.

Discipline is at the heart of service law. The authority of the chain of command depends on powers to enforce discipline to ensure the fighting effectiveness of those under command, and to be effective that authority must apply equally at all times and wherever forces are serving. It is of the utmost importance therefore that the services have a system of law that is fair, expeditious and consistent and that is subject to appropriate safeguards in order to protect the rights of service personnel. That is what we will seek to introduce in the next armed forces Bill.

We are also investing in technology with a new military personnel management modernisation programme, the joint personnel administration. The programme will introduce simplified and harmonised personnel policies and processes to each service in turn during 2006.

In partnership with leading academics, we are implementing a long-term scientific study to develop a coherent set of measures of individuals' expectations, attitudes and values and to monitor how those change over time. The study, "Measuring human capital", will get under way next month in partnership with King's college, and it should enable us in the longer term to target our resources and further develop our personnel policies to maintain satisfaction and improve retention of our people, which is an issue that many hon. Members have mentioned this afternoon.

We have embarked on a major programme to transform the management of the civilian work force. The people programme will put the MOD at the leading edge of human resources practice and maximise the civilian contribution to defence by providing modern, efficient internal human resources services. The programme will generate financial savings and will release hundreds of civilian staff as part of the reduction announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State last summer.

A number of hon. Members asked about service family accommodation, which is an issue that is often raised. This year's target was to upgrade 500 properties, but we have now extended it to 2,000 properties by increasing resources, and we expect to meet that target. Of the long-term core stock of 42,000 properties, around 23,000 are currently at standard 1 and a further 18,000 are at standard 2. As hon. Members have pointed out, it does not mean that there is room for complacency, but it is progress.

The hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) raised the issue of single living accommodation. Again, we are making rapid progress. More than 1,100 bed spaces have been completed, and a further 2,100 are being designed. We expect a total of 4,000 bed spaces across several sites to be constructed very soon.

The hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) and a number of others raised the issue of reserve forces. Hon. Members know that we recognise the important contributions that reservists and their employers make, and we intend to continue to improve the support that we provide. Together with the work that we are undertaking on integration, we are very conscious of our responsibilities to ensure that we do not endanger the commitment and dedication of our reserve forces or the tremendous support that we have received from employers. We have been working to clarify the way in which the MOD uses the reserve forces and to establish a set of aspirations that the MOD can work towards. Based on the lessons learned from Operation Telic, we are examining the optimum period of notice that we should aim to give reservists to report for mobilisation, and the frequency with which we can reasonably mobilise reservists on a compulsory basis. I expect to make further announcements on that in the House next month.

In his excellent opening speech, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State referred to the early service leavers initiative, which was instigated as part of the veterans strategy. It helps to improve resettlement for those leavers who are vulnerable to social exclusion. For those leaving with less than four years' service or those discharged administratively, there is now a mandatory unit-level brief and a one-to-one interview to assess vulnerability to social exclusion. Early service leavers are also advised on available housing assistance through the joint services housing authority organisation and SPACES—the single persons accommodation centre for the ex-services. A proper resettlement umbrella is therefore now in place, covering all service leavers.

I hope the House will agree that the veteran's lapel badge, which Members will note is worn by many of their veteran constituents, has been a tremendous success. Indeed, more than 35,000 have been dispatched since its launch last May. From 1 February, I am extending the badge's availability to second world war widows, but I want to go further still. Transition from service to civilian life is an important area of policy for the Ministry of Defence, so I am announcing that from 1 February a veteran's badge will be included as part of the leavers' packs, subject to certain conditions. I hope that that reinforces the high esteem in which the country holds, and the thanks that we owe to, those who fought 60 years ago, along with today's armed forces personnel, who do such a first-class job.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow made an outrageous attack on the work done by this Government since 1997 on Gulf veterans' illnesses. Perhaps I can refer him to the Hansard for Tuesday 18 January, when I responded to an Adjournment debate in Westminster Hall initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe). I set out then in detail the action that has been taken since 1997.

In what may have been a slip of the tongue, the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood referred to four suicides at Deepcut. He will of course be aware that the verdict was one suicide, with two open verdicts and one case still to be determined.

Mr. Dalyell: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Caplin: I am afraid that I cannot.

Mr. Dalyell rose—

Mr. Caplin: I am sorry, but I really do not have the time.

The hon. Member for South-East Cornwall mentioned continuous attitude surveys, and I can assure him that we take them very seriously. As he knows, the publication of much of such information was an initiative of the Government and the MOD.

The hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) made a very interesting point about service education; indeed, I believe that he asked a related question of the Department for Education and Skills in the House this morning.

Mr. Cameron: We did not reach it.

Mr. Caplin: I am sorry about that, and I shall certainly investigate further the hon. Gentleman's point about service education.

I had hoped that the hon. Member for Blaby would give us some detail on the Conservatives' spending plans, which have been roundly trashed in all quarters, but he chose not to do so.

Mr. Caplin: Interestingly, the hon. Member for Banbury talked about the Defence Logistics Organisation. If I have understood the Conservatives' review document properly, they want to merge the DLO and the Defence Procurement Agency. I do not know what that would do to the site at Bicester, which is in his constituency. The merger is meant to save £900 million, and as such contributes to the Conservatives' overall proposed defence savings. However, the two organisations are already being streamlined and reformed. They consist of essential military and civilian staff who work together very closely. Realistically, to make savings on that scale the Conservatives would be forced to make some £900 million of cuts in vital logistics and procurement. That would weaken our defence capabilities and lead to massive job cuts in British industry. It is clear that the sums have not been thought through properly—[Interruption.] As my right hon. Friend the Minister of State says, they are back-of-a-fag-packet calculations.

I want to make two final points. Much has been said about the tour interval and the restructuring of regiments. We take the tour interval issue very seriously. Tour intervals of less than 24 months are undesirable but have proved necessary, as the House knows. That is particularly true for some units. The ending of the arms plot and the other restructuring that we are undertaking in all three services—but particularly in the Army—over the next three years will better balance the enabled forces and help us to attain sensible and enduring tour intervals of 24 months. I hope that that answers the point made by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South.

This is a time of considerable change and transition for the Ministry of Defence. We have in place a comprehensive and cohesive programme of change that is designed to make defence more efficient and able to meet future challenges. At the centre of these changes are our people. We owe a considerable debt to our people, and for my part, I want to pay tribute to those men and women of the armed forces currently engaged in dangerous and serious undertakings in Iraq and throughout the world. At the same time, we should also recognise the sacrifices made by families and friends, and in the case of our reserve forces, employers, who support our people in their endeavours.

Worktrack Programme

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Ms Prentice.]

6 pm

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I welcome the opportunity to raise the proposed closure of the Worktrack programme in Northern Ireland.

In the budget for the Province announced by the Minister with responsibility for finance and personnel in late autumn last year, a major reduction in funding of Worktrack was announced for 2005–06, and no funding thereafter, which means its complete closure.

Worktrack is unique to Northern Ireland and allows people classified as long-term unemployed the opportunity to get back into full-time employment. It provides paid employment, often with commercial employers, for six months and, crucially, it targets the economically inactive, many of whom are returners to work, and those not eligible for the new deal programme.

People in my constituency who have participated in the scheme have told me about how the programme helped to restore their self-esteem and dignity and gave them a real chance to go out and once again earn a wage. It has given many people out of work for extended periods the chance to train on the job. For many, the best place to gain employment skills is in employment. Many of those participants have started paying tax and national insurance contributions once again. The programme is popular, and in my view, it was working, with 50 per cent. of participants placed in sustainable employment.

The programme is delivered in Northern Ireland by almost 20 lead providers, supported by a significant number of secondary providers throughout the Province. As I understand it, there are 27 contracts over a three-year period, representing every council area in Northern Ireland and running through to September 2006.

As a result of the announcement on the programme, more than 1,200 participants per year will be deprived of the chance to take the first step back into the labour market under the scheme. In addition, 200 permanent core jobs will be lost. The loss to the Northern Ireland economy is estimated at some £300,000 per week, which comes to half the cost of running the scheme. The loss to the social economy of Northern Ireland should also be taken into account, and the consequent loss of community resources, skills and capacity building.

I know from my experience in this area, of which the Minister will be well aware, the importance that the Government attach to building community capacity in deprived areas of Northern Ireland, especially in Belfast, and particularly in my constituency in north Belfast, where a dedicated community action unit has been set up by the Government. One of its main tasks is to build community capacity in areas where it is underdeveloped or non-existent.

The Government should be aware that the lack of consultation with providers before the decision was announced has done real damage to relations between the voluntary sector, the community and the Government. Given that there was little or no criticism of the way in which the programme was working—quite the reverse—the announcement came as a bolt out of the blue. Many people were taken by surprise at the Minister's announcement both in relation to this and the learndirect programme. The Government should explain why the decision was made with blatant disregard for the process of consultation.

In my own area, Community Aid 2000 is the Worktrack lead provider for north Belfast, east Belfast and Newtonabbey, and has 177 people on placement. Between October 2003 and November 2004, 347 people, well over half of whom were women, started on the programme. Since 1999, it has assisted 600 people back into work. The contracts held by Community Aid 2000 are used to assist people in the most difficult and challenging areas, with some of the worst deprivation and unemployment in the Province. It works with secondary partners in many of those communities. Many of those partners and other community groups have made representations to me, as they are concerned and angry about the decision to end the Worktrack programme. In addition, small businesses have been affected, and the Northern Ireland branch of the Federation of Small Businesses has expressed concern that people in Northern Ireland generally have been let down by the Government. In a press release of 16 November 2004, it says that the closure and other cuts in training schemes will have a negative impact on small businesses, which make huge investments in their infrastructure and staffing to enable them to offer a quality training provision. The federation fears that jobs will be lost because of the announcement and is worried about the fact that there was no consultation with providers before the decision. Only the other day, it relayed its concern and anger at the announcement about axing learndirect as well.

We are told that the reason for closing Worktrack is that unemployment in the Province has fallen significantly in recent years and that provisions such as the new deal and training for work will still be available for people who are unemployed or economically inactive. According to the Northern Ireland labour market statistics for August last year, however, more than 550,000 people are economically inactive, of whom 9 per cent. or 50,000 want to work but do not satisfy the availability or job search criteria to be classified as unemployed. Worktrack is the only wage-based programme to target those people. Just before Christmas, the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner), who has responsibility for employment and learning, said:

> "the labour market has improved substantially since the introduction of Worktrack, and in the context of the current economic climate with lower levels of employment and more job opportunities the programme was considered to have a lower priority than other competing demands."

I fully understand the problems arising from a finite budget on which there are competing demands, but I should be grateful if the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Basildon (Angela Smith) would outline those competing demands and explain what criteria were applied in assessing the allocation of resources for training and skills provision in Northern Ireland.

[Mr. Nigel Dodds]

The announcement of Worktrack's closure appears to be at variance with other aspects of Government policy. For instance, the skills strategy for Northern Ireland, which was announced just four days after the Worktrack announcement, suggests that it is Government policy to prioritise engagement with the economically inactive in Northern Ireland. The strategy says that, although unemployment is at a record low, that masks a high proportion of people who are long-term unemployed. Three out of 10 adults of working age in Northern Ireland are outside the labour market altogether and are not adding to economic productivity.

The neighbourhood renewal strategy identifies areas in Northern Ireland for special assistance, where many of Worktrack's secondary providers are already operating and where the scheme is operating very successfully. The draft economic vision report states:

"since 1998 employment levels are up, unemployment rates are down and Gross Value Added has grown steadily. Against that must be balanced the highest economic inactivity rates in the UK."

What we see emerging from the strategies and papers that the Government themselves have produced is that, while we have historically low unemployment, much of what remains is stubborn long-term unemployment, and the low unemployment tends to mask high economic inactivity and low levels of qualifications. Many of those who are unemployed or economically inactive lack skills and are at some distance from the labour market.

I find it odd—indeed, it is contrary to some of the objectives that they have set out in their strategies and papers—that the Government should be pointing to those issues, but deciding to close down a programme whose purpose is to tackle some of the underlying problems. I simply do not understand the rationale, and neither do the providers, the people who are participating in the programme or small businesses. It can only be a question of saving money, but as we have already indicated, the amount involved is relatively low, but it has produced enormous impacts in meeting the needs of people in highly deprived areas.

In the area covered by Community Aid 2000, there is no existing provision for providing an employment option to people outside jobseeker's allowance other than Worktrack. The new deal is concerned with those on the unemployment register and training for work is a benefit-plus training programme.

The fact is that Worktrack or something very similar will still be needed in Northern Ireland, and we need to know today what the Government propose to do. The Minister needs to address whether what is proposed is the right and sensible option. People who are economically inactive or on benefits other than jobseeker's allowance are being deprived of a proven and effective route back to work. Thus far, we have heard nothing from the Government apart from some vague comments about competing demands and suggestions that employment is now in relatively good shape across the Province, although Belfast, North has the third highest unemployment of any constituency in the Province. We need some more detail from the Minister about what is going to happen. There have been some hints from the Minister with responsibility for employment and learning about further and higher education programmes. Can we have more details on this matter?

As the Minister will know, there is cross-party opposition in Northern Ireland to the announcement that has been made. As far as I am aware, all the major political parties in Northern Ireland have expressed concern and opposed it. The Government should take note of that opposition. As the Minister may be aware, the Government were defeated just a few moments ago in the Northern Ireland Grand Committee on top-up variable fees in Northern Ireland. There was major cross-party opposition from Northern Ireland on that issue—all the parties expressed their opposition.

I hope that the Government will look afresh at this issue and spell out in detail what they intend to do. They cannot simply close the programme and not replace it with something similar. Why not leave in place a programme that has been effective, successful and popular, and let the providers get on with the excellent job that they have been doing?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela Smith): I congratulate the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) on securing the debate and on the reasoned way in which he expressed his concerns. I know that he has had correspondence with the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner), and I am sure the hon. Gentleman will appreciate the way in which my hon. Friend has dealt with the issues that cause him great concern. I put on record the apologies of my hon. Friend, who was detained on other business and is probably on his way to the Chamber.

It may be helpful if I outline the major factors and rationale for the closure of the Worktrack programme. The decision was taken against the backdrop of a significantly improving economy, with significant falls in levels of unemployment over recent years. In that economic climate and with increasing job opportunity, Worktrack was proving an expensive means of supporting and creating employment. In the future priorities of the Department for Employment and Learning, there was a change of focus towards a more targeted approach to unemployment and increasing emphasis on improving skills on an individual basis of personal support. I shall expand on that.

Worktrack was introduced in August 1999 when claimant unemployment was 6.2 per cent. Its objectives were to provide training and employment opportunities for those who were not suited to, or who were ineligible for, other labour market intervention programmes. That meant that it focussed largely, though not exclusively, as the hon. Gentleman noted, on the long-term unemployed and economically inactive. Worktrack is a temporary employment programme providing 1,000 places every 26 weeks, with the key aims of developing the skills and competencies of those engaged on the programme to help ease them back into the workplace, mainly by boosting confidence. Many who have taken part see it as a means of gaining experience of a modern workplace, new skills and work-related disciplines without the perceived high pressure of what some might term a "real" job. That is not to belittle the work that participants do on those placements.

I am fully conscious of the valuable contribution that Worktrack has made in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and elsewhere in Northern Ireland. He spoke of 50 per cent. of participants progressing to employment. The rate was not quite as good as that, but it was significant—an average of 36 per cent. of participants have progressed into employment since the introduction of the programme. That is a commendable record and one to be proud of. However, we must recognise that as circumstances change, policies must change to reflect them.

Let me summarise the main arguments. First, the Government believe that the economic context in Northern Ireland has changed significantly. The employment market is much more buoyant than in former times and there are many more opportunities to re-enter the labour market. Secondly, given the changed circumstances in respect of employment, Worktrack, costing in the region of £13,000 per job, is an expensive means of creating jobs. It is important to realise that many of the people may have been offered jobs without the support of Worktrack, although that is difficult to quantify. Thirdly, given the changed circumstances, the Government considered carefully the recommendations of the employability task force report and the research behind the skills strategy, and decided that a more targeted approach to employment barriers, including the promotion of reskilling and upskilling on an individual basis was the way forward.

We have sought to create the conditions for increasing employment in Northern Ireland, as in the rest of the UK, by promoting economic stability, developing a policy framework that incentivises both entry to and progression in work, and putting in place new arrangements to assist those who are not in work. Economic stability has brought growth and the delivery of an increasing number of job opportunities. Improving incentives through reform of the tax and benefit system and the introduction of the national minimum wage have helped to make work pay. Support for those without work through the new deal and through the rolling out of the jobs and benefits offices across Northern Ireland is providing people with the help they need to move into work. The outworking of our skills strategy and the change in approach of the Employment Service will assist further in removing or reducing barriers to work for individuals.

The economy in Northern Ireland has made significant progress. The gross value added—GVA—per head rose in real terms by 17.2 per-cent. between 1997 and 2002, the last year for which there are full figures. In the construction industry, it rose by some 70 per cent. compared with 45 per cent. in the United Kingdom, and in manufacturing by 21.5 per cent. compared with 3.8 per cent. in the United Kingdom.

It may be helpful to consider some of the information on the working-age population, which in Northern Ireland has risen by 60,000 people, or 6 per cent., since 1997. An estimated 721,000 people are in employment, the highest number on record. Unemployment has fallen from 8.1 per cent. of the work force in 1997 to 4.7 per cent. in the summer of 2004—a fall of some 26,000. Northern Ireland has experienced a greater proportional fall in unemployment than the UK as a whole. Since the introduction of the new deal in 1998, claimant unemployment has fallen by 51 per cent. to its current level of 2.7 per cent.

That is not to say that all the issues involved in employment and employability are resolved. It is one thing to talk about statistics and figures, but every single percentage hides a real story of people who are desperately looking for work. The hon. Gentleman made that case when, in speaking about his concerns on behalf of his constituency as well as wider issues in Northern Ireland, he made it clear that there are still issues to be addressed. I assure him that there is no lack of commitment from the Government and that our changes of emphasis and delivery mechanisms will ensure that people have help and support in getting back into work.

Let me deal with some of the points that the hon. Gentleman made. He mentioned low skills and qualifications. The skills strategy includes proposals to offer a free first level 2 qualification. Acquiring skills will be an important dimension of employment policy.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that other provisions such as the new deal do not deal with the same issues as Worktrack. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has taken that on board and is examining ways of making all the remaining provisions accessible to all, including the economically inactive. I accept that Community Aid 2000 does an excellent job, and the Department will consult it on alternative developments. It can play a role in insisting that we continue to help those in most need who are looking for work.

The hon. Gentleman expressed concern about the loss of community resources. That is not an objective for the Employment Service, and the Department for Social Development provides essential resources for community development. Having said that, the Department plans to talk to providers on an individual basis to offer practical advice and assistance on the needs of the client group that may not be assisted following the withdrawal of Worktrack. The hon. Gentleman said there was a lack of consultation, but providers were notified in time to contribute to the budget consultation process.

I hope that that deals with some of the hon. Gentleman's concerns. The strongest argument that I would put to him is that the Department is carefully and actively trying to ensure that those who would have been covered by Worktrack will be covered by the new deal and other schemes. I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman's constituency has particular problems as regards unemployment. The unemployment rate is higher in his constituency, at 4.2 per cent., than in Northern Ireland as a whole, and male unemployment is 6.9 per cent. in his constituency. However, his constituency has the highest ranking in Northern Ireland in terms of local jobs, with a job density index—the number of jobs divided by the resident population of working age—of 1.48, compared with the Northern Ireland average of 0.75.

In broad terms, the picture is clear. Employment in Northern Ireland is higher than it has ever been, unemployment is lower than it has ever been, new businesses are growing at an increased pace, more people are engaging with further and higher education than ever before and the numbers taking up apprenticeships are growing. We want to do everything that we can to ensure that the hon. Gentleman's constituents participate in that prosperity. That is the context in which we must look at the ending of the Worktrack programme. We are trying to ensure that all those who would have been part of it can progress to other forms of training and skills upgrading.

Significant resources are committed to tackling those needs, most notably through the new deal with its package of financial support and opportunities. In certain circumstances, prospective Worktrack clients may have access to the full range of provisions already offered through the various new deal schemes. While it remains a priority for the Department to help people into employment, there is also a change in focus towards individualised targeting of need rather than the sustaining of direct employment programmes. In line with that change of focus, the Department will develop a menu of more flexible provision to help people into work. We know of plans in the rest of the United Kingdom to test a targeted approach described as building on the new deal, or BOND. We plan to do something similar in Northern Ireland.

It is essential for change to build on the strengths of the new deal and other programmes, as well as identifying new ways in which assistance for all who need it—but particularly those faced with the most intractable barriers to employment—can be improved. That can best be achieved through an approach that is targeted more deliberately at meeting the specific needs of individuals. Such an approach should make provision available to all groups, based on a flexible menu of modular provision.

Managers and personal advisers will be able to tailor provision according to their local labour markets and their clients' needs. Central to that will be working more closely than ever with partners in the statutory, private and voluntary sectors. The elements of the menu will be available to all clients, irrespective of the benefit that they receive. Personal advisers operating in the jobs and benefits office network will choose from the menu the type of support that meets their clients' needs most appropriately.

The Department is currently testing the client-centred approach in four pilot targeted initiative—TI—areas that have been designated because of their high levels of long-term unemployment and social deprivation. Two key components of the initiative are the introduction of a transitional employment programme—TEP—which targets the very long-term unemployed and the creation of job assist centres—JACs—which aim to strengthen community outreach services. TIs will also develop a co-ordinated service that builds on partnerships between statutory agencies, local voluntary and community organisations and employers, and will be tailored to individual needs through increased flexibility and access to employment measures. An evaluation of that approach is planned for March 2006, with the completed report expected in November of that year.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has agreed to test a series of measures designed to reform the way in which people claiming incapacity benefits in Northern Ireland are supported in their return to work. I am sure the hon. Gentleman is aware of those measures, which are known as pathways to work. They reflect measures currently being piloted in seven areas in Great Britain. The intention is to introduce Northern Ireland pilots in autumn 2005 and additional funds have been secured for that work.

Pathways to work programmes focus on individuals and offer tailored support to help them return to work. The structure for new claimants includes a series of intensive mandatory work-focused interviews, new rehabilitation services provided by the health service, improved links with new deal for disabled people job brokers, and improved financial incentives—a return-to-work credit of £40 a week, with pre-employment training.

Early performance indicators from Great Britain suggest that between 15 and 20 per cent. of participants have taken up elements of the support package. Furthermore, in some of the pilot areas there has been an increase of between 8 and 10 percentage points in off-flows from incapacity benefits after four months on benefit. Those monitoring the pilot schemes are also reporting significant interest among existing incapacity benefits claimants, who are not currently required to take part in the programme.

In Northern Ireland, as in Great Britain, the probability of someone ceasing to claim incapacity benefits to enter employment is significantly reduced as long as the person continues to receive the benefits. We shall be working with those who have been receiving them for up to two years.

We should all recognise, however, that some people are faced with specific barriers that must be dealt with before they can gain access to employment. Later this year, work will begin to help people throughout Northern Ireland receiving working age benefits who are trying to move towards employment but, without additional specialist support, would be unlikely to succeed because of their personal circumstances. The programme will target those with drug and alcohol misuse problems, homeless people and those with a criminal record.

I trust that what I have said gives some idea of the scale of the work that the Department wishes to undertake, and that the hon. Gentleman recognises that difficult decisions were made during the planning of budgets. I understand that all lead providers have been contacted and that the Department's desire is for the transition from Worktrack to be managed as smoothly and sensitively as possible. Worktrack was highly successful in times of high unemployment, but the time has come to look at other ways of addressing the needs that clearly exist. I assure the hon. Gentleman that what is being done and what is planned for the future represent, in the current economic climate, a realistic and deliverable alternative to meet the needs of the unemployed.

The motion having been made at Six o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at half-past Six o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 11 January 2005

[SIR NICHOLAS WINTERTON in the Chair]

Community Railways

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Ainger.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): Before we start our business, I want to welcome hon. Members back to the House after the all-too-short Christmas recess. I wish everyone a happy, prosperous, peaceful and successful new year.

The first debate has been initiated by the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Lawrie Quinn), the subject of which is clearly popular. Many hon. Members are present in the Chamber and quite a number of them have notified me that they wish to speak. If they are relatively self-disciplined, I will try to include as many of them in the debate as possible.

9.30 am

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): It really is an honour to be granted the first debate in Westminster Hall in the new year. I wish to reciprocate on behalf of all hon. Members in the Chamber in sending our best wishes to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to all the staff of the House for the healthiest and happiest of new years. It is clear from the number of colleagues who have joined me this morning that a popular subject has been granted for the first debate of the year. Given the wide geographical representation in the Chamber, we know how important community railways are to the nation. I shall limit my remarks to allow as many hon. Members as possible to raise the specific issues affecting the many local routes that they represent.

Last week, I was reminded that the new year of 2005 is the 40th anniversary of the infamous work of Dr. Beeching and, in a personal context, it is 25 years since I started my railway civil engineering career, before entering the House of Commons in 1997. I hope to steer the debate with due reference to both anniversaries and to what have been the seven happiest and most fruitful years of my life as one of the joint chairmen of the all-party railways group of which you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are an active member.

What Dr. Beeching did 40 years ago was fundamentally a major error. Such action was pessimism over optimism and a pessimistic assessment of how much the rail network deserved to survive. Today's debate will link back to what has happened during the past 40 years and will demonstrate how far the potential for community railways can be taken.

Community railways are really about local people and partnerships. In my constituency of Scarborough and Whitby, the Esk valley route from Whitby to Middlesbrough through the North Yorkshire moors national park, the North Yorkshire moors railway and the route along the Yorkshire coast from Scarborough through Bridlington to Hull are good examples of the type of railways that we shall be considering this morning; it is a list of railways that Dr. Beeching did not manage to cut. Given such an historic context, we must define what is meant by a community railway.

In the 1950s, significant parts of the network were being closed as the spread of the private car and the lorry took away much of the local railway's traditional business. In 1963, the Beeching report concluded that about a third of the network should be closed along with many local stations on main lines. The programme was vigorously pursued for five years against strong community opposition. In 1968, it was evident that such an approach could not continue and the policy started to change. The then Transport Minister, Barbara Castle, introduced a subsidy payment for services that did not quite pay their way. It reflected the gap between income and costs and recognised the social and political value of particular local lines. Later, it was consolidated into the passenger service obligation grant under the Railways Act 1974, which lasted until it was replaced by franchise support mechanisms and payments on privatisation between 1996 and 1997. The recent work by the Government and the Strategic Rail Authority responds to the situation today and seeks to repair the historic trend of decline and ultimate closure of our important local community routes.

The community rail development strategy, which was published last November, follows naturally from those historic strands. It is based on the wishes of the communities served by key lines around the country to remain connected to the national rail network and on the concept of a different category of local railway, separately specified, with standards appropriate to its use. It builds on the wishes of local communities to be actively involved in the development of their railway. Essentially, it is about putting those lines on a sustainable basis by bringing costs and income closer together. It recognises that continued subsidy will be required and needs to be commensurate with the value of the railway to the community in terms of economic development, accessibility, social inclusion and the environment, as well as fitting in with spatial development plans and fulfilling a role as backbone of local public transport.

The strategy provides the first opportunity for many years—perhaps 40 years—to consider the development of community railways in their own right. Previous policies focused on principal routes or market segments, with little regard paid to the effect on local and rural railways. Fares and standards are often a by-product of decisions made to meet the needs of main lines, but the new strategy provides an opportunity to consider separately the unique characteristics of the much-loved and much-valued community railways.

Many hon. Members have discovered first hand from debates and visits by the all-party railways group as well as recent sittings of the Transport Committee, how important the community railways are to local people. When I have finished speaking, I hope to hear wider contributions from the Floor to support the arguments for many valued local railways from all over the country.

As I look forward into the new year, the outlook for rural railways is positive. Publication of the Strategic Rail Authority's community rail development strategy on 22 November last year, with the Secretary of State's strong support, was a turning point for rural and local railways in the United Kingdom and perhaps helped to define the new concept of community railways. The new policy suggests development of more lightly used lines in a sensible, cost-effective way. Every Member of the House must applaud that. It will also help to reduce operating costs and to drive up use and revenue. That is important for this sustainable objective.

The proposals include seven demonstration projects, and I am pleased that the Esk valley route in my constituency is one of the seven routes. Those projects will provide practical experience of the best ways of achieving the goals set out by the strategy. I hope that every Member of the House will play a full part in becoming involved in the projects in their own localities to ensure that that is delivered.

Fifty-seven routes have been identified as suitable for future community rail designated routes and perhaps operating standards can be simplified, as is common in other parts of Europe. It is fair to note that much of the policy that has been developed during the past decade or so has its roots, in terms of best practice, in Germany and Scandinavia. I am pleased that many hon. Members have been able to see that work in practice.

The key component of the strategy is the community rail partnerships. They have been extremely successful in winning new business for the rural railways. I believe that the SRA's statistics confirm that. The partnerships bring together local communities, local authorities and the railway industries, with the shared goal of improving service and driving up the use of rural lines. Many of them have been effective in bringing in external funding for projects, including station improvements and extra train services. They go beyond the simple transport agenda and link into wider strategies for accessibility, rural regeneration, social inclusion and sustainable tourism. A growing number are structured as social enterprises and generate some of their resources from practical initiatives such as on-train catering services and events, running feeder bus services, and organising community car clubs and consultancy services—all good examples of the type of work done in the Esk valley.

Despite that positive background, media coverage of the recent launch was mixed, to say the least. Where local journalists had been briefed and were aware of the work of their local community rail partnerships, the coverage was positive and well informed. However, that was not the case with some national newspapers. That led to scare stories about closures and a Beeching mark 2, which undermined the strategy's positive message.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that the negative coverage was not helped by the remarks of some in the upper reaches of government about transporting round the country large volumes of fresh air? Does he also agree that, if the SRA brief were widened from its laudable aim of improving the revenue from and usage of existing passenger rail lines to include the restoration of passenger services such as the national forest line in north-west Leicestershire and south Derbyshire, that would also be worthy of attention and investment?

Lawrie Quinn: Indeed, it was remarks of that kind that generated the interest and were one of the reasons why I applied for this debate. I wanted to ensure that the Government gave us the positive answers that I optimistically expect.

At the heart of this matter is the concept of partnership working. Without doubt, the sense of partnership that has been generated owes a tremendous amount to the Association of Community Rail Partnerships, led by Paul Salveson. It has done an excellent job by facilitating the involvement of many local railway support groups, local authorities and individuals in the development of this new policy. The association has already responded to the negative general media coverage of the strategy and has tried to stress the positive way forward. I hope that this debate will enable us to put the record straight about what we mean by community rail partnerships and the objectives that hon. Members seek for their local railways and the national transport network.

The strategy is supported by a wide range of organisations with a long record of supporting rail and public transport—Transport 2000, Railfuture, the Rail Passengers Council and many local user groups. I hope that that will reassure anyone who thinks that the strategy is about cuts. It is not; it is about driving up revenue through greater use and looking at the scope for reducing costs where possible.

I thank Mr. Speaker again for being so all-knowing about the importance of this debate. With it, the Government have an opportunity to give the positive response that I am sure we all want to hear.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for introducing this important debate. Does he agree that an important facet of the Government's response must be the flexibility to allow the community partnerships to develop around the markets that apply in their areas? In my constituency the north-south Bidston-Wrexham line, which can be developed for commuter and leisure activities, is quite different from the lines that run east-west, which could see significant freight development.

Lawrie Quinn: Indeed, that sentiment is at the heart of the community rail development strategy published by the SRA in November. The strategy tries to provide local solutions and to focus on the fact that each local railway is a separate entity that needs local solutions.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate, because it is important, especially in our area—south-east Northumberland—where there were a lot of pit closures a few years ago. Those closures mean that everybody now has to move out of the area to find jobs. The problem in our area is that there is no transport except for buses. However, there is also a rail link, which is dormant. As we said, that is unfortunate, as rail linkage would get people from the areas where the coalfields used to be to the Tyneside conurbations, where all the work is now.

Lawrie Quinn: My hon. Friend may remember that I spoke on the subject in his constituency some years ago. I believe that, if fully implemented and developed, the community rail development strategy, above all through community partnerships, but also through closer working between regional and local authorities, offers hope that the type of initiative that he wants will eventually be brought forward. This is the start of a marathon march of policy development. It will be extremely important for many local communities.

We have heard the keenness of many colleagues to intervene on the debate. Their interventions and their presence in the Chamber shows the strong support for community rail development strategies around the country. It also shows what positive examples there are in the local areas of the 60 or so railways around the country. I hope that every Member of the House will commit to support the maintenance and development of railway services in their constituency and nationally, just as my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) has.

Mr. Bob Laxton (Derby, North) (Lab): I share my hon. Friend's view that there is a good—indeed excellent—future for community railways. Does my hon. Friend share my concern that, at the same time that the Government introduced the Railways Bill, which includes abolition of the SRA, the SRA published a report about the community rail development strategy? I have some concerns about a railway service that runs through my constituency in Derby.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions should be brief. They are not speeches.

Mr. Laxton: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The railway service in question runs predominantly through the constituency of the hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin). Traffic on that railway has grown by 15 per cent. Like many commuters, I have some concerns about the future of that railway service.

Lawrie Quinn: I think that that particular train was well out of timetable, but I agree with my hon. Friend's point. As my speech comes to its conclusion, I want to put some key questions to the Minister. I am sure that we are all interested to hear the Government's response.

I was talking about the direct role that Members of Parliament can play in their local community rail partnerships and how, if such partnerships have not been formed, hon. Members can help form them in their area. I have played a small but, I hope, significant, role in supporting the work of the Esk Valley rail partnership in the past eight years or so. Given my expertise in the rail industry, I hope that that has been a positive contribution to the debate.

It is worth noting some heroes. On behalf of the Esk valley railway development company, I pay full tribute to the original development officer, Neil Buxton, who handed over to his successor, Tony Smare, in 2003 after many years working with the local community to sustain and build the community rail partnership—a partnership that saw groups such as the women's institute and local parishes work closely alongside the county council, the North York Moors national park and the North York Moors railway to sustain and in some senses take ownership of those vital community assets.

My first-hand experience of working with the Esk valley railway development company allows me to focus on three key work streams that are important in my locality—marketing, rail operations and infrastructure. Those are significant and important because the franchise has just been transferred in my part of the world and there needs to be continuity of working to ensure that the good work that has been invested over many years is not lost.

I pay tribute to Network Rail, in particular, for working in partnership with local groups and the local newspaper, the Whitby Gazette, to recognise the importance of renewing the final mile or so of track into Whitby to improve journey times, rideability and the overall performance of an important piece of railway that had seen little attention since those black days of Beeching.

Mr. Denis Murphy (Wansbeck) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the demise of Railtrack will improve the opportunities for introducing new passenger rail services such as the Ashington, Blyth and Tyne line, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell)? Were it not for the incompetence of Railtrack and the fact that the SRA diverted the vast majority of funds to improve the west coast main line, by now we would probably have had passenger rail services running on the Ashington, Blyth and Tyne line.

Lawrie Quinn: As my hon. Friend and many in the House know, I spent the last days of my career as a railway civil engineer working for Railtrack. I believe that the attitude and community focus of Network Rail, and the fact that it is prepared to work with community groups in community rail partnerships, demonstrates that there is a different, positive attitude. I urge him to become involved, if he is not already, in forming a rail partnership for his location.

The Esk valley line has been much improved and there is hope that in February—a few weeks' time—there will be a multi-million pound investment in the renewal of the final piece of track, brought about by a community partnership.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend share the concern that has been put to me by the friends of the Derwent valley line, which affects three hon. Members present in the Chamber, that the abolition of the Countryside Agency raises some doubts about the funding of such partnerships and how they will continue to pursue the valuable work that they do?

Lawrie Quinn: My hon. Friend tries to prevent me from closing my more parochial remarks, but I am coming on to some key questions that I am sure that all hon. Members want the Government to answer.

I hope that the Minister will restate the Government's full support for the strategy and the intention to transfer it, with all its formal powers, to the Department for Transport once the SRA is wound down. I hope that she will express support for community rail partnerships across the United Kingdom and for the work of the Association of Community Rail Partnerships, which is the national federation of community rail partnerships. I hope that she will include a commitment to maintain Government funding for ACoRP once the SRA and the Countryside Agency funds cease.

The commitment to the development of a rural rail network, which we all want to see, will bring great benefits and give community rail partnerships throughout the country greater confidence, and enable them to understand better how local circumstances can bring about the much-needed change and the flexibility that we have heard about in some of the interventions, and how they can improve and extend services.

I hope that I shall be able to tease a reassurance out of the Minister that the proposals set out in the Railways Bill do not herald a systematic closure programme. Any future proposed closure programme should take account of the important social exclusion issues that we have mentioned briefly this morning.

We need to hear about the Government's commitment to get the best from rail and complementary transport in rural areas. There is much scope to develop many of the integrated bus and rail links, as well as to promote walking and cycling to stations. In rural areas, particularly national park areas—such as the one in my own constituency—the spread of public transport is very thin, and it makes obvious sense to ensure strong integration between bus and rail to maximise the potential of the network.

This year will present a number of challenges to the community rail partnerships and to the Association of Community Rail Partnerships. The Countryside Agency and the Strategic Rail Authority have been major funders of vital work and of community rail partnerships. Both organisations will be wound down this year, and their funding support will cease. It is essential that ACORP should continue to develop its positive work with the rail industry and the Government. The funding gap must be bridged and properly filled. What has been achieved so far has come from a real sense of partnership, and I pay tribute to what has happened in Scotland and Wales, where generous support has been provided to community railways.

In conclusion, not only the future development of transport links but the vitality and economic regeneration of communities such as Scarborough and Whitby depends on good transport links and good access to the rest of the country. The strategy, when it is fully developed and given its head with the voice of local people at the forefront, will create the prospect in my area and many others of reopening many of the missing railway links that were axed by Beeching 40 years ago. One such important link is the eight-mile route from Pickering to Rillington Junction, which offers the revitalisation of transport from Whitby, in my constituency, to the city of York.

It is extremely important that we have reassurance from the Government. I commend the work of the SRA in introducing this strategy, and I pay full tribute to Mr. Chris Austin, the executive director of community rail development, who said in a covering letter to the SRA that was also sent to all hon. Members:

"Success will be seen as a railway which is sustainable and which contributes to a vibrant local and rural economy, as well as helping to meet Government targets on accessibility, the environment and social inclusion."

I hope that the Government believe that, and that the Minister will confirm it during the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I repeat my request for very short speeches, and I ask the Front-Bench spokesmen to shorten their contributions, because many hon. Members wish to speak.

9.59 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I note your request that we make short speeches, Mr. Deputy Speaker, given that the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Lawrie Quinn), who opened the debate, has spoken for almost one third of the time available to us.

I want to speak about two lines in my constituency, the Maidenhead-Marlow and Twyford-Henley lines. They are both designated in the Government's plans as future community railways—a proposal that has caused much concern to my constituents and those of my hon. Friends the Members for Henley (Mr. Johnson) and for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), both of whom are actively taking up this cause on behalf of their constituents.

I begin by saying that I have no problem with the concept of the community railway. I am sure that there are lines in the country for which the concept is right and entirely suitable. It will be appropriate to designate such lines as community railways; the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby has spoken lyrically about his own Esk valley line. However, I do not believe that such a designation would be appropriate for heavily used lines that form major parts of the commuter railway network.

The hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby referred to lightly used lines. In its consultation document, the Strategic Rail Authority discussed lines that were local and rural in character. The two lines that affect my constituency—Maidenhead-Marlow and Twyford-Henley—are not lightly used. In peak hours, they are a main part of the commuter network and carry residents from Wargrave, Cookham and Furze Platt into Maidenhead and Twyford, on to the main line and then, predominantly, into London Paddington, although some people commute west. The lines are heavily used in peak hours and it would not be appropriate to designate them as community railways.

The hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby paid tribute to the role of the Strategic Rail Authority in bringing forward the proposals. That authority, which was set up only four years or so ago by the Deputy Prime Minister, is now being abolished by this Government. The abolition of the SRA means that the responsibility for such decisions will fall to the Department for Transport.

The question for my constituents is whether they can trust this Government to look after the future of their heavily used branch lines. From their experience of this Government's transport policy, their answer must be a resounding no. Anyone who tries to fit on the 7.27 from Twyford to Paddington on a weekday morning—courtesy of this Government's change of our local railway franchise from Thames Trains to First Great Western—knows that. Sadly, our local commuter lines are being pushed to one side in favour of long-distance trains. What does that say about the future of branch lines such as Maidenhead-Marlow and Twyford-Henley?

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the reasons why none of us trust the proposals is that they represent a classic smoke-and-mirrors effort by the Government to shift the subsidy that they have been giving to community rail lines on to local authorities, without giving those authorities any extra money? The case is made—no one can trust the Government on this issue because they are seeking simply to shift the responsibility and any blame for problems on such lines to other agencies that do not have the necessary funds.

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. This is yet another example of how this Government all too frequently shift the burden of responsibility on to local authorities but do not follow that up with the necessary funding. The idea that a community rail partnership would take over the running of the Maidenhead-Marlow or Twyford-Henley lines, with all the funding responsibilities that that would bring, causes significant concern among my constituents. They feel that the only outcome will be reduced services—particularly peak-hour services—and that this is about nothing less than future closure by the back door.

The Strategic Rail Authority's consultation paper on the proposals suggested that a community rail partnership would not be suitable for high-frequency railways; in fact, it designated as suitable low-frequency railways with hourly or less frequent services. In peak hours, the Maidenhead-Marlow and Twyford-Henley lines have half-hourly services, and that fact on its own shows that they do not fit the criteria set by the Strategic Rail Authority for community railways.

As I have said, there may well be railways that the designation fits, but I do not believe that the two lines affecting my constituency are such railways. They are used heavily by commuters in peak hours and by schoolchildren travelling to local schools. We want people to use those railways because doing so has many environmental and social advantages. They are heavily used at the moment, and it would not be appropriate to hand them over to the local authority. In the case of the Maidenhead-Marlow line, the local authority—the Royal Borough of Windsor and Maidenhead—could not even respond to the consultation document on community railways; local authorities are not the best bodies to run community railways.

I can only think that the Government have a long-term plan to cut back on the branch lines and to reduce the subsidy. That will lead to reduced services and, in the end, to cuts by the back door. As one of my constituents said in the local paper, at least Beeching was honest about what was being done. I fear for the future of those two lines as a result of the designation, and I urge the Government to remove the Maidenhead-Marlow and Twyford-Henley lines from the proposal to designate them as community railways. My constituents need those lines, and the Government need to respond to their concerns.

Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Lawrie Quinn) on securing the debate, which is of great interest to all of us. Like probably everyone else, I want to be very parochial in my remarks.

Initially, I was very interested—almost excited—by the ideas in the document about community rail partnerships, because they seemed to give those in my part of the world a good opportunity to get a grip on rail services that are, for reasons that I shall give later, inadequate. However, I was depressed by the response given to the document by the local ginger group, a very good and active group with which the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) and I have a great deal to do: the Ormskirk, Preston and Southport Travellers Association. It immediately responded to the proposal as if it were the death-knell of those railways specified as being suitable for community rail partnerships. Perhaps the group had been talking to the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May).

West Lancashire has three rural railway lines: Southport to Manchester or Wigan; Liverpool to Preston via Ormskirk; and Liverpool to Wigan via Kirby. Those are all local and rural lines, but obviously they also connect substantial conurbations. There is nothing better than an hourly service on the lines—when the trains turn up, that is. All three lines are on the list as being suitable for community rail partnerships, and I would very much like them to be taken over by a community partnership as soon as is reasonably possible.

Two of the three lines are broken, in that the electrified parts of the lines from Liverpool end in Kirby and Ormskirk. Passengers have to transfer from those lines to diesel lines to make the rest of the journey. There are 11 small stations and halts. The largest community in my constituency is Skelmersdale, which has 40,000 people and is growing rapidly. It has no rail link at all to the rest of the country, even though the Liverpool to Wigan line runs along its borders, only about a mile away from the town centre. For many years, we have sought to link up Skelmersdale with the railway world, but we have failed. I hope that the community rail partnership will be a way to secure that link.

The Ormskirk-Preston and the Southport-Wigan lines cross at right angles in the town of Burscough. There are two stations in Burscough, and they are a mile apart. In the pre-Beeching days, those two lines were linked by the famous—in my part of the world—Burscough curves, so it was possible to make an almost right-angle turn in Burscough, and go from Liverpool to Southport, or from Southport to Preston, via Burscough. The track for those lines is still there, and there is a great feeling in the district that they should be reopened; the cost would not be too terrible. There is a big debate to be had about that, but it would fit in the category of restoring the curves.

The community rail partnership, if properly handled, could be of immense benefit. First, it could link Skelmersdale; secondly, it could bring back the

Burscough curves; and, thirdly, it could create a more rational timetable. One reason why the lines are underused is that there are hardly any late-night services and none on Sundays. In the villages and hamlets where there are stations, young and elderly people in particular are isolated and cannot get into any of the large towns 15 or 20 miles away.

Station accessibility could be tackled. Several stations are impossible to get into with a pram, or if one suffers from mobility difficulties. It has been suggested that unused or underused station buildings could be put to multiple uses, and that would be wonderfully appropriate for many small stations. A community rail partnership could advertise the lines and the places that people could get to. I am also interested in the Cumbria coastal line, but I do not have the time to talk much about that now. Virtually no work is being done, and has not been for 20 or 25 years, on advertising the places that people can get to on that line—the Lake district and the coast. As a result, it is terribly underused.

Will the Minister say a little more about precisely what the simplified operating standards would mean? What will they involve and how would they save resources? Will she say something about the variety of lead organisations that might be appropriate for involvement in partnerships? There is a very active local strategic partnership serving the whole of west Lancashire. Would that be an appropriate forum to pursue these ideas?

I had a lot more to say, but a large number of people want to speak and I will close my remarks with those questions.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): I congratulate the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Lawrie Quinn) on securing this important and interesting debate.

I want to speak on behalf of my own line, which is the Cambrian coast line, which runs from Pwllheli in my constituency to Machynlleth. It stops at busy little stations in Porthmadog, Bermo and various other places on the way down, as well as many romantic and windswept halts on the seashore of the west coast of Wales. The line was first mooted to be a link with Ireland, in competition with Holyhead, which had to face the little difficulty of crossing the Menai straits—which it does magnificently, of course.

The line has faced many perils over the years, including marine boring insects, which were a threat to the bridge at Bermo and, most important, the threats posed by Beeching, who closed the vital 16 miles between Afonwen and Caernarfon. That prevented travel from the south and west of Wales to the north of Wales.

The Cambrian coast line is part of the network. It is a community railway in terms of the infrequency of the service, the fact that it serves a rural community and the fact that it provides travel for tourists, but it is also part of the network. I know that my colleagues on the Cambrian coast forum would want me to emphasise that. It is a busy local forum, made up of local representatives from the councils and also my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Elwyd). We see the Cambrian coast line not only as serving our local community but as the link to Shrewsbury, Birmingham, London and beyond, as well as to south and west Wales. I want to emphasise to the Minister that it is part of the network, even though it might appear to some to be a quaint, romantic and perhaps even Ruritanian little line out in the west of Wales.

My second brief point is in respect of the School Transport Bill, which we discussed some time ago. The Cambrian coast line carries 250 school students every day. It is probably the only practical way that some students can attend the schools in Porthmadog and in Harlech. The line derives about £109,000 a year as a direct result of its use by school students. I want to emphasise to the Minister that when guidelines are being drawn up for the preparation of school transport schemes the rail element must be given proper consideration, particularly in respect of my line. I am sure that the local forum will be discussing that with the national Executive.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I understand that the hon. Gentleman has written to me about that issue and I have responded. He will receive a response in writing very shortly.

Hywel Williams: I thank the Minister for that intervention. I am sure that there is great scope for using community rail lines for school transport and I commend such use to hon. Members.

10.15 am

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): I commend my hon. friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Lawrie Quinn) for taking the lead nationally on several health and safety issues and on this issue. I wish to talk about the matter in a slightly different way and deal with the rolling stock that is used on community railways.

The black country has always been a centre for technological innovation. In particular, Parry People Movers, which is mentioned in paragraph 2.5 of the document, has been developing rolling stock for versions of light rail in recent years. I should declare an interest, as several close friends and members of my immediate family have small investments in John Parry's company. They have made a social investment from which they do not expect any immediate return.

The forms of light rail carriages that have been developed have great advantages. They cause less pollution, use less energy and have high-performance acceleration and braking systems. They do not have to be segregated from the surrounding environment with, for example, fencing, and are less costly to run. However, I wish to raise four points about some of the difficulties.

The first difficulty is up-front investment for innovative technologies such as this one. The National Audit Office report on light rail in April last year mentioned the need for up-front investment. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to identify—perhaps later—where funding might come from. For example, could the Energy Saving Trust's powershift programme, which applies to buses, cars and so on, also be used for light rail?

The second issue—improving value for money—is referred to in paragraph 1.8. The strategy document says that further research is required on rolling stock value for money, lower costs for ground-level boarding and so on. I urge my hon. Friend to arrange for such research to be carried out as soon as possible so that there will be no impediment to community rail.

The third issue relates to specifications for rolling stock. As I do not have time, I shall not go into detail, but there have been great difficulties in meeting some of the specifications, which historically focused on high-speed rail. Applying them to the development of rolling stock for community rail has been difficult. The strategy document says that the standards should be as flexible as possible and appropriate to the routes. I urge the Government to ensure that the specifications are flexible, to match a more flexible railway.

The final point is about interchange with other forms of transport. The Brierley Hill metro extension, which will affect my constituency, relates to community rail in that heavy rail freight will run over part of it. There is a need for flexibility. Incidentally, I urge the Government to approve funding for the Brierley Hill metro extension by the summer. Everything is now in place, but, again, there must be a more flexible approach to linkage with other forms of transport.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): I wish to make just a few comments. The line I want to talk about has already been referred to by the hon. Members for Derby, North (Mr. Laxton) and for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber).

The way in which the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) started his speech was quite telling. He began by saying that he was very excited when he first heard of the community railway idea, but then became very depressed by the reaction to it. I wonder whether that is not something like the experience in respect of what we hear from the Government. An idea starts off, and, yes, we may all agree with it and agree that there is some logic behind it. But we are haunted by the Chancellor's words: we cannot believe a word that they say. He said that of his neighbour, and the truth is that the British public are now saying it of the Government. That is why there has been a great deal of scepticism, to put it mildly, about what community railways are all about and what they will actually deliver.

I have received a letter from the friends of the Derwent valley line—as, obviously, have other hon. Members. I want to discuss that line because it serves an important part of my constituency. It goes from Derby up to Matlock. It includes the stations of Matlock Bath, Cromford, Whatstandwell, Ambergate, Belper, Duffield and Derby. A good half of that line—the section from Ambergate—is on the same line that is used by inter-city railways. Virgin and Midland Mainline use it for their main services. The line is designated to become a community line—it is not in the first seven, but it is one of the other 57 lines that we have heard about. Who will have the priority on it, if it is designated as such? That worries me.

The concerns expressed to me by the friends of the Derwent valley line have a lot of legitimacy. There is much concern about what will be the consequences of the Government's overall proposals for the line, and also about what will come out of the Railways Bill.

We have heard lots of comments this morning about the Strategic Rail Authority and its published document on the community rail development strategy. The Government set up the SRA, and they are now abolishing it in the Railways Bill. When the Deputy Prime Minister set up the SRA he informed us that it would be the answer to all the problems facing the railway industry, and the present Secretary of State for Transport has told us that the Bill is the answer to all the problems currently facing the railways. Therefore, it is not surprising that the British people are sceptical about what the community railways policy will actually deliver.

The hon. Member for Amber Valley and the friends of the Derwent valley line have mentioned the abolition of the Countryside Agency, and the fact that future funding for the community rail partnerships in general and the Derwent Valley Rural Transport Partnership in particular is not guaranteed after 2005. I want the Minister to assure us that that funding is secure, and that finding that money will not suddenly fall on any of the relevant councils—Derbyshire county council, Derbyshire Dales district council, Amber Valley borough council or Derby city council. It would be a travesty if the funding were not in place and we were expecting any of those councils to find that money.

We all know about the problems with regard to local authority resources. There has been an increase of 15 per cent. in passenger traffic on the Derwent valley line in the past six months. The areas that the line serves attract many tourists in the summer months, as well as at other times of the year; lots of people go up to Matlock and Matlock Bath. The Minister's constituency abuts mine and she knows the area well. We also have a huge number of visitors to the Peak district. Therefore, there is a lot of pressure on the roads and urban transport.

Today seems to be a transport day in the House of Commons. There is not only this debate but a debate on road safety this afternoon in the main Chamber; the Railways Bill is also being debated in Committee. There is a lot of attention on transport today; but there is also much concern. I have not had enough time, but I want to ensure that the Minister has time to respond to some of the interesting points raised by many hon. Members.

There is much scepticism about the underlying motives behind community railways. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) said, there is a case to be made for them in certain areas where the railway interferes with no other lines. I am concerned about the Derwent valley line—particularly about whether a community railway or one of the larger companies, such as Midland Mainline or Virgin will get priority when they operate on the same tracks. My constituents are also concerned about that.

Whenever there is any threat or change to the railway service—there was a possibility earlier this year that some services would be removed—that issue fills my postbag. I thought that the Government wanted to encourage people to use the railway. That is what they say, but they must give an assurance that they are not putting services at risk.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): Just briefly, following on from previous points, I ask the Minister for some reassurances about the clauses of the Railways Bill on railway closures, because they are causing some anxiety in relation to the development of community railways and particularly the Derwent valley line.

I ask the Minister to consider the different uses of railways in the future development of the railway service. Commuters have expressed their concerns to me about whether services on the Derwent valley line might be lost from Standwell and Ambergate into Derby and into Belper. However, that line is also important in the economic regeneration of the midlands. The Derwent valley has world heritage status and it is essential that we develop the railway line further. The partnership that we have had up to now has done well, in conjunction with Central Trains and the county council, in developing and expanding traffic on that line, and it will expand in future.

I am a great supporter of community transport buses and getting more money into such schemes and of the tax regime under which they operate. In this situation, however, we have to consider community transport in terms of the railway. The A6 is the main road through Derby and is used for everything: lorries use it, tourists do too, and so do those of us who dawdle behind the tourists trying to get to Matlock to visit the county council buildings. The A6 is a wonderful route that is also used by bikers and it even has helicopter signs, because the bikers are monitored from the air. We cannot afford to expand buses on that road as the main form of transport to meet all those needs.

I hope that in the development of the railway lines and this policy my hon. Friend the Minister will consider how to develop a range of uses in different areas. The Derwent valley line is valuable. It has a great deal of local support and we want to ensure that the proposals put forward are advanced positively to meet the various needs in our area.

10.28 am

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): I want briefly to mention the Bedford to Bletchley line in my constituency, which has an active rail user group that has worked with the local authority and the train operator, Silverlink, to grow custom on that route. Can the Minister confirm the suggestion in the SRA's rail strategy document that it would be possible for the Bedford to Bletchley rail link to join the Bicester to Oxford route, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry)? Those two rail links are part of the Oxford to Cambridge route that was shut down by Dr. Beeching and are part of the wider east-west rail link. If they could join in a single community rail partnership, it would benefit them, would be helpful in reopening the closed section of line between Bicester and Bletchley and would contribute to the reopening of the Oxford to Cambridge link.

Will the Minister confirm that that sort of rail partnership between two separate links is possible?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can only say that hon. Members have more than co-operated with my request. If there are no further Back-Bench speeches, we can start the wind-up on time.

10.29 am

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I will be brief, because the Minister has a lot to respond to. I congratulate the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Lawrie Quinn) on securing this important, wide-ranging debate that started in Westminster and seems to have covered all stations north.

No one can be against the objectives of the Bill—increased use, costs down, less subsidy and, generally speaking, a new approach. Community ownership is a fine phrase. The new approach defined by the SRA involves a series of desirable moves, such as the use of other funding sources—although some of the funding sources specified in the paper that it prepared seem a bit optimistic. The paper mentions better marketing, integration, flexible fares, boosting secondary sales such as cinema tickets, food and additional products that can be sold as part of the package, links with tourism and events and more flexibility. None of us would object to having nicer, better looked-after stations and realistic and appropriate engineering standards.

None of the proposals are objectionable in principle, and none of them are impossible on a larger scale. On lines such as Mersey Rail a lot of co-operation takes place with the local community over events programmes, although that line is not designated for community rail partnership.

I accept that we are dealing largely with a dysfunctional and disjointed system. Despite the good prospectus, there is suspicion about the Government's zeal for community rail partnerships. That is despite their protestations on that score, notwithstanding the remarks made by the Department for Transport about moving air around the country. Many of the lines are believed to make heavy losses, although in the SRA paper a community line is not by definition a line that bears heavy losses or incurs big expenses. I suppose that suspicion is exacerbated by the fact that the Railways Bill, which is being debated in Committee as we speak, contains an inordinate number of clauses about closures. I suppose also that part of the suspicion lies in the fact that some of the ideas have evolved from communities' attempts to save railway lines under threat. It is relatively easy to parody the plan under discussion, seeing it as the gradual handing over of the line to anoraks while reducing funding—a kind of Beeching mark 2, with all the subsequent economic and social damage, which is never properly weighed up with railway closures.

None the less, my personal position is one of slight ambivalence. I am not convinced that everything recommended in the paper by the SRA can necessarily be dismissed. There is a lack of clarity about what a community rail partnership is, and the consultation documents provided to the SRA say so. We are unclear, and we will still be unclear after today, about how the cocktail of funding will work. There is a lack of clarity about the true cost of the existing lines. It is unclear how liabilities and assets will be dealt with, because some community rail partnerships will inherit track that has been recently renovated, which will be run at a low cost. Other partnerships will inherit substantial and heavy costs.

It is unclear how community rail partnerships will work in the wider industry, which everyone acknowledges is fairly fragmented. It is also unclear how partnerships are going to get out of hock to the train operating companies and the rolling stock leasing companies, which have a licence to print money whether community rail partnerships exist or not. It is fundamentally unclear how the partnerships will avoid having responsibility but little control and possibly less funding.

I remain suspicious about designation, which is the process whereby some rail lines are being designated suitable for community rail partnerships—an issue brought up by the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May). In the north-west, the Southport to Manchester airport route is designated as one for community rail partnership, which is particularly interesting to me. In recent SRA documents, routes to airports are regarded as fundamental to the further development of the strategic rail network—not a small local issue but a major part of our transport infrastructure. None the less, other routes in the north-west—the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) mentioned the Ormskirk to Preston line—are almost tailor made for a community rail partnership. Like the hon. Gentleman, I am involved in a project to develop a railway line in that area and to install a curve in Burscough—I hope to see that some day—which will link Ormskirk, Preston and Southport. That would change Merseyrail from a radial structure to a far more profitable loop structure and it could be done with very little cash. Small change from the tram scheme for Liverpool would do, or even the tea money from Crossrail; either would adequately accommodate such a scheme.

Progressing the scheme is extraordinarily difficult; one needs to speak to Network Rail, the Strategic Rail Authority, the train operating companies, the Merseyside Passenger Transport Authority—which is pretty encouraging—Lancashire County Council, the regional development agency and the Government office for the north-west. It is like knitting fog. It takes an extraordinary act of faith to believe that the creation of a new partnership will make life easier. None the less, it might.

There are doubts about the programme and what the Government are endeavouring to do, and those doubts have been voiced by many hon. Members. Is the proposal really about a sustainable future for community lines, or about winding up lines that have no future? I suspect that it is both.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): This has been an excellent debate, and I, too, would like to congratulate the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Lawrie Quinn). At the beginning of the debate, there were 22 people in this Chamber, including you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the Government Whip. That shows the great interest in the subject.

We can divide the contributions into those from Members on the Government side, which were basically centred on naivety, and were made by hon. Members who have, so far, been taken in by the Government's spin, and those from Conservative Members, which were perceptive. My right hon. and hon. Friends realise that if one halves the subsidy to community railways, saving £150 million a year, many rural lines will be forced to close. Not surprisingly, the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh), who speaks for the Liberal Democrats and is their sole representative here, describes the position as ambivalent; there is nothing new about that.

The proposal is essentially another attack on rural Britain. One needs only to compare the subsidy going into rural community railway lines with that going into London buses, let alone the London commuter rail network, to see the enormous disparity. The Government connive at putting £1 billion of subsidy a year into London buses, yet they seem to resent £300 million in subsidy going into the national network of community railways.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), in a succinct and pithy speech, put her finger on the key issue: the proposal is about future closure by the back door. If not, why is the line that she mentioned, which is heavily used by commuters during the day, to be included in the community rail network without local people having the opportunity to veto that? My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) talked about smoke and mirrors and about not being able to trust the Government, a theme taken up by my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin), who has the Derwent valley line running through his constituency. I understand that that line has attracted a large increase in passengers in recent months.

We Conservative Members are concerned about the gap between what the Government say and what is actually happening. When launching the Government's new vision for rural railways, the Secretary of State for Transport said:

"Rural railways are important to many parts of the country."

We all agree with that. He went on to say:

"We want more people to use rural railway lines and the development of community railways is a vital part of that."

My right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), who cannot be in two places at the same time, would usually have dealt with this debate, but he is dealing with the Railway Bill Upstairs. He asks—and I certainly support his point—why the Government's Railways Bill is making sweeping changes to how community railway lines can be closed in future. If the Government really are interested in promoting community railway lines, would not it be great to have a Bill that dealt with making it easier to open railway lines where demand existed? There is not much chance of that from a Government, who have kicked almost every project for expanding railway capacity into the long grass.

Unfortunately, the Railways Bill is about making it easier to close, not open, railway lines. It is also very much about ensuring that if they are closed, someone other than the Secretary of State will take the blame.

The railway network has remained roughly constant in size since the 1960s. It is widely assumed that the Government's latest wheeze, dressed up as the community rail development strategy, is little more than a smokescreen behind which Ministers are trying to conceal a new round of savage rail cuts. I remember the Beeching cuts; at the time, I was none other than the secretary of the railway society at school, so I felt very strongly about them. I have had a continuing interest in the maintenance of the railway network since those early days. We know what happened then, but I cannot cope with the fact that the Government are not prepared to come clean about their intentions. They are disguising their true intent.

The community railway development strategy transfers more responsibility for financing rail services to passenger transport executives—although it does not transfer any extra money to them—while simultaneously taking away from those executives their role in determining which local rail franchises should be awarded. To provide extra local services, a PTE must get approval from Network Rail, which, as we know, is not an easy task. No such problem arises if the local PTE wants to cut a service—what a surprise. In that case, it is free to switch the spending to other transport modes, as the White Paper delicately puts it. That means a bus. Although Network Rail is allowed to block the provision of new train services if some of its engineers want to do that, there is no comparable hurdle to starting a new bus service, however congested the roads that service may have to use.

An interesting insight into where the Government's sympathies lie is provided by the fact that when new rail services are considered, the extra infrastructure costs and compensation to other operators must be calculated in advance and paid by the local passenger transport executive. In the case of new road surfaces, however, such considerations apparently do not apply. That is described as "streamlining" in the White Paper. That really means that the Government want to shift traffic from trains to buses, but do not want to say so. Most of all, they do not want to take the blame for the rail closures that they are secretly planning.

We are not against flexibility in facilitating decisions about new forms of transport service, but we are utterly against a policy of closure by stealth, which has been designed to ensure that when closures are carried out, the local passenger transport executive will be blamed when the Government are actually responsible. We share the concerns of PTEs throughout the country about the way in which the Government are removing some of their powers. Kieran Preston, the chairman of the Passenger Transport Executive Group has said that > "it makes no sense to hand over the planning and management of regional rail networks to unaccountable civil servants in Whitehall who lack the local knowledge and expertise".

We have had a good debate. It is important to put pressure on the Minister to answer some of the points and give some of the assurances that hon. Members have sought. We want community railways to have as much freedom as possible to increase their passenger numbers by coming up with their own schemes. We are inherently in favour of freedom, enterprise and decentralisation—they are inherent parts of our policy. That is not the way the Government are going. They have an agenda to close down many rural railway lines by stealth, which is why we are grateful to the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby for giving us the opportunity to express those views. I hope that all of those who switch in due course from the naive to the perceptive category will seize the opportunity to press their arguments home on Report of the Railways Bill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Lawrie Quinn) on securing the debate, which has generated a huge amount of interest. We have had a wide-ranging debate, and I could not possibly attempt to respond to every local issue raised. However, I shall undertake to write to hon. Members giving detailed responses to the points that they have raised.

As the House will be aware, the Strategic Rail Authority published its community rail development strategy in November last year. The strategy aims to put local and rural railways on a sustainable basis for the long term, by increased ridership, freight use and net revenue, keeping managing costs down and the greater involvement of the local community. It is based on the premise that the closure of lines is not desirable nor a solution to the problems that local lines face, irrespective of what hon. Members may have read in certain sections of the press. I can assure hon. Members that the strategy is aimed at increasing rail use and developing the railway to the benefit of the communities that it serves.

The strategy has been developed over 18 months. It involved an extensive consultation exercise in February last year, which drew responses from more than 300 organisations and individuals, including local and regional authorities, regional assemblies, regional development agencies, the rail industry, tourism bodies, Members of Parliament, rail user groups and a host of other bodies and individuals. By and large, the objectives and approach advocated in the consultation document were supported overwhelmingly by the respondents. There was an almost universal agreement that no single approach can be adopted nationwide, as many hon. Members have said today. Instead, appropriate local solutions would have to be encouraged within a broad framework.

The final strategy was published in light of the responses received to the consultation. It lists 56 routes that the Strategic Rail Authority proposes to designate as community rail lines. Those local and rural routes make up about 10.5 per cent. of the national rail network, including 390 stations. There is evidence of latent demand for the lines and the argument for their retention and development is therefore compelling. It is one that is supported fully by the Government. To achieve the objectives of the strategy, there will have to be active support from a wide range of stakeholders, including train operators.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Minister may not now know the answer to the question that I am about to ask, so I should be grateful if she would let me know it in due course. Of the 56 lines that have been designated, how many have lines that are part of the inter-city network? I am concerned about the Derwent line in that a large part of it is dominated by the inter-city network and I am worried about the priority that the community lines would receive.

Charlotte Atkins: I cannot give a figure. However, the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right about the Derwent line. I am aware of it; it is not too far from where I live and my constituency. There is a possible link between the Derwent valley line and Peak Rail, the heritage line at Matlock and, given that it is in the Peak district, there is clearly scope for the development of tourism along that line.

Dr. Pugh: The SRA document contains a definition of a community rail line and a list of lines that are designated as community rail lines. Are there any lines that fit the definition, but that are not on the list?

Charlotte Atkins: I am not aware that that is the position, but I shall write to the hon. Gentleman about it.

To achieve the objectives of the strategy, there will have to be active support from a wide range of stakeholders, including train operators, Network Rail, local authorities and local users working in partnership.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister referred to local authorities and stations. Obviously, a key issue is station reopenings or, indeed, openings. Local authorities often put money forward with the rail authorities for that to happen as such action is expensive. Some new designs for platforms are being produced. Is the Department for Transport encouraging such designs and does it regard that as helpful research?

Charlotte Atkins: We always want to ensure that stations are accessible. Many issues concern the inaccessibility of stations, especially when we are discussing tourist lines. It is difficult to make arrangements for people with access difficulties at local stations, so we are keen to make sure that we make stations far more fit for purpose.

Although the characteristics of the 56 proposed routes vary, they all have the scope for greater community support and greater development. The strategy is designed to improve the value for money and social value of the lines in three broad ways, the first of which is through increasing patronage and income. There are many ways in which that can be achieved, such as raising the profile of the railway within the local community and through better marketing. There is a latent demand to be tapped, as demonstrated by the Bittern line partnership in Norfolk, where passenger numbers have increased by 162 per cent. since the establishment of the partnership.

Mrs. May: The Minister refers specifically to the desire to increase patronage on potential community railway lines. At the moment, the Government's policy, as exercised through the SRA and Network Rail in the operation of franchises and timetabling, gives emphasis to long-distance services and is leading to a reduction in services on local branch lines and commuter lines. When will the Government reverse that policy? Without that reversal, she cannot hope to have the increase in patronage that she is talking about.

Charlotte Atkins: I agree that there have been issues about the inter-city lines, for instance, taking precedence over local lines and I know that many Members have raised that matter, including in my area. We are looking at that.

As the right hon. Lady has jumped up at this point, I will take on board the issues that she raised about the Twyford to Henley-on-Thames and Maidenhead-Marlow branch lines. She talked of the strategy being imposed on her local community. I assure her that local consultation will take place prior to the designation of any lines. We believe that there is scope for some operational improvements in Marlow in particular, where the current signalling is restrictive. By designating it a community railway, there is a real opportunity to make that a priority for attention. However, I want to make it clear to her and to other hon. Members who raised the issue that it will be down to local consultation and if the local community does not want such a designation, it does not have to happen.

Returning to the points that I was making, the second key issue is to drive down costs. The key drivers of cost on the railway are the maintenance and renewal of the infrastructure, the lease charges for trains, and staff costs. There is scope for reducing those outgoings on community lines through track maintenance strategies more closely aligned to the needs of the routes, through better use of rolling stock and competitive pressure in the rolling stock market, and through training staff with a variety of skills.

Assessing the exact costs of community rail routes is difficult because almost all routes are part of a larger network. More work is required on that issue and it will be carried out through seven pilot projects that the SRA has identified, including as my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby mentioned, the Esk valley line from Middlesbrough to Whitby, which runs through his constituency. That work will necessarily involve the support of Network Rail and the Office of Rail Regulation.

Thirdly, the strategy relies on greater community involvement. That includes the industry working with local authorities and local users, and the establishment of community rail partnerships. Those are not-for-profit organisations that include local authorities, rail users, the train operator and often Network Rail. Some may also include local businesses, national park authorities or other local stakeholders. They are established by mutual agreement and run by a committee of the stakeholders.

Hon. Members have raised a number of issues. One of the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) related to the Countryside Agency. The Countryside Agency has funded ACoRP as a rural transport partnership project since 2000–01. A number of Members raised issues about the future of rural transport partnerships and that programme. The programme was never intended as an initiative that would last for all time. Existing commitments will be met until the end of March 2006. At that point, the Countryside Agency will hand over its decision making to regional development agencies. Each RDA will determine the priorities for its region and will certainly give priority to such rural initiatives.

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley) (Con): On the subject of local community involvement, a question has formed in my mind relating to something the Minister said. If a community suspects that a community railway project is a back-door way of closing a line and that the cuts in subsidy entailed by the SRA paper will have that effect, how can it set about rejecting it? The Minister said that if, after consultation, a local community wants to reject it, it may do so; how, exactly, can that come about?

Charlotte Atkins: If there is no local support, that will become clear during the local consultation process. Community railways cannot work unless they are actively supported by the local community. If that support is not forthcoming, they will not be able to proceed.

Lawrie Quinn: The hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) intervened when the Minister was talking about continuity funding and the Countryside Agency. Did she say that that will be guaranteed until 2006, and what mechanisms does she envisage will be in place with regard to the more piecemeal negotiations with the regional development agencies for future funding?

Charlotte Atkins: With the ending of the Countryside Agency's responsibility, a number of programmes will be passed over to the regional development agencies. They will take responsibility for the rural funding and for developing the valuable initiatives developed by the Countryside Agency, such as the village partnership schemes and the rural transport moneys that go to parish councils.

The strategy provides a framework for all these developments to take place. A route prospectus will be prepared for each community rail line to identify the opportunities for development, and any constraints on that, as well as the suggested time scale for implementation. The plan will be consistent with the SRA's programme of route utilisation strategies and regional planning assessments and, prior to publication, it will be discussed with all the key stakeholders, including the community rail partnership or the rail development company. An agreed plan, along with the associated consultation, will be a prerequisite to the formal designation of routes as community rail lines.

None of what is proposed in the strategy will change the principles of railway operation, and the safe operation of services will remain the overriding concern. However, designation of a route will allow for a reappraisal of the standards for infrastructure renewal and maintenance to ensure that they are appropriately specified for the route in question and to allow for a reduction in costs.

The specification of service levels will remain the responsibility of the funding body—in most cases the SRA or, in time, the Department for Transport. However, in the case of microfranchises, that body may be a local or regional authority. In both cases, the specification of service levels should be made in conjunction with the local community.

The regulatory cap on fares will be removed from community rail lines so that they can be determined locally in light of demand and, where appropriate, integrated with bus fares. Local promotional fares will be encouraged, as will improved methods of revenue protection.

The implementation of the strategy will at first be focused on the seven pilot projects. They have been chosen for their differing natures in order to demonstrate and test various aspects of the strategy. The detailed proposals for each line will be confirmed following local consultation and discussion with local authorities and the community rail partnership or railway development company.

This has been a useful debate, and I am grateful to Members for their contributions. I will write to Members who raised detailed points to ensure that they get a full response.

Waterways Museums

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): We now move on to an earlier form of transport, which the hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) missed out of his list of the things that are happening today.

I welcome the opportunity to have this debate and thank my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda) for his interest in it. With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall allow him a couple of minutes to make points about the Gloucester museum; he has spoken to the Minister about that. I also thank the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) for his support today. He represents a constituency that is the home not only of Formula 1, but of the Stoke Bruerne museum. The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and my hon. Friends the Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman) have also indicated their support.

The Boat museum, the National Water Maze museum and the Canal museum hold the UK's inland waterways collection, which includes the world's largest collection of historic inland waterway craft. That historic fleet is the greatest conservation liability: in a recent condition survey, more than half the boats were reported as being in a poor or very poor condition, and many more need restoration to bring them back to conservation condition. The broad beam barges are the rarest and at greatest risk, as they are much less common than narrow boats. The collection represents about 90 per cent. of the UK inland waterways collection—some 14,500 objects, including 80 historic inland waterways craft. It is the largest such collection in the world.

The Waterways Trust manages and co-ordinates the waterways archive, which holds 80,000 records at Gloucester docks, Ellesmere Port and 13 local authority public records offices. Together, the collections and archive records provide the most comprehensive and complete record of the social, economic, technological and cultural story of inland waterways from the 18th to the 21st century. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister agrees that the collection is of national importance and that, whoever picks up the bill, it must be preserved and available to the public. It represents an important part of our national heritage.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): May I emphasise how widespread the interest is in this debate? I have had correspondence from people in Birkenhead who, although they do not have an immediate relationship to such a site, are passionately interested in the issue and the outcome of the debate.

Mr. Miller: The canal network provides not only an important piece of Britain's heritage, but a superb leisure resource, and the museums that I am talking about today provide a very important educational resource. My right hon. Friend is absolutely right: there is interest right across the country, including from you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, although I know you have to be neutral today.

The museums attract about 100,000 visitors per annum, generating £1 million in gross income from admissions and trading—retail, catering, boat trips and so on. However, that is not enough to cover the responsibility, which I touched on earlier, to conserve and interpret the collections. The museums do not receive core funding from the Government, but receive generous support, worth about £4.50 per visitor, from British Waterways.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will correct the comments made by Lord McIntosh of Haringey, who said:

> "The implication of some of these questions is that there is no government funding for the Waterways Museums. That is not the case. The British Waterways Board gives the museums £750,000 a year, which comes from its Defra funding."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 4 November 2004; Vol. 666, c.430.]

As my right hon. Friend the Minister knows, British Waterways provides the trust with £890,000 a year, of which £450,000—not £750,000—is for the museums. That funding is not really from DEFRA, but is sourced from British Waterways' commercial income. British Waterways also provides premises free of charge at Gloucester and Stoke Bruerne. At Ellesmere Port, the local authority provides the site without charge.

The Waterways Trust has financed the annual deficit of more than £60,000 a year for the past four years. Sponsorship from British Waterways is topped up by revenue earned from admissions—some £350,000 a year—and secondary business in catering, retail and boat trips, which is worth about £100,000 a year. In addition, one-off discretionary grants are received from regional development agencies and local authorities. My very small local authority of Ellesmere Port and Neston gives a grant of £7,000 a year and Cheshire county council gives £3,000 a year. Small grants such as that are also important. However, despite being designated as nationally and internationally important, the inland waterways collection receives no direct Government funding, in contrast with the National Railway museum, the National Maritime museum and the National Coal Mining museum, all of which receive Government subsidies worth between £8 and £19 per visitor and offer free admission.

In the past three years, changes in Government policy have worked against the financial stability of the waterways museums, which has resulted in the loss of about £200,000 a year in income. That is the focus of our case. The impact on the market of free entry, which is very much welcomed by visitors to museums and a great credit to the Government, must be addressed.

Competition from the free-entry museums was paralleled by a serious decline in visitor numbers at the three sites of 11 per cent. overall and 19 per cent. at Ellesmere Port in the year after free entry was implemented. Numbers have drifted lower in subsequent years and have just dipped below 100,000 visitors a year. That has had a major impact. Designation challenge funding, which provided the waterways museums with £100,000 a year for three years, although not dead, does not provide core funding and I understand that there has been recent correspondence about that.

The waterways museums have been successful in raising capital grants—nearly £4 million since 1999—and generating their own income of about £1 million a year gross. They make a significant contribution to the local economy. Spend per visit is about £9 to the museum and about as much again to the local area. More than 10 per cent. of visits are education based and, having looked carefully at the quality of the material and its historical importance, I am convinced that that number could grow and that the relationship between our museums and the education sector could be strengthened.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I find myself entirely in sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's comments. Does he agree that the particular and almost unique character of the waterways museums is that they provide a fascinating insight to our economic and social history, which includes some quite under-privileged people, and the wider environmental impact of the canals?

Mr. Miller: I could not agree more. Not only have the museums had an enormous impact on the development of our industrial heritage, but they have left a legacy that has an impact on society today to a degree that we take for granted. It is extraordinary that we have this fantastic resource in the United Kingdom, but allow it to go into decline. British Waterways has done some fantastic work, with Government support, to help to restore some canals, particularly for leisure purposes. A lot more can be done that will be beneficial to communities throughout the country—not just in the three locations where the museums are. There is a huge job to be done by my right hon. Friend's Department, in liaison with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Department for Education and Skills, to ensure that society gets the best from this fantastic resource.

The museums cannot sustain their position with the loss of income that I have mentioned and a critical point has been reached. Some £1.1 million per annum is needed for the next 10 years for the maintenance of the collection, to address conservation arrears and to enable the museums to offer free entry to all. Free entry sounds like a decline in income, but in my judgment and that of the experts on the trust it will generate a stimulus to visitor numbers. The nationally and internationally important designated inland waterways collection should by funded by the Government in the same way as other national collections, such as the railway, maritime and coal museums.

New investment in the waterways museums can do much to help them to develop as centres of excellence for education, cultural tourism and public enjoyment. The museums have the capacity to double their visitor numbers and an economic value of about £1.8 million could become as much as £3.6 million, split roughly 40–40–20 between Ellesmere Port, Gloucester and the Daventry, Northamptonshire, location. Without action, these museums and the many treasures that they hold could be lost, which would be a huge tragedy.

The museums have the capacity to increase their secondary income from catering, retail and boat trips, but real growth will come once they have secured the future of the collections, which are the basis of their future attractions, and become centres of excellence for conservation and learning. It is calculated that free entry alone will increase visitor numbers by as much as 50 per cent. We know that people will naturally and more readily go through the door if somewhere is free of charge than if there is a barrier of a charge on entry. The evidence is reasonably clear that where that approach is adopted, revenue generation can be increased substantially.

During the years in which I have represented my constituency, which you know better than most people in the Chamber, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have been arguing passionately for stronger cultural and tourism links between the museum and the fantastic city of Chester. I firmly believe that there is a real commercial market out there for getting our American cousins and Japanese visitors, who come in their tens of thousands to the great city of Chester, to come and enjoy the boat museum. If any commercial tour operators are listening to the debate, I commend that idea to them, because there is the basis for a commercial operation.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): This is not tangential, but vital. Will my hon. Friend also pay due regard to the Waterways Trust for the campaigns it has run, which are all to do with seeing the heritage and wanting canals to be reopened so that people can continue to live the life of the canals?

Mr. Miller: I agree with that sentiment entirely. Some restoration work on the canals that I have seen throughout the country—for example, in my hon. Friend's area, in Wiltshire and in Northamptonshire—is splendid and has undoubtedly raised public awareness of the subject. In itself, that can act as a magnet to encourage people to dig a bit further. Properly structured museums that are tailored around that important educational niche can provide potential income for those museums and do a service to our young people. As I suggested, some imaginative tourism enterprises could be developed around the museums and the surrounding waterways.

My right hon. Friend the Minister may not be in a position to say yes—which is the word we are looking for—to all the demands being placed on her today, but in introducing the debate and before, with your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, allowing my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester to speak, I must say that I hope my right hon. Friend the Minister agrees to work with colleagues in the Chamber, and, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead said, with the many other colleagues from throughout the country who are interested in this aspect of heritage, to find a practical way forward in the interests of our national heritage.

The nation's industrial heritage—built as it is on sea-going vessels, coal and the railways—has another important strand, which is that of the canals. We should never forget the importance of the canal network in the development of this nation. It would be a tragedy if those collections were broken up or allowed to deteriorate, and I urge my right hon. Friend to do her best to help to deliver what we seek.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda) has rightly sought the approval of the Member who introduced the debate, the Minister and the Chair to participate briefly in this half-hour debate. I call Mr. Dhanda.

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall try to keep my contribution to no more than about 60 seconds, because I want to give the Minister time to reply. I concur with everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) said. We have been working on the issue for some time and I am pleased that the debate is taking place.

I also wish to thank some people, not least Roger Hanbury of the National Waterways museum, for everything that we have tried to do together on the issue. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) will join me in thanking the docks historian and secretary of Friends of the National Waterways Museum, Hugh Conway-Jones, for the work that he has done with us, as well as volunteers such as Audrey Fielding and many other constituents. The key thing for us in Gloucester, in Daventry and in Ellesmere Port is to ensure that the National Waterways museum can continue and can compete.

We welcome the Government's decision to introduce free entry to museums. At the same time, we are concerned about the difference in subsidy between our National Waterways museum and the national railway, maritime and mining museums. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will consider seriously this request for an additional £1.1 million. In Gloucester, that money is important not only for our heritage. More than £1 billion is flowing into Gloucester docks for regeneration and we want to be able to remind the next generation—because of tourism and education and because of their history—why Gloucester docks are so important. A waterways museum is a key part of achieving that.

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller), my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda), who have spoken in the debate. I acknowledge the importance of the issue, the huge campaign that has taken place during the past 12 months and the support for what is being asked of the Government today.

In some ways, the description that my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston gave of the significance of the waterways museums is a timely reminder of the importance of museums to our national life. They have an ability to contribute to education, remind us about our past, enable us to understand our present and shape our future, and take a key role in regeneration. All museums across the nation play that role in the life of the nation and communities, although that sometimes goes unrecognised. To some extent, the work that hon. Members and others have done in bringing the needs of the waterways museums to the nation's attention is a timely reminder of the significance of those museums.

I am not here to argue against the needs of the waterways museums, to take away from the work that they have done or to fail to acknowledge their determination, effort and achievements to date. That goes without saying; I know that they are important. It is imperative that the collections that they hold are preserved, conserved and improved to ensure that not only our constituents, but their children and grandchildren, can understand the importance of waterways and the museums to our nation's development. For the sake of putting it on the record, I want to confirm the special place that they have in our nation. They provide the most comprehensive and complete record of the social, economic, technological and cultural story of inland waterways from the 18th century until now. As we have regenerated canals and waterways, the story is not yet finished; there is another story to be told.

That is the good news. I have no difference of opinion over the importance of waterways museums, but let me be honest about the dilemma in which the Government find themselves. We are talking about a strange sector, in that it is not a planned sector. The Government have no control over how many museums are started. Every year, there are people who feel that they have a collection that they want to show to others and preserve for posterity, and they start a museum in their own home—such museums exist. People might hire a small shop front and they have their museum. However, the Government can never respond to that haphazard growth in the number of museums by funding every one of them. I do not think anyone would expect us to do so.

Other things that are important to the nation, such as schools or hospitals, involve planned growth and planned arrival of resources—revenue and capital—to support them. The dilemma in which I find myself, as the Minister who is meant to be supporting the museums, is that they grow haphazardly and our budget does not grow to meet those needs. The result is that our funding structure, in which we give money to the museums, is sometimes not rational.

This is a matter not of choosing the museums that are the most beneficial or most important to the nation and deciding to fund them, but of doing what we can, taking into account custom and history, and making the best of a museum sector that is both nationally funded and funded by local authorities, as well as by industry and trusts, but funded by no one independent museum itself.

As hon. Members know, the Government have a direct responsibility to fund and care for a number of national museums. They are all set up in statute; there is a law of this land, passed by these Houses of Parliament, that gives them the status of national museum. This is not rational, however. They are the big museums that we all know about and they are often in London. The story of how they got to be national museums is also one of this nation's history and of the things that it valued in the past.

We inherit an obligation to fund those national museums, but it is very expensive to do so. We take on our obligations, however, and £284 million a year goes into funding those museums. The extra money that we have been able to put in has ensured that the collections are looked after and are world beaters. We should be immensely proud of them.

[Estelle Morris]

The bottom line, however, is that the Government are not in a position to add to the list year in, year out. We simply do not have the money to do that. If we were to do it, we would be splitting the money—that increased amount that the Government receive from the Treasury for national museums—among more museums, and the consequence would be less money for each museum and poorer collections. I would then have to reply to lots of Adjournment debates on why national museums were getting less than before.

I do not use that as an excuse; it is the truth. That is the dilemma that we face all the time. Therefore, I cannot say that we hope to take the museums on as a national museum. That is not to say that they do not have an important national collection, but having an important national collection is not the same as being a national museum. These are not the only museums that claim to have an important national collection and that want to join the national museums list. Without thinking very hard, I could name three other museums that believe they have national collections and that want to be added to the list in the run-up to the spending review. The Government have not embarked on inviting applications to the list.

Mr. Miller rose—

Estelle Morris: I will give way, but let me say a few more things. I am afraid I shall run out of time and not be able to put them on the record.

The Government acknowledge that to set things in stone—to say that the list of museums that get all the money is closed for ever and a day—is not helpful to the good work that museums do. Hon. Members will be aware of two things that have happened. First, the Government are putting money into regional museums through the renaissance in the regions programme—£45 million by 2007–08. There will be opportunities for museums, including the waterways museums, to join the clusters of museums that are included in that programme—perhaps not now, but the Government hope that that funding stream will increase as the years go by.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston said, the waterways museums have had designated funding of £300,000 over three years. Bidding will open again for such funding in 2006, and the waterways museums will be able to take part. I acknowledge that that does not come anywhere near meeting the £1.1 million revenue costs that the museums need—not to survive, but to improve.

My hon. Friend will know that we have asked the Museums, Libraries and Archives Council to work with the Museums Association to see what can be done. We have taken that approach in a few other examples. In the north-west, it has already brought in—not a lot—£50,000 from an overseas organisation.

Hon. Members are bound to ask that certain museums be allowed to join the list of national museums, as achieving that is a copper-bottomed guarantee that revenue and capital will be provided. They should continue to make such requests, but should not expect that to happen in the next few years. I invite them to continue to work with us so that we are aware of wishes to join the list, but they should not turn their back on other innovative ways of funding museums. To some extent, we are in this together, and we will do as much as we can to work with the waterways museums through the MLAC.

Mr. Miller: I accept what my right hon. Friend says, but I ask her to consider the time scale and conservation needs.

Estelle Morris: I will do that. In fact, I hope that that will form part of the conversations with the MLAC and that, as designation challenge funding comes up again, we can ensure that the collections are preserved. That is what I want and what the nation is entitled to expect.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That was an excellent short debate.

Immigration and Asylum

2 pm

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to raise such an important issue this afternoon. As opinion poll evidence shows, which I shall quote in a moment, our electors believe that immigration and asylum is one of the most important matters that affects society. The unprecedented level of immigration into this country is accompanied by a range of consequences, such as the polarisation of residents from 1 per cent. ethnic minorities in the New Forest district to more than 50 per cent. in Newham.

Our failure to integrate ethnic minorities has led to the creation of an ethnic vote, which has been long exploited by Labour in our inner cities and brilliantly so against Labour during the Leicester, South by-election. It was put into overdrive by the Minister for Energy and E-Commerce in his recent attempt to whip up Muslim sectarian feeling against my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), the Leader of the Opposition. The effect of the failure to integrate ethnic minorities is the creation of areas in our cities in which the English language is alien and the British culture subordinate. In the words of the Government's community cohesion panel, which reported in July 2004:

"There are . . . concerns about the speed at which newcomers can be accommodated . . . The identity of the host community will be challenged . . . The 'pace of change' (for a variety of reasons) is simply too great in some areas at present."

My first question concerns whether the Government encourage integration or multiculturalism.

Another objection people have to the high level of immigration is the apparently unfair treatment of the majority community. That was exemplified most recently by the different treatment by the Birmingham Repertory theatre and the BBC of the plays "Behtzi" and "Jerry Springer—the Opera", which were perceived as deeply offensive to the Sikh and Christian religions respectively.

While we are about it, on 26 December, The Sunday Times reported:

"The Inland Revenue is considering recognising polygamy for some religious groups for tax purposes. Officials have agreed to examine 'family friendly' representations from Muslims who take up to four wives under sharia, the laws derived from the Koran."

Perhaps the Minister is in a position to tell us that that was a Boxing day joke. It is not surprising that, when people consider that it might be racist to oppose such culturally unfamiliar concepts, they say that they are not ashamed of being called racist. People vote for extremist parties, and parties that while not extremist, are robustly unafraid of addressing race and immigration. Those are some of the consequences.

The final consequence is the huge pressure of overcrowding on public services and housing, in particular, in London and the south-east of England. Let no one say that such issues are not widely recognised. A YouGov poll showed that 74 per cent. of people believed that too many immigrants are coming into Britain. As The Economist put it a month ago today:

"Londoners, young people and the middle classes can normally be counted on to hold more liberal views, but not, it seems, when it comes to immigration. Their sentiments are virtually identical . . . A Eurobarometer poll earlier this year"—

last year, that is—

"found that 41 per cent. saw immigration as one of the two biggest problems faced by the nation."

Of course, the Prime Minister—ever ready to launch an eye-catching initiative—was not far behind. On 19 December, The Guardian reported:

"Blair looks at points plan to outflank Tories on migrants . . . Blair and his election co-ordinator, Alan Milburn, are said to be determined to show that asylum and immigration are under control . . . Sources said . . . 'We can't just sit there and say "It's all fine."—we look like an incumbent government that is just complacent. There is absolutely no desire to get tough just for the sake of it'."

My second question to the Minister concerns whether he is planning to get tough. If so, is that because he thinks that it is necessary to get tough or will he do so just to impress a concerned electorate? If he gets tough, what will he do to cut the numbers of migrants to these islands?

Pressure on housing is overwhelming. Just before Christmas, I heard of a proposal to build between 14,000 and 27,000 new houses in my constituency, which would increase its population by 25 per cent. They would be part of the 1.2 million houses designated by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister for the south-east and eastern regions. Those proposals are causing untold anguish and conflict, as well as the necessity for massive public and private infrastructure investment. They have, of course, been rejected both by the South East England and the East of England regional assemblies.

The proposals coincided with the admission by the Government for the first time that immigration will increase the number of households in England by 1.2 million over 20 years to 2021. That figure comes from a written answer in the House of Lords. That is double the previous estimate of fewer than 600,000, which was based on 1996 projections of migrant numbers. One in every three new households a year—that is 60,000—will be formed due to international migration; 55 per cent. will be in the three Euro regions of London, the south-east and the east. That is one of the most crowded areas in Europe. The rate of new household formation in London will be doubled from 26,000 a year to 46,000 a year.

Sir Andrew Green, chairman of MigrationWatch UK, stated:

"It is completely irresponsible for the Government to promote immigration without taking account of the resultant intense pressure on housing and public services."

Therefore, my third question to the Minister is whether the effect on demand for housing was taken into account when formulating the Government's immigration policy. Do the Government accept that the consequence of increasing immigration is increasing pressure on housing in the south and east of England?

Of course, we are not only talking about housing; other services are put under considerable pressure. There are some schools in London in which more than half of the pupils in the first year do not speak English.

[Mr. Andrew Turner]

The Government do not collect those statistics, but some local authorities do. The Government do not know how many pupils at the age of five are able to be taught through the medium of English in our schools.

There is pressure on hospitals and all the other public services. My constituents cannot get a dentist. Today, I received an e-mail from a friend in north Nottinghamshire who told me the same. He cannot get a dentist in that part of the world. That consequence cannot be detached from the large additional numbers of people depending on our public services.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I am interested in this line about dentistry. Does the hon. Gentleman think that the decision of the previous Conservative Government to cut the number of dentists that we trained 10 years ago might have had a bearing on the availability of dentistry services for his constituents, in addition to any issues raised as a result of immigrants?

Mr. Turner: It has had no effect whatsoever on the number of consumers of dental services. This Government, who have been in power since 1997, were aware of the previous provision for dental training when they took the decision to increase massively the number of people coming to this country.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): If I heard the hon. Gentleman correctly, he told us at the start of his speech that what he described as the immigrant population of his constituency was about 1 per cent. Does he seriously suggest that such a small proportion could have the effect on the dental services in the Isle of Wight that he seems to blame upon it?

Mr. Turner: Actually, I was talking about the population of a constituency on the mainland. The point is that people move. People are moving out of London to the rest of the south-east as more and more migrants move to London. People are also moving out of the south-east to constituencies such as Isle of Wight and those in the New Forest as more and more people move out of London to the surrounding counties. There is a knock-on effect; that is how I would describe it.

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Desmond Browne): We should dwell on the point that my hon. Friend raised with the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman prayed in aid the absence of dental provision in his constituency, saying that it was a consequence of the Government's migration policy. Perhaps he could explain to those of us involved in the debate the profile of population movements in the Isle of Wight and how it relates to the Government's migration policy, so we can be reassured that the argument that he has advanced is germane to the debate.

Mr. Turner: There is additional pressure on all public services as a result of there being more people in all parts of this country. I was going to ask why has there been such a massive increase in demand for public services, particularly housing.

The Government have, as a matter of policy, allowed a huge escalation in migration. According to the Office for National Statistics, net migration to this country has risen sharply since the Government took office. In the years 1994 to 1997, the figures were 78,000, 48,000, 39,000 and 75,000, but from 1998 the annual net inflows were 100,000, 133,000, 176,000, 172,000, 153,000 and 151,000 respectively. Those figures no longer refer mostly to asylum seekers. Although asylum is still a problem, the number of regular migrants to the UK has, according to figures given to my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Mr. Rosindell) on 11 November, increased, with a dip only in the election year 2001, more or less regularly from 58,000 in 1997 to 140,000 in 2003.

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): On the question of public services, particularly the national health service, we have heard a lot about numbers, but have we heard anything about the contribution that the migrant population plays in running those essential public services? Would not we be at a loss to run the public services we have today without them?

Mr. Turner: The hon. Gentleman will hear much more about that. My dentist is South African and I understand perfectly the contribution that migrants make to running the public services. However, not all of them do so and I will demonstrate how many in a moment.

Fourthly, was the growth of immigration from 1997 accidental or intentional? What was the justification for the growth that the Government put in train? Are the figures that I have already quoted good enough? The Government Actuary's revised projection of an inflow of 130,000 a year is 28,000 below the average for the past five years, so one wonders how he reached that projection. He takes no account of recent Government policies that are designed to stimulate immigration or of illegal entrants—about 50,000 of whom are detected, so it is likely that a similar number will succeed and add another 500,000 people to each decade of the population estimates—and he takes no account of overstayers. Some 70 per cent. of those refused asylum stay in Britain. There are simply too many scams that the Government seem unable to stem; they lack the will to inquire, the determination to act and the power to succeed.

I shall give some examples of those scams. The first is the student scam. Home Office immigration statistics document, Cm 633, suggests that the number of students who are allowed to extend their stay is so great that it amounts to another beck door into the country. In the years 2001–2003 alone 27,000 Jamaicans had their student visas extended, even though only 1,690 had been admitted and there were supposedly only 780 students here in the first place. Overall during that period, there was a 48 per cent. increase in student extensions and it is evident from the detailed statistics that extensions are most frequently sought by and granted to nationals of the poorer countries that generate most economic migrants.

Fifthly, how does the Minister explain the huge dissonance between the number of students and the number of extensions from each country? What is he doing to plug that apparent loophole?

The second scam is the work permit scam. The so-called sector-based scheme was set up to permit unskilled young people from outside Europe to take up temporary employment in the food and hospitality industries for up to 12 months. Some 10,000 such permits were allocated to Bangladesh and the quota was filled within three weeks. The Immigration Advisory Service said in July last year that "there is chaos in Bangladesh with disturbences, a sports stadium having to be hired to issue tickets for interviews, and a suspension of the scheme in April".

The administrative cost of that scheme must have been colossal. However, more importantly, why was the scheme set up in the first place? Unemployment among young Bangladeshis already in Britain is 50 per cent. As Sir Andrew Green said:

"Surely the people already here should be offered these jobs, or should be trained to do them, before we add still further to immigration . . . . There is absolutely no check on departure. This could well be just another example of immigration by the back door."

My sixth question to the Minister is about why his former boss, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), said on 6 April 2004 that there was a need for immigrants to fill 60,000 catering vacancies in London. Why did Bangladesh receive an allocation under the food and hospitality sector-based scheme when many British Bangladeshis are unemployed and 75 million new EU citizens are eligible to work here? What was the cost of administering that element of the scheme?

Finally, I turn to the effect of arranged marriages. One of this Government's first decisions was to abolish the primary purpose rule, which was designed to ensure that marriage took place between people who wished to spend their lives together, and not as a cover for immigration. Two ill effects have come from that decision. First, it has led to the abuse of the immigration process—and I define it as a scam to that extent. Secondly, it has perpetuated the division of communities on racial lines, and that is not a scam but a danger.

There are about 20,000 arranged marriages a year involving people from the Indian subcontinent, and young Asians in this country come under considerable pressure to undertake such marriages. A failed arranged marriage can mean not one but two people having the right of abode in the UK, each able to bring in another spouse in future. Even assuming that such marriages are genuine and sustained, they involve more rapid population growth than when both parties are from the United Kingdom. As Lord Ousely has reported:

"About 1,000 Bradfordian Muslims marry each year. If most of those marriages were internal to this country, it would lead to 500 new households which would be likely to average 4 children per household . . . With 60 per cent. of marriages involving a spouse from overseas, the number of households goes up to 800 and . . . family size is likely to be significantly larger . . . This leads to very rapid population growth", which,

"concentrated in particular areas puts severe demands on the public services."

Furthermore, as fewer children are brought up in English-speaking households, fewer are ready for English-medium schools and fewer families integrate into the local English community, if one remains.

The course adopted by Denmark and Norway, two countries of impeccably liberal traditions, is to tighten the rules for the admission of spouses and long-term cohabitants to ensure that both parties enter into their unions maturely—over the age of 24—and willingly; arranged yes, forced no. Secondly, in Denmark such marriages have to have a long-term stake in Danish society and be financially secure enough to support themselves. Thirdly and most importantly, to ensure that they remain together, permanent residence is granted only when the couple have lived together in Denmark for seven years. That system produced a 27 per cent. drop in the number of applications in the six months after it was introduced. My penultimate question to the Minister is whether he will consider what elements of the Danish system could be adopted to prevent abuse and to promote community cohesion.

Mr. Browne: On that very point, I should like to ensure that a full picture of the Danish system is given. The hon. Gentleman may know that more than 1,000 couples of mixed nationality, including one Danish person, live in Malmo or the surrounding area in Sweden and commute daily to work in Denmark. The number of mixed nationality couples in Sweden is increasing at a rate of 60 a month, which is an unattractive consequence of the very policy towards which the hon. Gentleman is driving us.

Mr. Turner: I am grateful to the Minister for that information. The bulk of the statistics that I quoted come from MigrationWatch UK, which has established an estimable reputation for objective measurement and observation of this important matter. In the past, the Government have slagged off its statistics as being unreliable. Fortunately, an unnamed civil servant said in an internal Home Office e-mail on 29 July 2003:

"I have made this point many times before but can we please stop saying that Migrationwatch forecasts are wrong. I have pointed out before that Migrationwatch assumptions are often below the Government Actuarys Departments high migration variant."

My final question to the Minister is to ask him whether he still believes that there is something wrong with MigrationWatch UK's forecasts and statistics.

If we are to persuade the people of Britain, of all colours and creeds and, particularly, those who have such long-standing connections with this country that they have nowhere else to go, that we really are interested in their welfare, we must take action on all the fronts that I have described. If we do not debate the topic, we leave it to be debated behind closed doors on the basis of rumour and mystery. If we debate it openly and discuss it honestly, we stand a chance of making sensible decisions on how to deal with the issue which is of such concern to our constituents. If we do not, we risk driving them more and more into the hands of parties less scrupulous than those represented in this Chamber.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): I would like to take the opportunity presented by this debate today to raise one aspect of the immigration rules: visa charges for international students attending education in the UK. For the past month or so, I have been trying unsuccessfully to secure an Adjournment debate on the subject, so I am grateful to the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) for securing a debate on a topic whose broad remit allows me to concentrate on this specific issue.

Having heard the hon. Gentleman's opening comments, however, I was tempted to divert my comments in another direction. Although he has raised some valid questions, it seems to me that under the guise of telling us that he wants a serious debate on the matter, he is giving circulation to a number of anti-foreigner and anti-immigrant myths about the effect of immigration on public services and so on, which are entirely unacceptable. I shall be interested to see how the more liberal face of conservatism on the Opposition Front Bench distinguishes itself from the comments of the island backwoodsman who introduced the debate.

I shall not digress and will speak to the issue that I want to address and that has been a matter of concern to many organisations involved in higher education in this country, including Universities UK and the British Council. It has been raised directly with me by Edinburgh university students' association and constituents of mine who work in the area. It is particularly relevant to cities, such as Edinburgh, that have a large student population, many of whom come from overseas.

The principle of charging for leave-to-remain visas was introduced in the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 and, as the Minister knows, there has been recent Home Office consultation on the matter, the outcome of which has not yet been announced. The big problem, as those who have been involved know, is that we charge those already in the UK who require leave-to-remain visas or extensions of such visas, to allow them to complete their studies. The charge is currently £155 or £250, depending on how the application is made, and, under the consultation, it could rise to almost £500.

The proposal is of great concern to the organisations to which I just referred. It certainly risks deterring overseas students from coming here to study. It is widely recognised that it is in the interests of the UK, and not just of the students concerned, that we should encourage international students to come here. In cities such as Edinburgh, overseas students and the economic activity that they bring with them is a major element of the local economy. The Prime Minister himself recognised that when he launched his initiative on international students in 1999 with the objective of attracting more international students to the UK and the long-term aim of generating long-lasting trade and diplomatic links for the UK. He rightly spoke at that time of the important contribution of international students and of the need for greater efforts to be made to attract more of them here.

Many international students do not have to pay the higher charge for visas or visa extensions, but the evidence is that many do. Hon. Members may have received a helpful briefing from Universities UK, which is a highly respected organisation. It states that many entrance clearance officers do not seem to follow the UK Visas guidelines that they should give students leave to remain for the duration of their course plus at least several months when they first make application for a visa. As a result, although students get the benefit of the lower charge when they first apply from outside the UK, they have to renew their visa at the higher charge—Members will understand that that is a potential deterrent to many students—and international students who have gone into higher education from school or from further education, or who decide to remain as research students having completed an undergraduate degree here, may also be hit with the higher charge.

Let me make it clear that I do not object to the principle of requiring those who apply for visas of any type to make a contribution towards the cost of administering the system, just as a UK citizen pays towards the cost of being issued with a passport. However, many organisations that are involved with international students believe that the Home Office would drive away thousands of international students from the UK were it to implement the proposals. To our short-term and long-term detriment, they would likely go to our competitors in Europe and elsewhere.

My hon. Friend the Minister knows that this issue concerns many Members, particularly those such as myself with a significant further and higher education presence in their constituency. More than 70 MPs, including me, have supported the early-day motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell). It calls on the Government to grant an exemption from visa charges to international students studying in the UK. Even if the Minister and his colleagues are not prepared to go that far, I hope that they will listen to the concerns that have been raised by Members in this debate and by a wide range of organisations involved in higher education in the UK to try to ensure that we continue to make the UK attractive to the genuine international students, who contribute to our economy, to their education and to the economy of the countries from which they originate.

I value having had a few minutes to put those points. As I indicated to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, prior to the start of the debate, I hope to take part in the debate in the main Chamber later this afternoon. If by any chance the business in that Chamber were to proceed a bit more rapidly than it is at the moment, I hope that you and other hon. Members will understand why I might leave a little early and before the end of this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): Before I call the next speaker, I thank the hon. Gentleman for the courtesy of advising us of his situation.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) on raising the topic today. We ought to congratulate him doubly because, if I recollect accurately, the last time the subject was debated—18 March 2003, also in Westminster Hall—it was he who raised it. I recall that debate well, because I had the pleasure of supporting him then as now.

Clearly, Isle of Wight and Orpington are linked in that one respect. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Malins), who is on the Front Bench, pointed out that my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight and I are entirely opposite in that I have gardening down as one of my interests, while my hon. Friend's private interests include absolutely not gardening. But there we are; that is life.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight that this is an important topic that has, I am sad to say, been under-debated recently in the House of Commons, whatever view one takes of it. I agree with him that all the opinion polls show that the matter is of great importance to ordinary citizens. He will be interested to know that that is also shown by a poll that I conducted in my constituency—with exemplary objectivity, I might add. Obviously, I did not know who would reply to my survey. It was not only conducted with exemplary objectivity, but took a very high sample compared with the opinion polls conducted nationally. Such polls usually have about 1,000 or 1,500 replies, but no fewer than 25,000 Orpington citizens received my survey.

The survey absolutely confirmed what my hon. Friend is saying—namely, that the subject is of high importance. Indeed, it came after only crime and antisocial behaviour, which were top—not surprisingly, perhaps. Immigration was second, well ahead of health, education and transport, which would otherwise be considered very important topics. My localised survey entirely confirms my hon. Friend's general impression.

The issue of statistics troubles us on such occasions. I readily admit that the whole business of trying to measure immigration is fraught with difficulty—obviously, there is a great deal of illegal immigration of one kind or another, and it is difficult for statisticians under any Government to capture exactly what is going on—but there have been various attempts to cast more light on the statistics, notably by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames).

My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight will recall that the last time we had such a debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex had had an Adjournment debate the day before, in which he tried comprehensively to get at what exactly the figures show—with scant success, I am afraid, as they reveal very little. That is for two reasons. First, it is inherently difficult to get at proper numbers, which I concede. Secondly, and frankly, the Government have created an atmosphere of suspicion about all Government figures because of how they have spun them over the past seven years. The Government are notorious for their spin, and statistics have been no exception to that.

As we know, the Statistics Commission and the Audit Commission have both been extremely critical of the fact that the Government have handled figures in a political way over the last few years, which has done a great disservice to government as a whole, whoever is in power. As a consequence, people have lost confidence in Government figures on this or any other subject.

Mr. Browne: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is about to move off the issue, but I cannot let him do so without drawing his attention to what I expect he already knows: in or around July, the Home Office invited the National Audit Office to audit the published immigration statistics. He will of course be aware that the NAO gave those statistics a clean bill of health, although it made a number of interesting and qualifying remarks about them. Consequently, on the basis of his own argument, he can now rely on those figures.

Mr. Horam: I hear what the Minister says, but I remain suspicious of the whole subject, because as the Audit Commission and the Statistics Commission—an independent watchdog—had said previously, the Government handle statistics with considerable political spin.

I have for some time advocated that responsibility for such statistics should be given up by the Government. I am glad that my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor has recently taken this up. The responsibility for statistics of this kind—whether they are from the Home Office, the Office for National Statistics or independent bodies or are general Government statistics such as those on waiting lists—should be taken away from the Government and given to Select Committees of the House of Commons.

That would have two advantages. First, the process would be far more open and the Government would not have to make interventions of the sort that the Minister has just made to defend statistics because they would be open and there would be accountability to the House. Secondly, the scrutiny of the Executive by the legislature, which has not been a happy process recently, would be enhanced. We need to improve such matters, and making such a change is one way to do that.

It is inevitable that statistics from organisations such as MigrationWatch have far more credibility than those of the Government because they are making an attempt to take an independent view of the matter. We should be grateful for the views of MigrationWatch because it is making a considerable effort to get a clear picture of what is going on, including the difficult area of illegal immigration. Its figures, which I read from time to time and tend to support, state that there is a net immigration of about 250,000 people every year. Bromley, the borough of which Orpington is a part, has a population of 300,000, so that figure represents about two and half constituencies coming to this country every year, which is a huge proportion of the population.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight said, those immigrants are mainly coming to England, particularly the south-east, and even more particularly to London. I am glad that the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) is here. If he were not, I would be the only London MP present. Perhaps he will have a countervailing view on the matter. I feel that London has a particular problem in this area, which we ought to address.

My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight made such a comprehensive speech that I do not want to cover all the ground, but I must comment on one area, which is the effect on housing. This is a very sore issue in an area such as Bromley, particularly in my own constituency of Orpington. Whole areas of south-east and south-west London have been inhabited for some time by people from other countries. I am thinking of an area of south-west London that is occupied almost exclusively by Koreans. Whole streets of houses are taken up by Koreans, all the local shops are run by Koreans and the schools mainly take Korean pupils. As a consequence, one of my friends has emigrated: he cannot afford to buy a house where his father lives, nor can he afford to get his children to a school or find a school to take them, so he has gone to Australia. It is a sad fact that that is happening in this country in this day and age, and it is happening in London.

Mr. Turner: He is welcome in the Isle of Wight.

Mr. Horam: My hon. Friend says that he is welcome in the Isle of Wight, but the housing situation may not be much better there.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman says about someone being unable to afford a house. That indicates that the area has improved immensely as a result of people moving to it.

Mr. Horam: I think the problem is that houses are unavailable to people in that part of London—I am thinking of Morden—because they have been bought up by Koreans, whatever the price, and English people are priced out. That is what is happening—[Laughter.] I do not think that it is a very funny matter. That effect percolates throughout London, particularly the south.

The situation is bad and getting worse. A recent report in The Times said:

"Immigration is dramatically outpacing official predictions, the Government admitted today. Ministers now believe there will be double the number of foreign households previously predicted. More than half of the new arrivals are expected to settle in London—with serious implications for housing."

That is the point I am making. My own borough has been told by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to increase the amount of housing it is putting up, even though it is more or less doing so at its capacity according to its unitary development plan. In December, a report in the local paper stated:

"Senior councillors fear the green belt could be under threat after being told to increase house building.

Planners on Bromley Council have been told by a Government inspector more houses need to be built.

Inspector Ava Wood, who heard the public inquiry over the borough's 10 year unitary development plan (UDP), also said density needs to be upped to fit more homes in."

The report also stated that "the authority needs to set a target for affordable homes based on need, rather than capacity."

That seems to imply that it should build more than it thinks it can build if the need exists, which is an astonishing position for a Government to take.

We know from the overall position of the ODPM that it received a report by Professor Barber that essentially said, "Predict and provide," and the fact of the matter is that a great part of the prediction is caused by net immigration. My simple view is that if we could control immigration in the way proposed by the Conservative party—there should be a quota for asylum seekers and less encouragement to economic migrants—we would have a lower demand for housing and the possibilities for first-time buyers in the London area would improve.

Mr. Browne: We have not had an opportunity to ask a Member from the hon. Gentleman's party about the specific point of a quota for asylum seekers. Is it his position that if the most deserving case the world had ever seen for refugee status were to arise after the quota was filled we would have to say to that individual, "Go back to the country you have come from and your almost certain death."?

Mr. Horam: Absolutely. Our country is not the only country in the world. There are other destinations that that person could go to. There ought to be a rational way to sort out such situations. As the Minister knows, in recent years we have taken a disproportionate share of all the genuine asylum seekers, and that should not continue.

I strongly agree with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight in his third question to the Minister. What are the implications for housing, particularly in the south-east and London, of the current level of immigration? I believe that it is a major factor in creating social and family problems in London, and that it is a cause of immense distress. If we could get it under control in a sensible way, all those linked problems would be alleviated.

Mr. Lazarowicz: I will try to take the hon. Gentleman's arguments at face value. Given what he says about the pressure on housing, if it were possible to do what he suggests—I doubt that it would be— what would be the consequences for the labour market of the failure to allow workers to come to this country to meet the needs of the economy? Would not that have very damaging consequences for his constituency, among many others?

Mr. Horam: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point, because economic activity is precisely the ground on which the Liberal Democrats and the Labour Government justified the level of immigration, which they clearly think is acceptable, during the debate on 19 March 2003 in this Chamber, which I have mentioned. The Minister responding to that debate conceded that a lot of such economic activity figures reflect immigration by people such as high flyers in the City of London, rather than the mass of migration that we are talking about. That skews the economic effect of this.

One also ought to take a balanced position. Economic activity is only one part of the equation; the other is the environment and quality of life. We do not measure quality of life simply in terms of our standard of living. In my part of the world, quality of life is deteriorating as a consequence of the amount of development that is being forced on areas of south London by the level of immigration. That is a factor in the overall overdevelopment of areas such as mine. I am surprised that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) does not see that we have to strike a balance between the environment and quality of life on the one hand, and economic activity on the other.

The Government are allowing this to happen and the Liberal Democrats, on the ground of economic activity, do not dissent, but that is mistaken in the short term and damaging in the long. Conservative proposals will not only command respect and support among ordinary people, but they are in the best interests of this country.

2.45 pm

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): I also thank and congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) on raising the topic. This is an extremely sensitive issue, which, if it is not debated here, is certainly going to be debated on the doorsteps in the months and weeks to come. It requires careful, sensitive handling and difficult questions must be answered. I appreciate the efforts of colleagues to do so in this Chamber.

I do not want to follow the general argument, because I want to deal with a specific area of asylum policy. However, a couple of remarks about the statistics and how policy is put together may have some bearing on the worries that my hon. Friends rightly raised.

I am sure that it will come as no great surprise to the Minister that I want to consider the situation surrounding the Yarl's Wood detention centre in my constituency, particularly the contents of the report by the Prison Service ombudsman on the incident and fire as long ago as St. Valentine's day 2002, but on which the ombudsman was only able to report on 16 November 2004. I am pleased to see the Minister; he bears no criticism for the matters that I will discuss, because he was not in place at that time. Since he has been the Minister responsible for Yarl's Wood, he has treated my requests for information and pleas on behalf of various detainees with nothing but courtesy, speed and dispatch, which I appreciate very much indeed. However, his Department has some considerable explaining to do, which I will make clear.

On 16 November, in an answer on a 450-page report on a highly significant incident in which £100 million of damage was caused and scores of lives were endangered, the then Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), issued a written statement, which I consider wrong. The statement made no admission of Home Office error and no apology for the circumstances, but the report indicates that the role of the Home Office was of immense significance in creating the problems that eventually led to the disaster.

To put this matter into context, I shall quote from the conclusion of the report. The Prison Service ombudsman said:

"The targets underpinning the project were unachievable, the project was conducted under unreasonable time constraints, the design of the building was poor in terms both of construction materials and layout, speed of delivery was given undue prominence in the contract letting process, the contractors never looked likely to complete the construction within the agreed timescale, policies were ill-thought through and were inadequately consulted upon, and the incident that led to the disturbance was mishandled."

That is a damning indictment.

I make six charges that I should like the Home Office to answer in due course. The Government are incompetent at handling a significant policy and they panic under pressure; they waste resources on an epic scale; they are incompetent in managing their agencies; their use of information for short-term political gain is less than trustworthy; they unfairly pressurise their civil servants; and they are careless with the lives and liberties of those whom they detain without trial or commission of crime. I shall illustrate those charges briefly.

On incompetence and panic, the circumstances behind the building of Yarl's Wood were rising numbers of asylum seekers post-1997, but relatively static removal rates of about 7,000 per year. The report details the setting of an unachievable new removal target and pressure to get a detention centre built speedily, but there was no understanding of the consequences. It was a botched job leading to what the ombudsman describes as a building that was unfit for purpose and the subsequent disaster.

The ombudsman says:

"There was of course no excuse for the actions of those detainees involved in the disturbance and the suffering and damage they caused. I have concluded, however, that what occurred at Yarl's Wood was the result of a series of decisions taken over the previous three years."

There is a policy point: we cannot be sure that this Government get their policy right under pressure. Therefore, what assurance can the Minister give us that the policy failures in the assessment of the issues surrounding asylum and removals have been addressed, so that that sort of problem cannot arise again?

Secondly, I charge that the Government waste resources on an epic scale. Yarl's Wood was significantly overpriced. The ombudsman details a memo from the Prison Service, which said:

"My own view of the IND exercise is that if and when the NAO [National Audit Office] takes an interest they will have a 'field day' in value for money terms."

The report describes how the pressure of speed made it an overpriced contract. Premiums were added on and there was not adequate supervision. I have informed the NAO of that particular paragraph and I am interested in what it says.

The speed also ensured that there was a failure to transfer the insurable risk from the public to the private sector, which has led to an ongoing dispute about the insurance. It might mean that the taxpayer bears a cost for the whole fiasco instead of the people who should have insured it. Again, that is an outstanding waste of resources.

How have procedures changed in the Home Office to ensure that such a reckless and expensive response to a problem cannot happen again? Why were they not considered sufficiently significant to be detailed in the Home Secretary's statement on 16 November.

Thirdly, I allege that the Home Office is incompetent in managing its agencies. I will give two examples. It was stated to my constituents at the outset that Yarl's Wood would be a relatively low-level security area and that no one who was a serious security risk or was dangerous in any way would go there. However, the report details how those who had been responsible for a riot and incident at Campsfield house shortly before Yarl's Wood opened were deliberately transferred to Yarl's Wood in breach of those undertakings.

It is also clear from the report that the Home Office did not know how many people were at Yarl's Wood on the night that we are discussing. Among his many expressions of astonishment, the ombudsman said that he was astounded that the Government did not know how many people they were in care of in detained circumstances in Yarl's Wood on the night of the fire. How can a Department be so incompetent in the management of its agencies? What action has been taken in the Home Office to investigate why so many errors were made in relation to the supervision of contractors and how can we be sure that that such a situation will not happen again?

[Alistair Burt]

I allege that the Department is less than trustworthy in the use of its information, for short-term political gain. I am aware of the seriousness of that charge. The ombudsman's report describes the process—if it can be called that—to produce a removal target of 30,000 a year at a time when removals then stood at about 7,000 a year. The target was treated with great scepticism in the Home Office and by the various agencies involved in the removal of detainees. It inadvertently got into the public arena and a Home Office official, who is quoted in the report, apologised to a Minister by way of a memo on 7 June 2000 for having allowed such a high figure to get into public currency, because once it did, it gained some credibility.

Despite that lack of certainty within the Department, on 23 March 2001, just a few weeks before the onset of a general election campaign, the then Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), re-announced the 30,000 target in a Home Office news release. Indeed, it became a manifesto commitment. It was described by, among all newspapers, The Guardian. On 24 March 2001, it said:

"The home secretary, Jack Straw, yesterday insisted he would continue to maintain the pressure by making the return home of 30,000 failed asylum seekers . . . the focus of official efforts over the next 12 months."

Immediately—and I mean immediately—after the general election campaign was over, the new Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), was advised by his officials that the target was unachievable. How can that sort of target, the subject of a general election campaign, become unachievable in a few short weeks? How did it become unachievable then, when beforehand, inside the Department, it had been known to be very suspect? I suggest that the carelessness with which the then Home Secretary used those figures was tantamount to a fraud on the electorate. I want to know from the Minister how such a figure, which was characterised with such concern inside the Department, became an official target when it had such a sceptical basis.

My fifth point may give some indication of why that was the case: civil servants are placed under unreasonable pressure. A senior civil servant, the director of detention in 2001, is quoted in the ombudsman's report as saying that "he considered the 30,000 target 'laughable' and 'plucked out of the sky'. This view was based initially on the views of experienced Immigration Service staff and very rapidly his own observations and judgement. He went so far as to describe the target as some kind of fantasy which you had to publicly acknowledge or you were branded 'not one of us' and a 'troublemaker'. Disturbingly"— the ombudsman concludes—

"he said reasoned debate was 'forbidden'."

What investigation has taken place into allegations made by such a senior source? In his conclusions, the ombudsman drew attention to the climate in the Department. What evidence do any of us have that that climate is not still present? That leads to the suspicion about statistics and about everything else that we hear about. That is the concern behind the fact that that sort of pressure is placed on officials.

My final point is that the Government are careless of the lives and liberties of those whom they detain without trial and who have not committed any crime. That is the story of the whole thing. For political purposes, a removals target was plucked out of the sky, put in a manifesto and driven by the Prime Minister—whose personal involvement is also noted in the report—when everybody else in the Government knew that it would not work. That only became clear immediately after the election when the then Home Secretary admitted a mistake. It was a mistake for which many hundreds of people could have paid with their lives. That was the process described by the ombudsman.

In conclusion, the story is appalling: detainees were let down; those responsible for them were let down; my constituents were let down; the emergency services that had to deal with the fire were let down and, to add insult to injury, were sued for the part that they had played. Local and national taxpayers were also let down, and the Government's response was a written ministerial statement.

I am certain that the Minister can do a lot better. I ask him to take this opportunity to apologise and indicate what the Home Office is doing to ensure that its part in the process that became the Yarl's Wood disaster is not repeated.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) on securing this afternoon's exceptionally interesting debate. On seeing the title "Immigration and Asylum", my first reaction was to observe that it is not always helpful in a 90-minute debate to lump the two subjects together, because they are very different. However, while listening to the hon. Gentleman and some of his hon. Friends, I heard a number of different issues being conflated. Perpetuating the supposed conjunction between asylum and immigration is the least of the difficulties that have arisen today.

The hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam) said that this issue is under-debated, and he is right. Other hon. Members have highlighted the dangers of a lack of debate on such issues. There was a debate in this Chamber on 8 July, not under the heading "Immigration and Asylum", but on the Home Affairs Committee report on asylum applications. It was held at the conclusion of an extensive, exhaustive and evidence-led investigation by the Select Committee The manner in which the issues were dealt with on that occasion—my recollection is that the Minister was also present—benefited from the opportunity enjoyed by members of the Select Committee to go out and learn for themselves, at first hand, the extent and nature of the problems that people undoubtedly face.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight made his opening remarks and went on to speak about the problems of integration and multiculturalism. He asked whether Government policy is to pursue integration or multiculturalism. I do not think that those two objectives are necessarily mutually exclusive. We must be careful about how we use the terms. For example, the issue does not arise from immigration or even asylum, unless we take the term "immigrants" to mean people whose family came here perhaps two, three or four generations ago. The problems of community relations are not exclusive to communities with a high number of migrants, whether economic or asylum seeking.

In raising those matters in such a way, the hon. Gentleman risks conflating the issues. I regret to say that that is what he did when he discussed dentistry provision. I suspect that, like me, every Member here knows from their own constituency experience about the problem of availability of NHS dentists. I also know about it because I well remember campaigning to save the Edinburgh dental school. The root cause of the problem—that was an unintended pun—was the closure of the dentistry schools by the Conservative Government between 1992 and 1997.

It takes a long time to train dentists. The Scottish Executive have made the recruitment and training of dentists a major priority, but the situation will not change overnight. To raise the issue as the hon. Gentleman did in a debate on asylum and immigration lends credence to the taxi driver view, if I can call it that, which is that all those people are coming over here and taking our jobs and services. That is manifestly not the case.

The hon. Gentleman also spoke about several scams, including the sector-based scheme, which we value greatly in my constituency. We do not regard it in any way as a scam. It brings to my constituency many processing workers, which the community simply is not able to supply from its own resources, for the fish and shellfish processing sectors. I also must caution him in respect of his comments on arranged marriages. Perhaps he was well intentioned, but I fear that many outwith this Chamber will read his comments and take offence at them.

Mr. Browne: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I am aware of the significant contribution that migrant labour makes to the economy of his constituency. I do not wish to endorse all that the hon. Member for Isle of Wight said, but he made a coherent point about the changed circumstances after the accession date of 1 May. We now have access to a much extended labour market in Europe, and, of course, that is relevant. It may be of help to the debate if the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), who has some experience of the matter in his constituency, discussed it further at the appropriate time.

Mr. Carmichael: I am exceptionally grateful to the Minister for that contribution. He makes a valid point, which the hon. Member for Isle of Wight also made. On the wider market, we must wait and see. The Minister referred to access—he was right to use the term—but it is early days. The extent to which we can exploit access to that market, the extent to which people will want to come from the new accession countries to perform those jobs and the impact that that will ultimately have on matters such as the sector-based scheme all remain to be seen.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) referred to visa charges for students and I am grateful to him for raising that issue, about which I, too, have received representations. He is right to say that there is a widely held fear that the charges will start to deter overseas students from coming here, which would be exceptionally unfortunate and another example of the law of unintended consequences.

The contribution made by overseas students to our higher and further education sector is immense in respect of the individual institutions and the long-term benefits that accrue to this country—those, however, are perhaps less quantifiable—because we establish good links with a generation of people who will return to their own countries and perhaps go on to lead the opinion-formers of tomorrow. Many of those countries are ones with which it is essential that we establish good relations if our future national security is to be assured.

The hon. Member for Orpington referred to scepticism about Government statistics and the Minister made an interesting observation about the National Audit Office audit of the statistics. The answer that he received from the hon. Gentleman made me suspect that not much would satisfy him about Government statistics; he was determined in his scepticism. However, as one who lives at both ends of the country, I caution him because I can take an outsider's view of the problems facing people who live in London.

I see that there are problems with the overheating of London and the south-east, but to raise such issues in the context of a debate on immigration and asylum and to conflate the issues in that process is not particularly helpful. Indeed, it is no more helpful than the Tory proposals for quotas for asylum seekers. I was disappointed by the hon. Gentleman's response when the Minister challenged him on that issue.

I am keen to keep to my 10-minute limit and there is only one more issue that I want to draw to the Minister's attention. It was raised by early-day motion 458 on immigration rules and English language fluency for ministers of religion, and it concerns the difficulties that Hindu temples are having in recruiting poojaris as a result of having to meet English language fluency level 4. The Minister may be aware that poojaris are not required to be preachers in Hindu temples, but there are difficulties with recruitment as a result of that language requirement and I hope that the Minister will give his earliest attention to the matter.

3.9 pm

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): I, too, would like to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) on securing this debate and on the way in which he has presented the subject to us this afternoon. I also congratulate all those colleagues who have contributed to the debate.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) said rightly that these vast subjects, particularly when placed together, cannot be discussed fully in a short debate such as the one that we are having today. However, the subject is important, and my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) was right to say that when we debate asylum and immigration, we should speak with sensitivity and care. Debates in the House in recent years have shown that characteristic, which is important but is not always reflected in the press and other parts of the media.

I pause only to say that I sometimes consider that standard debates are not the easiest way in which to develop policy and an exchange of ideas. The hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser), who is here today and an expert on such issues, and I served on the Home

[Mr. Humfrey Malins]

Affairs Committee, which I often considered was an extremely good venue for an exchange of ideas and policy, and a good place in which to talk rationally. Other experts on such difficult issues are also present today. What a huge subject.

Reference has been made to the Government's record over the past eight years. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire was right to refer to it. The record was unhappy in many respects and much took place before the Minister was in his place. I thank him, as I have done on other occasions, for the way in which he approaches such topics. Undoubtedly, during the past few years, asylum and immigration have become high on the list of worries of members of the public. My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam) referred to a survey that was carried out in his constituency. Such matters cause concern.

It is not easy for a Government to handle an efficient and humane asylum and immigration policy—not easy at all—but many would say that their record has been disappointing, to give it its lowest description. Asylum applications shot up and almost trebled between 1996 and 2001 and reached more than 100,000. The Government's inability to adopt a proper and effective removals target of failed asylum seekers was well highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire.

In 2001, I tabled a parliamentary question to which the Government replied:

"The current . . . target relating to the removal of failed asylum seekers from the United Kingdom is to remove 30,000 in 2001/02; 33,000 in 2003/04; and 37,000 in 2004/05."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 17 December 2001; Vol. 377, c.78W.]

The Government should not have put forward such figures if they could not deliver them. The truth is that they had to abandon that target. It is not surprising that the former Home Secretary said not many months ago that he did not have a clue how many illegal immigrants were in this country. I think that the best estimates suggest that there are upwards of 250,000 failed asylum seekers here at the moment. That is a pity.

I wish to refer to two or three narrow, but important, points. My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight naturally and properly referred to the impact of migration on housing in this country. Last December in the other place, my noble Friend Lord Lamont asked Her Majesty's Government about the latest projections for additional households each year in England, over what period forecasts had been made and how that compared with the previous projections of households in England in 2021 that was published in 2000. The Minister of State, Lord Rooker replied:

"The 2002-based interim household projections are the Government's latest projections and have updated the 1996-based household projections.

The 2002-based Interim Household Projections show that 189,000 additional households are projected to form annually between 2001 and 2021 in England. This projection assumes recent population trends continue and trends in household formation remain as estimated for the 1996-based household projections. They do not take account of future housing supply.

The 1996-based Household Projections showed that 150,000 dwellings were projected to form annually in the same time period".

Lord Lamont went on to ask:

"How many additional households in England each year can be attributed to the projected levels of net international migration in current and previous projections", to which Lord Rooker replied:

"It is estimated that, in the 2002-based interim household projections for England, about 59,000 additional households per year are attributable to net international migration out of a total of 189,000 additional households per year between 2001 and 2021."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 8 December 2004; Vol. 667, c. WA38–9.]

The number had previously been estimated to be about 38,000 additional households a year. Simply, in terms of housing, the problem is important; I say no more than that.

We now have Government figures that show that nearly one in three of the additional 189,000 households formed each year will be due to international migration. It is the first time that that has been officially admitted. I simply put those figures before the Chamber for the Minister to comment on, if he will.

My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight talked about immigration scams. There are a couple on which I would like an update, although the Minister has been very helpful on the matter in recent times. Reference was made to bogus colleges. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) was entirely right to talk of the many benefits of having international students in this country. However, we know—and the Minister accepts—that there have been and still are a number of bogus colleges. In a written answer, the Minister has said that "Immigration and Nationality Directorate officials have visited over 1,150 establishments of concern so far this year"— that is, educational colleges—

"of which about a quarter have been found to be bogus."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 15 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 1092W.]

That is almost 300 bogus colleges. I would appreciate it if he could give an update on how many of those bogus educational establishments have been closed.

Mr. Gerrard: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that something has been done about bogus colleges—and about time, too. The issue is not so much whether they are closed down, but whether people are allowed to get visas to come to such a college. That is now not possible. It is a step forward that that loophole has been closed.

Mr. Malins: The hon. Gentleman, whose judgment on such matters we respect enormously, was right to say that it was about time that something was done. The situation was very bad. I simply ask the Minister not only whether some of those places have been closed but what has been done to ensure that such places cannot profit.

I have two other matters to raise. First, there is the question of sham marriages. A reply to a parliamentary question that I asked last year suggested that, in 2001 to 2004, the better part of 8,000 to 10,000 marriages suspected to be bogus had been reported by registrars to the Home Office. It was significant that my inquiries among registrars showed that whenever they reported a proposed possible bogus marriage, they found the Home Office unwilling to act. There has been legislation since. The Government were right to deal with the problem and, to quote the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard), it was about time they did. Can the Minister bring us up to date on whether he is entirely happy with the current situation?

Finally, there is the question of juxtaposed controls and borders. The debate on border controls could occupy weeks in itself. I happen to know that the Government have been working hard over the past year or more to improve our border controls. It is a difficult task. However, I would like them to comment, if they would, on a document that I received a few days ago from representatives of the British International Freight Association. What the association says is very important. Quoting observations of some member companies, it says that

"in July of this year all major ports around the world had to upgrade their security to comply with the International Ship & Port Security (ISPS) Code, agreed in December ... The ISPS Code is administered and regulated in the UK by ... TRANSEC ... our members moving goods by road from the Continent still report significant instances of 'clandestine entrants' getting into and hiding on trucks in order to gain entrance to the UK. They are said to be usually armed (sometimes with firearms). The point being that these trucks move through supposedly ISPS compliant in France and the Low-countries (some of which have British Customs/Immigration staffed 'juxtapositioned' control zones at them), go aboard ISPS compliant ro-ro ferries/ships and through UK ISPS compliant ports the other side, yet such armed stowaways can remain undetected."

Can the Minister briefly address that matter? I am sorry that I have extended my allocated 10 minutes by a few seconds.

3.20 pm

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Desmond Browne): I congratulate the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) on securing the debate. He is right to say that it addresses an important and under-discussed issue, and the policy on it can only benefit from the debate. Unfortunately, I appear yet again to have been left with a comparatively small amount of time to respond, so it is unlikely that I will be able to deal with all the points that have been raised in this debate, but I will seek to deal with those that I do not address by other means.

The tone of the debate has broadly been helpful, although I will have something more to say about that. I am grateful to all hon. Members who have spoken for the contributions that they made; I hope that they will excuse me for that general acknowledgement. I am also grateful that my hon. Friends the Members for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) and for Dover (Mr. Prosser) are present; they have expertise in this area and it was unfortunate that the limited time available to us did not allow them to do anything more than intervene in the debate. However, they were telling interventions that helped the debate to progress.

I have a slight disappointment about something, which I hope that the hon. Member for Isle of Wight will accept in the right spirit. He promised that he would address the positive aspects of migration, and particularly the significant contribution that migrant labour makes to the national health service at all levels, but, except for a fleeting reference, he failed to do so. That may be a consequence of lack of time. As I have debated with him before, enjoyed those debates and felt that his contributions were balanced, I will give him the benefit of the doubt on this occasion.

Nobody is more acutely aware than I am of the views of the public on this issue of public policy. They are reflected in my postbag, and in contributions from both sides of the political spectrum. Not everyone shares the views espoused by the hon. Gentleman. There are significant numbers of people in the United Kingdom who have different and far more liberal views about how we should run our border controls and how we should approach issues such as who should be entitled to migrate to our country and live and work among us.

I know that MORI polls show that 70 per cent. of people in this country think that migration is too high. I am also conscious that polls—and sometimes they are the same polls that produce that 70 per cent. figure—show that for many of the people who hold that view, it can be explained by the fact that they have exaggerated beliefs about what the actual figures are. The MORI poll that the hon. Member for Isle of Wight referred to recently showed that, on average, people thought there were four times more migrants in the UK than there are on any view of the figures—whether they be the figures that other people extrapolate from the public figures or those that are published after being audited.

There is a duty on all of us, to use statistical information in this area with a degree of responsibility, and, being a Minister, I accept that that stricture applies more heavily to me and to the Home Office than to anybody else. That is what my dispute with MigrationWatch UK is about in relation to the figures. To the extent that it uses figures that are published and are in the public domain—and, broadly, it does use such figures—I have no argument. Most of the time, it uses figures that have been independently audited, at the request of the Home Office, by the National Audit Office, and that have to a large extent been given a clean bill of health. I have a copy of the report in front of me and it contains some qualifications, as I mentioned to the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam). However, it suggests that the figures can largely be relied on, and it shows in particular that there is no transference from one set of figures to another—from the migration figures to the asylum figures, or vice versa—which was an important part of the debate that was taking place many months ago.

To that extent, I have no objection. It is the flawed analysis of the figures that I dispute. I understand that some of that is in an area where there is debate, because no Government in this country have ever been able to say how many illegal migrants are here. No Government in the world can say how many illegal migrants there are in their country. It seems a sterile argument to concentrate—as many people and commentators want to do—on the inability of one Home Secretary, or successive Home Secretaries, to be able to answer that question with accuracy. Nobody has ever been able to do it and I suspect that nobody ever will.

It is incumbent on the Government—I accept this responsibility—to look at the methodologies used by other countries, as we are currently doing, to see how the figures can be properly estimated in a way that does not inflame public opinion one way or the other, but informs it and allows us to have a debate. When that work is complete, we will publish those figures and that information, but, as yet, it is work in progress.

I turn to some other important points. It is important to accept that people in the UK live in a globalised world. We do not live in isolation. We may have lived in a different world 20, 30 or 40 years ago, when international travel was much more difficult than it is now and when our economy was in a different state. However, migration is essential if we are to maintain our role as a major economic player. I do not think that there is any party in this Parliament that does not think that that is right. It is the scale that we are debating, rather than the principle.

It is beyond debate that we have one of the strongest economies in the world. We consistently have nearly 600,000 vacancies in the labour market, unemployment is at sustained, historically low levels and employment at sustained, historically high levels. Without migration, the rate of economic growth that we presently enjoy would be much lower. We could not look forward to the expected level of economic growth that all of us, as politicians and the elected leadership of this country, wish to see so that we can make the level of investment that we want in the infrastructure of our country and our public services. We could not sustain that growth. We must face up to that reality.

I understand that those labour market facts have significant consequences in relation to pressures on public services and, in particular, on housing in certain parts of the country. However, we must face the reality that those issues exist whoever does the work. If the work needs to be done in those parts of the United Kingdom, and if we are of the view that that level of growth should be sustained and continued, workers will need to come to do the work.

As I travel around this city, I notice—with my accent— that there is a significant amount of migrant labour from my part of the United Kingdom carrying out work and living among the people of the city. If those people settle in this part of the United Kingdom and want their families with them, they will generate a degree of pressure on public resources, whether they be housing resources or health resources. I understand that that is an uncomfortable reality for people who consider themselves to be the indigenous population—whatever that might mean. What is the indigenous population of the south-east of England? When I am out, I hear people speaking English as a native language with many accents.

Whatever the native population is, that is a challenging fact for them, but if we are to see the growth that we all want, we must deal with those issues. It will be unfortunate if this debate, which it is the Government's responsibility to respond to, becomes an issue about immigration, because, as the hon. Member for Isle of Wight pointed out, if we do not get the context of the debate right and if we do not take it forward properly, it will be ruthlessly exploited by extremists—particularly from the right wing of politics—to mask their racist approach to life in this country. That will do significant damage. We have a joint responsibility to take the issues forward.

We are not, in international terms, a high net migration country. Whatever the figures may be—the Government Actuary's Department has a mixed record of predicting the number of people and the growth of the population of this country—we are not a high net migration country. In fact, in relation to all our competitors, we are substantially smaller—.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret that time is up. I congratulate the House on a constructive and well informed debate.

GP Services (Exmoor)

3.30 pm

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): I am extremely grateful for the opportunity to raise an important issue for the people of Exmoor that also resonates in every sparsely populated area of England. As the south-west region is the most rural of England's regions, the debate is relevant to counties other than Somerset and the part of Devon to which Exmoor extends.

I am sure that the Minister has boned up on his knowledge of my constituency and no doubt he knows that there are two very distinct geographical parts to it: Taunton Deane, which has 80,000 electors, and Exmoor, which has nearly 4,000—a much smaller number. The matter is best illustrated by my saying that although Taunton Deane is not overcrowded, the 3,900 electors of Exmoor live in an area roughly the same size as the whole of Taunton Deane.

I share Exmoor with my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) and the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey), so together we represent one of the most remote areas of England. It is worth pointing out that, compared with the national average, Exmoor has a significantly greater proportion of households with individuals suffering from limiting long-term illnesses. Due to the nature of farming communities, families will be left to look after those who are ill.

On Exmoor, there is also a greater proportion of individuals caring for the ill or the elderly and a greater number of people living in medical and care establishments run by housing associations. Contrary to how some people regard Exmoor, it is not a very wealthy area across the piece. It is also well accepted that Exmoor has an ageing population, which is easy to understand when one considers that many people aspire to retire there. In turn, a higher than average proportion of people provide unpaid care in farming families, and a consequent proportion of the elderly live alone after the husband or wife has passed away.

It is also worth pointing out that Exmoor is unusual in having no traditional nursing homes, which creates extra problems for the GP surgery I shall mention in a few moments.

There are two particular issues that I want to bring to the Minister's attention. The first is the sparsity of the area that I represent, along with my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater, and the manner in which primary services are struggling to match those in the towns of Taunton and Bridgwater, as well as those elsewhere in England. Secondly, there is the particular problem of the Dulverton medical practice which is based at Trumpington House surgery in the town of Dulverton. Even to the Minister, hon. Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), whose constituency is hardly a conurbation, Exmoor must be really rural and Dulverton, although a town, not much more than a large village. It is the gateway to Exmoor and one of Britain's most beautiful areas, yet it is only a small town.

I am grateful for the information that has been provided by the partners of the surgery and Mrs. Pam Poole, the practice manager. Everyone who works for the surgery is held in high esteem by people throughout Exmoor. I am also grateful to Mr. Bernard Smith, chairman of the Dulverton medical practice patient group, which has a good relationship with the doctors at the surgery.

The practice covers an enormous area of 300 square miles and is based right in the centre of the town. That is the good news. The bad news is that the town is old and the practice based in extremely cramped conditions in an old house. There are 4,000 patients—a very steady number held over the past 20 years—with three whole-time equivalent doctors, of whom Dr. Lee Burton is the only full-timer. Some will say that 4,000 patients for three full-time doctors does not seem like a particularly burdensome load, but I am about to come to the crux of the issue, which is sparsity. Given that they have to cover 300 square miles, three full-time GPs working between 8 am and 6.30 pm five days a week do not have much time for house calls as well as surgery appointments, even on a good day. The doctors are, as in every doctor's surgery in the country, extremely pressed for time.

The patient group has emphasised the rurality of Exmoor to Somerset Coast primary care trust. Coupled with the lack of public transport, those from all the isolated communities must travel long distances to the community hospitals at Minehead, Williton, Tiverton, Taunton and, in some cases, Wellington. The round-trip can take several hours.

The patients' group is concerned that the outreach surgeries continue. They are in demand and began in response to local need. I know the village halls well, and will visit three of the outreach surgeries with Dr. Burton on Friday morning. I will be honest and admit that it would be fair to say that they lack professional amenities. No doubt Dr. Burton and his colleagues offer good medical care, but those village halls, which are at times cold, are not as well equipped as they ought to be. I am sure that the Minister appreciates that that is not the best way to deliver primary care in the 21st century.

The Minister will be aware of the issue of out-of-hours care. In a sparsely populated, rural area such as Exmoor, it is the main concern of the practice group. Patients are not happy with the out-of-hours service that has been afforded to them by Somerset Coast PCT. Thanks to the distance, emergency GP attention often takes several hours to arrive. Doctors are dispatched from Taunton, sometimes via Bridgwater, to get to the heart of the moor. Even with the most sophisticated navigation equipment available, local knowledge is immensely important.

In short, what is needed is funding for more doctors to cover the area at any one time. That issue, I am sure, will be evolving in many rural areas throughout the country. The problem is that, when the unknown GP arrives in the middle of the night, he has few, if any, patient records. That is always a cause for concern for patients and for the patients' group.

It appears that, since the system came into being at the beginning of April, none of that has been able to take place until the patient has telephoned the emergency contact number, been subjected to a host of questions—sometimes repeated by more than one operative—and been told that a doctor will be phoning. That call could come up to three hours later due to excessive demand for the service. That comment is what electors of mine—patients of the service—are hearing all too often, so, of course, confidence in the system is low.

The alternative is to call 999 immediately, rather than go through the NHS Direct system, but 999 calls mean an in-built expense to the NHS that we would prefer not to be placed on it. However, that is what a large number of people are beginning to do. When 999 is called and an ambulance arrives, the response time is well outside what is expected. That is understandable because Taunton, the location of the nearest major ambulance station, is at least 25 miles away.

So, the issues are out-of-hours service, the continuation of outreach services and sparsity. The availability of physiotherapy also needs to be improved. Farming is the mainstay of Exmoor and farmers go through physical work and exertion much more systematically than many of us, who seem to have desk jobs. It therefore becomes an imperative that people receive physiotherapy much more smoothly and efficiently, or they could end up prematurely chronically disabled and unable to work. That would undermine their whole lifestyle. Mental health care is common in rural areas, but the service and support for psychotic or affective disorders is sparse on Exmoor.

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): My hon. Friend and I share Exmoor almost exclusively. He makes an eloquent case, but perhaps I may tease out this point a little further. Domiciliary care in our local hospital in Minehead, not the main one in Taunton, has been cut even since we began to represent the area—not because the hospital wants it cut, but because the resource has been moved to Taunton. Does he agree that we must try to encourage more domiciliary care such as physiotherapy back on to the moor?

Mr. Flook: It would be extremely useful if the services being offered in Minehead were also offered in Dulverton. I wait to hear the Minister's response. In the spirit of trying to be helpful to one another, I informed his office of the issues that I intended to address this afternoon.

The minor injury unit represents an important issue, but one that I hope is being resolved. The Minister may be aware that it has been a slight local cause célèbre. Following 1 April and a new GP contract, the PCT saw no value in continuing to fund the minor injury unit. The sum involved is fairly small—just a few thousand pounds—and the unit offers local people an opportunity to be seen quickly by a health professional. However, the doctors thought that that decision was wrong and, despite local medical committee guidelines, which advise against offering services not funded by the PCT, they have continued to offer the facility.

Even the people in Bridgwater, where the PCT is based, did not grasp the issues of rurality and sparsity faced by those living on Exmoor. The 80 patients treated every year are grateful that the doctors have continued the facility. Where else could they go? Wherever they live—it could be Simonsbath—to go to Dulverton is a detour. If they found that the minor injuries unit was not open, they would have to go on to Taunton. Therefore, a small detour to Dulverton could mean another 25 miles to the accident and emergency department at Taunton or going back across the moor to Minehead.

In response to my hon. Friend's comment on Minehead, there is, I am told, no medical cover, by which I mean a doctor's cover, for the minor injury unit between 11 at night and 8 in the morning. That creates further concern and pushes people the longer distance to Taunton, instead of the slightly shorter distance to Minehead.

The patients' group remonstrated with the PCT successfully, and following a personal meeting with Alan Carpenter, chief executive officer of the PCT, a dialogue is taking place. I hope the problem will be resolved

I hope also that the Minister has been able to follow closely my depiction of the difficulties in delivering primary health care on Exmoor. The matter is made more problematic by the situation in which doctors find themselves with their own surgery premises. The building, which is in the centre of Dulverton, is outdated and restrictive. It was converted in the 1960s from a house, when the doctor, who had a single consulting room, moved next door. The number of consulting rooms is now too few for the number of doctors. The nursing area is equally cramped. The corridors are not wide enough for wheelchair or stretcher access and there is a lack of space in the treatment rooms.

In view of the geographical isolation and the distance even to the community hospitals of Minehead and Tiverton, the surgery needs to be able, and is just about able, to offer dietician's advice, community nursing and midwifery, a health visitor service and—not that the doctors are being paid for it—the minor injury service, but all in cramped and unsuitable surroundings. When I visited the surgery in December, I was introduced to a number of staff who are based in what are effectively broom cupboards. They make the facilities that some of us still endure in the House of Commons look quite palatial.

The Minister will know that much more is being asked of primary care and that Trumpington House has no opportunity to match what many GP surgeries can offer elsewhere in my constituency. The minor surgery service could even be extended. There could and should be mental health support. It would be good to see occupational health services for rural workers based there and even visiting GPs with special interests being allowed to go to the surgery.

Access for the elderly, infirm and disabled is real issue. There is an inadequate drop-off point on a narrow street, which always blocks the traffic and is a problem for blue-light emergencies and for the air ambulance if it ever has to pick someone up from the surgery. I noticed, because it is all too clear, that the dispensary is too small. Of the 4,000 patients, 75 per cent. get their prescriptions from the doctor and get a poor service—not because the pharmacy is inadequate, but because people have to queue so close to each other that everyone knows what everyone else's prescription is. That cannot be right. Overall, in the words of the chairman of the patients' group, Trumpington House "is not conducive to a healing environment".

There is a solution. A site for a new medical centre has been found in grounds currently occupied by the dentist in the town. It is well located, easily accessible to everyone in the community and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater and I know, even has the blessing of local planners, who are fairly picky. Funding, as I am sure the Minister would expect me to say, is the key to solving the problem.

The PCT acknowledges the difficulties, knows that there is a solution and, depending on the yardstick used, says that the surgery is its No. 1 or No. 2 priority. It has given everyone the impression that it wants to be helpful, but says that there are genuine restrictions on finding suitable capital funding to help the GPs to move their practice. It appears that the PCT's budget to help doctors to improve their facilities throughout all its surgeries on the Somerset coast amounts to about £600 per surgery. That may or may not include the extra £108 million for help for doctors to improve their premises, which was announced by the Government at the end of July, but it works out to an extra £100,000 per PCT and an extra £150,000 next year, which is not a lot. I hope the Minister appreciates that there are problems of sparsity on Exmoor and even the local PCT is slowly working out that it has not quite grasped what that means in terms of how services need to be delivered.

I believe that my comments are helpful and I hope that they have been received as such. We are looking for help and for understanding of sparsity and its impact on how doctors are trying to keep up with what is expected of primary care elsewhere in our country. In trying to improve the health of their patients, it appears to me as a layman that they have to struggle more than others. They are at the end of the queue in more ways than one: they tend to have smaller patient lists, which means that funding is more difficult, and they are geographically more removed from the centre, which means not only that their patients have to travel much further, but that the money seems to travel more slowly to them.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Flook) for the interest that he takes in his local health services and I congratulate him on raising the issues today. However, for the very reasons that he outlined, I hope he will understand that much of what he has said pertains to matters that have to be addressed locally.

The hon. Gentleman correctly said that, although my constituency of South Thanet contains significant rural areas, it is very different from Exmoor. I have no knowledge of the detail of how life on Exmoor works; I cannot possibly know. I have enough to do to ensure that I understand how life in South Thanet works. That is why it is right that we have a policy of shifting the balance of power, sending money for the national health service to local areas and making local primary care trusts the focal point for local decision making, with people who know the area making decisions that are relevant to it.

Although I will deal with some issues that the hon. Gentleman raised and tell him what is being done about them, the response must come from his local PCT and local health professionals who understand the area. They have been given the resources, the opportunity and responsibility to address those issues locally. I hope that he and his colleague, the hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger), engage with their local PCT to ensure that their views are fed in. I am also happy to say that, because that local PCT has a duty to ensure it understands the views of local people, it organised a series of consultation events last autumn to enable it better to comprehend the needs of the local health community. Those events have informed the capital programme, including primary care services; helped to ensure that resources are going to the right places; and helped the PCT to create a strategic services development plan, which will no doubt address many of the issues that the hon. Member for Taunton raised.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: The Minister has made the most elegant points. One problem with Somerset Coast PCT—most of which is in my constituency—is that one goes from an industrial town to a very large seaside conurbation to a huge rural area. We have four hospitals of which only one would meet Government standards. The PCT is good, and the Minister is absolutely right: it is undertaking a phenomenal consultation process, in which I, my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Flook) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) have been involved. However, it is finding it very difficult to obtain the capital receipts to be able to do what it would like to do.

Dr. Ladyman: Later on, I hope to have good news about capital receipts for the hon. Gentleman. We have come up with a formula for ensuring that the capitation expenditure in each area reflects properly the needs of that area. Deprivation and rurality are two issues that are taken into account when determining the amount of money per head going into the health service in a particular area. It will take us some years to move fully to the use of that formula, but it already is and will continue to be an awful lot more generous to Exmoor than the formula for spreading out money in the national health service that it replaced. I hope it will help the PCT to address the issues mentioned in the long term.

I ought to say something about the problems of contracting and attracting GPs to an area such as Exmoor. Before I do that, with my Government hat on and to ensure a balanced debate, I am pleased to say that in December almost 100 per cent. of patients were offered an appointment with a GP within the national target of two working days and almost 100 per cent. of patients were able to gain access to a primary care practitioner within one working day. That is a considerable achievement by health professionals, and I congratulate them on their hard work and commitment.

Part of the modernisation of the national health service means that we must modernise the role of GPs and have the new general medical services contract, which came into existence in April, as an alternative to the personal medical services contract. It allows far more flexible working and increases UK expenditure on primary care from £6.1 billion in 2002-03 to £8 billion in 2005-06, which is an increase of 33 per cent. It is based on a series of quality indicators that will allow GPs to be paid more if they improve the quality of services to their patients and are able to reflect the needs of areas such as Exmoor.

The contract also provides new recruitment and retention possibilities to tackle shortages, which will be very important to areas such as Exmoor. For example, it allows for new benefits, including enhanced service payments if specialist services are delivered in a primary care setting; allows for resources to be allocated more fairly according to need; and benefits patients, giving them a far wider choice of high-quality services.

I hope that those services will be in the community, as the hon. Member for Bridgwater said in an intervention, rather than in a hospital. In an area such as Exmoor, it is vital that we provide more services in people's communities, rather than have them travel long distances to hospital.

All the surgeries in the west Somerset area, which includes Exmoor, have transferred to GMS contracts—only a few remain on the PMS contract. I have no doubt that they all recognise the benefits and that they can use them to improve services in their area.

The hon. Member for Taunton raised several issues, and I shall try to deal with them. First, the Trumpington House surgery in Dulverton faces several serious challenges. I do not minimise them for a second. Officials of the PCT have met regularly with the surgery to discuss options for developing integrated health facilities on an alternative site. I am pleased to say that, following acceptance of the new GMS contract, the PCT has invested more than £900,000 in Trumpington House surgery.

The news that I have for the hon. Gentleman—I am slightly surprised that he has not heard it already and that the PCT has not put it up in lights—is that the surgery has been awarded £250,000 for 2005–06 from the Dorset and Somerset funding. The money has been allocated for development of the modernisation project and has come from the new premises moneys released by the Government in 2004. It is for the local PCT and the surgery to work out how the £250,000 can best be used, but, if the provision of new services and facilities is as important as the hon. Gentleman suggests, I hope that they give serious consideration to using the money for that purpose.

The hon. Gentleman discussed out-of-hours services. He may be aware that the new GMS contract allows PCTs to take responsibility for such services. By 1 January, all but seven PCTs had assumed responsibility for them. Indeed, the transfer of responsibilities for such services to PCTs means that in many areas much more effective out-of-hours services can be provided. The new contract also helps to retain and recruit GPs who otherwise would not be interested in providing an out-of-hours service.

Somerset Coast PCT has taken on this responsibility and has put in place a robust and integrated out-of-hours service. The service can be accessed by NHS Direct and is supported locally by treatment centres, minor injury units, community hospitals and community nursing teams. Out-of-hours services are available at Musgrove Park hospital in Taunton and at community hospitals in Bridgwater and Minehead. The services are supported by a county-wide strategic development group, which is chaired by the chief executive of Mendip PCT, the lead PCT for out-of-hours services in Somerset.

I am not saying that everything about that out-of-hours service is already working perfectly. Of course it is not. The service will have to be monitored and improved. The issues that the hon. Gentleman identified will have to be addressed as time goes on, but the local team has put in place a strong plan that can improve on and deliver a top-quality out-of-hours service to people on Exmoor in the long term. Although feedback will be necessary from patient groups, the hon. Gentleman and local people, I believe that the service will go from strength to strength.

It is important that we deal with resource allocation, at least briefly. As I said, because the old formula did not properly reflect deprivation, rurality and other issues that add to costs in particular areas, we abandoned it. We have introduced a new formula that is much more generous to areas such as Exmoor, although it will take several years before Exmoor is on target for the total spending that we expect it to receive. However, the area has already benefited significantly from the new formula, and it will continue to benefit as it approaches the target in the coming years.

I hope that, following that brief canter through the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised, I have addressed his concerns. If I have not, I am happy to meet him to discuss them further.

School Buildings (Medway)

4 pm

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): I am pleased to have an opportunity to talk about schools in the Medway towns and I would like to put it on record that my contribution is supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Paul Clark) and by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews). All three of us, representing the Medway towns, have high aspirations for our young people, students, and children, and the schools in which they learn.

Without doubt, Medway schools have benefited enormously from investment under this Labour Government. There was £21 million of capital investment last year; there is the same again this year; and there will be just about the same again next year. That means more than £60 million within a three-year period, which is unprecedented. When I was elected, in 1997, if I were to have forecast those sums of money going in to schools in the Medway towns, people would not have believed it.

The figures are one thing. What matters to children, parents, school staff, heads and governors is what that £60 million does. What happens in the classroom and in the schools is what matters. The money improves facilities for schools and thereby the learning opportunities for our children and young people in the Medway towns.

I used to be surprised when I visited schools and heads wanted to show me their new toilet blocks. I had difficulty in matching their enthusiasm when they described the transformation. They said the same about staff rooms. I should not have been surprised, because the reality was that there was never any money to put those things right; if there was money, staff rooms, loos and so on were the last priority. That has been why there has been enthusiasm and much else, which I will go on to talk about.

Heads have said to me that, at long last, they have got the money, particularly devolved capital, which has proved very popular, to put right and to improve aspects of their schools that they had never been able to consider. That was the picture in many Medway town schools, but those days are going. It is not just a matter of toilets and staff rooms; it is much more than that. I will give a few examples. We are constructing new buildings. A sports hall at Medway community college just recently opened. It cost £1 million and it is a superb new centre. When I visited it recently, a young girl said, "This is the best thing that has happened to our school in years". I am really proud of it.

Seven years ago, when a head teacher at All Saints primary school, Mr. Stuart Kay, and I stood outside his Victorian building, he looked at me and said, "I want a new school for this area in Chatham". Well, he has got it. More than £1 million was involved. There are fantastic new classrooms and there has been a transformation. There are smiles on the faces of all the staff and the children. As the head teacher said, "We are over the moon with what has happened". He did not believe that it was possible.

We can contrast that and other examples of what went before. Perhaps one of the startling examples was Chatham South secondary school, which for 21 years did not have a school hall. We are talking about a secondary school that provides education for hundreds of pupils; boys and girls in the Medway towns did not have a school hall. Well, it has a school hall now. Eighteen months ago, a new £1 million school hall and drama and music centre opened.

Close to home, Wayfield primary school, where I am a governor, has a nursery. It was originally built under the urban aid programme under the previous Labour Government. It took the election of another Labour Government for that nursery to be refurbished under the new deal for schools programme. The school had to wait that long. I have said that in a very partisan way because Conservative Members of Parliament vote against that investment; that is the clear dividing line, of which my constituents are very much aware.

The examples of school investment that I referred to are typical of what is taking place across the Medway towns. My hon. Friend the Minister knows that the Medway area is part of the Thames gateway. It is one of the four national growth areas and a national priority for the Government. There can be no question about the priority given to the Thames gateway; the relevant Cabinet Committee is chaired by the Prime Minister himself. We have aspirations for the new communities, and—vitally—for the existing communities in the gateway. If we are to succeed in getting cohesion and dynamism and if we are to grasp those opportunities, we have to ensure that the infrastructure—whether of transport, health or education—is improved.

We have made a good start; recently two new nurseries were built as a result of £500,000 each from the Government. There are free places, and a new Sure Start centre has opened, at a cost of £1.1 million, that provides high-quality support for children and families in Medway towns. It would be wrong to overlook the Government's investment in higher education to ensure the establishment of the universities. Kent university and Greenwich university now share the Medway campus. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway is not here today but, since 1991, he has been an inspiring champion of the cause to establish a higher education institute in the Medway towns.

Discussing school buildings in Medway is relevant to the core purpose of this debate. Institutions for higher education are in place; we need to create the right conditions so that all our young people can aspire to and obtain the necessary standards so that they can choose whether they will attend those institutions. Those two universities have undertaken great work, particularly on the children's university and in reaching out to communities that had never considered higher education. The education maintenance allowances have made a difference by encouraging young people to continue their education post-16; some £500 million has been invested to assist such children and their families. We are only too aware of that investment.

The essential infrastructure, however, has to ensure that there are people with the skills to meet the challenges and opportunities. Some 12 per cent. of residents in Medway towns have qualifications of degree level or higher, compared to a national average of nearly 20 per cent.; on that criterion, we are ranked 66th of 67 authorities in the south-east. That is a poor position from which to benefit from the growth that comes from the knowledge and skills based economy.

[Jonathan Shaw]

Standards are rising in Medway schools and I pay tribute to the hard work and efforts of head teachers, other school staff, pupils and parents. However, 30 per cent. of Medway's work force do not have any qualifications. In a competitive region such as the south-east, that makes things difficult for us. Our people have 7 per cent. fewer qualifications than the regional average. Given that backdrop, the Minister will understand our determination that Medway schools should be the springboard for our population to reach out and grasp the gateway's potential.

The Department has advised Medway that we will start to receive building schools for the future funding in 2011, and that more will come into effect in 2016. I understand that building schools for the future is a long-term programme. However, if the gateway is to meet its full potential, we need to invest earlier in school buildings in Medway. The Department needs to understand better the gateway and the unique and special circumstances in Medway and the whole of the gateway. Perhaps it should be clearer about the importance that it attaches to schools for the future. I say that because in neighbouring Gravesham there has been an allocation from the 2008 tranche for building schools for the future. I would like to understand the criteria that the Government are working to. I know that deprivation levels are similar in Medway and Gravesham, but what factors are taken into account in terms of growth and the need to improve the personnel infrastructure? The Government must look again at Medway and I ask the Minister to consider my points and to review those decisions.

We have no argument about the commitment to invest in our schools. We know that we are having a share of the £5.5 billion of capital investment that the Government are providing compared with the £650 million that was being spent on schools prior to 1997. I am not just saying that I want more for my schools and I want the Minister to understand that. If we are to grasp the opportunities and realise the ambition, the gateway must meet the challenges and have a skilled work force. We need the schools that will be the springboard to create those opportunities.

Many more properties—some 120,000—will be built in the gateway by 2016, 43,000 of which will be in Kent and Medway. Schools need infrastructure investment and they have had that infrastructure investment. I am a great supporter of the Government's ambitious programme of refurbishing and rebuilding schools. In parts of my constituency outside Medway, rebuilding of two schools will start in March with spending of some £13 million or £14 million. I know that the Government are not just talking about spending money; they are spending money on schools both in Medway and elsewhere in my constituency. However, the point that I am labouring is that if we are to meet the challenges and if my existing residents and constituents are to realise the potential and grasp those opportunities, our schools must be the springboard. Investment is needed so that in Medway we can build those schools for the future before 2011. I hope that the Minister will review that decision.

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Twigg): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Jonathan Shaw) on securing this important debate. I put on record my respect for his efforts and, as he rightly said, those of our hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews) and our hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Paul Clark). I had the opportunity last year of visiting the area with our hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham to meet parents and teachers and to visit a primary school. I am aware of many of the challenges and opportunities that my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford set out.

It is probably worth starting by saying a little about some challenges that we faced when we came to office in 1997. My hon. Friend set those out with reference to his constituency. It is fair to say that school buildings throughout our country had suffered from decades of under-investment and neglect as well as a chronic and widespread backlog of urgent repairs. A large number of schools that were built in the 1960s and 1970s were passing the end of their design life and many were in much poorer condition than older schools built 50 or even 100 years ago. A huge number of temporary classrooms were in use and many were in terrible condition.

My hon. Friend referred to toilets. Many schools had outside toilets and heating systems that were antiquated, inefficient and inadequate. Very few new schools were built between the late 1970s and the mid to late 1990s. Those that were built were usually a response to necessity caused by rising pupil numbers in certain parts of the country. Schools were not in a position to improve their buildings or to respond to developments in learning and teaching, in particular the challenges of information and communications technology and the new technologies that are now available to us.

In 1996–97, the financial year at the end of which we came to power, direct Government support for capital investment in school buildings stood at just under £700 million for the whole of England. That has been increased dramatically to record levels. This year the figure is £4.9 billion and it will rise over the next three years to £6.3 billion in 2007–08. That significant improvement in capital investment in our schools is designed not only to make up for those decades of neglect, but to address the challenges that the education service faces as we go into the 21st century. We need to ensure that all schools are up to the expected standards, with very high aspirations for all children.

We have done a number of things. We have revised and improved the design and environmental guidelines for schools to reflect the needs of this century, and in particular to capture the benefits of new technology and ICT. An example is the greater availability of interactive white boards and greater expectations in relation to sustainable buildings and good environmental quality. That is in addition to meeting some challenges around inclusion in education, for which my hon. Friend has been a powerful advocate in his role as a constituency MP and on the departmental Select Committee.

In November, we announced the capital funding for schools over the current spending review period, taking us through to the financial year 2007–08. Taking those three years together, we are talking about more than £17 billion of additional capital support for investment in maintained schools across England. The capital strategy underpins the five-year plan for education, which was set out last summer. It seeks to provide all schools and authorities with funding, allocating it in a way that is fair and meets the needs that exist.

In 2007–08, a typical primary school of 250 pupils will have a direct grant of £34,000 to spend for its own capital purposes and a typical secondary school of 1,000 pupils will have about £113,000. On top of that, depending on local priorities, all schools will have access to about £2 billion through the local authority or the diocese.

By 2007–08, there will be a further £500 million available for exceptional needs that formulaic funding alone cannot meet. By then, we will be targeting about £2.7 billion for the renewal of the secondary school estate through academies and the building schools for the future programme. I will come to the position in Medway in a moment. The ambition of building schools for the future is to renew every secondary school in England. That is a huge task. It has never been attempted before and will take some time—we estimate between 10 and 15 years, and even that must be subject to future decisions and future spending patterns.

I turn to some challenges in Medway to which my hon. Friend referred. First, I acknowledge the important points that he has raised, both about standards and improving quality with respect to learning and teaching, and about some continuing challenges that are faced in the education service in his constituency. I am pleased to echo his points on the role of universities and the great importance of getting that higher education presence in Medway. Like him, I pay tribute to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway, who has led the campaign on that issue.

We know that part of the challenge with respect to aspiration for those children who come from families that traditionally have not gone into higher education is to achieve more effective co-operation between schools and higher education. The progress that my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford described enables those aspirations to be raised—ideally, experience shows us, from the youngest possible age. The greater the links between universities and schools, the more likely it is that we will see the benefits.

As my hon. Friend acknowledged, Medway benefits from the general increase in funding via formula and the targeted capital fund. For the next three years, the authority and its schools have been allocated £45 million in capital funding. Much can be done to ensure that that investment has a real impact, but, as he said, Medway has not been prioritised in the first three waves of BSF funding.

Let me say a little about how we chose the areas that would go into the different waves of BSF. As I said, it is a long-term programme lasting perhaps 10 to 15 years. Just two years ago, we invited every local education authority to apply to be included in the first wave of projects or to express an interest in being included in the rest of the programme. We published detailed guidance on how we would prioritise investment, and how we would start with the areas of greatest educational and social need. We chose simple, robust and understandable criteria: a combination of schools' GCSE performance and eligibility for free school meals in the area. That meant that authorities could see for themselves whether they were likely to be included in the early stages of the programme.

BSF is a development of the private finance initiative. As such, it deals with procurement of groups of schools rather than individual schools. That clearly brings efficiency and value for money from public procurement. However, more importantly, the real value of BSF is that a grouped approach should mean that we get much greater educational impact from the capital investment. Each local authority has the opportunity to think about its educational vision for all the children in the area covered, including, for example, whether the number and type of pupil places across an area are right. Groupings can consist of an entire authority or part of one. Where it makes sense, groupings can also cross authority boundaries where those authorities wish to collaborate.

Medway did not ask to be included in the first wave of BSF, which was announced in February 2004, but it expressed an interest in coming into the programme after wave 1. However, compared with other groups of schools put forward by other authorities around England, Medway's schools did not have enough need to be included in waves 2 or 3, which we announced in November. The further 20 projects, which will access funding by 2007–08, all have greater overall need than Medway as a whole.

My hon. Friend asked about the comparison with Gravesham and suggested that the two areas are broadly similar in character. It is worth pointing out that because of the sheer size of Kent LEA, the two will come into BSF at different stages. Gravesham was the first priority area. In a broad sense, my hon. Friend is right, but schools in Gravesham have a greater need than those in Medway, according to both the indicators that we used. The percentage of pupils with 5 GCSEs at A* to C for Medway schools is 47.9, whereas for Gravesham the figure is 42.5 per cent. On free school meal eligibility, the figures are 10.2 per cent. for Medway and 16.5 per cent. for Gravesham. That explains the technicalities of how Kent's bid for the project in Gravesham was deemed to have a higher priority than that for Medway.

Jonathan Shaw: I am not disputing the figures; I said only that there are similarities between the two areas. However, without question, the most deprived area in Kent is Thanet. I am trying to understand what importance, if any, my hon. Friend's Department has attached to the Thames gateway and the special circumstances to which I referred.

Mr. Twigg: I was coming to that. We have sought a consistent set of criteria across the country and we decided that, for ease of understanding and clarity, the combined indicator of GCSEs and free school meals was the best. For the reasons set out by my hon. Friend, a particular challenge exists with respect to the authorities that are part of the Thames gateway. There will be opportunities, through basic need funding and the targeted capital fund, for some effects of the increased demand for pupil places that the Thames gateway will bring to be met before authorities such as Medway become part of BSF.

We recognise that uncertainty is damaging to good planning by authorities and schools. That is why we wanted in November to give the authorities not in waves 1, 2 or 3 a broad indication of where they were likely to start in BSF. As my hon. Friend said, Medway is likely to join the programme between 2011 and 2016. We cannot give greater certainty this far in advance, but that is indicative planning information, which must be subject to future public spending decisions.

I would not want to mislead Medway into thinking that it has a definite and predetermined slot, but we have made it clear that the Government are committed to completing BSF within 10 to 15 years. Officials will meet local authorities, including Medway, in the coming months to discuss the issue in further detail. That meeting will give the authority an opportunity to put to our officials some points that my hon. Friend has raised today.

We have also announced that authorities, including Medway, that are not in the full programme by 2011 will receive capital to enable them to rebuild or remodel at least one of their secondary schools with the greatest need, either through the academies programme or through additional funding via the targeted capital fund. To support local education authorities in their planning, the meetings that I have just described will deal with capital strategy and consider the investment needs of each local community in greater detail. I sympathise with the fact that Medway's secondary schools will not immediately get the investment that some of them need. Despite the generosity of the education settlement, the scale of the need nationwide is enormous.

I mentioned the substantial capital support of £45 million that has been allocated to Medway schools over the next three years. That sum can be used for their priorities. In addition, Medway can take up the offer of funding for its neediest school, and I have encouraged it to do so. I am sure that my hon. Friend will do the same. I understand that plans are already being developed locally for an academy: more than one school might be able to benefit from the academy route. It will be for Medway to bid to the revised targeted capital fund for any further priority projects. We hope to publish our guidance on this fund next month.

Direct Government funding is not the only resource available to Medway and other authorities for priority investment in their schools. Medway has the flexibility to decide how to use all capital delivered from the single capital pot, not just that which comes direct from the Department for Education and Skills. Therefore, if education is its priority, Medway can direct further capital towards schools, if it wishes. It should also ensure that it maximises all its section 106 planning gains. I think my hon. Friend will accept that that gives Medway real options, and I hope that it will explore all of them. I give him an undertaking that our officials will give whatever support they can to ensure that that can happen.

I congratulate my hon. Friend again on raising this important issue. I believe that building schools for the future represents a tremendous opportunity to deliver improvement. We must have a system for prioritising, but there are a number of other ways in which we can get the extra capital needed into the schools in Medway. I look forward to working with him and the other two Medway MPs to ensure that that can be done over the months ahead.

Question put and agreed to.

NHS Dentistry

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[James Purnell.]

9.30 am

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): I congratulate the newly-appointed Lord Commissioner of Her Majesty's Treasury, the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell), on efficiently carrying out his duties.

I am grateful for the chance to raise this issue, which came to my attention as a constituency matter. Clearly, it also has national implications, and I shall make some general points about the national position shortly. Some problems are, however, specific to my constituency, although their seriousness illustrates the general problem. Indeed, I can see by the number of colleagues from both sides of the House who are present that it affects many constituencies.

To put it straightforwardly, no dentist in my constituency is taking on new national health service patients. In recent weeks, one practice has become so frustrated at the uncertainty surrounding the introduction of the new contract that it has pulled out of NHS work altogether. Inevitably, the effect on local provision has been disastrous.

The problem is illustrated by the primary care trust's figures. Right hon. and hon. Members will be aware that the Government have set targets as part of their commitment to ensuring access to NHS dentistry. When someone living in an urban area phones NHS Direct saying that they need an NHS dentist, they are supposed to be provided with one within 10 km of where they live. A year ago, the Ashford PCT was able to meet that target in 98 per cent. of cases; in the latest quarter for which it has figures, however, that percentage had already fallen to 64 per cent.—well below the Government's target of 90 per cent.—and it is heading downwards at a rate of knots. Clearly, that is not acceptable, although I should make it clear that I have no criticism of my local PCT, which is working extremely hard to do what it can within the severe constraints that it faces. It is trying to extend the hours of emergency cover, but that is simply not enough.

As hon. Members would expect, I have received many letters, e-mails and complaints about the crisis in dentistry in my constituency, but I shall quote only one, which illustrates what is, I am sure, a familiar story to colleagues from all parts of the country. Mrs. Barker writes:

"My dentist whom I have been with for 7 years has now turned private, only accepting patients who sign up to Denplan. Children will not be taken unless their parents are patients at the surgery and agree to Denplan. I believe that this can cost between £10-£30 per person per month . . . I contacted NHS direct for advice and to try and locate an NHS dentist but was told the nearest ones are Sandwich, Canterbury and Hadlow.

I have Multiple Sclerosis and I am currently having a relapse. This therefore means I am off work. Because of the nature of this illness I cannot predict the recovery period. I am unable to drive at present due to my illness and therefore trying to access a dentist some considerable mileage away is impossible.

My concern is for my children. I have dutifully taken them to the dentist on a regular basis and I want to continue this, to encourage them to look after their teeth . . . I feel desperately upset that I am unable to provide my family with a dentist that will look after us on a regular basis without it costing approx £50 a month/ £600 per year."

I am sure that such letters will be familiar throughout the country.

I make a plea to the Minister to see Ashford as a special case precisely because the Government designate it as an area of fast population growth. Already, under the Deputy Prime Minister's sustainable communities plan, 800 new houses a year are being built in Ashford, and the plan is for roughly 1,000 more new houses every year for the next 25 years. We know that about 2,000 more people will be living in Ashford this time next year, and not one of them will be able to find an NHS dentist in the town. For the people of Ashford, easy access to NHS dentistry is a mirage. I know that the Minister will not find that acceptable, so I ask her to suggest to the strategic health authority that the allocation of resources in Kent and Medway this year and in the years ahead needs to reflect an urgent crisis, which will become more acute in years to come.

In my survey of the local situation, I mentioned the new dental contract. The contract negotiations provide the link to the wider national picture. This debate is particularly timely after Monday's announcement of yet another delay in the introduction of the new contract. The Minister will be aware of how frustrated dentists are, and that that frustration and uncertainty have already been reflected in the number of dentists leaving the NHS.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, and for enabling us to have this debate. Is he aware that the British Dental Association has welcomed the latest delay?

Mr. Green: I am aware that the British Dental Association said that it thought that the situation is entirely unsatisfactory, which is why the talks broke down in December. The association obviously welcomes the fact that the delay has been introduced. However, the proof of the pudding will be in the eating when it comes to whether serious talks can start that resolve the many frustrations that have caused dentists to become so unhappy. Last July the report of the primary care dental work force, the latest work force review, said that in 2003 there was a shortage of 1,850 dentists in England alone, and predicted that by 2011 that shortage is likely to more than double to between 3,640 and 5,100.

The Government have taken notice of that survey and have announced a plan to recruit 1,000 extra whole-time equivalent dentists by October this year through a number of measures, which I am sure the Minister will address at the end of the debate. However, we need to put that in context as a problem that affects different parts of the population in different ways. It is the most vulnerable communities that are least likely to have decent access to NHS dentistry, and the community dental service is worse off in terms of vacancies. The BDA has reported that 10 per cent. of posts in the community dental service are vacant, and the average time that those posts remain vacant is 12 months. Clearly that is a worrying situation.

It is also clear that many dentists' frustration is deep-seated. Research carried out towards the end of last year shows that 60 per cent. of high street dentists will either reduce their NHS commitment or quit the NHS altogether. Only 2 per cent. of high street dentists said that they would increase their NHS work on the back of the Government's proposals, while 16 per cent. said that they would stop providing NHS dentistry altogether. Those are worrying findings. To revert to the point made by the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) about what is actually happening, I think that the latest figures for those leaving NHS dentistry show a worrying trend.

The figures obviously have to be taken with some caveats because the vast majority of dentists do some private work and some NHS work, but the best guess seems to be that in 2003 about 250 dentists left the NHS, and in 2004 that number increased to more than 300. If we take those figures alone, the Government's plan for an extra 1,000 dentists has to be put into context—more than 500 have left the NHS over the past two years. One of my fears about the Government's proposals to address the crisis is that they are simply pouring water into a bucket that has a large hole in it. Dentists are already leaving in such large numbers that the extra 1,000, even if they can be recruited, will be swallowed up far too quickly.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that exactly the problem that he describes is becoming acute in places such as mid-Wales, where almost no NHS dental provision is available to a large proportion of the population? Does he agree that in the long term that will probably cost us more because minor dental ailments will become crises and emergencies, which necessarily cost a great deal more? There is a serious resource issue, which probably will involve higher costs if we do not resolve it in the short term.

Mr. Green: I am sure that that is right. I should make it clear that the idea behind the contract reforms of making dentistry less a problem-solving profession and more a preventive profession seems entirely sensible. The practical effect may be precisely what the hon. Gentleman has just described. I am grateful to him for mentioning mid-Wales because the situation is clearly patchy around the country. I have been struck by the e-mails, letters and phone calls that I have received from different part of the country since this debate was announced. The first came from west Wales and the constituency of Preseli Pembrokeshire where every dentist has now pulled out of the NHS. In an area of high deprivation, in an objective 1 zone, it is no longer possible for an adult to access NHS dentistry.

The NHS Direct advice line is referring people in Pembrokeshire to a dentist in Port Talbot as their nearest NHS dentist, which is 60 miles away. NHS Direct fails to mention that the dentist there is refusing to see anyone from outside his area. Even if they wanted to travel 60 miles, the dentist would not help them. Just before Christmas the local health board brought in some extra provision, but that left 40 people who wanted emergency dental treatment queuing for three hours from 7 am at a special clinic, only to be told that the dentist being brought in was in Ireland and had forgotten that he was supposed to be working that day. That is a terrifying snapshot of what is going wrong.

There are similar tales from other parts of the country. In Portsmouth, people make on average 22 calls before they can talk to anyone about the possibility of dental treatment.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning Portsmouth. According to the first letter that I received about a dentist going private, my local PCT, Fareham and Gosport, was telling people to go to Portsmouth, Gosport or Lee-on-the-Solent for an NHS dentist. The NHS Direct website today tells them to go to Eastleigh, some 26 miles away. That shows the acuteness of the problem in south-east Hampshire.

Mr. Green: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for expanding my point. Moving further west again, the chairman of the Cornwall local dental committee says that dentists there are already working like machines. Dentists will not put up with the extra work that the contract will impose on them and growing numbers will go private. About 200,000 adults in Cornwall are not registered with a dentist. That is half Cornwall's adult population.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): The real principle behind the new contract is whether we should move from the old system of payment for each individual item of treatment, which encourages over-treatment, to a system where dentists seek to promote good oral health for their patients. Surely that is the right way to go and the Government are right to seek to change the contracts. Are not the minority of dentists who resist that wrong?

Mr. Green: As I said, I think that the principle is perfectly sensible. The problem is that there is a huge gap between the rhetoric and the practical reality. The change clearly has not and is not being made in a way that dentists find acceptable. That is why the situation that I am describing, with help from all parts of the House, has come about.

My last port of call is the north-west and a letter from Mr. Tariq Drabu, the chairman of the Bury and Rochdale local dental committee, in response to the Department of Health's chief dental officer, who wrote in The Daily Telegraph about the plan for an extra 1,000 dentists. Mr. Drabu challenged Professor Bedi's statement, saying that he had "spun and stretched the truth somewhat regarding recruitment of dentists. Yes there will be the equivalent of an extra 170 places per year starting this year and by 2010, 5 years intake will either have been trained or be in training—but by 2010 there will still only be an extra 170 qualified dentists in the system. Add to that the fact that 50 per cent. plus of those will not be whole time equivalents—so in truth by 2010 we are looking at perhaps another 80–100 extra dentists for a population of 60 million not the headline figure of 850 as claimed.

Neither I nor any of my colleagues locally have seen any incentives whatsoever from the government to encourage dentists in private practice to increase their NHS commitment which is completely at odds with what Professor Bedi says. This in spite of the fact that it has been impossible to access an NHS dentist in Rochdale for the past 12 months."

As regards international recruitment we are recruiting from countries who have a worse oral health record than ourselves, where dentists are far more needed. It is a desperate sticking plaster solution to a gaping open wound and until the government seriously addresses the issues of quality care for NHS dental patients and improving working lives for NHS dentists and their teams rather than just being obsessed with access, the problems for NHS dentistry will only get worse."

The point about foreign imports is a good one. They are clearly one solution to the problem, but I confess that I feel slightly uncomfortable about the idea of this country trawling the world to attract dentists, for instance from India, where the ratio of dentists to the general population is 1:36,000. I appreciate all the pressures that are on Ministers, but I hope that the Minister agrees that the idea of this country scouring countries that are significantly poorer than the UK for medical staff makes one feel slightly uncomfortable.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): I hesitate to speak anecdotally, but I suspect that the import of dentists from elsewhere is not new. I recollect that when I was taking my own children, who are now young adults, to the dentist, almost every dentist appeared to be from New Zealand. I think that that was because the New Zealand Government had instituted an extremely good preventive health programme, so there was not anywhere near the level of dental caries in New Zealand that would be required to keep all its dentists going, so some came to this country. Given the age of my children, that was happening under a Tory Government.

Mr. Green: The issue is not new, and I can safely say from where I stand that this country has been significantly enriched by the import of New Zealand dentists. As I said, I fully appreciate the pressures on Ministers, but recruiting vital medical staff from countries that are at a much lower level of economic development than we are makes me uncomfortable.

Hugh Bayley: Is the hon. Gentleman arguing against the freedom of dental staff to emigrate and practise in other countries? Would he block British dentists from going to work in the United States, which is a richer country than ours? Does he believe that Poland, Spain or Germany should prevent their dentists from coming to work in this country?

Mr. Green: No, I believe in the free movement of labour and that individuals in all countries should be allowed to work anywhere. That said, I feel uncomfortable about this country, as a rich, developed country, having to solve its recruitment problems by attracting medical staff from countries where they may be even more desperately needed than they are here. That is not an economic but a moral point. Nor is it a partisan point; I agree with the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) that foreign recruitment has been happening for a long time. However, it should make us uncomfortable that that appears to be the routine way in which we attempt to solve problems in all parts of the health service, not just the dental service.

All these problems are happening against what is already a difficult background. A National Audit Office report of last November made pretty stark reading, especially in conjunction with the latest adult dental health survey, which showed that the average Briton has lost eight of his 32 adult teeth by the time he turns 45, and that 44 to 45 per cent. of the population are registered with a dentist. Those figures should worry us.

The NAO asked the right question: will the new contract stem the flow of dentists out of the NHS? So far, the answer has been a clear no. If the situation is not reversed as a matter of great urgency, the crisis, currently patchy, will become universal. I do not underestimate the scale of the problem that the Minister faces. I hope that she can give me some reassurance about the special difficulties in my constituency, and that the uncertainty clouding the future of NHS dentistry can be lifted soon. If it cannot, dental health in this country will become an area of embarrassing national failure. All of us would regret that.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Those hon. Members who catch my eye might care to be aware that the Front Bench contributions must start not later than 10.30 am.

9.51 am

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): It will come as no surprise that I intend to draw to the Minister's attention the deficiencies of the dental service in my constituency. However, I also want to talk about the improvements that have started to happen and to touch on the importance of prevention as well as treatment.

The situation in Milton Keynes, so far as I can tell, is that only one dental surgery in the Milton Keynes primary care trust area is accepting new NHS adult patients, and only a small proportion of surgeries are registering children aged 0 to 18 for NHS treatment. Like the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green), I represent an area of housing growth—it has been growing continuously for the past 20 years—which causes problems in that we are continually trying to fill up the bath with the plug out. That adds to our problems as an area of population growth, although we do not have a population that is significantly less healthy than the average for England and Wales.

The story of a constituent in Bletchley highlights a particular problem. He was trying to get new dentures and had been unable to find a dentist who could provide them. It became clear that the laboratory cost for producing dentures was about £10 more than the NHS fee. We finally managed, after a great deal of negotiation, to get him referred to a local practice that had just taken on an extra member of staff to do NHS work, so there was a good outcome to his case. However, that took a great deal of effort.

Another problem is the lack of an out-of-hours service within a 20-mile radius. My understanding is that it is impossible to get treatment after 9 o'clock in Milton Keynes, Luton, Bedford, Northampton and Oxford. That means that people tend to turn up in great pain in accident and emergency departments, and have to be given treatment simply for the pain to tide them over until they can be treated for the problem.

According to my PCT, one of its difficulties, apart from the general shortage of dentists and the fact that more and more have withdrawn from NHS work, is that Milton Keynes, thanks to our Government's stupendous care of the economy, has a hugely dynamic local economy, but that has a negative side as well as a positive one. The negative side is that there are many other employment opportunities, not so much for dentists but for all the other staff whom dentists need to provide a service. In our local employment market, it is difficult to recruit those ancillary staff and retain them.

An additional problem is the high cost of housing in our area, which means that people employed in the public service who would be paid the same wherever they lived in the country find it difficult to move to jobs in Milton Keynes because their effective salary is lower. I ask the Minister to consider that issue, which affects not only the dental services, but the NHS generally. Key worker housing has been made available in Milton Keynes and is helping to deal with the problem, but I ask the Government to keep the situation under review.

From what the hon. Member for Ashford was saying, the situation in Milton Keynes seems to be better, or slightly less worse depending on which way one looks at it, than in his constituency. I am certainly not saying that my constituents have particular and intense problems, but they are suffering like others across the country from general problems affecting the dental service.

Measures have been taken and are starting to improve the situation. There has been a combination of increased Government funding and new innovative ways of delivering the service. I am pleased to have heard recently that the Milton Keynes PCT received Government funding to create 9,000 new NHS registrations. That process is just starting, but I would be grateful if the Minister confirmed the time scale for those new registrations, and what action the strategic health authority will take to monitor progress and ensure that there is no slippage on the delivery of them.

A number of NHS dental access centres have been created in Milton Keynes, which have been extremely helpful in supplementing the normal—if I may describe it that way—conventional dentistry service and enabling people to gain access to dental services when necessary. As well as providing routine care, those centres provide specialist care for priority groups who cannot get to dentists and act as specialist treatment centres for patients referred by other health professionals. Are dental access centres intended as a permanent supplement to the conventional dental service, or are they a stop-gap measure to tide us over during the continuing dental shortages?

A third improvement, which has not yet happened but has been announced, is in the north of my constituency in Wolverton. It is an area of deprivation but a significant amount of extra housing is planned as part of the expansion of Milton Keynes. In November, the Government announced £5 million of funding for a new one-stop primary care centre, including dental health services, in Wolverton to care for the current and expected population. I commend such super-health centres, which provide a much wider range of health services than the conventional GP surgery, bring GP and dental health services together, and will also carry out a number of minor operative procedures currently carried out in hospitals. Plans for another such centre in the further growth area on the western side of the city are being consulted on. I commend those initiatives and hope that the Government will monitor their progress when they open so that they can modify how health services are provided if there are lessons to be learned.

On prevention, as in other areas of health, it is important to encourage people to improve dental health so that the need for dental care is reduced. I alluded in my intervention to my children and the influx of dentists from New Zealand, one of whom told me of the effectiveness of fluoridation there, which had drastically reduced the level of dental caries in children, leading to an oversupply of dentists. That is a very happy experience, which I am pleased we are finally building on in this country.

The amendment to the Water Act 2003 requires water companies to increase the concentration of fluoride in water supplies when the strategic health authority requires it. The evidence in favour of fluoridation is extremely strong. It is particularly important for children in deprived areas whose dental health is much poorer than that of children in better-off families. The fluoridation measures will have the greatest effect in improving the dental health of those children in disadvantaged areas. It is important that we continue to point out to parents and to the population at large the health burden of poor dental health, the problems that occur and the need to build good dental health in children. Good dental health will follow children into adult life. It is very difficult to repair in adults the damage done to dental health by a poor diet in childhood.

I wanted to stress the importance of ensuring that fluoridation is extended, but there are other steps that children and adults can take to improve their dental health. It is important to stress the importance of a balanced diet, the need to reduce the sugar level in foods, which has obvious implications for the labelling of foods to ensure that parents and other adults can choose foods with lower sugar levels for themselves, and the importance of reducing the use by parents of fizzy and sugary drinks for children. Parents and children should be encouraged to drink water or milk rather than drinks with high sugar levels that will lead inevitably to poor dental health.

Finally, it is important to encourage people to give up smoking, not only for the more obvious reason that it reduces heart disease and cancer, but because of the effect of smoking on oral health. Smoking discolours teeth and increases the risk of mouth cancer.

For all those reasons, and despite the primary focus of the debate being on the difficulties of gaining access to dental care, I hope that the Minister will not lose sight of the importance of continuing to stress preventive health measures that will reduce the need for people to seek dental care in the first place and immeasurably improve their health.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It would be interesting to hear the views of New Zealand dentists.

10.3 am

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): You have declared my interest for me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, although it is a little more than that. I have an NHS number and I am a practising dentist, although an extremely part-time one. If someone has toothache on Sundays, there is a chance that they can see me. I am also a member of the British Dental Association, and have dental experience in the NHS and a tiny bit of experience in New Zealand. The comments made by the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) on fluoride are correct, but she should also mention the school dental services for children in New Zealand, which have also made a dramatic difference.

When I first came to this country, I worked in east London, predominantly in the NHS. Even in those days, however, there was a shift towards private dental care. I also worked in south-west London in mixed practice, and spent a year in the Eastman dental hospital. I have done the rounds, which explains why I am 10 years younger than I look. I have another considerable advantage: I am not on the Opposition Front Bench. I also regularly meet dentists and dental technicians at meetings and conferences.

My constituency has exactly the same problems as the constituencies of everyone who has spoken so far and those who will follow, with perhaps the exception of the Minister, in that we have a shortage of dentists. Most people in my area have the advantage of being able to afford private dentistry, which means that those who cannot afford it have a tough time. There are pockets of quite bad deprivation.

In the past 32 years of my being here, I have been struck by the improvement in dentistry in this country. Several factors are involved, but I know that the reputation of the UK's national health dentistry is not good in other western nations. Dentists in America, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and so on warn their patients who come to this country not to take NHS dental treatment. They advise them to look for a private dentist. However, having said that, things are improving. There have been many changes, but two of the greatest are, first, fluoride in toothpaste and in water supplies—I hope that the Minister takes that seriously, as I will have questions at the end of the debate which I hope that she will be able to answer—and, secondly, the introduction of fees for patients.

The introduction of fees had a dramatic effect on standards, because patients started to take notice of what was being done. They asked the dentist why something was being done a second time when it had been done last year or the year before and so on. If they had to pay for the filling, they asked whether they could have a white one. That brought in change quite quickly, which was stimulated by magazines and the Daily Mail Femail pages—it seemed that everyone had to have a "Hollywood smile", although I should be desperately upset if we ever reached that stage. Dentists started to lift their standards, particularly in the past decade, and to examine the available equipment and materials. There has been a huge improvement in that respect, but also a huge change in costs.

When I was at the Eastman dental hospital I spent quite a bit of my time undoing botched work done on patients who came in with toothache. One of the primary areas was in endodontics—root canal treatment. In those days dental schools taught students to use Dr. Sargenti's N2. I said to the professor at Guy's, "Why are you teaching students to use that stuff, which is banned by most western nations?" He replied, "They will have to do national health dentistry and that is the only way to do it quickly." When I pointed out that it had a 60 per cent. failure rate, he just shrugged his shoulders. That was depressing, but even more depressing is that the national health dentist gets about £75 or £80 for doing molar root canal treatment, which will be reflected in the income under the new system. It should take a dentist and one or two assistants between one and one and a half hours to do the work properly, and the capital cost of the equipment—microscope, digital X-rays, fancy nickel titanium files and so on—is more than £20,000. There is also a continual heavy revenue cost because the nickel titanium files can be used only a few times or they break and have to be discarded. If they break at the end of a tooth, the dentist is worried and has to phone his protection society to make sure that he is all right.

The only way to respond to such matters would be to make a large investment. Dentists are asking for £4 billion-plus and, realistically, that is not to be expected, so the question is where we are going. At present, we are going backwards. Dentists are disappointed and upset. We have heard how they are moving out, and I assure the Minister that what they say behind the scenes is unprintable. They have had enough, and if they could get out, they would. They would go into private dentistry because there are more incentives and more opportunities for dentists to produce work that they are proud of and to respond to patients and their demands. That worries me, because although there is a need for that, as I know from my time in east London there is also a desperate need for a basic health service that is oriented towards dental health, rather than fixing things with new private cosmetic treatment.

The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West spoke about the difficulty of getting a full upper and lower denture for a constituent, the cost of which is £100, £200 or £300 from the NHS. Even privately it is not much more than that, but more exotic dentistry, such as full implant replacements, costs £40,000 or £50,000 per patient, which is out of the question. There is a definite health need, but the demand for cosmetics need not and should not be met to that degree by the NHS.

I was astonished when the Secretary of State, responding to a question from a BDA representative at a press conference on the last White Paper, announced that "dentistry was sorted". I have not heard a more incorrect statement for years. The dentists have had enough. The dentists' organisations have had enough—they have ended up walking out. Patients are finding the situation impossible. They believed that, by the end of 2001, they would have the opportunity—according to the Prime Minister—to have access to national health dental services. They probably have that access if they are prepared to drive to it, but they have to drive a long way.

[Sir Paul Beresford]

The new contract was intended to solve the problem, but there are some major problems with it. In an intervention, the hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) mentioned that there was a fee system that tended to make dentists rush more and do more—I think that "treadmill" was the word that he used. The problem is that one treadmill has gone, but we are bringing back another.

There is pressure from the Government for dentists to meet figures—they will have to meet the agreement on producing sufficient turnover for the finances that they have been promised. That will have two effects: first, it will speed up treatment but reduce the standard of treatment; secondly, it will make the dentist choose a quicker, cheaper option, particularly when laboratory costs and fees are involved. If an elderly patient comes in with a denture that they need to eat with—a genuine health need—which is linked to a key tooth that has suddenly developed an abscess, will the dentist, when he is under pressure, spend two and a half, three or four hours carrying out root-canal treatment, building up the tooth, putting a crown on it and then making a denture to attach to it? I suspect that he will be tempted to say no to that work, although I hope that he will not, and to extract the tooth, which is a poorer treatment for that patient. However, the new treadmill will induce the dentist to do that.

The idea that we will rush undergraduates into the profession and that within five, six or seven years they will all be pouring out of the dental schools to solve our problems is not on. That will not work. To begin with, we do not have the staff to deal with them.

We have also touched on the matter of overseas recruitment. In that context—a point that has not been mentioned—I have deep concern over standards. I was recently horrified to discover that the pass mark required for dentists in the UK, when they sit the international English language test system, has been lowered. Perhaps that has been done for current convenience.

I recognise that the Minister will not be able to answer all our questions today. However, I ask her to write to us all with the answers to those questions that she does not deal with. I shall pose only a few questions, but there are many more. One question that I have asked repeatedly in written form concerns when dentists and their professional organisations can expect sight of a draft base contract. There have been repeated delays. There have been responses to questions, but no answers.

Does the Minister accept that the drive to increase the number of NHS dental patients is seen as a transference from one treadmill to another, and how will she overcome that? The paper-based tick-box system of monitoring, which we as dentists anticipate, will impose pressure throughout dentistry and will, as I mentioned earlier, lead to poorer treatment. However, in the case of one or two dentists—although I do not know any of that sort—it will mean that their golf handicaps will improve.

Does the Minister recognise that the increase in demand for private dentistry with those new materials brings greater patient satisfaction, and that it is a contribution to the dental health of the nation? We think that we have a problem now, but if everyone dropped private dentistry and rushed to the NHS, the overload would be phenomenal.

Can we be assured that the new base contract and the NHS link with dentists will enable dentists to tackle health care in a mixed practice, and that there will not be pressure to cease mixed practice? I want the Minister to recognise that any restriction on private dentistry will have a bad effect on standards and cause an increase in demand on the NHS. Many dentists need that mixture because they undertake a core service on behalf of the NHS, which they are willing to do because they can top it up with the private health service. If they do not have that, many will go straight across to being private. We need to recognise that, under the contract, capital investment is welcome, meagre though it is. There needs to be more recognition that with modern dentistry with changes and the increased costs of modern equipment day-to-day revenue costs are increasing faster than inflation. I am deeply concerned that the PCTs are so overburdened and so ignorant of dentistry that it has become just a little hole-in-the corner job, of no particular interest unless there happens to be local Members—like the two we have heard from today—who will jump up and down on their necks.

Finally, as the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West mentioned, there is the vital issue of fluoridation. We took a teetering step during consideration of the Water Act 2003. Members on both sides of the House supported an amendment, but we are still waiting for the regulations. Can the Minister hurry up the process and tell us when the regulations can be implemented? I am a dentist who, in my tiny part-time work, engages almost entirely in private dentistry. However, NHS dentistry is an important part of the health of this nation. It is oral health against oral cancer, as was mentioned, and agonising toothache with the pain which that gives not only to those suffering from it, but to the employers and the economy of this country.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) on introducing a very important debate. I will try to speak briefly, as I had the opportunity of speaking in a debate in May 2004 on dental provision in Devon. I do not propose to go over the issues I raised then, describing how our part of the country is one of the hot spots where some problems emerged early. In that debate, other hon. Members and I raised issues to do with the supply of dentists in Plymouth and the wider dental health community in Devon and, indeed, Cornwall. In particular, we were concerned about the importance and future security of the vocational dental health service. That plays a significant role in providing dental care, especially in the poorer areas of my constituency. We talked of the need to establish dental training, at least as an outpost of Bristol—the nearest dental school to Devon and Cornwall—because, as with medical care, dentists tend to go into practice where they were in training, and, vice versa, more people come into training in such a locality. That has certainly been found to be the case with the new Peninsula medical school.

We also talked a lot of the expectation that we might be able to recruit dentists, particularly from within the EU. If the hon. Gentleman feels uncomfortable about that recruitment, I hope the Minister will be able to offer some reassurances. I certainly think from what I know of the progress that has been made that there is no need to feel uncomfortable. I look forward to my hon. Friend's comments, but the hon. Gentleman, and perhaps other hon. Members, should reflect on the fact that the haemorrhage of dentists from the NHS has been going on since the early 1990s, when a deeply unpopular contract was introduced. Indeed, two medical schools also closed then. I will not dwell on that particular political point, but is important to make it, and I urge the Minister to continue to give serious consideration to the training of new dentists, particularly in our part of the south-west peninsula.

I know that there has been progress and look forward to what the Minister has to say about that. Like most hon. Members, I am in regular contact with my local PCT, and have been over a range of recruitment issues since that earlier debate. I thank her Department for its speedy attention, helping us in trying to resolve some issues in finding new ways forward. Plymouth primary care trust is continuing to work hard to stabilise the situation and plan ahead. Some dentists have entered into early contracts. We were an "Options for Change" field site and those contracts appear to be working successfully. Plymouth primary care trust continues to try to maintain those dentists working in the NHS and to improve access where possible, bringing them back into personal dental service local contracts. I hope that the Minister, in responding to the questions raised, will say what the Department is doing to ensure that PCTs such as Plymouth can build with confidence on what they have already achieved. For that, it needs a PCT budget for dentistry and clear guidance, with swift clarification on contracts where such guidance is unclear.

I want to illustrate the point briefly in relation to a practice of five dentists in my constituency, where there seems to be some lack of clarity over both the ability to enter into individual contracts and the need to do so. The point was highlighted by a somewhat frustrated dentist who wrote to me:

"The contract is to run for three years. Both my wife and myself will have retired before the end of this period. None of the other three dentists would be prepared to accept responsibility."

One of the dentists is even likely to return to his own country. The dentist continued:

"It would seem that we are being pushed into the private sector"

by the inability to come to a conclusion over individual contracts. I hope that that can be resolved.

Finally, I want to comment on one or two points arising from the Plymouth city council scrutiny committee. All last year it worked alone and with other scrutiny committees in Devon and Cornwall to try to bring some sense to the difficult situation in the far south-west, of which I know the Minister is aware. A copy of the scrutiny report has been sent to her and I hope that she will pay particular attention to its recommendations about children.

The report recommends conducting a national review of dental health care for children and not giving practitioners of NHS dentistry an automatic right to deregister an NHS child patient, although I do not know whether that is practical, because they are individual contractors and business people. Also, as the hon. Member for Ashford said, children who have been registered with an NHS dental practitioner should be permitted to remain on that practitioner's list, irrespective of whether their parents have registered as private patients following a change in practice by that dentist.

Finally, the report also recommends establishing a south-west peninsula school of dentistry, as part of our new Peninsula medical school, which is establishing such first-class representation in other medical fields.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): I will not pretend that the problem can be laid entirely at the Government's door. I remember debating the very same point under the Major Administration with the then Secretary of State for Wales, the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood). In a debate in 1993, he agreed to provide a grant for Welsh dentists to set up in NHS practices, which partly alleviated the problem. However, I live in one of the most rural parts of Wales. My constituency is 100 miles north to south and 100 miles east to west, but we have only two NHS dentists in the entire area. The out-of-hours emergency provision is two hours on a Sunday morning and a 150-mile round-trip a three-hour drive which is absolutely third-world stuff.

A proud elderly lady from Bala came to see me recently and said that she had to see her GP more often because her oral health was suffering owing to the fact that she cannot access reasonable treatment. We face a crisis. I have a list from the Gwynedd local health board of 30 dentists in the county, 29 of whom will not accept adults on the NHS and one of whom will do so from April 2005. The situation is extremely disturbing.

There is of course an uneven distribution of dentists. Many dentists have told me that students often train in dental schools and then get attached to urban practices, where high-paid cosmetic work is undertaken. They are attracted to that work rather than to rural areas. There is no doubt that it is placing considerable pressure on GPs. As I mentioned, the lady from Bala gave such evidence. As has been said, dentists are frustrated by the lack of time available to spend with patients to offer proper preventive advice. None of this is new; it has been happening for some 10 years, but it is now even more urgent that something be done.

The Prime Minister promised at the 1999 Labour party conference that anybody wishing to access NHS dental provision would be able to do so by 2001. However, the position in Wales is probably far worse than in 1999. Overall, there are 0.36 NHS dentists per 1,000 population in Wales, according to a study undertaken by Bath university that was published in May 2004. That compares, for example, with 0.6 in the Czech Republic, 0.7 in Belgium and Germany and 0.8 in Norway—so we are lagging behind. Worse still, only 46 per cent. of adults in Wales are registered with an NHS dentist, and that figure has not improved since 2000. As was recently acknowledged by the Minister responsible in the Welsh Assembly, that figure has remained constant, with 40 per cent. of children in Wales not registered with an NHS dentist. The overall result, according to the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, is that five-year-olds in Wales have, on average, twice as many missing, decayed or filled teeth as youngsters in the west midlands or south-east England. That is a serious position and, obviously, something needs to be done.

The report of the Select Committee on Health in 2001 said:

"We consider that dentistry has never been fully integrated into the NHS and as a result, major health inequalities exist. We believe that the present arrangements for accessing NHS dentistry are inequitable, uncertain and getting worse; patients do not know where they stand. Unregistered patients find it hard to get any form of care. Registered patients can lose that status without redress and often without knowing that they have done so."

It went on to say:

"Certain very vulnerable groups of patients, such as elderly people and those with dementia, face particular problems."

It is far worse in rural areas. Perhaps the Minister will consider the fact that the Ceredigion local health board is offering bursaries of £12,000 for students who train in dentistry and come back to practise in the Ceredigion area for five years after graduation. I do not know whether that scheme commends itself to her, but it might be a way of dealing with the problem.

I fully appreciate that there is no single answer, but I have spoken recently with several dentists about the subject. One in my constituency, Dr. John Swain of Dolgellau, told me that the position is far worse in rural areas, as we know, but that one of the problems is that smaller practices need financial assistance to take in trainees. That might also assist. I have spoken with the Secretary of State for Wales, also the Leader of the House, who thinks that that is a good idea, so I ask the Minister to take it further. If the right hon. Gentleman has not spoken with her, would she be prepared to discuss it with him? I have tried to be as brief as possible in the light of the time constraints, and I am grateful for this opportunity to raise this important matter.

10.29 am

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): I shall be brief. Most dentists are happy to work for the NHS if they can do so with reasonable terms and conditions, and most patients are not really too concerned with the detail. As virtually every speaker has said, they simply want the access. During periods of uncertainty, dentists are open to approaches from private groups, which pursue them with somewhat predatory zeal. Once they are signed up, they turn their ruthless marketing on to the patients. At least two of my constituents say that they were told in the surgery by Denplan salesmen that unless they signed up at once, they would find that not one dentist in Greater Nottingham was taking on NHS patients. That is, frankly, a fat lie. It is therefore important that dentists who are keen to stay with the NHS should be able to negotiate their arrangements as quickly as possible. I have been corresponding with the Minister on behalf of my constituent Andrew Keetley. In the last exchange I said that discussions with him were continuing, but he says that he has not heard anything for quite a long time. I appreciate that not every application can be granted or considered, but it would be good if those matters could be brought to a conclusion as quickly as possible.

10.30 am

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) on securing the debate. It is useful for the House periodically to review progress on the issue. The progress has been rather depressing; the figures suggest that it is still in reverse rather than going forward. I want to comment on two or three points that have been raised in the debate, which is timely in view of the written statement that was made on Monday, with its remarkable closing words:

"The changes which we have been making to NHS dentistry are proving to be very successful as evidenced by the high level of interest among dentists in moving to new ways of working."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 10 January 2005; Vol. 429, c. 8WS.]

Surely the best measure of how the Government are doing is the number of people with access to an NHS dentist.

Reference has been made to the Prime Minister's promise of 1999. Back in 1997, 51.8 per cent. of adults were registered with an NHS dentist. According to new figures that I obtained from a written answer in December, the figure for 2004 had fallen to 38.8 per cent. The number of children registered has fallen alarmingly from 65.7 per cent. in 1997 to 54.6 per cent. in 2004. The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) referred to the aspiration—I think that that is how it must be described at the moment—of 9,000 new NHS registrations. On the basis of answers that I have received, I would suggest that only one in five NHS dentists is registering children at the moment, and that only 14 per cent. are registering charge-exempt adults.

The most vulnerable are struggling to find an NHS dentist anywhere with a book that is open and to which they can be added. In my constituency, I found from a survey that I undertook last year that 30 of the 69 practices were not taking NHS work. Some people might uncharitably claim that the Government's two-pillar approach to dental reform—the local commissioning of dental services by primary care trusts and the new contract—is fundamentally undermined by what the Government said in their written statement on Monday; they might say that those pillars are crumbling.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that part of the problem is the extent to which dentists have ceased to believe that the British Dental Association speaks for them? Dentists in my area feel that the negotiations are problematic because of uncertainty about whether they are truly represented.

Mr. Burstow: I am not here to speak for the BDA, which will speak for itself. I am sure that dentists will make representations through hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew).

Hugh Bayley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Burstow: No. I am trying to make progress in a very short time, and the hon. Gentleman has made several interventions.

The PCTs were found by the National Audit Office to have had little experience of high street dentistry, as the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) said. They are already absorbing a huge agenda of change, not least of which is the GP contract. Monday's written statement explained that the delay is needed to give PCTs the time to prepare for their new role. It also explained that a longer lead-in time is necessary to allow public consultation on key aspects of the matter, and so that the parliamentary process can be fully observed.

How on earth can we be presented with a statement at the beginning of this year telling us that the parliamentary process needs fully to be observed? Why was the Department unaware of the need to do that when it was programming the implementation of the reform years ago? Why on earth has the Department only now woken up to the fact that the National Audit Office warns that PCTs are not ready? Why did it not make its own assessment and reach the same conclusion, so that it could have put in place the measures to provide PCTs with the necessary capacity?

The dental work force review was commissioned by the Department in July 2001, and was the first since 1987—it was very welcome for that reason—but it was not published until July 2004. It had sat in the Department from autumn 2003. We have heard that shortages of up to 5,100 dentists are forecast for 2011 and that the number going through training in the next few years will not fill the gap. Surely, that will necessitate substantial overseas recruitment, and regardless of whether one supports the idea of open access and the free movement of labour, there must be serious questions about safeguarding the ethics of overseas recruitment to ensure that we do not poach resources from countries that can ill afford to lose them.

The hon. Member for Ashford referred to NHS Direct, and it is worth noting that calls to it about dental matters have increased by 77 per cent. over the past two years, against an overall increase in calls of 10 per cent. So, there is a huge underlying problem, with people failing to gain access to NHS dentistry services and seeking emergency access.

The second pillar is the new contract. We need the details of that contract, and it would be helpful if the Minister said when they will be shared with those in the BDA, with whom the Government are negotiating, so that things can begin to move forward.

Will the Minister also say something about how the new charging regime will interact? There is a question about the extent to which it will generate a financial shortfall in funding for NHS dentistry. Given that the NHS health economy has a £500 million deficit, which is growing, according to the Health Service Journal, how will that shortfall be met?

The hon. Members for Milton Keynes, South-West and for Mole Valley referred eloquently to prevention, and the absence of a reference to it in the White Paper on public health gives cause for concern. I hope that the Minister can clear up an issue arising from the written statement. It would be useful if she clarified the Government's attitude and intentions towards the National Institute for Clinical Excellence guidance on the call-up for checks by saying when they will be rolled out and implemented.

There is no magic solution to fixing NHS dentistry. The current direction of travel—local commissioning through PCTs, provided that they have the necessary capacity and skills, the long overdue reconstruction of the work force, and the new contract, which will, I hope, move us to a system that is about prevention, not drill and fill—has to be the right way forward.

The question, however, is whether the Government have prosecuted things in an aggressive way that shows that they recognise that there is a serious problem. I do not think that they have, in their eight years in office, prosecuted the reform and improvement of NHS dentistry with anything like the pace that was necessary. That is why things have become worse over the past few years, not better. Indeed, that is why I fear that they will get much worse and why, for some years to come, many of our constituents will continue to suffer the anxiety of being unable to find an NHS dentist. Although the Government inherited a very poor legacy from the Conservatives, they have not done enough to put things right.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) on his success in securing this timely debate. At the heart of it lies the famous pledge made at the Labour party conference in September 1999 that everybody who wanted it would have access to NHS dentistry within two years. I think that the Chancellor would bear testimony to the fact that one should not necessarily take prime ministerial pledges at face value, but we were perhaps entitled to expect that we would have something rather different from what we have now. Although dental access centres provide theoretical access, we have heard ample testimony today to the fact that most of our constituents have great difficulty accessing NHS dental care.

Mr. Hoban: Is my hon. Friend aware of the recent survey that indicated that only 40 dentists in Hampshire, Dorset and the Isle of Wight are taking on new adult NHS patients? No wonder people feel angry and bitter that the Prime Minister's pledge has been broken.

Dr. Murrison: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I used to be a dental patient in Hampshire, and his comments come as no great surprise. They will, of course, be reflected throughout the country.

The proportion of adults registered with a dentist has steadily fallen from 55 per cent. to 46 per cent. today. There might be some dispute about those figures, and I have heard different ones bandied about, but I believe that those are the official figures. However, we can all agree that things are bad and getting worse. Worse still, dentists are leaving the NHS in droves so the debate is timely.

Hugh Bayley: I agree. There are big problems in my area. However, does the hon. Gentleman not agree that there are things that we can do in our localities to make things better? I convened a meeting of the strategic health authority, the primary care trust and the local dental committee in York. As a result, we have got through personal dental services contracts for seven practices, which will take on an additional 5,000 patients, and we have established an open-access urgent treatment centre. There are problems in my neighbourhood, but if we work with our local health bodies we can get them to address such problems, using the tools that the Government are making available.

Dr. Murrison: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention. From what he has said, the picture in his constituency seems to be somewhat better than that in mine. In my constituency—I suspect that it is typical—the PCT that is being encouraged to run such things is struggling. I believe that it will continue to do so, for reasons that I shall explain. Can the Minister tell us why, according to Monday's announcement, the Cayton report will not be given a full airing until the summer? I shall be grateful if the hon. Lady confirms that she has it, and I would gently suggest to her that this might be a good opportunity to share its contents, which will be crucial as we pick up the pieces of Monday's announcement.

The Consumers Association would also like to see the report. It says that the fear must be that the Government are running scared in the run-up to the election. It suspects that they want to delay publishing their proposals to set charges that are higher than the public can stomach. Others have suggested that the extraordinary delay is because the Government know that the anticipated three-banded system will not work. It will be interesting if the Minister can say which of those two possibilities is correct. We have to accept that progress since the beginning of December has been something of a dog's breakfast. We began with a very poor backdrop: the dental work force review, which was delayed by two years and published early last year.

The sorry saga has, I am sad to say, gone from bad to worse, with the most recent chronology going something like this: on 7 December, hours after the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), confirmed at the Dispatch Box that arrangements on dentistry were proceeding on time, the British Dental Association walked out of contract negotiations. Lester Ellman, chair of the BDA general practice committee, said:

"We have been proactive in our discussions with the Department of Health but the traffic has been almost entirely one way. To continue would be to devalue NHS dentistry, and to let down the dentists we represent."

Earlier that day, the Minister had told us, in a fairly upbeat way:

"Preparations for the most far-reaching reforms of NHS dentistry since 1948, founded on the delegation of new contractual arrangements to primary care trusts, are proceeding on time."—[Official Report, 7 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 1027.]

The following day, I raised the Minister's assurances on a point of order. On 14 December, Sir Nigel Crisp, reflecting on the BDA walk-out, told the Public Accounts Committee, surprisingly perhaps, that the association's involvement was "not absolutely crucial for us" and that

"we would not expect the timetable to slip."

Confirming that on 21 December, the Health Secretary wrote to my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley):

"I can assure you, as Rosie Winterton assured the House on 7 December, that we are on course with our programme of reform."

Yet in an official ministerial statement published on Monday, the Health Secretary announced plans to delay the introduction of the new dental contract until April 2006. Further consultation has been deferred until the summer; I have to ask the Minister why.

Cynics would say—heaven forbid—that in the intervening period we are highly likely to have a general election, and that there is, perhaps, an attempt to delay dealing with what has become an extremely difficult subject until after that general election. As others have said, it is not for want of warning. The BDA, the NAO and PCTs have indicated all along that PCTs do not have the capacity to take on responsibility for commissioning dentistry. It is hardly surprising that things now have to be delayed, and I am not surprised that, as the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) said, the BDA welcomed Monday's announcement. It has said all along that things are simply not right for PCTs to take on responsibility for dental commissioning.

Monday's ministerial statement claimed that there has been progress with recruiting dentists from overseas. We are told that the Government intend to recruit 230 dentists from Poland and that they have engaged a recruitment agency to do the job at a cost of £3.8 million, which is £16,500 per dentist going directly to the agency if my mathematics is correct. We also understand that a £10,000 golden hello will be provided to dentists from Poland who wish to work in this country.

Can the Minister offer a justification for spending £16,500 per dentist, given that EU practitioners do not need to take the international qualifying exam and could go straight on to the UK register? While she is about it, can she explain why we no longer have mutual recognition with dental schools of other Commonwealth countries? We have corresponded on this subject before, because it seems to me that there is potential for recruiting dentists in a fairly trouble free way, as we used to do.

In response to the points made by the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West, there is a real ethical difference between recruiting surplus dentists from countries such as New Zealand and recruiting them from those countries where they are desperately needed. I would be grateful if the Minister told us the true cost of the Government's recruitment exercise and how many dentists have started to work here as a result. How long will practitioners, so expensively recruited to the NHS, be tied to the NHS?

A little while ago some representatives from the Dental Laboratories Association came to see me and we had a fruitful meeting. They pointed out that in dental pilot areas their members' work had fallen by 70 per cent. Has the Minister reflected on that and drawn any conclusions? Does she, like me, suspect that one of the factors in pilot areas is that dentists are much less likely to refer expensive work to dental laboratories because of the perverse incentive that is acting there? I do not want for one moment to decry the pilots that are being carried out, but it is important to take note of concerns that have been expressed by organisations such as the DLA and ascertain whether the quality of work in those areas has fallen off as a result of the pilots.

Our consultation document, "NHS dentistry—proposals for modern oral health", is based on five pillars, not two like the Government's. They are: registration, capitation, a low-cost voluntary monthly payment scheme for non-exempt adults, oral health promotion focused on children and a greater role for the National Institute for Clinical Excellence in determining an evidence-based schedule for NHS dentistry.

Almost all the responses have been positive. One described the review as refreshing and a clear step in the right direction. Another said that the document was impressive, showed a great understanding of the issues that had allowed dentistry to be sidelined, and offered good solutions to many of the issues pertinent today. Other respondents said that they broadly supported many of the underpinning five pillars of the Conservative party's action plan, adding that the plan was cogent and well constructed.

Those positive responses give us good grounds to hope that our solutions, when they are announced very soon by those higher up the food chain, will be well received both by the profession and, more importantly, by patients. In the meantime, I hope that the Minister will use the opportunity provided by my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford to explain why the Government have given up on dentistry.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) on securing the debate. I am well aware that there are big challenges for NHS dentistry. We have seen from the number of Members on both sides of the House who are present in Westminster Hall that the matter is of concern to their constituents. I hope that I will be able to give some reassurances about the action that the Government are taking.

I take on board many of the points that have been made, but as my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) said, Conservative Members have to take some responsibility for the very unpopular contract that was introduced in the 1990s, the resulting cuts in fees and the closure of two dental schools. I do not say that we immediately have all the answers, but let us be honest about where some problems arose. That is why we are dealing with the situation today by introducing radical reforms to NHS dentistry. As hon. Members know, we have a drill-and-fill system under the current contract in which dentists are paid for the work that they do, which in a sense is invasive. The problem is that the money reverts to the centre if dentists decide to leave the NHS, and it is not possible for that money to be replaced at local level. By radically changing the system of commissioning at local level, we are enabling PCTs to carry on using their money to commission at local level rather than losing it from the area, as happens at the moment. We are backing up the changes to local commissioning with a 20 per cent. increase in the amount of money that we are investing in NHS dentistry. We are also putting massive extra resources into NHS dentistry.

Those are key changes. We are also introducing a new contract for dentistry that will enable the changes in preventive care to which my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) and the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) referred. That is exactly what dentists have been saying. They do not like the way that the contract works and want it to change so that it will reflect modern ways of working. That is why we are making the changes. Over and above that, we are also thinking about how we can introduce a new system for charges and for gathering remuneration from dentists that will make things simpler. That will not replace one treadmill with another.

The hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) talked about the report on patient charges. We are keen to ensure that we get that right, and I want to do more work on that system before we finally decide exactly how it will work. Various options are available to us, and I want to ensure that there is the least bureaucratic system for dentists and one that enables us properly to monitor public money.

So, we are spending about £368 million more on NHS dentistry in the long term. We will be training more undergraduates, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health announced recently. In the short term, we have allocated £59 million in the past year to address some real and immediate access problems. We will recruit an extra 1,000 dentists in two ways. First, we are allowing many dentists to move to the new personal dental services system. About 3,500 dentists now say that they like the new ways of working. We also have several PDS applications in the pipeline, which we want to ensure that we can process. Again, we want to give PCTs more time to move dentists over to the new system, because those dentists are voting with their feet and showing that they like the new ways of working. That gives us the opportunity to ensure that we have learned lessons from some new PDS sites when we bring in full implementation.

There are several points to make about international recruitment. First, we do not recruit dentists from countries that have no surplus of dentists and that do not want us to take dentists from them. We are making good progress. Polish dentists have begun work in the constituencies of the hon. Member for Westbury and my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton. Problems remain in my hon. Friend's constituency, but extra money has been allocated and international recruits are going into her area. I invite Members to meet some recruits from India whom I met at the Eastman dental institute, where the hon. Member for Mole Valley trained. There is a high level of expertise, and it is vital that we use it.

Changes are taking place at a local level with the extra money that we have allocated to PCTs. I met my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) and representatives of the PCTs in his area, and he is right that plans have been formulated and extra money has been allocated. I congratulate him on working closely with his PCTs to that end.

Hugh Bayley: The new PDS contract is making a big contribution in York, but the largest and longest-established NHS practice in York is concerned that a contract currently being negotiated may not be approved. Will the Minister give an assurance that any practice that wants to transfer to PDS will be able to do so and that it is just a matter of agreeing the terms?

Ms Winterton: It is certainly a matter of agreeing terms. The Department of Health has set up a support team and increased the number of people dealing with PDS applications. I will take up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer), and I can also tell my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West that 9,000 registrations are expected over a three-year period. One new dental practice is starting this spring, followed by four later this year.

In Ashford, £65,000 has been allocated to the local PCT to improve immediate access problems, and I will write to the hon. Member for Ashford about the various dental practices to which that money has been allocated. In the immediate term, there are plans for some 2,500 extra registrations.

I have addressed the points made by the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) about the new contract—discussions have taken place and will continue to take place. As I said, I shall pursue the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe, and I will pass on the comments of the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Nationally, plans to change the system of commissioning dentistry are proceeding, but at local level changes are already being made. Dentists are telling us that they like the new ways of working, and we have also made £59 million available to address some immediate problems.

To address the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West, there will always be people who do not register with a dentist, so there will always be a role for dental access centres. I am aware that colleagues, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton, continue to experience difficulties, but the field site in the south-west peninsula has provided opportunities for us to examine new ways of working, and I congratulate her local health authorities on that.

The changes will make a difference to NHS dentistry. I know that there are immediate access problems, but I hope that I have given some reassurance that we have a vision for the future and radical reform, which is backed up by a massive increase in investment in NHS dentistry, both in the short and longer terms.

Women Prisoner Suicides

11 am

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I welcome the chance to highlight the high rate of suicide among women prisoners. I first became aware of the subject when I chaired a women's Liberal Democrat meeting at conference and met a lady named Pauline Campbell, the mother of the late Sarah Campbell, who died in Styal prison on 18 January 2003. There is a certain irony in the fact that I have managed to secure this debate when the inquest into Sarah's death is being held. The more I looked into the matter, the more I realised that the high rate of suicide among women in prison is a symptom of all that is wrong with how the criminal justice system, and particularly the prison system, treats women.

The facts are simple. I am sure that the Minister is aware of them, but I will repeat them for the record. In 2003 the female prisoner population reached 4,595, but that hides the fact that more than 13,000 women were in prison that year. There were 14 female suicides in 2003 and 13 in 2004. The Home Office, for some reason, prefers to use the term "self-inflicted death". I am not sure why. I shall stick to the term "suicide".

Of course, men commit suicide as well, but while women make up just over 6 per cent. of the prison population, they account for 15 per cent. of the suicides. They also account for 45 per cent. of the incidents of self-harm in prison, which are connected to the subject of suicide. Inquest, which campaigns against deaths in custody, said that the high number of female prisoner deaths was "desperate, depressing and shameful".

It seems clear to me that different factors are having an impact on women and that the reasons for the difference in suicide rates must be investigated. It is pertinent to look at the differences between the male and female prison populations. The key difference is the type of crime committed. Women are much less likely to have committed a violent crime. Only 10 per cent. of women in prison have committed a violent crime. More than 40 per cent. of women are jailed for crimes of an acquisitive nature—theft, to the average person—and 11 per cent. are jailed for drug offences. It is thought that a high proportion of the theft offences are linked to the need to steal to fund a drug habit, but it is difficult to establish a precise figure.

The evidence shows that women in prison suffer from a number of mental health problems. Two thirds show symptoms of at least one neurotic disorder such as depression, anxiety or phobia. More than half suffer from personality disorder. That can be compared to the general population, in which less than a fifth of women suffer from those disorders. Half the women in prison are on prescribed medication such as anti-depressants or anti-psychotic medicine, and there is evidence that the use of such medication increases while in custody. As if that was not enough, studies have shown that many women in prison also have serious drug problems, and about 40 per cent. could be described as harmful or dependent users of drugs.

It is clear that we are dealing with some of the most vulnerable members of society, particularly when one bears it in mind that one in four female prisoners spent time in local authority care as a child. The problem is much wider than trying to pin blame on the Prison Service. Forty per cent. left school before the age of 16 and more than half say that they have suffered domestic violence. One in three have experienced sexual abuse.

Prior to 2003, a high proportion of female suicides were to be found among remand prisoners. According to Government figures, in 2003 there were no deaths of females on remand. However, figures from the Howard League for Penal Reform indicate one death of a remand prisoner, so I am not quite sure how the difference has arisen. Either way, that seems to be a reversal of the trend and suggests that special attention has been paid to remand prisoners, but there is no room for complacency. We also have to take into account the number of failed suicide attempts and incidents of self-harm.

The situation of women at Holloway prison was recently highlighted by The Guardian:

"Officers at Holloway prison are cutting down five women a day from nooses, the Guardian has learned, and recently saved one inmate six times in a single night."

The article goes on to describe those women as the lucky ones because they did not succeed. It also quotes Deborah Coles of Inquest:

"'We know that prisons cannot keep women safe: it is not just those who are dying, but the numbers who are self-harming and committing suicide every day.'"

Seventy per cent. of the female prisoners at Holloway are on remand. It is clear that any improvement in the death toll among female remand prisoners is a temporary blip, as the rate of attempted harm remains unacceptably high, but I hope not. I have been told that there are hopes that the situation will improve because there are plans to reduce the proportion of remand prisoners at Holloway. However, there might be a problem if more remand prisoners are dispersed around the country to units that perhaps are not quite so used to dealing with the specific problems of Holloway.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Holloway is part of my constituency and I made a lengthy visit to the prison last week to discuss the whole process. Obviously, there are tragedies in Holloway, as I am sure the hon. Lady would accept. Does she also accept that the tragedies that occur there are largely a result of sentencing policy rather than of the prison itself, that the prison has made enormous efforts to try to support the prisoners—for example by giving them access to the Samaritans helpline—and that the staff involved in these tragedies also suffer terrible traumas? I am convinced that Holloway is doing its best to care for the women there, but frankly many of them simply should not be in prison.

Sandra Gidley: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. I was not going to mention this, but perhaps I should have said that often the staff feel that they are struggling with the system too. They want to help but often cannot because of resource problems or just the sheer volume of the problem. I shall return to the sentencing point, because that is also pertinent.

It is helpful to think about how female prisoners are treated from the moment they enter jail. In fact, the system starts failing women even before they enter prison. The first point to bear in mind is that many women do not expect to find themselves in jail, because of the nature of the crime that they committed. They might not have thought that they could be put in jail for a theft, for example. A report by Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons in 2000 said that more than half of new prisoners appear not to have expected to be remanded in custody and may not have made preparations for it. Has the Minister given any thought to a system such as that which operates in the Netherlands? There, if a decision is made that a woman with children should be jailed, she is given a breathing space so that she can go home and make appropriate child care arrangements.

The "First Night in Custody" project conducted interviews with 1,400 women coming into Holloway for the first time. On analysing the data, the Revolving Doors Agency learned that 42 of the women—3 per cent.—had no idea who was looking after their children and that 19 children under 16 were looking after themselves. The former figure does not include those women who knew who was looking after their children but had not expected to be separated from them that evening.

Clearly, separation from their children is traumatic for any parent, but I believe that separation has more impact on women because they have generally spent more time with the children and have taken on the major responsibility for caring for them. I find it shocking that the Home Office does not seem to see any need to keep a record of how many children are affected. We have heard much about joined-up government, and that information should be collected even if it is only so that social services can check that all is well with what is probably a vulnerable family.

Answers to fairly recent parliamentary questions show that "for every female prisoner, there are roughly 1.5 children in the community" and that

"prior to going to prison, 60 per cent. of the female prisoners who were mothers had been looking after their children at home."—[Official Report, 5 January 2004; Vol. 416, c.16W.]

An earlier answer showed that 66 per cent. of the female prison population were mothers of children under 18 and that more than one third of the mothers had one or more children under five.

Clearly, the process is stressful, but the Prison Service seems to have ways of adding to the stress. In a debate in another place on women in prison, Baroness Gale pointed out that Holloway does not have a lock-out system. I think that that is well meaning on the part of Holloway, because it thinks that it should be able to receive prisoners at any time. However, many male prisons in the area do operate a lock-out, which means that after, say, 7 o'clock they will not receive prisoners, so men are usually dealt with first and women are frequently kept in the transport van for long periods. A new system of escorting prisoners was due to come into effect last summer, but I understand that the option of escorting female prisoners separately from male prisoners is deemed to be prohibitively expensive. Has the Minister assessed whether the new system has improved things for women?

Women arrive stressed from the impact of not expecting to be in jail and of the inefficient transport system, combined with concern for their children if they are mothers. Sadly, things do not get much better. The Prison Reform Trust report "Lacking Conviction: The rise of the women's remand population" goes into detail about what happens next:

"When women enter custody on remand they are often subject to dehumanising treatment. This is largely due to the sheer numbers of remanded women and the problems they present."

The report of Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons on Styal prison goes into detail on how women are treated on arrival. I do not have time to read it all, but the following sample will give the flavour:

"Women who have been newly sentenced or newly remanded into custody are known to be at risk of self-harm. It was therefore of great concern to find that many of the women we found sitting on the floor had been shuttling back and forth from magistrates courts and police cells for between two and four days. We talked to several of these women who had been locked out for some days. One woman was several months pregnant and another was 19. One woman aged 35 was detoxifying and concerned about her medicatiorf. They all looked exhausted and confused."

The chief inspector suggested that there is a strong link between the treatment of those women—he used the word "humiliating"—and the strong evidence that the risks of self-harm and suicide attempts are highest during the early days of custody. A later report in June 2004 found that women arriving at Styal were still lacking support and 48 per cent. of women surveyed said that they had not received any help or support from Styal within the first 24 hours of arriving. I think that that is due to the pressures of the system rather than the hard-heartedness of the staff.

It is worth picking up on the woman who was detoxifying and concerned about her medication, because it is believed that a relatively high proportion of female prisoners have a drug dependency problem. In an ideal world, the system should be able to identify those people and start providing appropriate help and support as soon as possible, but we do not live in an ideal world and I was disappointed that in response to a written question last June the Minister told me that data on the matter are not collated centrally.

The chief inspector's report on Eastwood Park in 2001 said:

"The initial services offered to women who had recently arrived and were withdrawing from substance abuse were uncoordinated and not meeting their needs."

That is of particular concern because responsibility for health in prisons is being transferred to primary care trusts. If the Home Office does not have any understanding of the scale of the problem, although I cannot believe that it does not, it will be difficult to get the PCTs to deal with the problem adequately. That is particularly so when drug rehabilitation services generally are often very difficult to access.

Eastwood Park is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), who tells me that the local PCT has real concerns that it will not receive adequate funding to deal with some complex problems that it will inherit. Any information on how the system will work and how the funding formula will be calculated will be welcome.

Even if a detox programme were able to commence, there is the added problem that women are often in jail for comparatively short periods. I do not complain about the length of the sentences, but unless services start quickly and there is some attempt to continue them when a woman leaves prison, any positive work will be negated when the woman returns home.

I mentioned the high rate of mental health problems in women's prisons. It is worth repeating that 37 per cent. say that they have attempted suicide at some time in their life. The many stories of women who have succeeded in taking their own lives highlights the fact that friends and family members have often raised concerns in the days and sometimes hours before a suicide. In January last year, the Minister was asked

"what proportion of the female prisoners who committed suicide had previously been identified as at risk through the use of the HM Prison Service form F2052SH in each of the past four years."—Official Report, House of Commons, 5 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 17W.]

The answer was staggering: all the women had been on an open F2052SH at some point during their imprisonment. In 2003, 64 per cent. were on an open form at the time of their death. In 2004, that had reduced slightly to 50 per cent., but it is still a very large proportion.

That is a damning indictment of the prison system's ability to keep its prisoners safe. It calls into question the accuracy of the review process and means that we need to examine the circumstances of the suicides and to learn from the failures of the system.

I conclude by highlighting one further area of concern: family contact. There are a small number of women's prisons, so women are more likely to be held long distances from home. Half of all women prisoners are held more than 50 miles from their home town and a quarter are more than 100 miles away. A Home Office study found that only half the women who had lived with their children or been in contact prior to imprisonment had received a visit since going to prison.

I have not painted a pretty picture. Clearly, action must be taken, and I am aware that the Government have launched their suicide strategy. However, although that is welcome, far more fundamental changes must be made. The first change relates to the point raised by the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn). We need to ensure that we jail only those women who really need to be in jail, whether that be because of the seriousness of their offence or for the protection of the public. The judiciary seems to take the attitude that it is okay to send women with children to prison for short periods without taking into consideration the wider impact on the family. If there is a will to reduce the number of women in prison—many of whom are imprisoned for relatively minor offences—the Home Office must impress the importance of those considerations on the judiciary.

Many people have called for the establishment of a women's justice board, which would address the particular needs of women in prison, and I fully support that call. We also need to ensure that there is a clear strategy for identifying the needs of women prisoners as swiftly as possible. A service is needed that is capable of dealing with child care, housing, mental health and drug rehabilitation services.

I began by mentioning Sarah Campbell. Action must be taken for her sake, for the sake of the 26 other women who committed suicide over the past two years and for the sake of all those who tried to do so and did not succeed. This problem is not a happy legacy for the Minister to take on, but I believe that he is concerned about it. I look forward to him telling me how some problems that I have highlighted will be tackled.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I congratulate the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) on raising this difficult issue. I am pleased that she has brought it to the attention of the House. I am also grateful for the contribution made to the debate by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn). I warmly acknowledge that both he and the hon. Lady have a long-standing interest in this and related issues. As the hon. Lady made clear in her opening remarks, the debate is also timely. The inquest on Sarah Campbell is taking place, and that draws our attention to this important issue.

As the Under-Secretary with responsibility for correctional services and reducing re-offending, I have many issues to consider, but none is more important than this one. The need to reduce the number of prisoners—and perhaps women prisoners in particular—who seek to take their own lives is of the highest priority.

The hon. Member for Romsey asked why we use the term "self-inflicted deaths" rather than suicide. Suicide implies intent, and we cannot always be certain that someone intended to take their own life. That is why we use the more inclusive term "self-inflicted deaths". It is not an act of political correctness, but an attempt to define the issue accurately.

Tragically, last year there were 95 apparently self-inflicted deaths in our prisons, 13 of which were those of women prisoners. The figures were broadly the same as the previous year, when there were 94 deaths overall, 14 of which were those of women. As in the previous five years, in 2004 the rate at which women in prison took their own lives exceeded the rate at which men did so. That runs counter to the trend in society as a whole, where women are less likely to take their own lives than men. Clearly, there are some unique factors at work in this situation that predispose women in prison to be more likely to self-harm and to take their own lives. We need therefore to appreciate the differences between male and female prisoners.

The hon. Lady gave the House some figures that demonstrate the vulnerability of women prisoners. It is interesting to contrast some of those figures with the figures for men. For example, we know that there is a close association between sexual abuse and self-harm by women prisoners. We have conducted interviews with prisoners who have self-harmed that show that 41 per cent. had experienced sexual abuse, compared with 18 per cent. of men. Some 44 per cent. of women on remand have attempted suicide in their lives, which compares with 27 per cent. of men on remand. About two thirds of the women who arrive in custody require clinical detoxification, as compared with just less than half of men. Those differences demonstrate the increased vulnerability of many of the women in our prisons.

All those factors have been identified as significantly increasing an individual's risk of suicide. Also, as mothers tend to be the primary carers of their children, concerns about child care arrangements, the fear of losing contact with children, the inability to plan for children as they grow up and the sheer pain of separation all add to the stress and distress that many women in prison experience.

We cannot underestimate the unique pressures that are involved in the day-to-day care and management of such a vulnerable female prison population. I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North paid tribute to the staff at Holloway prison and, indeed, staff at all of our prisons, who deal with such vulnerable people day in, day out.

Jeremy Corbyn: Has the Minister visited Holloway prison recently? If he has not, would he be prepared to go and examine the custody records, the inappropriate sentencing policies, which are not the fault of the prisons—they are the victims—and the caring approach taken by the staff, who are desperate to improve the situation of the prisoners? Will he see whether there are lessons that can be applied more widely? After all, 10 per cent. of all women prisoners are in Holloway prison and, as the hon. Member for Romsey rightly said, they are often isolated, and receive few visits and little support from outside.

Paul Goggins: I visited Holloway prison some time ago, but if there is an opportunity to do so again in the near future, I will seize it. Perhaps my hon. Friend would like to join me on that visit. We can learn many lessons from Holloway, not least about how the first night of a prisoner's stay is dealt with in such a sensitive and supportive way. We have carried those lessons across to other prisons, which is one way in which Holloway has helped to inform practice.

We are talking about the contribution that staff make. I am sure that it would interest hon. Members to know that 127 resuscitations were carried out on women prisoners in 2003 and that a further 51 were carried out in the first nine months of 2004. We are talking about people being brought back from the point of death by highly dedicated staff, to whom I pay tribute.

The hon. Member for Romsey and my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North both raised the important issue of sentencing. Over the past 10 years, the female prison population trebled. However, I am pleased to say that the female prison population today is 4,134, which is 173 fewer than on the same day last year and more than 500 fewer than the record level reached in May last year.

I hope that my hon. Friend is encouraged by the fact that sentencers are getting the clear message that short-term prison sentences for less serious, non-dangerous offenders are an ineffective way of dealing with offenders and that robust community sentences are a much more constructive alternative for women prisoners, as they are for male prisoners. Offenders are provided with the opportunity to address the causes of their offending behaviour and at the same time put something back into the community where they committed those offences. For such offenders, that is a much more constructive approach.

[Paul Goggins]

In the longer term, I hope that the women's offending reduction programme, which I launched in March last year, will help to rebalance the system and bring a sustained reduction in the women's prison population, ensuring that custody is reserved for the most serious and dangerous offenders. To achieve that, our priority will be to improve community-based services and interventions, so that they are more appropriate and accessible for women offenders. We also need to ensure that women who are sent to prison are kept safe from harm. The Prison Service is developing a suicide prevention and self-harm management strategy for women prisoners. The strategy recognises that, given the vulnerabilities and needs of women in prison, there are some areas of suicide prevention that require a gender-specific approach. The strategy does not aim at providing favoured treatment for women prisoners, but it acknowledges that treating men and women prisoners as though they are the same would not represent the best care.

The strategy is building on interventions that are already improving the care offered to women in prison. It might be helpful if I give one or two examples. Holloway and Bullwood Hall offer crisis counselling for women who self-harm. East Sutton Park has what is called a vision team, led and run by the prisoners. They help to deal with issues such as housing, employment and family matters. The first night in custody project at Holloway, which I mentioned earlier, focuses on the needs of women at the extremely vulnerable stage of initial entry to prison.

Several women's prisons, including New Hall and Morton Hall, have introduced the insiders scheme. Insiders are peer supporters selected and trained by officers to welcome new prisoners into reception, to check whether they have any immediate concerns and to share basic information with them as newly arrived prisoners. In addition, women's prisons run Samaritan-supported listeners schemes to support the more vulnerable prisoners. Holloway also runs a domestic violence programme based on cognitive behaviour therapy, which provides participants with information on how to get help and advice.

Those examples show the excellent work being done in women's prisons. However, beyond that there are high-level strategies that are having a positive impact on the care offered to women in prison. They include a strategic plan for detoxification and maintenance programmes throughout the prison estate to ensure that there is continuity of treatment between prisons and, indeed, after release—the hon. Member for Romsey emphasised the importance of that—and that women can develop ways of coping with their drug problems without feeling the need to self-harm. The hon. Lady suggested that there was difficulty in getting information about the number of detoxification programmes that are running. There should not be any difficulty, and I shall write to her with the information.

The Department of Health is providing an extra £1 million to recruit additional psychiatric nurses to add to the mental health support provided in prisons. We are developing a training pack for all staff working with women in custody to help them to understand the factors underlying self-harm and offer them practical ways of helping women in custody to cope with stressful situations.

The hon. Lady asked whether we had considered the system operating in the Netherlands, under which women are allowed to go home prior to a period of imprisonment. We have not considered that in any detail, but we have introduced a new sentence of intermittent custody, which is, I think, particularly helpful for women prisoners who have child care responsibilities. They spend part of the week in prison and part of the week at home. We have run it for almost a year and it is proving very successful. Families are helped to stay together, which includes the possibility of staying in work, but people face the appropriate punishment if they have committed a crime serious enough to warrant imprisonment.

The hon. Lady mentioned the escort arrangements for women prisoners. New contracts have been operating since last summer. Some of those arrangements are not working as well as they should be. That matter is a high priority both for the chief executive of the National Offender Management Service and for me. We shall expect improvements and I shall write to the hon. Lady in due course to report on them.

We are learning lessons all the time. The F2052SH form that the hon. Lady referred to is being superseded by a new system, which will, I think, engage prisoners and the staff around them more in their care. I assure her and my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North—and the whole House—that we are determined to make progress on the issue, and that I shall continue to give it the highest priority.

Neighbourhood Policing

2 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): I am delighted to have secured this Adjournment debate on neighbourhood policing. It is all the more welcome for being a surprise. I found out about it on Monday; I do not know whether the surprise was quite so welcome to the busy Minister, but I am delighted to see her.

I am pleased, too, to be accompanied today by my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Vernon Coaker), who has been an inspiration to colleagues in the Nottingham area by his persistent and relentless pursuit of more effective policing in his constituency and in Nottinghamshire. He has been a model in that regard, and although he is not in a position to comment today because of his duties as a Whip, I know that I would not have been as interested as I am in the issue had it not been for his assiduous work over the years.

The debate about reactive policing and pre-emptive policing has gone on for decades, and, as with all such debates, the views are often artificially polarised. The real truth, which most police officers and members of the public accept and understand, is that those two styles of policing are complementary; we cannot have one without the other. Nothing that I say by way of welcome to the Government's drive to improve neighbourhood policing, and the positive response being developed by Nottinghamshire police, should be taken as undermining the need for responsive policing and reactive policing. They are two sides of the same coin and I think that we are now finding a more appropriate balance between them.

In Nottinghamshire, the chief constable is developing a county-wide neighbourhood policing strategy with energy and intelligence, and that is reflected in the city division, of which my constituency is a part. Neighbourhood policing in my constituency needs 70,000 pairs of eyes and ears—those of my constituents, who would thus support the uniformed branches of the police rather than hiving off responsibility to them.

In the city of Nottingham, neighbourhood policy and neighbourhood policing are being developed by the police and the city council in collaboration. Genuine collaboration is the only way that what is happening can be made to work. If the effort is only police led, the full potential benefits will not be realised. The city council, as my hon. Friend the Minister will know from her visits, brings excellent experience of community involvement, through the 100-day clean-up, the blitz on graffiti and the "Respect for Nottingham" campaign.

I see neighbourhood policing as having five key components: beat officers, police community support officers, neighbourhood wardens, the community and multi-agency working. All five elements are either relatively new or are finding a refreshed role within neighbourhood policing. Teething troubles are to be expected, but there is no question but that what is happening is a real breakthrough and a new development that is settling down well. If we continue to drive it with effective management and public and Government commitment, it will make an ever more important contribution to improving law and order and public reassurance.

The first of the five elements that I identified is the beat officer. The central pillar around which neighbourhood policing must be based is the individual police constable who is responsible for a geographical area. That is the system now in place in my constituency, and I thank the chief constable, Steve Green, and the divisional commander, Chief Superintendent Les Kominiak, who, incidentally, may be retiring in the near future. I and my colleagues in the Nottingham area want to express our grateful thanks to that dedicated and determined officer, who did remarkable things in the city division in his relatively brief tenure there. Both those officers deserve commendation for their renewed commitment to the beat officer system.

I carry in my diary at all times a list of the 22 beat officers who are responsible for 22 specific areas in my constituency. That precise accountability gives ownership to the individual officer, and that provides a focal point for all other neighbourhood policing elements. Crucial to making that work is achieving the greatest stability among our beat officers. The chief police officer in my constituency, Superintendent Helen Jebb, is acutely aware of the need for as much stability as possible. I am very pleased that the police authority has approved the proposal for special payments for beat officers who stay in post for one year, followed by additional increments if they stay in post for two years, and further increments if they stay in post for a third year. I hope that the Minister will confirm later or in writing whether the Home Office has been able to approve that innovative and helpful use of the special priority payments. Regardless of the debate about whether increments are divisive, if beat officers are prepared to make a long-term commitment to a community, they must be the first in the line to receive such increments while they still exist.

I will go even further and ask the Minister whether she will re-examine the system that I saw in operation in Holland on a recent police parliamentary scheme visit. The beat officer signs a contract with the community to stay in post for five years. Perhaps the special priority payments should include an agreed minimum tenure. At the very least, each beat manager in the United Kingdom should have an engagement plan to suit their local circumstances, as is being pioneered in my constituency by Chief Inspector Simon Nickless.

The city of Nottingham divisional commander, Les Kominiak, pioneered the concept of the beat officer having a publicly known mobile telephone number. At the time, I thought that that would be counter-productive, because all sorts of phone calls would be made, but I am very happy to eat my words publicly, as the public's ability to leave messages has been not only good public relations, helping visibility and contact, but highly effective in delivering useful intelligence to the police. We are talking about not a return to Dixon of Dock Green, but the most effective hard policing to reduce the criminal elements in our society. This is not soft in any sense of the word; it is the most effective deployment of resources.

Another matter that needs to be examined nationally as well as locally is the disincentive of the shift pattern for officers who are retained on the beat. The generous six days on, four days off shift pattern for response officers must be reviewed, not only to make response officers more effective and easier to contact and to put them back under the control of local police station inspectors, but to ensure that they are retained on their patches.

The Government and the constabulary should be proposing effective personnel policies to insist that the norm will be that beat officers who leave have a proper handover period with their successors. Massive local knowledge is often lost by poor or non-existent succession policies. The beat officer must become as much of a fixture in a local community as the GP, head teacher or councillor. Consistency and stability will then have a massive consequential impact on neighbourhood police in the broadest sense.

Another area that needs a little more attention is police communication with the public. I know from my contact with constituents that not everyone has the name and mobile phone number of their local beat officer. If we provided them repeatedly through the local press, a regular newsletter or an annual "entitlement to know" enclosed with the council tax bill, people would be able not only to contact their beat officer, but to be put in touch with the whole range of neighbourhood policing and criminal justice system services.

Special constables also play an important role. Our local recruitment drive to increase numbers in the special constabulary is an attempt to encapsulate the essence of community engagement. Volunteers from our local communities are supporting their police service enthusiastically and productively, and perhaps the Minister can tell me whether there is or could be a modest payment for the hours that they put in.

The second important component of neighbourhood policing is the recent development of police community support officers. Although it is early days, it is not too wild a prediction to say that PCSOs—again, I pay tribute to the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling, who was at the forefront of campaigning for Ministers to introduce them—will be seen in a year or two as a permanent fixture in our communities, and we will be unable to imagine ever having done without them. They are one of the Government's brightest initiatives, and Ministers are to be congratulated on the vision and commitment that they have shown in putting PCSOs in place.

People like to see high-visibility public figures wearing yellow jackets. They do not necessarily know the distinction between PCSOs and the police, but we need not be ashamed of that. The more bad guys who see a uniformed presence of whatever description on the street, the happier my constituents and I will be. Indeed, in an interesting bit of joined-up thinking, there is an agreement between the divisional commander and the city council for council staff in the Nottingham city centre to wear high-profile yellow jackets. In my constituency alone there are four PCSOs at the Broxtowe station, six at the Oxclose Lane station and four on the mobile taskforce.

As regards PCSOs, I would like the Minister to continue to think about two issues. First, there is the continuing debate about what PCSOs' powers should be. I commend the gentle evolution of the PCSO in Nottinghamshire, which seems a sensible way forward. The more sensitive we can be with PCSOs, the more likely it is that they will fit well into local circumstances, which are obviously different in different places.

In Nottingham, PCSOs can do everything from policing dispersal notices to tackle antisocial behaviour and providing professional witness evidence, which is crucial in breaking the anti-witness culture that drug gangs in my constituency have developed, to using powers of arrest for half an hour until a police officer arrives to provide assistance and issuing fixed-penalty notices. The Minister must bear it in mind that we need to retain local flexibility so that we can determine what powers are appropriate and where they are deployed. That may mean fewer powers in certain circumstances and more in others.

Secondly, the greatest threat to the continuing development of PCSOs is that they might be seen as a substitute for, rather than additional to, the local beat officer. That could be the case especially if there were a squeeze on public expenditure—if the day ever dawned when another political party got into power and mismanaged the economy. If the issue is not handled sensibly, local policy could, by default, drift to PCSOs only. We would then be only one step away from response policing being run by a national police force and neighbourhood policing being run by the local authority.

There is much to commend that approach, and perhaps it should be piloted in the city of Nottingham. However, if that is the way we want to go, it should be done only as a matter of deliberate policy, not by default. I am therefore reassured by a recent letter that I received from the Minister, saying that PCSOs are additional to, not a substitute for, beat officers. However, as circumstances and perhaps even Ministers change—unless the present Minister becomes Home Secretary—we need continuity to ensure that that idea is retained, whatever the economic and political circumstances surrounding PCSOs.

The third element of neighbourhood policing is the welcome development allowing local authorities—in my case, the city of Nottingham—to employ uniformed neighbourhood wardens. So much of the low-level crime that angers and frustrates our local communities melds imperceptibly into antisocial values evident at street level, which neighbourhood wardens can combat. Having been out on patrol with neighbourhood wardens in my constituency, I know that their ability to take action across a wide range of council and community issues helps underpin the work of the other uniformed branches. They can issue on-the-spot fines for littering and intervene on issues ranging from designing out rat-runs around local estates to dog mess. Those are all very useful and positive services to which the community responds and feels is beneficial. Tying neighbourhood warden patrols into intelligence-led briefing and deployment ensures that their work is done not in isolation but in areas where communities and the other uniformed branches will benefit most.

The fourth element of neighbourhood policing—and the ultimate measure of success—is the involvement of the public. Involvement will differ between localities. Some may wish to be involved by becoming special constables, others by sitting on their tenants or residents association. In Nottingham, we have broken down the city into nine area committees, each with its own community safety group. That offers potential for participation, too.

However, I want to focus on what is in my opinion one of the most underused parts of the local scene: the neighbourhood watch. I have never been a great advocate of neighbourhood watch, but I must admit that as every day goes by it becomes more and more important that we make it relevant and renew what it needs to do. I ask the Government, through the Minister, to look again at that and to ensure that neighbourhood watch reaches a new and higher level, giving it the priority and resources that it needs.

I have asked all those who should be involved to set as an ambition the creation of a neighbourhood watch in every part of my constituency. Coverage is currently sparse, and the Government and local institutions must set out a clear strategy to make neighbourhood watch comprehensive. There is too much pass the parcel at the moment in organising neighbourhood watch. A named official must be known to the public and to the Government to make the scheme work in every constituency, town and area in the UK.

Many people in my area fear that their involvement in neighbourhood watch will lead them to be intimidated. To encourage more and more people to get involved, a fresh approach is necessary. Perhaps in the first instance there should be a neighbourhood watch club that people can join without being surfaced locally until a critical mass of a dozen or 15 people in a street can be achieved. Perhaps that could be explored as a different way to move forward on neighbourhood watch.

Although effective neighbourhood policing can do a great deal, I will continue to look across the Government and, indeed, to the Prime Minister to provide the context for the longer-term answers on crime prevention—above all making sure that youngsters grow up as social beings rather than antisocial yobs. Short-term measures to relieve the consequences of antisocial behaviour are essential, but will be little more than policy snacking if we do not address the longer-term issues. I hope that all political parties—they are all represented here today—will put the long-term development of social behaviour at the centre of their manifestos at the coming election and that whoever is elected as the Government will make the matter central to the next four or five years in British politics.

I am thinking particularly of the need for comprehensive parenting skills and of doing for social behaviour what we have done for literacy and numeracy, by putting it at the heart of the national curriculum—not referred to, not as an adjunct to it, but at the centre of the national curriculum. In that way, in areas such as mine we can undercut the attitudes that lead to such massive expense in the long term through involvement with the courts, the police, drug rehabilitation, social work, benefits—the whole panoply that follows if we do not get things right in the first few years of life and education. The new Home Secretary's recent background probably equips him more than most to acknowledge that young people who have a toolkit of social values, self-discipline and respect for others and the emotional intelligence to use them provide the most effective self-policing mechanism: a fully operational conscience.

Neighbourhood policing will be supported by the public when they understand the practical consequences of their criminal justice system. The Government—in this case Ministers in the Department for Constitutional Affairs—must pick up their responsibility in that area by ensuring that the new local criminal justice boards are empowered, resourced and then encouraged to involve systematically every tenants association, every neighbourhood watch and every area committee, so that people gain an understanding of how their criminal justice system relates to them.

The criminal justice system must be—it needs to be—returned to the public and it must stop being the private playground of lawyers and professionals. I hope that the Minister will be able to allude to that and to whether any progress has been made since I raised the matter with the Prime Minister on the Floor of the House before Christmas. If we do not activate the public, we will stand down our largest army in the war on crime. We must involve the public; they must feel that the criminal justice system and neighbourhood policing belong to them.

The last element to which I want to refer is the large number of local bodies and partnerships that have an interest in neighbourhood policing and often operate on a multi-agency basis. There are a number of examples of that. An obvious one, which has been raised many times by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell), is that of a far tighter partnership between the Crown Prosecution Service, the courts and the police so that we have an agreed strategy when deciding how to tackle antisocial behaviour with an antisocial behaviour order. That would reduce tension and ensure better understanding and communication between agencies. Equally, the embryonic antisocial behaviour teams that are being established in the City of Nottingham have a key role, not least on the former council estates that make up my constituency.

In areas of social housing, the local housing office is key. Repossession is a more potent tool even than ASBOs. The use of local knowledge and the ability to engineer better social behaviour through the lettings policy and police checks cannot be underestimated. I was up in Mansfield on a police parliamentary scheme visit, and saw the imaginative way in which the powers of traffic wardens and of PCSOs are being tied so that they combine their impact. The informal network of activity is equally important. We all remember the days when park keepers and bus drivers were the eyes and ears of a local community. That needs to be deliberately revived. Short-term savings on things such as one-person-operated buses or mobile park caretakers have long-term consequences, and we need to revive and regenerate the impact that people on the ground had in all aspects of public service.

I have just mentioned five or six examples of local bodies, and in such a situation co-ordination is absolutely vital, otherwise gaps appear, duplication occurs, things are left to someone else, or the organisational cultures either clash or sulk depending on the mood of the day. As neighbourhood policing develops, we look to the Government to make it clear and to take great care to ensure proper communication, accountability and responsibility for that co-ordination, which is so important between agencies and with the public.

[Mr. Graham Allen]

In the end, there is no substitute for a named person who is known to the local public and to the Home Office as responsible in such areas. Although the civil service may try to "Yes Minister" us out of it, I hope that the parliamentary constituency could provide the right bite-size area for such an arrangement. That would also give Members of Parliament a role and place on them an expectation to help to deliver on neighbourhood policing. I will leave that one in the air for the Minister. If all that is done effectively, we will be in the business of creating a web, a network, an infrastructure that will relentlessly tackle local crime rather than fobbing it off as somebody else's responsibility. Those are the key elements. Much progress has been made informally. The Government have set out their agenda on neighbourhood policing and lots of people are already pursuing that agenda before it formally comes into effect.

As well as that informal progress, I am delighted to be able to welcome the initiative endorsed only yesterday at the Nottingham crime and disorder reduction partnership. A proposal for two formal pilot schemes on neighbourhood policing in Nottingham was agreed, including one in my constituency, as a prelude to developing a city-wide neighbourhood policing plan. Some 20 PCSOs will be added to the present number of PCSOs and beat managers to form the core of the new teams. A named person will be in charge and the team will link to the antisocial behaviour team and the city council street scene department, with a named contact in each. The teams will be accountable to the area committee's community safety working group, which will be consulted on the task to be undertaken.

My thanks go to the Home Office for its funding of the active communities unit, which has been able to prepare the ground for effective consultation to make the scheme work properly. The pilot in my constituency is expected to be up and running next month and long-term funding will be sought in mid-2005 on the back of an agreed neighbourhood policing plan. The signs are very encouraging, but I hope that in developing the formal structures of neighbourhood policing the Minister will be careful in the following two areas.

First, connecting with the community must not result in the paralysis of over-consultation so that delivery itself is impaired. We can develop a meetings culture with too many open meetings which the same group of people attend. Delivery on the ground will inspire more people to get involved. Secondly, the pilots should be allowed to develop without being bound hand and foot by performance indicators and targets laid down from the centre, which are often insensitive to local needs and circumstances. At the beginning I hope that there will be a real desire for flexibility, so that many different styles and ways forward develop, rather than a wish to intervene too soon to ensure that particular benchmarks, which often are not that relevant to local needs, are met.

There are two minor dangers in what I think is a very welcome development from the Government in this area. The development so far reflects great credit on those who have been involved, but some key decisions are coming up. The central one for the Government is how far we can allow authority for neighbourhood policing to devolve to the localities. It is always difficult promoting a local solution that has to be driven at national level; we all battle with that contradiction in many different ways. If we can make police authorities a little more effective and representative as instruments, that will go a long way to help.

Additionally, while taking second place to no one in my admiration of the former Home Secretary, I hope that the new incumbent will understand that we will make fewer mistakes and get better and more practical outcomes if we involve practitioners and the public at every stage of developing the concept of neighbourhood policing. Whether we call it market testing or reality checking, there is no substitute for picking the brains of those most intimately involved and with the best experience.

In parliamentary terms, I hope that the Home Secretary will begin to make the fullest possible use of both pre and post-legislative scrutiny so that we can explore all the opportunities and use all the experience available to make neighbourhood policing work on the ground. This is something that Parliament, used properly, can help to bring to the party. It is too early to call neighbourhood policing an unqualified success. Equally, we should avoid presenting it, as some have presented identity cards, as a cure-all. None the less, there is no doubt in my mind or, more importantly, in the minds of my constituents, that the signs are very encouraging indeed, whether we consider neighbourhood policing a national initiative or a practical local policy. With due care and attention, neighbourhood policing, linked to the long-term measures on social behaviour that I mentioned earlier, could be the answer to tackling the culture of antisocial behaviour and volume crime that is my constituents' No. 1 priority. I wish the Government well in their efforts.

Several hon. Members rose

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. Members wishing to speak may like to bear it in mind that the Front-Bench contributions must begin no later than 3 o'clock.

2.31 pm

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): I am very glad to have such an unexpectedly early opportunity to speak. I wish that the attendance could have been better, although the number of hon. Members present might have something to do with the fact that the subject was changed late in the day. Perhaps not as many hon. Members as usual knew what was to be debated, which is a great pity. However, I congratulate the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on raising a central issue of our times.

As the hon. Gentleman said, a lot of interesting things are going on in Nottingham that we read about with great interest and approbation, even in London. He paid tribute to the local commander in Nottingham and I want to pay tribute to my local sector chief, Inspector Nick Stratford. The southern sector of Bromley coincides with my constituency. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the bite-sized area of a constituency being a good size for neighbourhood policing. My relationship with Inspector Stratford is good. I find him responsive, with his feet on the ground, and willing to commit to the idea of neighbourhood policing. I am grateful to him for all that he is doing.

I have no doubt that the more neighbourhood policing we have, the better. It is the right direction for policing to take in the 21st century. However, the one necessary criterion is that we have enough police on the ground—on the beat, visible to people, making themselves known.

I shall give an example of how that does not work in my constituency in current circumstances and how it could work. I went to a public meeting before Christmas that was attended by no fewer than 400 people. The meeting was called by the police, who were there in force. The Minister can imagine the long list of complaints that were aired, as the police explained that they thought they were doing a reasonable job, only to be told, "No you're not, because of X, Y and Z." The meeting went on for a long time and the conclusion was that we needed more police.

When the crunch came, the police had to admit that, in my constituency, quite a large area in Cray Valley—a large ward in a London borough—was being dealt with by just one beat officer. That is not all, however. I subsequently discovered that beat officer guarding the Door at the end of the main Committee Corridor when the Hunting Bill debate was interrupted and having two hours of her time wasted when she could have been down in Cray Valley doing her real job. That is an example of the problem of insufficient police officers and, particularly in London, their being extracted far too often to do pointless things in the centre of the city.

My first task as the Member of Parliament for Orpington in 1992 was to open a new police station in the Cray Valley ward, which then had about 20 officers. When the Labour party came to power, I am sorry to say that the station was closed. To be fair, however, although one beat officer covers one area, four or five cover another part, so there are probably about six or seven officers in all. The area is important, because there is a large Traveller population—the biggest in the country—and there are associated problems, as well as those that are not at all associated. People remember what happened to that police station because it happened only four or five years ago. They remember the number of officers that were there then and know how many are there today.

However, I want to encourage the Minister because I am not entirely condemnatory of there not being enough police. A police station in Biggin Hill, which is rather isolated and separate from the rest of my constituency, was closed under her Government. People were very upset about that and I held large meetings two years ago in Biggin Hill about antisocial behaviour at which all the usual complaints were raised. However, action was taken in partnership between Bromley council and the Metropolitan Police Authority, and there are now two regular beat officers and four PCSOs.

So, six people look after the ward of Biggin Hill. I am glad to say, and the Minister will be pleased to hear, that over the past 18 months there has been a total change in the atmosphere because there are now six instead of one. Even though we still do not have a police station, the local authority is talking about opening a shop with multi-service provisions, which is definitely a step forward. I assure the Minister that although there are glaring examples of neighbourhood policing not working because there are not enough police, such as in Cray Valley, it clearly does work when there are enough policemen on the beat, as in Biggin Hill.

I agree with the hon. Member for Nottingham, North that it is important that policemen become as familiar to local people as the local GPs and teachers. It may be that instead of there being one person, there are half a dozen people whom it is necessary to name in any particular ward. My constituency is a bite-size area for this concept. There are eight wards. Six or seven policemen in each ward, which is the ultimate intention, would make a huge difference. That is the case in only one ward. The others have to make do with one policeman, which is simply not enough. Local police officers can direct resources to an area, but other areas will remain uncovered and problems emerge: so they are fighting a losing battle.

The sine qua non of neighbourhood policing is that there are enough police officers on the ground to enforce it properly. I understand that the provision of the number of police in a London borough such as Bromley is the responsibility of the Metropolitan Police Authority rather than the Minister. One reason I am here today is that decisions will be announced at the end of this month about the new resource allocation formula for the whole of London. Antisocial behaviour, and everything associated with it, is as evident a problem in the leafy suburbs, such as Bromley, as it is in inner London and other inner-city areas. It is just as big an aggravation and as many people's lives can be made miserable by such everyday occurrences as in inner-city areas. Attention must be paid to the problem.

Bromley, which is the largest borough of London in population and size—my constituency is the biggest in London—has 150 fewer policemen than Lewisham and Croydon. Ironically, a constituent in Biggin Hill stood up at one of the meetings to which I referred and said that he felt safer in Lewisham than in Bromley, because in Catford, where he lived previously, he could see policemen on the beat, whereas he never saw them in Bromley until the recent change. I draw to the Minister's attention, and through her to the attention of the Metropolitan Police Authority, the fact that the leafy suburbs, particular Bromley, are not getting a fair deal under the current allocation.

People are much helped if they have the mobile phone number of their local beat officer. Beat officers who give them out are very popular. They may be in demand and inconvenienced by their mobile phone ringing, but in the case of a local hot spot it can be extremely helpful for people to have someone that they can get hold of immediately.

Another problem in the borough of Bromley, as I am sure the Minister is aware, is that the police force has the worst response rate in London. That is partly due to the size of the borough, and the few police cannot respond in time, but there is also a big communication problem in London. Changes are being made to how responses are handled, but it is so far leading to a deterioration of the situation. There are great concerns, not only about the number of police visible on the beat, but about the response times to people making emergency 999 calls. They are real problems in London, although I know that the Minister is not responding to London issues directly.

Finally, I want to mention two rather more futuristic points. First, I have concentrated on the need for more visible police on the streets, because that is fundamental. However, there also needs to be a change in the culture of the police force. In recent years, there has been an emphasis on promotion in the police force based on specialisation. Everyone wants to get off the beat and into a specialised remit, believing that that is the way to promotion within the force. On the contrary, I think that we need to go back to a generalist police force with people who are multi-tasked, and who can understand and respond to lots of different situations. In New York, for example, that was done by making the detectives responsible to the precinct captains. That was a huge demotion for the detectives and they hated it, but it meant, all of a sudden, that everybody wanted to be the person who was top dog—the precinct captain—and for their area to be the best policed neighbourhood in New York. That directed the competition in the right way and we know what results were achieved there. The Minister ought to pay some attention to that issue. It is a long-running one, which cannot be solved overnight, so perhaps it is not for her but for a future Minister. None the less, it needs attention.

Secondly, I strongly agree with the hon. Member for Nottingham, North about devolving responsibility. How far can we take localisation? The fact is that the police will pay more attention to local needs if they have to be responsive to local people. In my case, Bromley police are responsible to the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, who is in turn responsible to the Minister. They are therefore looking upwards all the time instead of downwards to the needs of their local areas. At the moment, there are too many central initiatives—they are undoubtedly relevant to some areas, but clearly not to every area—with targeted funding, which cannot be touched, and which therefore means little in terms of the money that is available to a local commander to deal with his general range of problems.

The balance between centralisation and localisation needs shifting sensitively and sensibly towards more localisation. I fully accept that that cannot be done overnight, and consequences would flow from it, such as in local authority funding. At present, roughly 75 per cent. of police funds come from central Government and 25 per cent. from local authorities. Clearly, while that is so, central Government will want a big say in how police forces use the money that they provide, so perhaps there will have to be some consequential long-term change in the funding. I accept that that is a long-term problem, but until we grasp it, we will not get the localised emphasis that is more relevant in this century.

I welcome the Minister to her job, but we need far more resources and a long-term view of the nature of policing.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on securing the debate, and I regret that the Opposition Front-Bench team was not represented for practically the whole of his speech, because he made some important points.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for not being present throughout the whole of the speech of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen). However, he was kind enough to let me have a copy of his speech, so although I was not here, I am aware of what he had prepared to say.

Mr. Dismore: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, although that is not the same as hearing it live.

The starting point to any debate on policing in London is the great success that the London Mayor has had in increasing police numbers to record levels. We now have 30,000 police in London, and the training school, which is in my constituency at Hendon, is bursting at the seams and cannot take any more. As the numbers go up, a tension is created between the number of police devoted to the safer neighbourhoods programme and the number allocated to core policing, an issue to which I shall return.

The most common concerns identified by the public are what, euphemistically and wrongly, used to be called low-level crime. In fact, they are high-profile crimes that impact on all our communities at all levels. The public are right when they complain about youth crime, antisocial behaviour, irresponsible drivers, graffiti, drug use and drug dealing and so on. The safer neighbourhoods programme in London is making a major contribution to tackling them. It is important to realise that the teams are ring-fenced, so they are not affected by aid extraction. That is a particular problem in London, because people are sent to central London to police demonstrations or to deal with terrorism.

There is no doubt that the programme has significantly reduced crime and the fear of crime. In London, the safer neighbourhoods teams have encouraged increased confidence in policing. In the first quarter during which we had them, there were 25 per cent. more calls to police in safer neighbourhoods areas. They are also having a positive impact on community cohesion. Since roll-out began, the teams have hosted more than 232 public meetings with nearly 6,000 attendants, of whom 20 per cent. were from minority communities. In safer neighbourhoods areas, robbery was reduced by 40 per cent. and criminal damage by 4 per cent. between 2003 and 2004—greater reductions than occurred in areas that did not have such teams.

Compared with the police service as a whole in London, safer neighbourhoods teams better reflect the communities that they serve. Women make up 23 per cent. of their members and people from minority backgrounds comprise 21 per cent. A work force who reflect the diversity of London inspire more confidence and trust in the police.

I have two safer neighbourhoods teams in my constituency, and I pay tribute to my borough commander, Chief Superintendent Ricketts, and his officers and staff, who have had great success. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North, spoke about the importance of stability at police constable level. I want to bring to colleagues' attention the need for stability at leadership level. Superintendent Ricketts is the fourth commander in my borough in the almost eight years that I have been a Member of Parliament. If local policing is to develop properly, we have to have the stability that has so far been lacking. It might be that two of the superintendent's predecessors were on the rapid promotion track, but I am pleased that Mr. Ricketts sees this as his last posting, of which he wants to make a real success, and that he is not keen for promotion. I hope that the Met will leave him be and let him get on with the job, and that the same will apply to the rest of his staff.

Where we have teams in Barnet, crime has reduced by 17 per cent. There has been joint working with the community in cleaning up graffiti and maintaining the clean-up. One tagger did return, but he was identified and arrested, and there have been few incidents since. There has been greater focus on local intelligence and local criminals, leading to effective enforcement against low-level crime, which affects quality of life. There has been a 45 per cent. reduction in the number of abandoned vehicles, and we have enhanced community cohesion. The officers are familiar and available, with the dedicated mobile telephone number of which we heard earlier. Direct working protocols exist between the police and the local authority on graffiti, abandoned vehicles and antisocial behaviour. Community advisory panels are focusing police activity and providing meaningful local oversight and feedback. Officers are tackling the issues that concern the local population.

There has been a 30 per cent. reduction in antisocial behaviour calls where there are safer neighbourhoods teams, and we have used PCSOs by focusing on their strengths. Intelligence has led to the arrest of local drug dealers on Grahame Park estate in Colindale—that information would not have been given had the individuals not had confidence in their teams, and the arrests would not have been made. Paradoxically, there has also been an increase in allegations of harassment and minor assault. Perhaps that, too, shows an increased confidence in the police.

There are problems with the teams; it is not all good news. One of my main complaints concerns how Conservative-controlled Barnet council has significantly downgraded its neighbourhood warden service. That has reduced some of the impact of the teams. Ward boundaries are too clumsy a model, and I shall return to that. Giving Hendon the same resources as inner-London boroughs is illogical and the roll-out has led to displacement issues, raising questions about core policing.

Let me deal with ward boundaries. The problem can be illustrated by the proposal for a team to come to West Hendon in my constituency. West Hendon includes Brent Cross, which distorts the crime figures, but immediately next to West Hendon is Hendon Central, and near the tube station and the shopping area is a major crime hot-spot. We had to get special consent, by my raising the matter with Mr. Livingstone, who agreed to use the Brent Cross police team as part of the safer neighbourhoods area team and to expand over the frontier to include Hendon Central. That was an imaginative way to break through the ring-fenced boundary, which had the potential to cause obstruction in the setting up of teams.

It is not fair that we should have a "one size fits all" system, with one team per ward irrespective of the size of the ward. We also suffer a degree of discrimination in connection with the cost of policing in London—a matter that I pursued with my hon. Friend the Minister in a recent parliamentary question. The cost of PCSOs in London does not reflect the fact that it is rather more expensive to employ them in London than in the rest of the country. That discriminates against us.

The biggest unfairness, however, is seen when one considers the size of wards in inner London compared with those in outer London. For example, the average population of the wards in Barnet is 50 per cent. higher than the average for Kensington and Chelsea. The largest is twice the size, and the smallest is twice the size, but they have the same size of team. The figures for average square mileage are even worse; the wards in Barnet are seven times larger than those in Kensington and Chelsea. The smallest ward in Barnet, Burnt Oak, is double the size of the largest in Kensington and Chelsea, and the largest ward in my constituency, Mill Hill, is more than nine times that of the largest in Kensington and Chelsea.

It is not practical for the same number of officers to police a much larger population and a much larger area. We have to find a way of gearing the size of team to reflect demand. It is all very well to say that we want visible policing, but that number of police vanish in such large wards, whereas Kensington and Chelsea seems to have a copper on virtually every street corner. Such a distribution is not fair or equitable. That is not only a matter for my hon. Friend the Minister, of course; it involves how the Metropolitan police distributes its resources.

We also need to consider the impact of the new teams on core policing. The safer neighbourhoods teams draw on the new officers, but that has effectively resulted in far fewer of them being allocated to core policing. That happens irrespective of the capital city function, which is a bone of contention between the Met and the Government, as 10 per cent. of our officers—as many as 3,000 at a time—are being diverted to anti-terrorism duties. That is a major drain on the Met, but we are not properly reimbursed, either as London taxpayers or as a London police service, for the extra work, which is not properly recognised.

If one looks at the geographical policing areas, one sees that Barnet is the fourth largest in area and the second largest in population. Again, the problem is well illustrated by comparing Barnet with Kensington and Chelsea. Barnet has nearly 19,000 reported crimes compared with just over 14,000 in Kensington and Chelsea. However, we have only 544 officers compared with 553, and we have 37 PCSOs compared with 55. Barnet is 34.5 square miles compared with just over 6 square miles in K and C, and our population of 320,000 is virtually double that in Kensington and Chelsea of 173,000, yet we have far fewer resources to tackle the job.

Those differences are reflected in some crime figures. Our crime figures in Barnet are mixed. Yes, there are some good signs, but some figures show that we are not doing as well as we could. That comes down to insufficient officers. Barnet is grouped by the Home Office as part of the 3B family group, but the amount of crime is double that. For example, we have almost twice the crime of our sister boroughs of Richmond, Kingston, Merton and Harrow, which are in the same group.

Looking at the volume of crime, it can be seen that Barnet is one of the highest contributors, with crime levels that match those of Newham, Haringey, Brent, Islington and Hackney. We have significant crime levels. As for the number of crimes committed per police officer—I do not mean that the police have committed the crimes—we have the worst ratio in London. I raised that matter with my hon. Friend the Minister in a parliamentary question, and she will probably recognise the answer. Barnet has 27.6 crimes per police officer; the average for outer London is 21, and only 17.5 for England and Wales. That major problem is caused by a lack of recognition of the impact of such demand on core policing.

It is important that the resource allocation formula should reflect some demands of outer London. We feel neglected due to how the formula was gerrymandered by the commissioner's discretion the last time around. I argued about that at great length with senior officers of the Met. We have significant problems. In Barnet and other outer-London boroughs, we now have many inner-London problems in our town centres. Those are not reflected in the unfair way that the commissioner and the Met have allocated resources to us.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on her drive and enthusiasm for the new policy, but ask that we try to tackle some of its by-products for core policing.

2.55 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): In the little time remaining I shall quickly cover a small number of points. I greatly value the opportunity that my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) has given us to debate this subject—it was a complete surprise to me, and a very pleasant one.

I want first to mention the work of South Derbyshire's crime and disorder reduction partnership, because I admire the quality of its work, but I am also slightly concerned about the approach that is being taken towards supporting partnerships. The work of the partnership in South Derbyshire has produced a range of highly effective innovations, which have helped to reduce crime and the fear of crime substantially—in particular the initiative on securing homes where there have been burglaries. Funds have been provided. I think that we all know that a place that has been burgled before is the No. 1 target for another burglary in due course. The work was so successful in the pilot period that in every case there was no repeat burglary. That is a tremendous success for the scheme; the people concerned are often elderly and it gave them great reassurance.

Building on that work, the partnership has funded a joiner and a van. The joiner tells me that the job is the best one that he has ever had—driving round to do the necessary work in a designated and clearly identified vehicle, uniformed, and giving all the reassurance of a proper quality service. Support has also been given to developing skateboard parks in the area, to provide useful and fun diversions for younger people. That has been greatly appreciated. Obviously, the partnership is not the only funder of the projects, but, nevertheless it is a significant contributor in ideas and money.

The partnership's work on tackling drugs is a highly successful initiative, which has pulled in a number of repeat offenders in parts of my constituency—particularly Newhall. That has dramatically reduced crime in that part of South Derbyshire. An officer is now dedicated to pursuing ASBOs. We are not as quick on the draw as some areas, and I welcome that. I prefer ASBOs to be a later resort rather than the first action that one would take to deal with someone who is not conforming in the neighbourhood.

The local force has recently been given funding for community support officers. South Derbyshire will get five. Derbyshire has not been the first to bid for those. The emphasis in Derbyshire has been on building the uniformed force and particularly on strengthening the role of specials. However, those CSOs will be extremely valuable in South Derbyshire and I look forward to their arrival.

We have a rural policing unit because of the rural nature of the area. The difficulties of targeted funding have been mentioned, but it is critical that targeted funding is retained to support a unit of that kind. It is extremely helpful, particularly in dealing with farm-based crime.

I congratulate Tony Hurrell, who is the commander for the division covering my constituency and a constituent of mine. It is a reflection of his commitment to the area that he is also the leader of the local strategic partnership. He sets a high example of commitment to his community and the constituency. The officers whom he appoints to serve the various South Derbyshire sections also reflect similar qualities.

I have three brief action points to outline, the first of which repeats the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North about parenting. In a meeting that I held on the Goseley estate in Hartshorne, residents surprisingly placed greater emphasis on the need to strengthen parenting and to get across the message of raising parenting standards than on visible policing and several other initiatives that one might have thought would be first in their minds, so that is a key area.

Secondly, it should be possible to give some financial rewards to specials. I have suggested in correspondence with the Home Office the possibility of parish councils in my area providing an additional bounty to recruit specials in their parish to provide that uniformed presence. I would like a more permissive approach to that. I also emphasise the importance of quality local partnerships. I have one, and I recognise that I am lucky. Other people have told me that their partnerships do not work very effectively. Mine does, and I want to ensure that it retains the commitment, support and funding that it has enjoyed until now.

I thank hon. Members for the opportunity to contribute briefly to this debate.

3.1 pm

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): I am glad that I could not receive the fax of the speech given by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) but I was in the Chamber to hear it—the reverse experience of the Conservative spokesman, the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell). It was an excellent speech and I did not disagree with a single word.

Quite a lot of cross-party consensus is emerging on many policing issues, and the hon. Member for Nottingham, North gave an extremely good and informed analysis of an ideal model of neighbourhood policing. The way in which he went through the various components was helpful. I shall refer to some of those issues and discuss some of the ways in which his ideas could be developed.

The hon. Gentleman's first point is essential. It is key that the beat officer must have a clear geographical area to cover. The situation that he described in Nottingham, where he can flick to the back of his diary and see the mobile phone numbers for 22 different officers, is probably the ideal. In my experience, however, it is not always easy to do that. It can be difficult to have that cover in all geographical areas.

The hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam) made the point that cover is very patchy. In some areas there is cover, in others there is a difficulty with cover. I take his point about officers who would usually take part in that work being drawn into other activities, and we must watch out for that, although I disagree that their defending us in this place is pointless. But there is a problem, particularly in London, with police officers continually being drawn into big high-profile events and coming under other pressures.

As has been said, continuity is essential. Again, my experience is that just when one gets someone who understands the area and gets to know the head teachers and community leaders, they leave, and all that good work is undermined. Certainly in the seven or eight years in which I have been a Member of Parliament, I have forgotten the names of individuals because they move so fast. I was therefore very interested in the example of the contracts in Holland and the ways in which the Government can bind in those individuals.

Another point made by the hon. Member for Orpington is that the police should regard this as an important career move and not as a stepping stone to a greater role and a better job. That would help to achieve continuity. I was very taken with the idea of including with council tax bills information about how to contact individual police officers. That is a very good idea, and what better way of allowing people who get fed up with having to pay their council tax bills at least to see a benefit in return for the money for which they are being asked?

There is also consensus on the use of community support officers. I have had my concerns about CSOs, but I recognise that they have an important role to play. I was encouraged to hear the hon. Member for Nottingham, North sharing my concern about the cautious approach that we take to tagging on powers for CSOs. I could not agree more that CSOs are additional to, and not a replacement for, fully trained police officers. We must be cautious and careful as we tag on more powers to CSOs. We must ensure that they are properly trained to understand how to use those powers and that they fall into line with the various Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 guidelines. They are being asked to do things that have enormous consequences, and ensuring that they have the necessary training is critical, but they do increase visibility—the jacket argument. Another way of considering the jacket argument and visibility is by asking some of our more senior police officers, even those involved in CID and undercover work, to be jacketed up if possible when they are not doing sensitive work. That would increase visibility at higher levels of the police. Often, there are many more police officers around in the streets than people think. Why are we not making them more visible when they are not doing sensitive work?

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North raised the importance of a partnership and of the local authority being involved at the same point. That was picked up on by the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), who talked about the great successes that have been achieved by partnership in his area, such as with the safer neighbourhood teams. He gave a long list of successes, including on graffiti, that have resulted from that project, and it seems that good work is being done, but he also gave a long list of some financial constraints that apply. People are obviously doing a good job, given those constraints.

We must think much more creatively about engaging the public, because they are part of the list of those involved in the partnership. My party has suggested the concept of community justice panels, which I think, in a strange sort of way, the Government are now pushing forward. The panels involve letting the community have a greater say in what the punishment should be in non-serious cases in which a crime has been committed against the community. The panels sit down and discuss with the offender what they will do to put things right in the community. At its rawest, that is engaging the public and bringing them into the process.

At a different level, building up the role of neighbourhood watch and perhaps modernising how it operates could be a useful tool in the process. I am not sure why the Government got themselves into a row last year with neighbourhood watch, but there is a need to build bridges with the National Neighbourhood Watch Association, which felt bruised and unloved by the Government when the debate over funding of how it operates centrally took place. I understand that many of the concerns have been resolved, but it would be useful if the Minister clarified where we are on neighbourhood watch.

As the debate progressed, we got on to the issue of ASBOs and at what point in the process it is useful to put in place such a punishment. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North used a phrase that I quite like. We do not want to get too involved in what I think he described as policy smacking.

Mr. Allen: Snacking.

Mr. Oaten: I would use the phrase with either word; it works with both. The hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) also touched on ASBOs, saying that he hoped that they would come at the end rather than the start of the process. The Minister will tease me about this endlessly, but I have come to the view that there is a useful role for ASBOs. That said, I share the hon. Gentleman's concerns that they should either be a last resort or be matched with something else. I have described such a scheme as ASBOs-plus.

The contributions of the hon. Members for Nottingham, North and for South Derbyshire hinted at the fact that ASBOs alone can be effective in a short-term way, but other measures must be put in place. That is about tackling the underlying causes of behaviour. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North asked questions, but not many answers were given, because we all struggle to come to terms with what the answers are. Why do 12, 13 and 14-year-olds go off the rails? What can we do to try to tackle the problems? The hon. Member for South Derbyshire talked about alternatives—one of which involved skateboarding—tackling drug problems, doing things in the community and trying to find ways to get to these individuals early. Again, the youth work that the Government have done in that respect has been good. There have been pilots involving early intervention and identification of youngsters who may end up getting into trouble. I enjoyed my visit to Bristol to see how that work is done. If we can expand it much further and nip things in the bud, before individuals have gone down the track of having problems, that will be very helpful.

I conclude with two thoughts. For me, the most telling thing in the debate has been the request from the hon. Member for Nottingham, North to allow different forms of experimentation up and down the country. That is essential because not every solution will fit every area. My constituency and other constituencies are different, and we need different approaches. If the Government can resist the temptation to impose too many set models and can allow mistakes to take place in certain parts of the country as the price of different experimentation, that will be very worth while.

The matter is complex, and must be seen within the context of police forces having to do things that they did not have to do 15 years ago, because of organised crime, drug problems, binge drinking, internet pornography and complex issues relating to terrorism. This critical matter should be up there with all of them, and I am grateful for the way that the hon. Gentleman set out his thoughts on how neighbourhood policing should play its role.

3.10 pm

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): I start by apologising to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the Minister for my late arrival. I apologise, too, to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) who, with great courtesy, gave me a copy of his speech. The irony is that while he was delivering it, I was reading it, close to this Chamber. I hope he feels that although he did not have my presence I was with him in spirit.

I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing the debate. Neighbourhood policing is a matter about which he has frequently expressed his concern. The hon. Gentleman and I entered the House on the same day in 1987 when he was elected for a central constituency and I for a suburb of Nottingham. I have the greatest possible affection for the city, which is a great place.

In November, the hon. Gentleman secured a debate in which he explained that it was his view that we could "effectively increase the amount of time that police officers currently spend on the streets by 25 or 30 per cent."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 9 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 227.]

On 8 December, he asked a question to the Prime Minister about linking the criminal justice system nationally with local policing and crime reduction initiatives. During a debate on the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill, which is closeted in Committee, where I am leading spokesman for the Opposition, he made it clear that he saw the beat officer as a central pillar of neighbourhood policing in a constituency such as his, where beat officers are not being replaced and vacancies are not being filled.

In another debate, the hon. Gentleman also said:

"The people of Nottinghamshire know that we have a record number of police officers in post in Nottinghamshire, but they also ask, 'Where are those police officers?'".—[Official Report, 15 November 2004; Vol. 246, c. 1018.]

Those are very fair points. I attach particular importance to what the hon. Gentleman says because he has recently been on the police parliamentary scheme, and he knows what he is talking about.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the five key components of neighbourhood policing and I very much agree with what he said about it. I also agree very much with what the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) said about the importance of knowing who the beat officer is. I am impressed that he has 22 names to go with the 22 beats in his constituency. That is enormously important and I strongly agree with the proposition that the telephone numbers of the relevant beat officer should go out with the council tax form. That is a very good idea, which I hope the Minister will consider.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North paid tribute to the local commanders in his constituency. I, too, pay tribute to Douglas Paxton, a superb policeman, who is chief of police in Sutton Coldfield. He is leaving shortly, although he has been in that post for a decent length of time. In the 18 months after I first became Member of Parliament for Sutton Coldfield, there were three chiefs of police. I complained on behalf of my constituents that that was wrong. I very much support the work that the police in Sutton Coldfield are doing on antisocial behaviour, which has been a common theme in the debate.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the importance of community support officers, but emphasised that they are not a substitute for properly trained policemen and women. I strongly agree with him. Conservative Members believe that there is an important role for CSOs in being visible; the public like them. We are extremely concerned, however, that the Government see them as a substitute for police officers.

I would welcome an assurance from the Minister that CSOs will be properly evaluated. There has been some evaluation but we want more independent evaluation before what the hon. Member for Winchester referred to as the tag-on of more powers takes place. We will discuss that next Tuesday in the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill Committee. It is important that there should be independent evaluation of CSOs.

The third component is neighbourhood wardens. I was distressed to hear the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) say that a Conservative council had removed them from his constituency. A Conservative council in Birmingham has just given my constituency two of those wardens, and we are delighted to see them there.

Mr. Dismore: The council have not removed them; they have downgraded them by reducing their hours and diluted their effect by expanding their responsibilities, so that they are far less effective than when they were first instituted under the then Labour-controlled councils.

Mr. Mitchell: I am glad to have put on the record that they have not been removed by a Conservative council.

I strongly agree with the point made by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North about the community and neighbourhood watch. I believe that neighbourhood watch is enormously important. I hope that the Minister will be able to say something about neighbourhood watch today that may encourage people who are feeling bruised by what happened last year. I hope that she will feel able to say something to encourage neighbourhood watch, which, in Sutton Coldfield, plays an important part in our deterrence of crime.

My final point on multi-agency working is to say that I agree with the hon. Members for Nottingham, North and for Winchester on the importance of deterring antisocial behaviour. That is something common to all of us, as has been emphasised by the debate today.

My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam) stood up, as ever, for policing in his constituency, and underlined his point by saying that mobile phone numbers are a good way of contacting local beat officers and assimilating local intelligence. He gave some examples from New York, a topic that I also hoped to talk about but may not. He also talked about the importance of a fair deal for the suburbs, on which he made common cause with the hon. Member for Hendon, and about the fact that antisocial behaviour is a big problem in his constituency, as it is in mine. He asked several questions, to which I look forward to hearing the Minister's answers.

The hon. Member for Hendon agreed on the point about a fair deal for the suburbs, and he also asked a number of questions. The hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) talked, with some reservations, about ASBOs and about the importance of the zero-tolerance approach to crime locally, with which I strongly agree. He also made an important point about the use of specials—indeed, he adopted a Conservative proposal to give a bounty to special constables. The number of specials has declined significantly under this Government—by some 45 per cent. since 1997. I hope that the Minister will feel able to comment on the importance of specials and what she and her colleagues intend to do to promote them.

Finally, I should like to emphasise the point made by the Liberal spokesman, the hon. Member for Winchester: that in local policing we must avoid top-down set models, which were a serious error of judgment by the former Home Secretary. We must ensure that local solutions are used to deal with local problems. I do not necessarily expect the Minister to agree with me and the hon. Gentleman, but I hope that she will take that point on board, because it will lead to much better neighbourhood policing.

I again congratulate the hon. Member for Nottingham, North—my former parliamentary near neighbour—on securing the debate and on the consistent theme that he has brought to his comments in the House on neighbourhood policing. It is greatly to be welcomed that there now appears to be a degree of cross-party agreement on how the matter should be taken forward.

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): I am delighted to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on securing the debate. This is an appropriate time to hold it. My hon. Friend may not know it, but the first ever national conference on citizen-focused policing is being held today; there are hundreds of police officers just down the road thinking about and working on the practical ways in which they can involve their communities to ensure not only that we have the reassurance from neighbourhood policing but, crucially, that that policing is hard edged and problem solving, using forensics and intelligence. Neighbourhood policing should not be simply a nice warm, woolly, fuzzy feeling about giving people reassurance; it should be at the heart of a modern approach to problems that face us in the 21st century. As my hon. Friend said, it should not hark back nostalgically to the 1950s either. He is a member of the police parliamentary scheme, and I think that that has given him a great deal of practical insight into the problems that our police services face on the ground.

I am happy to join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Vernon Coaker), who is here today. He has been a stalwart and active voice in ensuring that we drive policy to meet the needs of local communities, and that has been particularly true in his community in Nottingham. He was certainly very influential in our recent decision to introduce fixed-penalty notices for under-16s. I am delighted that we are now piloting the scheme in Nottinghamshire and I am looking forward to the results of that pilot. My hon. Friend has been very supportive, as has my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell), who, again, is absolutely focused on the issues of policing in his community.

It is fair to say that had we been discussing these issues a year or 18 months ago, the performance of the Nottinghamshire force would have been a cause for concern. It is partly due to the contribution of the local Members of Parliament, who have helped to support the force, that we are now seeing some pretty good performance in Nottinghamshire in crime reduction and in driving up the sanction detection rate. There is still more work to do, but policing in that community is now much better.

I am also happy to join my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North in welcoming the "Respect for Nottingham" campaign undertaken by the city council. It shows the power of partnership, and ever since I took on my current responsibilities I have been saying that policing and community safety are not simply matters for the police service. We must also involve local councils and the health service, which can help to tackle some drug problems that we face. Crucially, we must think about education, to ensure that we get to the causes of problems and achieve solutions for the longer term.

It would be remiss of me not to remind hon. Members that we have made much progress. We are not starting from scratch; we have nearly 140,000 police officers—record numbers—on the ground. I am happy to give a reassurance yet again, although I must have done this a dozen times, that we see community support officers as an addition to those record numbers of police officers. They are complementing the skills of police constables and are an integral part of the team approach to policing—although, again, that approach is about not only police officers and CSOs, but wardens and, increasingly, accredited members of the security industry, who are being given limited powers and can be part of the extended police family. That really is the future for policing.

I am glad that there is a degree of consensus among hon. Members present. Of course, it would be churlish of me to say that everyone now supports the Government's policy, but I genuinely feel that many of the things that the hon. Members for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) and for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) mentioned are happening and have been happening under this Government for several years now. They have not started happening just recently.

In dealing with some issues that my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North raised, perhaps I can give him a little reassurance. First, he and several other hon. Members raised the issue of specials, and I regard them as a very important part of our extended police family. Although their numbers have fallen in recent years, that is partly because many of them have become members of the regular police force. We have been expanding police force numbers, so specials have had the opportunity to be recruited and many of them have come through in that way. Furthermore, some have become CSOs, which is another route to the force. However, we had a major national recruitment campaign last year, with television advertising, and have received 4,000 applications as a result. Those applicants are now going through the system, and, in many force areas, the number of special constables is starting to rise for the first time in many years.

As part of the shopwatch scheme, which is now operating in London, we are getting people who work on retail premises—in Woolworths, Dixons, Marks and Spencer and Sainsbury—to train as special constables. They have been given powers and now patrol retail areas, and shoplifting in those areas is down by about 40 per cent. It makes good business sense to involve people from the local community. We also have specials, some with specialist IT skills, helping us with fraud investigations. That is a very different way of looking at the special constable resource.

I think that there are four schemes across the country in which specials are allowed to be paid, and they receive £1,000 a year. Interestingly, when consulted, half the specials said that they would welcome a small payment, but half said that they were volunteers and wanted to stay volunteers. The idea was floated that rather than paying them they could get a discount on their council tax. That is interesting, because it would establish a connection with what they are doing for their local community. Such schemes suggest ways in which we can think a little more creatively about rewarding people who want to come forward.

I am delighted that the two pilot schemes on the neighbourhood policing model are being carried out in Nottingham. The proposal to make special priority payments is a matter for the chief constable in the general scheme agreed through the Home Office. In many areas, beat officers get the special priority payments. That is a way of saying that they are a valuable part of the service. Everything that we are doing in the performance management regime to value neighbourhood policing, customer satisfaction and public confidence sends an important message to the service that that is not the soft end of policing. It is right at the heart of policing, and performance will be measured on how good neighbourhood policing is. That is how we will get the levers to drive the process forward.

I want to make it clear that the approach to neighbourhood policing is not about a "one size fits all" model. Communities are different. Inner cities are different from market towns; they share some problems of antisocial behaviour, as some hon. Members have said, but they are different places to police. Large rural areas with small concentrations of population are also different. Some areas may have a different team make-up from others. In some areas, a beat team might be predominately community support officers, perhaps led and managed by a PC. In other areas, with tough, serious crime, there may well be a predominance of fully warranted police officers, because that is what is needed—some investigators. The idea is to get the public to identify the problems and to shape our resources, so that the right people with the right skills are in the right place at the right time. That is neighbourhood policing in a modern framework.

Several Members mentioned the issue of continuity. That is very important. In north Wales, which I visited recently, a system has been developed whereby people give a three-year commitment—rather than the five-year commitment in the Netherlands referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North—to be in that area, to do the neighbourhood policing and to build the necessary relationships. After all, neighbourhood policing is about building relationships. In return, the police force tells those people that it will be of benefit to their careers. There is proper agreement between the police officer, the police force and the local community; there is something in it for everyone. A beat contract and issues with the local community are also agreed, and the police officer reports back monthly on what they have done and, sometimes, on what they have not been able to do and what they will carry on trying to tackle. It is a long-lasting, continuous relationship.

I entirely take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) about continuity at basic command unit level and at leadership level. That continuity cannot just be on the beat; it has to be throughout the service. Inevitably, getting the best people into the right jobs will sometimes be a problem. My hon. Friend made some important points about the rigidity of the model used in the London area. I have no doubt that the Metropolitan Police Commissioner will carefully study my hon. Friend's well made points. We need to ensure that there is flexibility and that we have the right mix in relation to the needs of the local community.

The hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam) said that his area needs more police officers. As I understand it, in the past 18 months there has been an increase of 42 in the number of police officers in Bromley, from 417 to 459. Like everywhere else in the country, that area has more police officers under this Government. I remind him of that. He welcomed the idea of a one-stop shop, although bricks and mortar—police stations—do not necessarily lead to the best policing. We have to get the people into the community to do the work. I am grateful for his support for what is happening in Biggin Hill.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) highlighted the excellent work going on in his community. The innovation around repeat burglary victims is good. Emphasis on parenting and the need to get to the causes of antisocial behaviour are absolutely key, as he said. I like to characterise that as trying to bring decency back into our communities.

Today's debate has been excellent. We need local solutions for local problems, but I have one caveat. The centre has a role to play, and so does target setting, because of equity and ensuring that the poorest communities in this country do not always get the poorest services. I am afraid that that did happen in the past, so we need a central framework with as much local innovation and diversity as possible. I do not think that those things are mutually exclusive; good government is about having some drive from the centre, but drawing in the innovation, enterprise and skills from the local area. That blend is what leads to long term sustainable success.

Colne to Skipton Railway Line

3.30 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): I welcome this opportunity to raise the issue of reopening a disused and dismantled railway in my constituency.

Many people—not just in Pendle but across the region, and in North Yorkshire next door—see the advantages in having this railway reopened. Getting a railway reopened, however, is a bit like pushing a boulder uphill. It is a never-ending task. The Countryside Agency produced a rail reopening toolkit in October last year, which claims to be a complete guide to the process of reopening a disused railway. It urges those who want a railway reopened to be rational and not fanatical. I will attempt to be rational this afternoon.

The Colne to Skipton railway opened in the autumn of 1848 and closed in January 1970. It is an 11.5 mile stretch running through very attractive countryside. There was a spur, which closed in 1965, from Kelbrook to Barnoldswick—the town where I live—but the link from Colne to Skipton is the key. After 30 years the track bed is still in good condition and if the link were reinstated it would open up east Lancashire to the prosperous market town of Skipton, over the border in North Yorkshire, and to the major commercial centres of Leeds, Bradford and other conurbations in Yorkshire. At the moment a train journey from Preston, on the west coast main line, to Skipton is a nightmare. It involves changing trains—sometimes twice—over a convoluted, dog-legged route with a travel time of at least two hours, and often considerably more.

Restoring the link, and I hope electrifying it in future, would open up a whole range of possibilities. A link to Skipton would give people from east Lancashire access to the Settle–Carlisle line and would in due course allow trains from east Lancashire to run into the national park almost to Grassington, the capital of lower Wharfedale, with its stunning countryside. That countryside is just sitting there, out of bounds to so many people in my constituency who do not have cars and who cannot get up there.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that with ageing populations in the whole of east Lancashire, many people would be able to access not just east Lancashire but parts of the much wider area to which he refers? People in our patches are quite rightly both rational and fanatical about reopening this line.

Mr. Prentice: Indeed, and I agree with the hon. Gentleman, whose constituency is adjacent to mine. The Clitheroe–Blackburn line is a great success, with many people using it. There is a line from Skipton up almost to Threshfield, a couple of miles away from Grassington. It stops at the Tilcon quarry, but it is perfectly possible for that line to be opened up to passenger traffic in due course. That is what the Yorkshire Dales national park authority wants. We want to get people out of the conurbations for their leisure and recreation, into the glorious countryside of the national park.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon) (Con): I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman on that point, although an enormous amount of heavy investment in signalling would have to be done to expand the capacity of that line. Railtrack would have to give it slightly higher priority than it does at the moment. Does he not agree that his constituency and mine have been unified economically for a long time? The textile industry embraced both the Yorkshire and Lancashire side of the chain and the Aire valley is, in many ways, the backbone of that industry. The lines of communication and the demand for commuting down that valley would serve the eastern part of Lancashire and my constituency in Yorkshire.

Mr. Prentice: I agree with every word of that. Of course, on reinstating the line and bringing it up to standard, everything comes with a price tag. I shall deal with that in a moment.

There are proposals to build a road—the so-called A56 village bypass—along the line of the old track bed. That has been on the cards for years and has been championed vocally by the local Liberal Democrats. However, we cannot endlessly construct roads and build our way out of congestion by urbanising tranquil rural and semi-rural areas. Roads bring pollution and noise and are not always the answer.

At this point, let me introduce SELRAP—the Skipton-East Lancashire Rail Action Partnership—a campaign group formed just a few years ago in 2001 to work for the reinstatement of the railway. It has, through its Herculean efforts, had a huge influence on shaping public opinion. I pay tribute to a number of people involved in that campaign, including Steve Broadbent, Andy Shackleton, David Magnall, Steve Arnold and many others who work tirelessly night and day to build an ever-growing coalition of support.

My colleagues here today—the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) and the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans)—are patrons of SELRAP, as am I. My Conservative opponent at the next general election, Jane Ellison, enthusiastically supports SELRAP and has spoken publicly about the benefits of bringing back the railway. That is good. Members of the European Parliament, Diana Wallis and Chris Davies, have spoken in support, as has Virgin Rail. One of the major employers in Skipton and Ripon—the Skipton building society—has been vocal in its support.

Brian Simpson, the director of the north-west rail campaign, was in touch with me earlier today. That campaign represents the Greater Manchester passenger transport executive, Merseytravel, Greater Manchester chamber of commerce, Manchester airport and lots of local authorities, so it is a heavyweight organisation. He said:

"The north-west rail campaign would certainly support the reinstatement" of the line,

"provided, of course, that a robust case can be put forward that would show that the line could act as a tool for economic regeneration, environmental protection and tourism development."

We can show that.

North Yorkshire county council is fully signed up. Craven district council in North Yorkshire—adjacent to my Pendle constituency—wants the railway back and Lancashire county council has moved its position over recent years and has, through its structure plan, kept the railway option alive. People on the ground, including Kelbrook and Sough parish council, support the idea, and when SELRAP canvassed public opinion in the area last year, 87 per cent. of local people who responded said that they were likely or very likely to use a reinstated railway.

So what is the problem? The only fly in the ointment is the local Liberal Democrats who run Pendle borough council. Under pressure, they agreed that the track bed should be protected, but they show no enthusiasm for the project to bring back the railway, which is tragic. The leader of Pendle borough council, Alan Davies, said last year that the campaign to reinstate the line was a "pipe dream". He stated:

"The railway line is not coming back on that track bed and as soon as we accept that as a fact we can get on and relieve the real problems."

By that, he meant building yet another road.

The Liberal Democrats exasperate me. They are like a franchise operation—they use a national logo, but on local policies they pick and mix. Nationally, the party would not recognise what Liberal Democrats say locally, as they resist bringing back the railway. Councillor Tony Greaves, Alan Davies's colleague and now also a member of the House of Lords, described the bid to bring back the railway as a "non-starter". Only a few weeks ago he told my local paper, the Colne Times:

"It is disappointing that people have put a lot of time into pushing for the re-opening of the link with Skipton—a non-starter—while the line from Colne to Gannow is under threat."

Lord Greaves went on to tell the Lancashire Evening Telegraph on 19 December:

"Gordon Prentice's Government"— that has a certain ring to it—

"is threatening a large number of branch lines with closure. Perhaps he should concentrate on that."

The situation is changing even as I speak. The Railways Bill is before Parliament, the Strategic Rail Authority is being wound up and the responsibility for the shape of the network is to fall on central Government.

I was interested in what the Minister said yesterday in the debate on community railways. We need to involve and empower local communities, to help them get the rail services that they need. I reflected on the issue after listening to the debate and, with the new proposals emerging, I wonder whether there is an opportunity to reinstate dismantled railway lines as part of the community rail programme, from build right through to operation.

Why should the railway be reinstated? Some 20,000 people in Barnoldswick, Earby, Sough and Kelbrook do not have direct access to the rail network. I am not talking about a backwoods part of the country. There are major employers in the area, such as Silentnight Beds, Rolls-Royce—the fan blades for a lot of aeroplane engines are manufactured there—and Country Holidays. That is one reason why I want the railway to be brought back. Doing so would open up a new trans-

Pennine corridor with North Yorkshire and Yorkshire beyond, and give people direct access to commercial and recreational opportunities. People who live in Yorkshire could sample and enjoy the recreational opportunities of Lancashire and the north-west and, as I said earlier, the Yorkshire dales would be opened up to the people in east Lancashire. Bringing back the railway would also reduce traffic in the national park more generally, which is surely a public policy objective that we can all agree with.

What about the feasibility of the reinstatement? As I said, the track is in good condition. The British Rail Property Board owns a section of track from Colne to Foulridge, which is about 2 miles long. Craven district council in North Yorkshire has a policy of protecting the 5-mile stretch from the Lancashire border to Skipton. Much of the track bed is in private ownership, but it is in good condition. The remaining 4-mile stretch is owned by Lancashire county council. It originally proposed using the track bed for a new bypass, in the deposit edition of the joint Lancashire structure plan, but the public opinion that I mentioned earlier forced a rethink. The original proposals were modified to allow other options, such as reinstatement of the railway.

Bringing back the railway is technically possible. North Yorkshire and Lancashire county councils commissioned the consultants Steer Davies Gleave to report on it, and in August 2003 it published its findings on the strategic value of the route for the development of trans-Pennine passenger and freight services. It concluded that the track bed is in good condition and largely intact, although it has been severed in two places, and bridges would be needed, one of them over the Leeds-Liverpool canal. The work would come with a price tag, but the consultants, who are skilled in such costings, estimate that it would be possible to reinstate the railway for £33 million. Such figures do not scare us—that is less than the cost of a single Eurofighter Typhoon. In 2003, Lancashire county council estimated the cost of building the new bypass—over which the Liberal Democrats salivate—as £37 million. So, it would be cheaper to reinstate the railway than to build the bypass.

What do we conclude from all that? There is a huge coalition of support for the reinstatement of the railway; the cost of bringing it back would be relatively modest; it would open up new economic and recreational opportunities for people on both sides of the regional border; it would lead in due course to the electrification of the railway from Preston to Skipton; and it would be a major driver in the regeneration of east Lancashire, where there are so many socially excluded people. That is the vision that I share with the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon and the hon. Member for Ribble Valley—if I dare speak for them—and with the thousands of people who support SELRAP. It is not a pipe dream, and I very much hope that it has the Minister's support.

3.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) on having secured the debate. He has conjured up a wonderful image of the opportunities that would be on offer as a result of opening the Colne to Skipton railway line, and I know that he has campaigned long and hard, alongside SELRAP, to bring his vision about.

My hon. Friend will be aware that our general approach to local and rural railways is to work towards putting them on a sustainable basis for the long term, so that they can continue to offer vital services for passengers and freight and to contribute to the local economy, as well as meeting Government targets on accessibility, the environment and, as he said, social inclusion. The general aim is to make better use of the subsidy already going into the railways, rather than providing—at this stage—additional grants for development. To that end, the Strategic Rail Authority published the community rail development strategy in November 2004. Sadly, at present, re-openings fall outside the scope of the strategy. Even extensions that represent value for money in economic terms invariably require additional subsidy, which is currently unaffordable.

The existing railways at Colne and Skipton provide local and longer-distance services. The service from Colne is one train an hour to Blackpool via Blackburn and Preston. I understand that the Association of Community Rail Partnerships, with the support of Lancashire county council, is actively developing a partnership for the line between Colne and Blackburn, which it expects to establish by the middle of the year. It will work with the train operator, Northern, and with Network Rail, local authorities, community organisations, businesses, development and tourism agencies and other locally-based bodies to promote the line.

From Skipton, there are regular stopping services to Leeds and Bradford, generally two trains to each destination every hour during the day, and it is served additionally by trains running between Morecambe and Leeds, and Carlisle and Leeds. It is, of course, part of the well known and well loved Settle to Carlisle route. Lancashire county council has received the Steer Davies Gleave report on the future of the railway formation around Skipton and Colne to which my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle referred.

Some conclusions of the report are:

"In the short to medium term it appears difficult to make a case for route reinstatement to serve longer distance strategic passenger movements. However, in the longer term there may be potential, particularly if the funding environment returns to one more conducive to investment in rail capital projects. If the route were reinstated to serve longer distance movements it would offer an opportunity to serve areas within the corridor both by stopping express services and local services;

A double-track reinstatement would provide the greatest amount of operational flexibility which is potentially important for longer-distance passenger services that might have to be pathed through constrained areas elsewhere. The Villages Bypass scheme as proposed would effectively restrict the railway to a single-track reopening on the current alignment which might compromise the benefits to strategic passenger services . . . The most cost effective way of maintaining the rail alignment is for the Villages Bypass to adopt an alternative route from that proposed at present".

The report also stated that the forecast of local passenger flows was not sufficient to make a case for the railway in its own right, as the cost of installing track alone was £33 million. It may appear to be a drop in the ocean to my hon. Friend, but it is still a significant amount of money.

[Charlotte Atkins]

The Strategic Rail Authority set out its plans for the railways in its strategic plan of January 2003. The plan makes no reference to reopening the line within the 10-year transport plan period, and it remains the position that there are no plans to do so.

The longer-term planning of the network—that is, over the next five to 20 years—will be determined by a series of regional planning assessments that the SRA is conducting to cover each English planning region. RPAs consider the function of the railway within current and future land use transport systems and its role in supporting the economic and wider development objectives of local, regional, devolved and central governments. Colne to Skipton falls within two RPA areas. Work on the north-west RPA is in progress, and the SRA expects to publish the conclusions in the spring. The Yorkshire and Humberside RPA is due to commence in the spring.

The SRA has taken the view that it would be prudent to safeguard the Colne to Skipton transport corridor for transport use until such time as the relevant RPA studies have been undertaken, as they will be of key significance in assessing the case for reopening the route for rail. It is a shame that the local Liberal Democrats do not share my hon. Friend's vision.

Since May 2003, the Lancashire structure plan has safeguarded the Colne to Skipton rail route for transport use, and the A56 villages bypass has become the third priority in the programme of major road schemes. The pre-adoption version of the Lancashire structure plan states:

"The value of the former Colne-Skipton railway line includes possible long term potential for rail reinstatement as well as being the current preferred route for the A56 Village Bypasses. It is, therefore, important that this corridor is safeguarded for transport purposes. Before a final decision is made on the most appropriate road alignment further analysis of options will be undertaken ensuring that the potential of rail re instatement is not precluded."

There are no plans to reinstate the railway between Colne and Skipton, but the route is safeguarded for transport use. I am sure that the enthusiasm and the campaigning zeal of my hon. Friend will carry his vision forward.

Strategic Transport (Norfolk)

3.54 pm

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): I welcome the opportunity to debate this subject, and I am grateful for the support of other Norfolk MPs. I notice in the Chamber my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) and the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson).

Given the geographical position of Norfolk, transport access is crucial to the local economy and tourism, and for attracting new business and addressing social deprivation. Of course, this is a broad subject that includes access by air through Norwich airport, and access by rail and sea. However, I intend in the short period available to me to concentrate on access by road. My motivation for putting in for this debate was the announcement in a Highways Agency press release on 1 December 2004 that three vital road schemes for Norfolk—the A47 Blofield to North Burlingham dualling; the A11 Attleborough bypass; the A11 Fiveways to Thetford dualling—were being downgraded from "national importance" to "regional schemes". All three schemes were programmed for completion by the end of 2008, and will now find themselves being "progressed subject to regional priorities".

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on obtaining this debate, which is of huge interest to everyone in Norfolk. Did he not find it extraordinary that he, as a constituency MP whose road scheme is affected by this summary withdrawal of Government approval, was not informed by the Government of their plan to withdraw their approval—as, indeed, I was not informed of the decision affecting the Attleborough bypass?

Mr. Simpson: My right hon. Friend makes a very good point, and I shall touch on this a little further in my speech.

This announcement from the Highways Agency caused both anger and dismay in Norfolk, as we felt that the Government had broken their promises about these schemes. Let me remind the Minister of just how important the A11 and A47, and these schemes, are to Norfolk.

Since 1997, I and other Norfolk MPs have initiated and spoken in debates in this House on why it is essential that the Government take a strategic view of these two main trunk roads, and how necessary it is that they should be dualled throughout. Is the Minister aware that Norwich is the only city in England and Wales that is not accessed by dual carriageway? In previous debates, I have taken the lead in stressing the importance of dualling the A47, part of which runs through my constituency of Mid-Norfolk. The A47 Blofield to North Burlingham section, one of the programmes that has been kicked into the long grass, is an example within my constituency. On 15 September 2003, I led a cross-party, cross-Norfolk delegation to lobby the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) on the need to dual the A47, and to press for a decision on the infamous single-lane Acle straight, between Acle in my constituency and Great Yarmouth.

The Highways Agency's announcement on 1 December raises many serious questions about the integrity of the Government's road transport policy as it affects Norfolk and the eastern region. I have come here today to urge the Minister to reverse those decisions and explain the anomalies and contradictions behind them. It would, as my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk said, have been courteous and helpful if the Department had actually notified local MPs of this decision in December. We had to learn about it from the local media. None of us was informed, and that includes the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke). I understand that he had something of a sense of humour failure over this.

Can the Minister explain why the A11 and A47 are not regarded as roads of national importance, but rather as regional roads? Even in the listing of regional schemes, the A11 and A47 are fourth in line after "schemes under construction, schemes planned to start construction by April 2008"

and

"schemes to be progressed for future construction".

At the bottom of the pile, our trunk roads come under

"schemes to be progressed subject to regional priorities".

This means that the A11 and A47 would be thrown into a regional transport pot for reprioritisation, along with all other local major schemes, with the earliest possible start date at the end of this decade.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): My hon. Friend will be aware that the western part of his constituency, the whole of my constituency and the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) also rely to a significant extent not just on the A47 but on the A17 and the A10. If the situation is bad for the A11 and A47, it is going to be a great deal worse for those two other roads, which are important as strategic links to our constituencies.

Mr. Simpson: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. Anybody looking at a road map of the United Kingdom sees that Norfolk is one of the few parts of the country where there are virtually no significant roads shown: we appear to be almost without transport.

The badly thought out nature of the proposals is well illustrated by the fact that the A11 and A47 will be considered through regional transport boards. The problem is that, as far as I know, those boards have not yet been set up, and it is not clear how the local authority interest will be represented and safeguarded. What can the Minister tell us about the establishment and remit of the regional transport boards? Is the Minister aware that the East of England regional assembly originally approved extra housing? In Norfolk alone, approval was given for some 72,600 houses by 2021, as long as infrastructure, including transport, kept in step with growth. The chairman of the East of England regional assembly wrote to the Minister for Regeneration and the Regions on 22 December 2004 that the "key transport schemes had been arbitrarily cut from the approved programme, which suggested a lack of good faith by the Government. At a meeting on 10 December, the Assembly condemned the cuts and regarded the endorsement of the housing plan as suspended."

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): I want to reassure the hon. Gentleman that in this important debate he has the support of all parties, all MPs and organisations that have considered this problem in Norfolk over the years. Will he find time to talk about the accident rate, which is sometimes swollen by the holidaymakers who come to Great Yarmouth, for example, in the summer? Every week there seems to be a terrible story of some horrific crash, often resulting in deaths, which has become almost acceptable to the public. From our point of view, it is unacceptable.

Mr. Simpson: I thank the hon. Gentleman. I shall touch on that later, as it is an important point.

It is called the law of unintended consequences: given the failure of the Government's referendum on regional assemblies in the north-east, and Norfolk's experience of decisions by both the assembly and the East of England Development Agency, the Minister will not be surprised to learn that we in Norfolk have very little confidence that either the A11 or the A47 will receive any kind of priority under the proposals put forward by the Highways Agency.

In the strange world in which the Government operate, there is another glaring anomaly about those decisions. I understand that, just before Christmas, the Home Secretary intervened with the Secretary of State for Transport and persuaded him to reinstate the A11 Attleborough bypass scheme to the category of national importance. I do not know whether such an agreement is in writing, but can the Minister confirm whether the scheme has been reinstated? If it has been reinstated, without meaning to be churlish, I must question the basis of such a decision. Was it made because the Secretary of State for Transport believes, after all, that it genuinely meets the criterion of national importance? If so, why not the A11 Fiveways to Thetford or the A47 Blofield to North Burlingham scheme? Or is it because the Attleborough bypass is close to the constituency of the Home Secretary? I actively support all colleagues supporting that scheme, but it seems to be a strange anomaly.

Finally, we are waiting for a decision on the dualling of the notorious Acle straight on the A47, shared by me and the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright), who is in the Room. Will there be a decision soon, and if so, are we to assume that, like the other Norfolk schemes, it will come bottom of the list of regional priorities?

As the hon. Member for Norwich, North pointed out, the issue is not just about improving transport and economic development. Dualling saves lives. Every study done by the Government and local authorities shows that where dualling is introduced, the number of accidents, including fatal accidents, is reduced. In the early evening of Thursday 6 January, Mr. Glenn Fransham was killed on the Acle straight, near the Halvergate junction in my constituency, and the road was closed in both directions for four-and-a-half hours. As well as the tragedy for his family, Great Yarmouth was effectively cut off. That is totally and utterly unacceptable.

The Government have failed to consider the A11 and A47 strategic roads necessary for the development of Norfolk as well as the whole of eastern England.

Mr. Anthony D. Wright (Great Yarmouth) (Lab): I apologise for being late; I had a constituents' meeting. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, although the European Union has accepted that the A47 is part of the trans-European road network, the Government must show the same commitment with respect to the strategic route of the A47, which runs all the way through to King's Lynn and beyond?

Mr. Simpson: The hon. Gentleman has argued very strongly on this issue, along with all of us here. He is reinforcing my point that the A47 is not only crucial in Norfolk, but the main east-west road running all the way to the midlands. I know that it is an entirely separate issue, but the hon. Gentleman and all of us here are waiting with anticipation for a decision by the Secretary of State about the outer harbour at Great Yarmouth. That decision will be made on separate criteria, but if it goes ahead, as we all hope, the dualling of the A47 will become significantly important.

Mrs. Shephard: My hon. Friend is illustrating, as has also been shown by the interventions of fellow Norfolk MPs, that there is a complete lack of strategic understanding of the importance of road networks in Norfolk. It is not possible to think of developing any of our towns, including Great Yarmouth, without some thought about how people are going to get there. Equally, if the Government talk about growth in housing and general regeneration of Norfolk, they have to give strategic thought to how people are going to get in and out of the county safely, which was the point made by the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson). A quick look at the accident and emergency figures in our hospitals will show the impact of unsafe and undualled roads.

Mr. Simpson: My right hon. Friend's point reinforces the arguments about road safety and expansion. The Government want to put a lot of resources and effort into the expansion of the economy in East Anglia. I recognise and support that, but we will not get that expansion if the impression is that Norfolk is somehow cut off.

By every criteria that the Government hold dear, the dualling of the A47 and A11 must come high in their priorities, particularly in terms of dealing with social deprivation. Many people are under the impression that Norfolk is a wealthy county. There are undoubtedly parts of Norfolk where there is great wealth and the possibility of generating great wealth, but all hon. Members in this Room have in their constituency areas—in some cases, large areas—of direct social deprivation. Given that alleviating deprivation is a Government priority, that is a strong reason for examining the issue strategically.

Limited schemes for dualling the A11 and A47 have been cut, and it seems to the people in Norfolk that there is no logic to the Government's road policy. I urge the Minister to reconsider this decision, because it is unacceptable to the people of Norfolk according to all the criteria that I have put forward. I hope that she will realise that the strength of feeling is represented here today by almost all Norfolk MPs—the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) would have been here but is in Committee.

Finally, I ask the Minister to remember that this year, Norfolk and Britain are celebrating the bicentenary of Admiral Horatio Nelson's victory at Trafalgar. Nelson was a Norfolk boy. He used to write about going into Norfolk and coming out of Norfolk as though Norfolk were almost a separate country, geographically, because of the poor communications. I leave her with a paraphrase of Nelson's famous signal at Trafalgar: "Norfolk expects the Minister to do her duty."

4.10 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing the debate and providing us with an opportunity to discuss what we are doing about providing transport infrastructure in his area. He painted a picture of an apparently neglected part of the country, cut off from the rest of it. I reassure him that that is not so.

The east of England as a whole is a vital region at national and international level. We are working closely with regional partners to deliver the transport infrastructure that it deserves and requires. Norfolk, by virtue of its geographical location, is sometimes perceived, especially by those living there, as being on the sidelines. However, in recent years there have been some additions to the strategic transport infrastructure, and those have improved accessibility in relation to the rest of the country.

Norfolk is served by four major roads from the west and south: the A47, the A11, the A12—which are obviously all trunk roads—and the A140, which is the responsibility of Norfolk county council. In recent years there have been several improvements to those roads, such as the Hardwick flyover at King's Lynn, which removed a major congestion point on the A47 and reduced delays by up to 50 per cent. The dualling of the A11 between Roudham heath and Attleborough has also reduced journey time.

A number of local transport schemes in Norfolk have contributed to improving access to the wider strategic network and, therefore, to connections with the rest of the country. However, it is not just within Norfolk that we need to look for improvements, as even improvements outside the county can be of benefit in improving accessibility to it. We are constructing the Thorney bypass on the A47, which has been promised by successive Governments for more than 60 years. It is due to open in early 2006 and will mean a major saving on journey time.

We commissioned a multi-modal study of the A47 between Norwich and Peterborough, which examined the whole corridor strategically. Although it concluded that there was no immediate need to build a dual carriageway along the whole route, it recommended that certain sections should be investigated further. The Highways Agency is reviewing the case for the Middleton and East Winch bypasses and will review the case for upgrades to the further sections of the A47 between the A1 and Sutton and between North Tuddenham and Easton.

Of course, it is not just roads that service Norwich at a strategic level. The railways do as well. The successes of the Norwich to Cambridge direct rail service, on which patronage has increased as the result of rail passenger partnership funding supplied by the Strategic Rail Authority, are excellent news. Also, from 1 January, the new franchisee, One, has withdrawn 38-year-old locomotives between London and Norwich and replaced them with more modern and reliable ones.

The latest performance figures for One railway's London to Norwich service show that 88 per cent. of trains arrive on time. The latest timetable from One shows an increase in the number of trains each day between Norwich and London from 65 to 70, with later departures in the evening. That has been made possible by a decision that we took to amalgamate several separate franchises into one, covering the majority of the East Anglia region, which made possible more efficient operation on the Great Eastern main line.

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk identified the recent announcement on transport schemes locally and nationally as an indication of our neglect of the area. I should say straight away that we have not removed any schemes from Government programmes at national or local level. He mentioned the decision not to include the A11 in the near future roads programme. However—and he raised this—we have reconsidered our decision about the A11 Attleborough bypass. We have announced that, in light of the scheme's value for money and the stage that it has reached, the Highways Agency will now take it forward.

The other two schemes in the region relate to the A11 from Five Ways to Thetford and the Blofield to North Burlingham section of the A47. We have asked the region to advise us on the relative priority of those schemes and other transport proposals in the region.

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): On the subject of the A11, we all welcome the notion of including the Attleborough bypass, but does the Minister understand that Norwich is the only major city in the UK not connected to the national road network by dual carriageways—a fact that I mentioned in my maiden speech three and a half years ago? One can get all the way from junction 9 on the M11 near Cambridge to Five Ways on a dual carriageway, and then suddenly it stops and one slows right down. Does the Minister agree that it is unacceptable that a city such as Norwich and a county such as Norfolk should be cut off in that way? Does she agree that getting the A11 dualled all the way, including the section from Five Ways to Thetford, should be a high priority?

Charlotte Atkins: That is why we asked the region to identify its priorities. If, as the hon. Gentleman suggests, that issue is so important, not just for Norwich but for the region, it will come very high on the list of regional priorities.

Mr. Simpson: The whole point of the debate and the arguments put forward is this: why does not the Secretary of State have a view on the matter? Strategy is decided at the national level, unless I wasted my many years spent teaching officers at the Army staff college. The Minister is talking about the tactical level. If the matter is to be decided by a region, which is, at the end of the day, a quango—I still do not know whether the regional transport board has been set up—we know from past experience that the schemes will be tail-end Charlies. We, and most observers, regard the schemes as crucial.

Charlotte Atkins: I do not know how the schemes can be tail-end Charlies if they are as important as Conservative Members suggest. "The Future of Transport" White Paper identified the value of involving regional bodies, local authorities and other key local stakeholders in shaping the programme of future transport investment in their areas. Local people on the ground know what the priorities are. Conservative Members, as leaders of local stakeholders and local political opinion, along with my hon. Friends the Members for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) and for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright), will ensure that such decisions are taken at regional level.

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk raised the issue of regional transport boards. There is no prescription from on high—from the Department for Transport—on how regions should co-ordinate and prepare advice on priorities. It is up to the region to decide to do that. The important thing is that the region makes those decisions based on the views of local stakeholders. It is important that they have the flexibility to develop those arrangements, simply because we are often accused of trying to run everything from Whitehall. We are devolving these decisions to the region.

Clearly, Norwich is an important centre and that will be taken on board by the region. If the lack of a dual carriageway is of such significance, the scheme will certainly be adopted as a high priority by the region.

Mr. Simpson: I know that the Minister is genuinely trying to address the problem, but can she explain why the three schemes were initially dropped from being of national importance to being of regional importance? The people of Norfolk had assumed that the schemes would go ahead, and that they would be completed in the next two or three years. In fact, Ministers urged me to congratulate them in previous debates. Why have the schemes been moved into a regional bracket? We know from the Highways Agency's literature that that means that they have slipped further down the decade. Why has the A11 Attleborough bypass scheme been brought back in, but not the other two schemes, particularly the scheme in my constituency, where the road accident rate alone would justify its introduction—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

[Charlotte Atkins]

Charlotte Atkins: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

There is clearly an issue of prioritisation and of deciding which are the most important. We have made it clear that regional local bodies should have a stronger voice in decision making. We reinstated one of those roads because we recognised that it had a significant effect on local transport needs. The others will have to be prioritised, taking account of available resources. If the region gives them a high priority, there is no reason why they should not go ahead in fairly short order.

Mrs. Shephard: I know that a great deal of the problem is not of the Minister's making, but she must realise that when her speech is reported locally it will have a hollow ring. The three schemes were withdrawn—I think on 15 December—with no notification given to local Members of Parliament, and one was reinstated on 21 December. If that scheme—it is true that it was near completion—was not perceived to have been near completion when it was withdrawn on 15 December, how did it escape the attention of the Department for Transport?

Charlotte Atkins: It was not withdrawn. It was decided that the regional priorities should be reconsidered. I have stated over and over again that those programmes have not been cut from the list of schemes. We have asked the region to prioritise the schemes within existing resources.

Mr. Wright: Does my hon. Friend understand the frustration of my constituents in Great Yarmouth? For the past 30 years of my involvement in politics, I have been campaigning for the dualling of the Acle straight, an 8-mile stretch of road between Yarmouth and Acle. The frustration is caused by the fact that a programme in the early 1990s to dual the road was withdrawn by the Conservative Government in November 1996. It is a case of give and take. Under Governments of all political persuasions, it seems that no one is handling the problem with the required urgency.

At least we now have a commitment that doing nothing is not an option. For the sake of safety, I urge the Government to get on with it. I would certainly have more confidence in the regional bodies committing their resources to the area than I have in the Department for Transport.

Charlotte Atkins: My hon. Friend has campaigned long and hard for that dualling. He rightly points out that a Conservative Government shelved the scheme. At least we now have a Government who are willing to invest in public transport and roads. He can be absolutely sure that that investment will be spent wisely and on a value-for-money basis. We are providing huge resources to be spent on the road system, but we believe that the region should have a key view in the decision-making process and that it has the power to help us come to the right decisions.

It is important that regions consider basing their decisions not only on transport priorities but on related housing and economic development programmes. Transport should be seen not in isolation, but as part of the regional strategic decision-making process. That is why we are consulting on proposals for providing long-term regional funding guidelines covering transport and other policy areas. Subject to the outcome of consultation, we will publish later in the year indicative regional transport allocations for 2007–08, and longer-term planning assumptions going far beyond then.

Mr. Simpson: On that specific point, how is the Minister's Department reacting to the letter from the chairman of the East of England regional assembly saying that, as a consequence of the Highways Agency transport reallocation from national importance to regional, there is to be a vote by the elected members, putting into suspended animation the agreement for extra housing within the eastern region?

Charlotte Atkins: I am not fully aware of that communication, but I shall certainly write to the hon. Gentleman about it.

Funding guidelines will allow each region to take account of the impacts of individual decisions on wider objectives and enable them to base their strategies on more realistic assumptions of future funding. They will also mean that regions are better able to align their planning, housing, transport and economic development strategies and come to a common, integrated view on priorities within their areas. No matter what the scale of the project, we must be absolutely assured that it meets our five criteria for transport set out in the 1998 White Paper "A New Deal for Transport".

Those criteria are accessibility, safety, economy, the environment and integration. No project will fully satisfy all those criteria, but we must ensure that there will be overall net benefit from the scheme. That often causes tensions between the various criteria, and one of the main difficulties is caused by trying to satisfy the environmental and economic criteria.

Norfolk, of course, has many areas of great natural beauty and the need to preserve them for the enjoyment of local people and for the benefits that are brought to the area by numerous visitors must be weighed against any economic benefits that the new infrastructure might bring. The hon. Gentleman highlighted the A47 Acle straight, where there may be economic benefits from widening or dualling the road.

As we have demonstrated elsewhere, our policy on new transport infrastructure also takes into account the full environmental cost as well as possible economic benefits. We are awaiting the results of work done by the Highways Agency on the environmental impact of widening or dualling the road. We are also aware of the work carried out by the county council on the economic impacts, and we shall make a decision in due course. In the shorter term, the Highways Agency is investigating measures that can be implemented to improve safety as part of its ongoing network management responsibility.

As for Eastport, to which the hon. Gentleman also referred, the project throws up a wide range of complex issues that must be considered carefully by the Government before a decision can be reached on public funding. We are considering such matters and are mindful that there are time limits on some elements of the potential funding. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is considering the potential impacts of the project on the ports sector and will provide advice to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, whose approval is required for the funding decision.

It is not only major transport projects that will increase the strategic access. Often several smaller scale improvements can make a big difference to the operation of the road network. The Highways Agency has developed route management strategies for the A47, A12 and A11. They set out its plans for the development and management of the routes over the next 10 years, with priorities identified for action over the next three years. Key proposals for the A11 include the closure of central reserve gaps with the aim of improving safety, reducing accidents and reducing delays caused by those accidents. The agency is also investigating measures to reduce congestion at the Five Ways roundabout, which, although located in Suffolk, will improve journey time reliability to Norfolk. On the A47 and A12, key proposals include ways to reduce congestion and improve access to Great Yarmouth.

Progress is being made to improve access to Norfolk. We have not axed any schemes from our programmes, but have asked the region to align its planning, housing, transport and economic development strategies and come to a common, integrated view on priorities within its area and then to advise us of its priorities.

Question put and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Jim Fitzpatrick.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): It is an immense pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You are a distinguished member of the Environmental Audit Committee, whose reports we have gathered to discuss. However, it is a matter of regret to me—and, I am sure, to other Members—that you will be unable to contribute to the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): I could not have contributed anyway, as I did not take part in the study. I did not join the Committee until after then; otherwise, I would not be in the Chair.

Mr. Ainsworth: I hesitate to say it, but lack of knowledge has never before been an obstacle to hon. Members speaking on subjects in this House.

I thank the Liaison Committee for this opportunity to discuss the Environmental Audit Committee's reports on environmental crime, which, sadly, all Members are only too familiar with from our constituency work. When I applied for this debate, I did not realise that it would take place in the same week that the House debated the Government's Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill on Second Reading. That covers much of the same ground and picks up on a number of the same themes and issues that the EAC reports explore. Several hon. Members present made distinguished contributions on Second Reading, including the hon. Members for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) and for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Challen). I regret that, for pressing family reasons, I was unable to be present.

As this is the first opportunity for a while to discuss specific EAC matters, I want to say a few words about the Committee's work. It was established in 1997 with the formal remit to consider the extent to which the policies and programmes of Government Departments and non-departmental public bodies contribute to environmental protection and sustainable development, to audit their performance against such targets as may be set for them by Ministers, and to report thereon to the House. Significantly, like the Public Accounts Committee, the EAC is not tied to any Department, and it therefore has the flexibility to work across Government and all areas of policy. That is appropriate, as the environment is not confined to a single policy silo, but forms the context within which all Government activity, and, indeed, all human activity, takes place.

Since the EAC's inception, its work has ranged widely across Departments and topics. During the past year, we have conducted inquiries into the following subjects: the Treasury's pre-Budget report; the Department for Transport's aviation strategy, on which, perhaps, the least said the better; energy policy; the periodic review of water pricing; genetically modified crops; the Barker review of housing provision; the Government's sustainable communities plan, our report on which will be published shortly; progress towards greening the work of Departments; and the Government's sustainable development strategy. Among other things, we are currently examining the international challenge of climate change, the issue of Government procurement, and the extent to which the concept of sustainable development is taken forward within formal and informal education. We have a wide, challenging and rewarding remit, and I want to place on record the gratitude of the whole Committee for the staff who support our work. We would not be able to function at all without the Clerks, specialist advisers and Committee assistants who work so hard in the background.

Those of us who are concerned with and about the environment are prone to speculating gloomily on why the issue has not been as central to political debate as we feel it should have been. There are many reasons for that, although you will be relieved to hear, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I do not intend to rehearse them all now. However, one reason is that, as the environment is everywhere, because it is the context in which we all live our lives, we are dealing not with a single issue but with many related ones. It is therefore hard to pin down. It is also natural that when people are confronted with such enormous, complex and difficult challenges as climate change, they tend to shy away and concentrate on more immediate and obviously tangible issues. Politicians have tended to follow suit. However, there can be no more obviously immediate or tangible issue than the quality of our local environment. It is that local environment that is affected by environmental crime.

In December 2003, the Environmental Audit Committee announced that we were establishing a Sub-Committee to conduct a series of inquiries into environmental crime. We have now published three reports. Two of them are "Environmental Crime and the Courts" and "Environmental Crime: Fly-tipping, Fly-posting, Litter, Graffiti and Noise"—things that the excellent charity ENCAMS refers to generically as "crapness", if that is not an unparliamentary expression. Those are the subject of our debate today. The third report, published last autumn, was on wildlife crime, and the fourth, which is the final one in the present series, is on corporate environmental crime and will be published shortly.

I am particularly grateful to Paul Stookes, chief executive of the Environmental Law Foundation, who has acted as specialist adviser in those inquiries. I take this opportunity to congratulate his chairman, Pamela Castle, on being awarded a well deserved OBE in the new year honours.

Our inquiries coincided with the consultation by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on the same general subject. They also coincided with a rising tide of public concern about local environmental crime and antisocial behaviour and about the apparent inadequacy of the measures in place to tackle such problems. The truth is that for many years the issue of environmental crime has not been taken seriously enough by the police, local authorities and the courts. To some extent, they cannot be blamed for that; they have taken their cue from Government.

The EAC Sub-Committee received some particularly telling evidence from the head of the sentencing policy and penalties unit at the Home Office. When I asked him whether environmental crime had any meaning for him as a discrete area of the criminal justice system, he replied:

"to be absolutely honest, in terms of my day-to-day job and life, environmental crime is not at the forefront of my agenda".

At least that response had the benefit of candour, but I cannot help but wonder where he lives.

It is interesting to note that the Department that has taken the initiative in bearing down on environmental crime and criminals is DEFRA, not the Home Office. It is at last clear that a new and welcome effort is being made to tackle the issue, but years of neglect have created an ingrained problem. Some people have become habitual offenders, and others have come to accustom themselves to daily, pervasive and seemingly inescapable blight.

We have somehow allowed a culture to develop in which environmental crime is not seen as "real" crime. Of course, it does not have the same immediate impact as a violent robbery or burglary. Also, statistics make it look like a modest problem. It is estimated that there are up to 10,000 environmental prosecutions annually; that compares with a total of around 2 million prosecutions. However, the statistics by no means tell the whole story. The Sub-Committee was told that only about 10 per cent. of all known environmental offences end up in court.

In addition, the bald statistics fail to reflect the unique nature of environmental crime. It is distinct from other aspects of the law because of the impact a single incident may have on a large sector of the community, and on wildlife and habitats. There may be long-lasting adverse effects on the environment and future generations—effects that go way beyond simple visual blight and loss of amenity.

Visual blight is not as simple an issue as it may appear to be. There is clear evidence of a link between local environmental degradation and other more obviously serious crimes. If an area is allowed to become squalid, strewn with litter, scarred by graffiti and smothered with fly-posting, it will tend to attract squalid people and squalid behaviour. It is perhaps that aspect of the issue that causes the most public concern, breeding a deep and worrying sense of insecurity in communities across the country.

The problem also costs a great deal of money. Local authorities and other agencies—in other words, taxpayers—spend a staggering £3 billion a year clearing up the mess left by environmental criminals. That is a huge drain on our pockets and another good reason why such crime deserves far greater attention than it has received in the past.

Tandridge district council in my constituency is a small, efficient local authority, which like many others has had to come to terms with ever-tightening central Government support. Last year it recorded 940 instances of fly-tipping—about three per day. They ranged from small heaps of domestic rubbish to three-piece suites, which have become a familiar adornment to ponds throughout the land, to 10-tonne loads of builders' rubble. Last year it cost £50,000 to clear up that mess. Tandridge shares a boundary with two London boroughs, although I cast no aspersions on the boroughs in question. It is also much favoured by those who abandon vehicles, and dealing with those vehicles costs some £80,000 a year.

The problem is compounded by the difficulty in obtaining successful prosecutions, which is an issue that arose time and again during the EAC inquiries. I can illustrate the difficulty with another example from my constituency. The local authority felt that it was on strong ground when it brought a case of fly-tipping before the magistrates, because it had photographic evidence of a man and waste, a van and a verge. The accused, however, successfully argued in court that, far from dumping rubbish on the side of the road, he was loading it into his truck. The case was dismissed.

In our sixth report of the previous Session, "Environmental Crime and the Courts", we examined the role of magistrates in dealing with environmental cases and particularly considered the level of sentences being handed out. There was a widespread feeling that the sentences were inadequate. Another local example of that problem was drawn to my attention by Councillor Eric Morgan, the chairman of community services at Tandridge district council. In relation to a fly-tipping case, he wrote:

"We recently had a case that cost over £900 to bring before the magistrates. The defendant was found guilty and fined £150 of which Tandridge received nothing. Furthermore, this derisory level of fine almost encourages them to continue because it would cost them some £50 to dispose of their debris at a disposal site. Four undetected fly tips and they show a profit, while Tandridge cannot afford to bring many offenders to court."

That perfectly illustrates the predicament of many local authorities across the country.

In most cases involving small quantities of household waste, the dumping is done out of idleness and with a casual disregard for the consequences. Increasingly, however, as the waste disposal regime tightens, dumping waste has become a profitable business, which has not gone unnoticed by organised criminal gangs. That is another example of how environmental crime is not just unpleasant and sometimes dangerous in its own right, but insidiously linked with other more serious criminal activity.

I was pleased to note that the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill proposes increasing the maximum fine in a magistrates court for fly-tipping from £20,000 to £50,000, but will that extra power be used? There must be some doubt. There are very few cases, if any, of magistrates using the maximum penalty—mostly the fines are significantly lower. One reason for that was offered by the director of legal services at the Environment Agency, who suggested to the Sub-Committee that a magistrate used to sentencing by fines of about £5,000 would baulk at going higher, even when permitted, in an area such environmental crime in which he feels he has little experience.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not criticising magistrates, because I took my justices' oath in 1973.

Mr. Ainsworth: Certainly not; I would not dream of doing so. It would be a foolish person who criticised magistrates.

The Committee took evidence from the Magistrates Association, which shared some of the concerns that our report subsequently expressed. There is a problem in dealing with these types of environmental crime; they do not come before magistrates courts very often and there is, therefore, a need to address an information gap. I will put it no stronger than that. It remains to be seen whether increasing the maximum penalty will lead to an increase in the level of fines, which is generally felt to be far too low to act as an effective punishment, let alone a deterrent. We concluded that:

"For many forms of environmental crime, compulsory remediation work on the sort of blight for which the offender was himself responsible would be a more appropriate sentence than a fine."

We also recommended that there should be greater judicial training on environmental crime and the principles of sustainable development. In addition, we highlighted the need to improve training for prosecutors, particularly in local authorities, and for resources to be made available for that.

The Committee also drew attention to the lack of consistent reporting and data on environmental crime. Although the development of the Environment Agency's Flycapture database is a welcome move in that direction, it is confined only to collecting data on fly-tipping. There is a dearth of reliable information on most other types of environmental crime. As information is always crucial to the fight against crime, that urgently needs to be addressed.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that one problem is that Flycapture is not necessarily compatible with police databases? Constituents of mine have reported matters to the police that have not been taken up because the police could not use the evidence. Will he comment on that?

Mr. Ainsworth: I am aware of that problem. Flycapture is a worthwhile and useful initiative. We need a lot more of that and we need it across the board, so that it can be used by all parties concerned with dealing with environmental crime, not just the Environment Agency, but local authorities, the police, prosecutors, investigators, and people responsible for clear-up. I suggest to the Minister that we need a national database of environmental crime. Until we have it, we will not have the information to go on in order to draw up effective, across-the-board, policies or to prosecute as adequately as we would like. Those ideas remain to be acted on.

I welcome a number of other new measures in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill that are aimed at tackling the illegal dumping of waste, particularly the proposed powers enabling the Environment Agency or local authorities to stop, search and seize vehicles. The removal of the waste carrier's defence of acting under orders, the introduction of fixed-penalty notices, the ability to seize vehicles involved in waste offences, and the proposal to allow regulations to be made to require developers to prepare site waste-management plans all coincide with recommendations made in the two EAC reports.

I was interested to note that it is reported in The Guardian today that the Solicitor-General is turning her mind to addressing corporate environmental crime. I hope that she will be interested in our forthcoming report on that issue; she will not have to wait long. A constant theme of our inquiries into environmental crime has been the inadequacy of the criminal justice system in offering an effective deterrent. The likelihood of being caught is slim and when a prosecution does take place the penalties are often derisory. Nowhere is that more the case than in relation to corporate environmental crime. There is a need to ensure that whether a company commits a crime through negligence or does so deliberately as a means of avoiding costs or of promoting its products—as the Ministry of Sound has admitted to doing—the penalties that it faces really bite.

The Environmental Industries Commission told the EAC that "underfunded and inconsistent enforcement, coupled with derisory fine levels by the courts, are undermining environmental policy objectives".

That cannot be allowed to continue. We may need to consider penalties other than company fines and to be more imaginative in devising penalties that bite. In any case, unless the polluter pays substantially more than the sum he profits from, there will continue to be no real deterrent or effective punishment.

One further area that needs to be addressed is the price to individuals of obtaining environmental justice. When public bodies are unable or unwilling to act, people are often left with no option but to go to court to obtain redress for environmental blight. In the vast majority of cases, that is no option at all, because legal action is prohibitively expensive. The Government have stated that they are committed to the principles of the Aarhus convention, which aims to ensure that people can access environmental justice whatever their means. I would be grateful if the Minister said what plans the Government have to deal with that issue.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): Several of my constituents have suffered because of businesses close to where they live operating on the margins of the law—skip firms, car-crushing businesses and so on. My hon. Friend is right: people go to the law to seek redress, but find out that the law is weak. Sometimes, they are even intimidated by the businesses concerned. Does my hon. Friend agree—I hope that Minister does so, too—that we must do more about such matters, otherwise our constituents will be given a miserable time and the law will be mocked?

Mr. Ainsworth: My hon. Friend is exactly right. The sort of businesses to which he referred are I think described in his part of Essex as "well tasty". He mentioned intimidation, which is a serious problem in respect of environmental crime. Recently, there was a case in my constituency of somebody reporting fly-tipping who had investigated the pile of fly-tipped rubbish, found an address and notified the authorities. The authorities visited the person, but felt that they were unable to take the case forward because the lady from whom the rubbish had been collected was a single mother who lived by herself, and the people who had illegally dumped the rubbish lived about 150 yd up the road. Intimidation is a serious problem and one, incidentally, that is not addressed under the new Bill. I urge the Government to give it serious consideration.

The Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, and much of the existing legislation, is focused on crime and punishment and local environmental issues. No doubt much of today's debate will be focused on that, too. It is important, however, to remember that we need to do a great deal more to encourage a better understanding of the environment and our dependence on it. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North knows that better than anyone, and I am delighted that she is chairing the current EAC Sub-Committee on environmental education. Only by a determined, consistent and imaginative effort to engage the public and policy makers in the importance of respecting the natural limits placed on us by the environment will we achieve a genuinely sustainable way of life. A society that respects its environment is a society that respects itself.

2.52 pm

Mrs. Helen Clark (Peterborough) (Lab): I am glad to have this opportunity to debate our Sub-Committee's reports because I was particularly keen that we should hold the inquiry on which the reports are based. In fact, I am sure that my colleagues will allow me to say that I promoted the theme in our discussions and made the suggestion. I have been worried for some time about the state of the local environment in my constituency, which is supposedly the "environment city".

Mr. Ainsworth: The hon. Lady is, of course, a distinguished member of the Environmental Audit Committee and is never ever anything less than provocative.

Mrs. Clark: I return the compliment.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): It was not a compliment.

Mrs. Clark: Indeed, I am sure that it was.

However, I am still concerned about matters in my constituency. We members of the Environmental Audit Committee, its Sub-Committee or other Committees are only too well aware that constituents do not make appointments to see us at our regular surgeries to have ideological debates about local taxation or privatisation. They might write to us about such matters, but they turn up in person when their quality of life is threatened to the extent that day-to-day living is unbearable. All the examples that I shall now cite are real-life situations that have been reported to me by my Peterborough constituents and sometimes seen by me.

First, I refer to a street that was held to ransom by neighbours from hell who created 24-hours a day noise nuisance. However, the local authority only suggested so-called mediation, which made the victims feel guilty for complaining in the first place. The second example is of a street that was targeted by graffiti louts, but the culprits were never caught and their handiwork was not removed. Thirdly, an abandoned house became adrug taker's haven with empty syringes, used condoms, broken bottles and beer cans tossed into adjoining gardens. Fourthly, a fast food outlet left dustbinsof food debris on the streets and in the road, resultingin an infestation of rats in neighbouring houses and gardens. Fifthly, elderly people had to forgo a pleasurable evening bingo session at the local community centre because they would have had to cross a school playing field packed with intimidatory youths smoking, drinking and smashing bottles on the ground. Okay, such things do not make front-page national news in our favourite tabloids or broadsheets, but they have front-page importance for many whom we have the honour to represent. Our collective failure to deal with such issues breeds a lack of confidence in politicians and political systems.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): My hon. Friend may be interested in what my local council—Swindon borough council—is doing about graffiti. It is experimenting with offering householders the chance to clear up the graffiti on their houses for free, and that is being very well received. Does she agree that it would be good for the Government to examine that pilot scheme and ascertain whether it would be affordable to fund it across the country?

Mrs. Clark: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that and I certainly agree with her. Will she contact me in the next couple of days? I should like to put my chief executive in contact with hers, so that we can work together. That sounds like a wonderful scheme.

I shall quote a comment that I often hear from my constituents, which I am sure hon. Members from all parties have heard: "I didn't bother to report it because nothing is ever done. What's the point?" How many times have we heard that one? The reports that we are considering today make various recommendations, but several issues stand out. First and foremost, we need consistent and firm action everywhere, rather than on a postcode basis.

Of course, during our inquiries we uncovered examples of fine practice. Prior to June 2004, Leeds city council made a most serious commitment to tackling environmental crime, using the full powers of legislation to include proper use of antisocial behaviour orders on environmental matters. The council fostered environmental pride with its strategy of clean streets, street leaders, graffiti busting, tough measures to combat fly-posting and even—I do not mean this lightly—a no-tolerance policy on discarded chewing gum and cigarette butts. On one occasion, the respected hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) had rather an experience of the effects of chewing gum busting.

Mr. Ainsworth: I am sure that Leeds city council still has a very effective programme dealing with environmental degradation and antisocial behaviour. I can confirm that going on the wrong side of those machines that blast chewing gum off the pavement is a very unpleasant experience.

Mrs. Clark: It is indeed; the hon. Gentleman was well photographed.

Step forward also Southwark. We were terrified of the Southwark representatives at our inquiry. They justified their tough line on environmental crime on the grounds that such offenders were very likely to commit other types of crime as well. I am sad to say that we felt that those authorities were the exception rather than the rule.

In our report, we recommend that the Local Government Association should co-ordinate good practice, commending authorities that excel and exposing those reluctant to enforce. The Environment Agency is rightly rigorous in pursuing prosecution, even without a 100 per cent. assurance of success. We need consistency in sentencing. I go back to my point about postcoding: we need to educate magistrates so that everywhere the penalty fits the crime.

The penalty should also fit the perpetrator. For example, to fine a thriving record company with huge profit margins a derisory £500 for blatant fly-posting merely invites contempt—the snigger behind the hand. It is not a deterrent at all. Fines for individuals may not be the best or only way to correct offending behaviour. Some type of community reparation, including making good the damage caused and the use of antisocial behaviour orders for environmental crime, as in Leeds, may be equally effective and more productive. We need to see.

Central Government of whatever political colour must ensure that local authorities and the police have adequate and proper funding for these functions, but these bodies should be held accountable for the money and be able to demonstrate exactly how it has been used. The Government response to our reports—I address these comments to the Minister—was thoughtful and energetically welcomed our recommendations. I return the compliment, in part. The Government have done a lot across different Departments to deliver cleaner, safer and even greener communities. It is especially encouraging when we see how this work puts into practice the recognition of the links that exist between these different facets of policy and between local environmental quality and the wider quality of life, including crime reduction. It really is, to use a phrase so familiar to our tabloids and broadsheets, "joined-up government".

I am sure I am not the only person in this House who has used the phrase over the years, in various contexts and with, I have to say, various amounts of enthusiasm and conviction. I do not suppose I am the only Member to have made representations to the Government on behalf of a local or national interest group that was trying hard to pursue one aspect of stated Government policy, but finding their hands tied by another. The Select Committee has heard a huge amount of evidence over the years, making these sorts of points again and again, across a range of policy areas. That is our remit. I am happy to draw attention to the Government's very positive achievements on beaches, bathing water, litter, abandoned vehicles, recycling and home zones—initially, I have to say, a ten-minute Bill that I propelled—which are really beginning to deliver up and down the country the range of social and environmental benefits that we knew they could.

Our reports today explicitly acknowledge further improvements resulting from new legislation. One example is recommendation 9 of the sixth report—Government response page 5—which welcomed sections of the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003, which has recently come into force and will assist prosecutors and sentencers in dealing more flexibly, and thus more effectively, with graffiti and fly-posting in particular. Another is in Government response page 6, paragraphs 19 and 20: the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, implemented early last year. It enables disqualification from driving for persons convicted of relevant offences, which can include fly-tipping.

The clean neighbourhoods consultation last year enabled many of the issues we had considered to be taken further. Again, this was especially true of fly-tipping and I am grateful to the Chairman for having mentioned it today. The new national database, Flycapture, will, I understand, make it easier to monitor the scale and type of activities in each area and where prosecutions are taken against offenders. Obviously, as colleagues have mentioned today, fine tuning is essential and we need to progress further on this.

In many places, the Government's response refers to changes that will be introduced at "the first legislative opportunity". I therefore join with colleagues from all sides of the House to welcome the new Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, which received its Second Reading on Monday. I have not yet had the opportunity to go through the Bill line by line, nor have I studied it in any detail. I do know, however, that it will give local authorities new powers to deal with fly-tipping and illegal dumping. It will be much easier for them to recover the cost of dealing with these problems. It will be easier to keep streets clean with an extension of litter controls. The Local Government Association has welcomed the Bill in general and I am happy to endorse its calls for adequate resources to enable authorities to make the best use of their powers. I agree that any changes to the law must be supported by properly resourced education and awareness campaigns to change behaviour.

Although there will always be persistent, determined and even enthusiastic offenders, most people in our constituencies will be happy to co-operate and take advantage of new opportunities when the benefits to the local environment become apparent. That is certainly the case with home zones. I invite any hon. Member present to come and see my home zone, of which local people are inordinately proud, but rightly so—it is their achievement.

However, to return to my fundamental concerns, which helped initiate and contribute—I hope—to this debate, it is essential that local government takes on board and uses the new powers. Local government can be the weakest link. In 1992, along with Leeds, Leicester and Middlesbrough, my constituency of Peterborough was awarded the title of "environment city"—one of John Major's projects and actually one that I support. There was a high level of environmental awareness in the city at that time, which was spearheaded by the then Labour council.

Peterborough Environment City Trust, or PECT, partially funded by the local authority, was created to promote good environmental practice in our city. Peterborough is the national headquarters of English Nature and the regional headquarters of the Environment Agency. We have an energy advice centre and a demonstration eco-house, opened by Prince Charles in 1996, which provides practical examples of energy efficiency in the home. UK Seed has established a base in the city with the aim of promoting environmental business, and the excellent wildlife trusts have encouraged the use of green spaces in urban areas. Railworld, which was recently in contact with my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, has an ambitious youth project, and the green wheel cycling scheme, promoted by PECT, was successful in garnering a good amount of lottery money.

Recently, the Environment Agency dubbed Peterborough "the greenest city", because more people there than anywhere else filled in questionnaires, showing a high level of interest in topics across the environmental spectrum: CO_2 emissions, GM foods, Kyoto and George Bush, to name but several. On environmental crime and the very matters that concern my constituents daily, under the present council administration, Peterborough talks the talk but it does not walk the walk. Pardon the cliché. There are democratic ways in which local people can express their dissatisfaction about what their local council is or is not doing, and I hope that they will in Peterborough.

Meanwhile, what can be done to ensure that councils fulfil their responsibilities? In Peterborough, local people are forming independent environmental crime squads and action teams, taking photographs, making videos and trying to contact local newspapers and the media in a desperate attempt to provoke a reaction from those on high—the city council and the local police. Every weekend, those local people show me the latest horrors from all parts of the city. That is what I spend my weekend doing. Since last August, I have seen toilet cisterns in front gardens, urine-drenched mattresses at the back, syringes in children's playgrounds, overgrown bushes functioning as wonderful canopies for all kinds of litter, including cans, food and needles, alleyways used as outdoor toilets and places for unlimited sexual congress, windows smeared with broken eggs and graffiti, graffiti, graffiti. That is the story of everyday life in one of the four so-called "environment cities" in the United Kingdom.

What can be done, hon. Members? National Government should not take over what are properly local powers and responsibilities. There are proposals to reward councils that encourage better recycling. I agree with that and I hope that there will be more examples and suggestions, as in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, to encourage that. However—I address the Minister here—there should also be penalties for those councils and regimes, such as the one in my constituency of Peterborough, where administrations do not use their powers responsibly for the benefit of residents.

I would like the Government to revisit the excellent title of "environment city". Why should the Government ignore that because it was a good idea introduced by a Conservative Prime Minister? It is one of the things that he did well and we could use the idea and progress environmentally. I would like the Government to retest for the award, as we do with Investors in People, on a three-yearly basis to see whether it is still merited. That would banish complacency and keep environmental awareness at the front of the minds of lazy authorities. It would keep their practice on its toes.

Whatever happens, I certainly hope that in a couple of years' time I shall not still be walking the streets in Peterborough being shown rats, litter, graffiti, fly-posting and dumping by rightly enraged residents whose quality of life is being undermined. Their lives are being made a misery by the sort of filth that was seen in the 19th century—we are talking about Victorian standards and values—and that has returned to our streets. We should remember that it was a Conservative Prime Minister, Benjamin Disraeli, who introduced the concept of public health and action on that front. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Yes, that is important and it should be acknowledged. I am proud to acknowledge it today.

Local government was set up in response to such public need and it has a proud record. The Labour Government are backing it in the campaign to preserve and restore the quality of life in our local communities. I hope that everyone concerned gets on with the job. Time may have been wasted, but fresh starts are never too late. I hope that in the fullness of time the reports that we are debating will be seen to have influenced Government thinking and local authority practice for the better everywhere in the country.

3.13 pm

Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): I welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Any comments that I may make about magistrates should not be taken as in any way diminishing the great regard that I have for the job that they do—largely unpaid.

It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth), who chairs the Select Committee with great dedication. We know that when we walk through the door into the Committee Room that partisan divisions will be left outside and that we will simply focus hard on the environment. That is so important. He has brought that bipartisan spirit here this afternoon with his extensive welcome for the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill. I am sure that his previous experience as a Whip will ensure that he is not too heavily punished for that welcome, which was not accorded to the Bill by his party on Monday. I also welcome my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment. When he appears before the Committee, he is usually one of our star witnesses.

I refer the Minister to the evidence on the ease with which fines for fisheries offences can be evaded, which was supplied to the Committee's environmental crime and the courts inquiry by the Home Office. That issue may be slightly tangential to the main debate but, knowing of my hon. Friend's extensive knowledge of the subject, I think it worth while to seek his response.

The evidence is astonishing. According to the Home Office, in just one magistrates court area—Dyfed-Powys—more than £3 million of fines for fishery offences were issued against Anglo-Spanish trawlers, as they are known, between January 2002 and November 2003, but they have not been collected due to loopholes in the law and the ineffectiveness of European legislation.

I wonder how many fines nationally have been evaded in like manner through the simple scam of companies using accommodation addresses, and whether that approach is replicated in other industrial sectors. It is no wonder that British fishermen feel aggrieved when they see how easy it is for Spanish trawlers to flout the law and to cock a snook at British courts. Will my hon. Friend assure me that that form of environmental crime—that is what it is—will no longer be tolerated and that punishments will be meted out effectively? What is being done to pursue the outstanding fines?

We were notified of the fines because of their exceptional size. The vast majority of fines for environmental crimes are peanuts by comparison, but there is a need to ensure that there is clearer guidance to the courts about the seriousness of environmental crime. I suspect that the fines and penalties imposed rarely meet the costs of cleaning up the damage. The £4 million fine imposed on the Milford Haven port authority after the Sea Empress disaster was subsequently reduced to £750,000 on appeal. There are shades of the Exxon Valdez disaster in that. After well over a decade, ExxonMobil is still appealing against the penalties that were imposed on it.

Environmental crime is not recognised by many offenders as even being a crime, still less an environmental one. How prevalent is the attitude that the environment is simply there to give up its resources and to become a dumping ground afterwards? After all, it is not that long ago that we all accepted, or at least rarely questioned, the presence of slag heaps or the dumping of raw sewage at sea. Today, the Irish still complain of the dangerous impact of radioactive waste from Sellafield in the Irish sea. We are not yet living in the enlightened era that we would like to live in as regards the environment. As the dumping of millions of tonnes of carbon in the atmosphere every year is considered not an offence but, possibly, a tradable commodity, we are still struggling with a sustainable concept of environmental crime.

In that context, the archetypal man in a white van who has a little pile of asbestos to dispose of will not be too concerned with the border lines between environmental crime and what is simply environmental degradation. What is environmentally acceptable? I wonder how many people still consider environmental crime a lesser species of crime, very much the Cinderella of crime, which we should not get too het up about.

I heard in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill Second Reading debate on Monday that it costs £150 million annually to clean chewing gum off our pavements. When the Committee visited Leeds, we saw the rather expensive and destructive technology that is required to remove chewing gum from pavements.

Ms Drown: Does my hon. Friend share my concern that there is still a lack of clarity over the definition of litter, and that chewing gum is often not included in it? I understand that there is a consultation on the matter. Does he agree that it should be made absolutely clear that chewing gum is litter?

Mr. Challen: I absolutely agree. That gap should be plugged as soon as possible. As a form of litter, chewing gum is probably worse than a bit of paper or even a fag butt. The Sub-Committee learned on its visit to Leeds that offences for dropping fag butts have been taken to court and fines have been issued, and that Leeds city council gives out little containers in which one can stub out cigarettes. I cannot understand why chewing gum manufacturers do not provide some little plastic container, so that one could dispose of gum safely. I think that a lot of people would take to using such devices if they were offered them every time they bought chewing gum.

Ms Drown: Has my hon. Friend considered on-the-spot fines for dropping chewing gum and litter, as well as fixed penalties? My borough council has raised with me its wish for such fines to be introduced. Also, given the stretch in police resources, it thinks that it would be good if there were pressure on the police to make a priority of such issues sometimes. During a particular event, local borough council officers could be out with the police. That way, someone trying to give a fixed penalty notice would have the police to back them up if a person refused to give their name and address and so on. Does my hon. Friend accept that, although the police cannot be there all the time for such matters, it would be good to have such co-ordination at events sometimes?

Mr. Challen: Absolutely. It would help if there were one or two high-profile cases, such as that of the smoker who dropped a fag butt in the street and got fined. That got quite a large headline in my local newspaper. If the same treatment were meted out to someone dropping chewing gum—obviously, we would have to catch them in the act—it would have a great impact. It is not so much the size of the fine that has an impact, although in the case of the cigarette smoker it was £75; that seems quite a lot given that no one thought it was an offence in the first place. It is more the headline and the photograph of the person in the newspaper—the name and shame aspect—that has the shock effect.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: I hesitate to break the consensus that the hon. Gentleman talked about so eloquently at the beginning of his remarks, but, speaking as a victim of the chewing gum blasting machine in Leeds, are there not two problems? One is that people usually dispose of their chewing gum in a pretty surreptitious manner, so it is very hard to notice them doing it. The other, which has been drawn to my attention by Westminster city council, which, as the hon. Gentleman will recall, gave evidence to us, is that if chewing gum were defined as litter, the council would have a duty to remove it.

[Mr. Peter Ainsworth]

Westminster already spends a fortune removing chewing gum from its pavements but, if every council in the land had a duty in law to remove it, that would send costs skyrocketing. In Leeds, we heard about the idea of giving people a little thing to put their cigarette butt in, and that is a better way of approaching the chewing gum issue than legislation.

Mr. Challen: The hon. Gentleman certainly raises a serious objection to placing a duty on people, but perhaps we could do so in certain designated areas, where the issue is a real problem. Some streets seem to attract a lot more chewing gum than others, so in some cases the duty would not entail much work. There is also a producer responsibility on the manufacturers; they should think about the problem and not wriggle out of it. That is one issue on which a difference arose between Front Benchers on Monday. I am not sure that it is a huge difference; it is certainly not a reason to vote against the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, and I cannot really make the link with that legislation.

It is clear that all those relatively small things lead to a great waste of resources. There are many better ways in which taxpayers' money could be spent. I am sure that the many people who toss their chewing gum to the ground complain to their friends and family about the level of council tax, without making the link to the fact that they could save money or have better services in other areas if they amended their behaviour slightly.

The cost of environmental crimes has been estimated by DEFRA at £3.4 billion a year. I was therefore astonished to read the evidence from the UK Environmental Law Association. In response to our question,

"Are the scale and nature of sentences for environmental crimes commensurate with the seriousness of the crimes themselves?", the association said:

"The data on environmental sentences is insufficient to answer this question fully as there is no centralised data and it is not gathered in a systematic way."

However, it went on to say that it has been found that

"in general the level of fines were much lower than the maximums set down (averaging £2,730 in magistrates' courts in 2002 with the maximum fine generally permitted being around £20,000) . . . This would indicate that insufficient discretion is being used in imposing deterrent fines which could lead to greater environmental protection."

That picture of an absence of deterrent is compounded by evidence from the Environmental Services Association:

"In 2002, the Environment Agency secured slightly less than four convictions a week (in a context where it has since its establishment spent about £5 billion of public money), with most of those prosecuted by the Agency being acquitted. We understand that of 462 prosecutions in 2002 only 207, or 45 per cent., resulted in a conviction. The total level of fines imposed was less than half of 1 per cent. of the Agency's estimated annual cost of fly-tipping."

The agency reckons that fly-tipping costs us about £100 million a year, but the level of fines amounts to less than £500,000 a year. Given that the ESA thinks that the magistrates already have sufficient powers, it seems that they are not choosing to use them to the full and are too lenient with offenders.

It must be bad enough for agency staff to wonder whether they will secure a conviction, but it must be galling to know that, even when they do, the guilty will be treated with kid gloves. The impact of those crimes must be studied more carefully by the courts and much stronger guidance must be given.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: The hon. Gentleman will recall that the Department for Constitutional Affairs told us that only 55 per cent. of those fines are collected anyway.

Mr. Challen: I am afraid that my arithmetic stopped early on in life. I am just trying to calculate how much that would be—55 per cent. of £500,000 is about £250,000. If the offence costs the country £100 million, the point about leniency seems extremely well made.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Gentleman's eloquent flow. He will have seen the regulatory impact assessment on the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill. It says that a 50 per cent. take-up of fines, which I am sure he would accept is quite low, would yield annually to all the councils in England and Wales a total of only £3 million. The point is well made in the Committee's report that the fines are set too low and frequently are not paid. That really runs a cart and horses through the report because, if the fines are not paid, the Government will not have the budget to implement the powers and duties under the Bill.

Mr. Challen: I shall dwell on resources because some of our evidence related to the matter. Without those, it is difficult to see how we can chase people and ensure that fines are recouped for the community, so that it can have more resources available to it. One of the reasons that I support the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill is that it includes measures to extend the regime of spot penalties to provide an incentive for councils to collect the money in order to generate funds. I see nothing wrong with that, and I shall return to that subject shortly.

I acknowledge that the Government have recognised the problem of leniency. The Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 allows for the proceeds of criminal activity to be confiscated. I am not suggesting that we are going to start chasing people for packets of chewing gum—potential crimes in the making—but the Government's response to our recommendation 6 acknowledged that the low level of fines is unsatisfactory.

The Government are aware of the problem, and I welcome their generally positive response to the report's recommendations, but the overarching case-by-case approach of the courts when dealing with such crimes should be addressed. That seems to be a fall-back position: "We cannot interfere with the courts too much. We have a case-by-case approach." We need to consider the implications of that.

Norman Baker: I served in the Committee that considered the Proceeds of Crime Bill. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman would agree that where a particularly serious environmental crime is carried out for profit—for instance, big business collecting asbestos and disposing of it regularly on farmland—the 2002 Act should be used.

Mr. Challen: I certainly hope so. The Committee has recently inquired into the matter of corporate environmental crime, and the report has not yet been published. We have had the opportunity to ask a number of people from the corporate sector whether they think that lifestyle penalties could be imposed, so that people know that the penalty for bigger crimes will not be some measly fine in a magistrates court, but something that could really impact on their lifestyle.

The courts are statutorily bound to consider the defendant's means to pay any fine, but they should have greater regard to the principle that the polluter pays, and reparations for damages—after a full costing—should be sourced in every way possible, including community service.

Resources have been mentioned. The discussion about whether tackling environmental crime is sufficiently resourced has occupied the Committee's time. It also featured in the debate on the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill. In respect of that, I would like there to be an extension of the principle of hypothecation, which is permitted in the Bill, so that money raised from fines or penalties is used to deal with the problem. We need to make more use of expensive mini-CCTV technology to monitor known fly-tipping sites, but where councils get the money for sufficient numbers of mini-cameras is always a problem. There are usually waiting lists for using them. There are a few fly-tipping sites in my constituency, and it is obvious to me that 99 per cent. of fly-tipping will continue unless we can secure more prosecutions by obtaining good evidence on offenders. Currently, fly-tippers know that they are almost immune from prosecution as a result of lack of evidence.

Money raised through the courts should also be used to fund rewards, where information passed on by the public leads to a conviction. That happens now, but so far as I am aware it is not common. The public should be encouraged to become more involved in helping to deal with these sorts of crimes. I would like more of a Crimestoppers-style approach to be applied to environmental crime.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: The hon. Gentleman may be interested to know that Tandridge district council in my constituency already gives a £500 reward to people who provide information that leads to a successful prosecution for fly-tipping. The problem is that there are very few prosecutions for fly-tipping. That is not because people are not keen to get the £500. What that reward reveals is the huge difficulties that are involved in successfully taking prosecutions through the courts.

Mr. Challen: I do not disagree with that at all. A constituent of mine wrote to me last week about a case. Someone was paid a reward for reporting someone else who dropped some litter but, although the offence was proven, the offender was only told off—they were not even fined. We must have a better approach than that.

Mr. Ainsworth: I have some better news from the area covered by Reigate and Banstead borough council. This week, a press release was issued that stated that a crisp packet was dropped from a van on the A217 Tadworth roundabout on Monday 6 December at 4.20 pm, and that Councillor Circus, who happens to be the portfolio holder for the environment, was in the car behind. The identity of the owner of the vehicle was established—he lived in Basingstoke, which is a considerable distance away—and he was fined £50. Therefore, the system sometimes works.

Mr. Challen: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was about to say that the offender was the chief constable of the county. However, that is cheering news, and it leads me on to the Select Committee's report on fly-tipping. As I participated in the Second Reading debate on the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill on Monday, I know how welcome that Bill is in addressing many of the Committee's concerns—although, oddly, the Conservative party was unable to support it. However, in keeping with the spirit of consensus that rules in the Committee, I will not dwell on that any longer.

The Government have paid attention to the Committee's concerns. That is a testament to the strength of the Select Committee system—occasionally. The report and the Government's response, including the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, should lead us to one conclusion: fly-tipping, graffiti, abandoned vehicles, littering, noise pollution, and so forth should be met with zero tolerance. I know that that phrase sometimes conjures up authoritarian overtones, but why should people have to live with the degradation of their local environment merely because a number of others could not give a damn about it? I welcomed the extension of fixed penalty notices in Monday's debate and I do so again. I hope such notices will encourage local authorities to take more action.

The money raised should be ploughed into the fight against antisocial behaviour and not used as just another revenue stream. I think that all of us would be disappointed if the money were not hypothecated, since it would no doubt mean a rerun of the debate about speed cameras. The effect of that debate is to remove the focus on safer driving and shift it to whether police forces are trying to grab more money. Such a cynical view always helps those who would rather carry on business as usual and persist with their antisocial behaviour.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to use the exact analogy that my hon. Friend used, although it is a possible one. In my area, there is a particular problem. My local authority has one policy with regard to the collection of large household items. The neighbouring authority has a different policy. That results in one authority picking up a large bill that it blames on the other authority. I know that there is an attempt in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill to seek greater co-ordination. Does my hon. Friend agree that that area is one in which local government does not always sing from the same song sheet and that that needs to be changed?

Mr. Challen: My hon. Friend touches on an important point that I hope the Government will address. In my constituency, there is no household disposal site. In the neighbouring authority, Kirklees, which is just a couple of miles down the road, there is. Kirklees council has introduced a policy of preventing anybody who is not a council tax payer in its area from using that site. It was the obvious place to go to for those who lived in Morley. We seem to have a sort of passport system. Local authorities are so keen to preserve their resources that they will not allow anyone else to use them. They should be prevented from doing that. We do not prevent hundreds of children from Kirklees from coming across the border to use our schools, which are a bit better than theirs. They cannot see the irony of that situation.

In the debate on the Second Reading of the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, I referred to evidence supplied to the Environmental Audit Committee by Leeds city council, which, until June 2004, was under the enlightened management of the Labour party. The submission from Leeds city council makes it clear what extra resources, which could partly come from fixed penalty notices, could pay for. It says that it could work more effectively with organisations such as ENCAMS to raise public awareness.

The issue of environmental decay has been raised this afternoon. To tell people about the cost of littering and other environmental crime, the council could improve the training of its staff, enabling a greater proportion of staff who work on the streets to tackle a wider range of environmental crime. It could enable better use of technology to collect and to share information, both in the council and with its partners. It could employ more staff. At the moment, it has only 13 dedicated environmental enforcement officers. In a city of 750,000, we could do with a few more. It could undertake more surveillance operations to tackle graffiti and so on. Importantly, it could provide small grants to community groups for organised community clean-ups. Those can have a major impact on the local environment, as they help to tackle the causes of the problem as well as the symptoms. Those are positive proposals that could make a considerable impact.

In the Environmental Audit Committee, we heard about how stretched Environment Agency enforcement staff are in tracking fly-tippers. That is labour-intensive and Environment Agency and local authority staff could be greatly assisted by more technology. I referred earlier to mini-CCTV cameras at known or potential fly-tipping sites to gather better evidence.

If fly-tippers were caught on camera, what fly-tipper would come out with the argument that it was wrong and expect the public to support such an argument, as speeding drivers do? At the moment, speeding drivers seem to be supported by the Automobile Association and the Royal Automobile Club. The apologists for cameras get away with too much.

The National Farmers Union, whose members' land is often the target for fly-tipping, told us what the cost to them can be to clean up afterwards. In Hertfordshire, the cost of removing 500 tonnes of waste was £4,600. In Essex, five seven-tonne lorry loads of tyres were dumped, with a removal cost of 75p a tyre.

The NFU is concerned, rightly, that such dumping will increase as the legitimate method of disposal. That will mean that people will have to pay increased landfill tax. As the hon. Member for East Surrey pointed out, that could lead to a growth in illegal dumping—it could almost become a business in itself.

Our report recalls that, on Environment Agency figures, fly-tipping between 2001 and 2003 rose by an astonishing 43 per cent. One fifth of the waste comes from construction and demolition work. There is a clear need, as we see more demand for housing, to educate not just builders, but the people who employ them about the proper disposal of waste. We saw at first hand, on our visit to Leeds, a fly-tipping site in the heart of the city. What appeared to be the entire contents of a house, which was probably being refurbished, were dumped next door to a residential area. I wonder whether that kind of fly-tipping is a particular problem created in the rented and houses in multiple occupation sectors. If it is, landlords who try to cut corners should be a particular target for local authority attention.

In that overall context, recommendation 16 of the fly-tipping report, as I call it, which calls for greater resources, is important, albeit the recommendation focuses only on the Environment Agency's needs. The Government should be congratulated on increasing the agency's funding by around 37 per cent. since 1999 but, given the extra demands that the agency will have to meet in the near future—I am thinking in particular of flood prevention—I wonder whether issues such as fly-tipping are in danger of being squeezed. I feel confident, however, that our report and the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill will ensure that that will not happen.

3.42 pm

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): It gives me great pleasure to follow the previous speakers, the members of the Sub-Committee of the Environmental Audit Committee who have done all the donkey work on this report, which was approved by the main Committee.

While I have the opportunity, I would like to congratulate the Chairman of the Committee, who plays a very committed part in its work. I single him out from other members of his party, because, like many people here, I sat through the Second Reading of the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill on Monday and looked, mostly in vain, for other Conservative Back Benchers. I know that the hon. Gentleman's commitment to the environment is not necessarily shared by everybody in his party.

Let us not forget that not only are you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a member of the Select Committee; our distinguished Minister is a member, too. The way in which the Committee's work pre-empted some, or even much, of the work that subsequently became the Bill presented to Parliament on Monday, shows the relationship that is now developing, in which very detailed work is done in Select Committees. The interplay between their work and that of the other bodies that care informs the drafting of legislation. It is important that our work in this Committee, of which I am vice-chair, has a role that cuts across all Departments.

Our role is to press the Government. I seem to remember that when my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister set up the Committee, he said that its role would be that of a ball chasing the Government. If we are really to influence the Government, we need to make sure that all Departments can work together, as team players, to do their bit, knowing what part they have to play and what contribution they have to make, so that they can go away and do it.

Perhaps this debate will give the Minister more ammunition if he goes to the Treasury to say that more funding is needed, or to the Home Office to ask why more local police have not taken advantage of the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 and used the new powers to tackle environmental crime as well.

Debates such as this are useful because we are putting pressure on the Minister to ensure that other Departments deliver, too. Environment crime needs to be considered in the round, otherwise we will not be successful in dealing with it, so we want to put that at the top of the agenda. Although I was not a member of the Sub-Committee, as a member of the main Committee I think that this is an important report. The considered contributions that we have heard so far vouch for that.

More than anything else, our Government are about transforming communities, regeneration and solving problems. As a constituency MP, which is the experience that I bring to the House, I think that if we in our constituencies cannot deal with issues that affect people locally, we cannot have any credibility in dealing with national or international issues. I was instrumental in getting a pilot project for a police priority area set up in a part of my constituency where there were huge problems with drugs and other aspects of crime, which were almost impossible to deal with. Once we received the funding from the Home Office and were able to deal with some of the bigger problems, the agenda shifted to what the report calls low-level environmental crime. It quickly became clear that that needed to be seen in the context of the wider Home Office agenda.

Once people started to deal with some of the problems of drug dealing, they soon began to say, "What about the dumped mattresses and television sets? Every time I go outside my front door there is rubbish ankle-deep in the gutters and on the streets." At that point they need a team of neighbourhood wardens, not just the police. It quickly becomes clear that we are talking about ways to engage the whole community and the institutions that serve and represent them in dealing, together, with low-level environmental crime. To people on the ground those issues are not a low priority; they are, as my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Clark) said, the highest possible priority, which is why it is so important that we deal with the problems and why the two reports will help the Government.

The response to the report from my right hon. Friend the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality was a breath of fresh air, particularly on issues such as fly-tipping. It seemed as though we had done the hard work and the Government were ready to legislate, were already consulting and were able to make swift progress.

Ms Drown: The report says that it is vital for local authorities to take the lead in the fight against fly-tipping. Are there recommendations about budgets? If local authorities were to take some work away from the Environment Agency there could be an argument about whether budgets should be moved. Does my hon. Friend agree that we need to get more money to local authorities so that they can do more to tackle the problem, albeit that some of the money should come from the imposition of higher fines for fly-tipping? Does she agree that there is a problem of resources for tackling fly-tipping?

Ms Walley: I am grateful for that intervention, because my hon. Friend has identified an ongoing issue that the Minister should address in his reply. We are dealing with the cost of fly-tipping. We can look at it from many perspectives, but we need to consider the financial and environmental costs. We need a framework to enable us to look at how to mix the costs of dealing with the issue.

One point that I want to get across in my brief contribution today is that we cannot separate costs and enforcement from the wider agenda. If DEFRA is to take on board the recommendations of our two reports, it must look at the whole picture. It is best placed to do that.

In reply to my hon. Friend's intervention, if the Government are confident that all European directives and the regulations that come from them are properly enforced, in accordance with a timetable, we must consider the recycling element and avoid the problems that we have had—for example, the fridge mountain—in respect of any future regulations. We must also deal with the end-of-life vehicles directive and the waste electrical and electronic equipment directive. At each stage of implementation we must have in place whatever is needed: licensed sites, the means of disposal and a duty of care. There will be a cost to the Environment Agency for dealing with that.

If, somehow, we enable local authorities, with the Environment Agency and the police, to do that competently and efficiently through the powers that we give them, that will change the balance and we will be looking at a different cost. The cost will be different if, as part of the equation, we ensure that every local authority in the country is enthusiastic about recycling and is meeting its targets. The cost will be different if we can, as my hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Challen) said, develop a zero tolerance culture whereby no one tolerates dumping and fly-tipping and everyone has the responsibility to do whatever is necessary to deal with waste. At the moment, a local authority may have to spend a wholly disproportionate amount of money on clearing up—the end-of-pipe-solution to dealing with litter and fly-tipping. Somehow, we must shift the balance through education, best practice and design, so that the money that is already being spent is used to prevent fly-tipping.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: I am following the hon. Lady's argument with great interest. Clearly, if the measures that the Government are putting in place on top of existing measures work, the cost will fall because there will not be as much of a problem to deal with. It strikes me that if we eventually move closer to a zero waste environment, there will not be anything to dump.

Ms Walley: Let us hope that that day comes quickly.

The point that I really want to make is that if we want to change the way in which we deal with waste, and if we want to end the culture in which people think that it is all right to drop litter and to fly-tip because they can get away with it as there will be no enforcement, we need some transitional arrangements, and with that comes a need for transitional funding. I become a little uncomfortable when Governments invite bids and some are successful and some are not. It is necessary, perhaps through the work that DEFRA does with the Treasury, to look at public service agreements and to concentrate much more on targets. We could then consider extra transitional funding for local authorities to enable them to change how they operate services, moving away from cleaning up and using the money more constructively for prevention and—I shall come to this later—education. It is important to send that message out clearly.

If we are to deal with some of these issues, we need to look at how the environmental crime agenda links to the Department of Trade and Industry. We all know that there is a problem with asbestos removal, for example—I cannot remember which Member mentioned asbestos earlier—because it is a hazardous material and has to be removed safely. If we have licensed processes that can deal with that effectively, then the quicker we can have them in place, the more likely we are to have proper disposal. We are also more likely to find producers fulfilling a duty of care rather than people thinking that they have got to dump material at midnight when no one is looking, so scarring the landscape.

With regulation there will always come huge opportunities for business, which can contribute to the country's improved economic efficiency. For example, as well as new ways of tackling this low-level crime, there could be blue-sky thinking about linking those processes to the way in which new businesses will, hopefully, be set up. I hope that DEFRA could play a leading role in that.

Given that when we talk about the environment it is always about what needs to be done internationally, nationally and locally, I do not think that I can avoid a brief mention of the scale of the problem in my constituency. I had an opportunity to speak briefly in the Second Reading debate on Monday, when I mentioned my hopes that Stoke-on-Trent city council could be the subject of a pilot project with the Environment Agency. It would look how we could involve the magistrates, the police, the local authority, neighbourhood wardens, residents associations and educational establishments in having a really big spring clean-up, getting everybody engaged while making sure that we had proper enforcement by the magistrates. This is not a criticism of magistrates, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but perhaps we could have more environmental awareness among magistrates. Perhaps you might like to initiate that. If the Minister could get back to me in due course, giving some indication whether my suggestion could be a proposal from Stoke-on-Trent city council, I would be grateful.

One of the other issues flagged up in our report is that of abandoned vehicles. I have some figures from Staffordshire which may be of interest in this debate, if only to show the scale of the problem. From April 2003 to March 2004, 2,640 cases of abandoned vehicles in Stoke-on-Trent were reported to the police. The figure for the whole of Staffordshire was 7,845. The number reported to the local authority was 2,000. The number removed by police in Stoke-on-Trent was 349. The number removed by the local authority was 500. So we are talking in the region of 800 abandoned vehicles dealt with, as opposed to 2,640 reported. The number set on fire was 295.

If one looks at the cost of all of that—we were talking about funding just now—one finds that Staffordshire fire service is having to spend £2.6 million a year dealing with abandoned vehicles that have been set alight. I know that because my constituency has a site of special scientific interest. Hardly a weekend goes by when there is not a car abandoned on the SSSI and set alight. Apart from anything else, it is polluting the nature reserve. As an aside, I would like to see far more commitment to ensuring that that we protect and conserve SSSIs.

If one thinks about how the £2.6 million spent by Staffordshire fire service last year could be better spent dealing with life-threatening events and fire safety assessment, it becomes clear that whatever the costs of dealing with environmental crime are, we are already paying them. We must therefore act innovatively, and in a way that cuts across Government. We must also act at local level, as we have to team up nationally and locally to ensure that we do not spend money in that wasteful way. If for no other reason, we must do something about environmental crime.

The Staffordshire fire service told me that it costs £55 to remove each abandoned vehicle. I must commend the Home Office on the abandoned vehicles initiative. I badgered the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, which is based in Swansea, to send representatives to my constituency last year. They came, bringing special equipment and machinery, and I set up a road safety initiative, along with the local authority. We got quite a few vehicles and dealt with them. The powers that the Government are now introducing to enable abandoned vehicles to be dealt with in seven days, as opposed to the long-winded procedure that applies at the moment, are most welcome. It would be even better if we could reach a situation where vehicles are not being dumped or abandoned.

That, too, takes us back to the European legislation, to the end-of-life vehicles directive and to the way in which we recycle, or deal with, things when they come to the end of their life. It takes us back to the question of responsibility, which applies as much to chewing gum as to televisions and all the technology that so quickly becomes redundant as new models outdo the others. Producer liability and responsibility is important, and it must be seen as part and parcel of all this.

I am conscious of time so I will just return to the issues that I wanted to flag up. As I said on Monday, people can legislate until the cows come home, introducing new powers for local authorities. However, those authorities need to be retrained, from their chief executive or council manager down to the elected members and residents associations. If we do not all get together and communicate, how will we solve this problem? What can we do about it? Our legislation will not have the impact on local communities that we want it to have.

My message to the Minister, as chair of the Sub-Committee on Education for Sustainable Development, is that we want to see leadership from DEFRA on education and communication. That needs to go right the way across business. We need major companies—whether it is Michelin in Stoke-on-Trent or other leading companies throughout England and Scotland—the Government and industry in general to show us how they will communicate a powerful message.

We need to replace the money that came from ENCAMS for education on sustainable development projects and initiatives. We need the Department for Education and Skills to single out education for sustainable development in the way that it does, for example, for sport. We need to build on the commitment to the environment of our young people in primary schools. If we do not do those things, what we are saying here will fall on deaf ears.

I do not question the Minister's leadership, but my message to him, more than anything else, is that we need more leadership from DEFRA to ensure education at every level, whether it is educating senior Whitehall officials or providing for more thorough education locally using, for example, technical qualifications. We face the major challenge of educating people for sustainable development.

The recommendations from these reports are very good, and the Government are proceeding with them in legislation in an excellent way. We are backing that. We understand our role as global citizens. People need to be aware of all these issues. I hope that our short debate will empower the Minister strongly to communicate that message to other Departments.

4.5 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): My hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Sue Doughty) is unable to be with us today. We are doing a job swap this week: she covered the Second Reading of the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill and I am covering for her in this Chamber this afternoon.

It is good to be reconnected with the Environmental Audit Committee, on which I served for some time. I was delighted to serve under the chairmanship of the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam), the predecessor of the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth). It is good to see that the Committee is continuing to undertake important work in a highly competent and relevant manner. It is also good to be reconnected with some of my colleagues from those days, particularly the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley).

The Environmental Audit Committee was set up by this Government during their early days, and it has been a very useful innovation. The idea of treating the environment cross-departmentally is, as other Members have said, absolutely essential, whatever the item of business. Earlier today I was considering the marine environment and I realised that that requires the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Department of Trade and Industry, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Department for Transport and others to work together. We need that cross-departmental approach and I congratulate the Government on setting up the Committee, even if in other respects their early radical inclinations have given way to cold feet in recent years.

Mrs. Clark: As a current member of the Environmental Audit Committee who has served with the hon. Gentleman, I welcome his complimentary comments about the Committee. However, he threw cold water over those comments by saying that we had got cold feet. Will he give examples of our freezing feet, cold feet or need for central heating?

Norman Baker: Either I expressed myself badly or the hon. Lady misunderstood me. I do not believe that the Committee has got cold feet at all; I am happy to endorse its work. I was referring not to the Committee's cold feet, but to the Government's—in the general sense of their approach to their business, and not only environmental business.

I turn to the scale of the problem of environmental crime, which the Committee has been dealing with. Many people have the impression that such crime is not terribly important, does not matter much and is all low level—someone chucking away a piece of chewing gum or dropping a piece of litter. Are we serious in saying that that needs to be dealt with? Members who have spoken, including the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Clark), are right to say that one person's litter is someone else's nuisance on the doorstep. The quality of life in a community can suffer greatly if it is badly affected by litter and graffiti. The problem can even become intimidating. It is also true—I do not know whether Home Office statistics show this; I suspect that they do—that an area suffering from environmental crime probably has a high degree of other crime.

It is not simply a matter of one person dropping a piece of litter. Fly-tipping sounds small-scale and innocuous, but it does not simply involve one person who is too lazy to go to the household waste site with grass cuttings from their back garden; it is big business. People set up companies offering a service to customers who want to behave legitimately. They then take a lot of money off those customers and pretend that they will dispose of the waste properly. However, they simply dump it in the first available field, and everything is pure profit. Criminals are involved in fly-tipping and that is a serious matter for all of us.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: The hon. Gentleman is entirely right. He may be interested to know that in our report on fly-tipping we mention that the Environment Agency stressed its frustration with the use of the term "fly-tipping" by the general public and the Government. It considers that the term disguises the gravity of the offence and prefers the phrase "the illegal dumping of waste".

Norman Baker: I entirely agree. Language is important in this matter as in all others.

Fly-tipping is big business and I fear that it is going to increase because the Government have increased landfill tax. The Government are right in discouraging landfill, which is the worst option for waste disposal. However, the consequence is that the gap between the proper figure to be paid and zero, which is what it costs to dump in a field, is becoming ever wider. As the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North said, we need to ensure that a proper system is in place in order to educate. We also need to get the community to co-operate and report such crimes more than at the moment, and ensure that those who perpetrate the crimes are caught, properly prosecuted and fined according to their means. That chain does not exist, and that is why changes must be made.

Hazardous waste is pernicious and if dumped in the countryside it is potentially far more serious than odd bits of organic waste, litter or anything else. Hazardous waste can be dangerous to human and animal health, and it can pollute watercourses and so on. That is why it is important to deal with the problem. The Minister is familiar with the ban on co-disposal. It came in on 16 July, and we have been examining whether it will present a problem. The Government say that co-disposal has not subsequently presented a problem. I hope that they are right, but I fear that they may be somewhat complacent. Some places where hazardous waste has been dumped illegally may not yet have become apparent, but, more than that, what happens if someone decides that they have some hazardous waste to dump? The nearest legal place to take it could be many, many miles away—that is certainly the case in my constituency—and the temptation to put it in a farmer's field is enormous. When that farmer finds that he suddenly has a load of asbestos in his field, what does he do? If he reports the matter, he is liable for dealing with it. That is grossly unfair, but it is the legal position. The temptation must be either to ignore it or bury it.

I suggest to the Minister that one reason why we may not have seen a high level of reporting of hazardous waste dumping is because of that sort of scenario. We need to find the answer to the conundrum of how we ensure that the person who dropped the waste, and not the person on whose land it is dropped, is prosecuted. The latter already has to suffer a nuisance, a problem and inconvenience, and to end up with the cost of disposal as well is unfair. I do not suggest that solving the problem is easy; a farmer could be in league with a polluter and pretend that he was not aware of the waste. I do not underestimate the problem, but it is a serious issue.

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but the Environment Agency does a very good job monitoring fly-tipping, and he will be aware that the Flycapture database has been upgraded. The agency tells me that although there is evidence of the fly-tipping of hazardous waste, it has not detected any increase since the introduction of co-disposal. I have sympathy with the innocent victims, but it is sometimes difficult with farmland to identify those who—very rarely—are colluding, and those who are not committing an offence. There was a recent case of a farmer who was fined £20,000 for burying fridges on his land. He was in fact also the Conservative leader of the local council.

Norman Baker: There is innovation in local government under the Conservatives, if nothing else.

The Government can do quite a lot. First, they can lead an education campaign and challenge the idea of a throwaway society. It becomes far too easy simply to believe that packaging does not matter very much—just chuck it away, and no one bothers about it. That is why I am particularly heartened by the example provided by the hon. Member for East Surrey of the crisp packet thrown out the window of the car. While supermarkets are producing 17 billion plastic bags every year, which are then—who knows what happens to them?—disposed of in some way because they are not recyclable in any meaningful sense, while fast-food outlets are producing cartons that are just thrown away because they are contaminated by food and also not recyclable in any meaningful sense, and while we have bad practice from industry, which people see every day, it is difficult to get across the message that waste is bad. Waste is implicit in the way in which society and industry in particular operates, and that includes some of our leading retailers. There is an issue about education not only for the public but for business, and the Government have a role in that.

Secondly, we must find a way to reduce waste, not simply allow it to increase every year. It is disappointing that the municipal waste figures show a 19 per cent. increase over the past six years. The Government's hierarchy, which I entirely endorse, has minimisation at the top, but we do not see much about it.

I was astonished that the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill does not explicitly include variable waste charging. The Minister's boss said in a speech in the summer that it would be included, but it suddenly disappeared. Some variable waste charging or financial incentive to reduce waste is key to minimisation, and I very much hope that that will be explicitly included by the time deliberations on the Bill conclude.

Mr. Morley: I just want to deal with that point in case I forget it in my winding up. It is true that DEFRA is keen on the idea of incentivising waste minimisation. However, we have discovered that primary legislation is not necessary to introduce incentive schemes.

Norman Baker: I am interested to hear that. If the Minister could provide a note on that, I would ensure that it is circulated to Lib Dem councils up and down the country. I hope that the other parties will do something similar.

I do not wish to be churlish, but the Government could also be better prepared for European Union directives. I mention the word "fridges". I will not say any more, as everybody knows the story of the fridges. I touched on the subject of hazardous waste. The issue of batteries is the next one down the line. We will shortly be required to recycle 44 per cent. of our batteries, yet we are recycling less than 1 per cent. of them at the moment. I am not talking about car batteries—the Minister's usual response—but about household batteries. I understand that the only facility in the country, in Bristol, has been shut down, so we are not at all prepared for that directive either.

Then there are abandoned cars. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North referred to abandoned cars and implied that the problem was nobody's fault. I must tell her that the Government had the option of making the producer responsible with immediate effect, but under DTI pressure—this comes back to the point that she made about how Departments work together—they chose to make the last owner responsible until 2007. Of course, the last owner has the car of least value and is the person who is most likely to dump it. Therefore, it is hardly surprising that 300,000-plus vehicles have been dumped in the countryside. The Government made a mistake. We could have avoided the abandoned car mountain.

The other thing that the Government can do, of course, is legislate. I pay tribute to them for the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill. I endorse the welcome that my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford gave it on Monday. It contains several useful measures that will go a long way to tackling some of the problems.

As I am not a member of the Environmental Audit Committee and do not have to take the completely non-partisan approach that others are taking today, I say in passing that it is astonishing that the Conservatives could not support the Bill. I can find no credible explanation for their position. One reason they gave for not supporting the Bill was that it "focuses predominantly on urban issues while neglecting rural areas".—[Official Report, 10 January 2005; Vol. 429, c. 48.]

Let them tell that to the farmers in my constituency who will have asbestos dumped in their fields. The Conservatives' position is ludicrous, and I cannot understand why they have taken it.

Ms Walley: I cannot understand their position either. To those of us who were present throughout the whole of the Second Reading debate, it is clear that waste knows no boundaries, and that the Bill applies just as much to rural areas as to urban ones. I could not understand the response from the official Opposition.

Norman Baker: Frankly, I had hoped that we might have a united approach on the matter. I suspect that if the hon. Member for East Surrey had more influence, we might have one. We must send out a message to the population at large that the issue is serious, and it would be helpful to have cross-party support for some of the measures that the Government are proposing. The Government will certainly have support from my party. To take a partisan approach, the absence of Conservative support for the Bill is a political gift in the run-up to the election. However, perhaps that is beyond the remit of this debate.

I particularly welcome in the Bill the greater use of fixed penalties as an alternative to prosecution. We shall explore in Committee the issues that are rightly raised about how they are administered, but the principle is right. I also welcome the removal of the defence for acting under an employer's instructions and the fact that the Government are seeking to close that loophole. I welcome the increase in penalties, which have been referred to, and the ability of local authorities and the Environment Agency to recover their investigation and clear-up costs, which is another useful addition to the Bill.

I also welcome the proposals on noise. The Minister will know that I am particularly concerned about car alarms, which are intrusive. Often they go on for a long time. They do not appear to protect the car, because everybody assumes that they are false alarms. Even if they are not, by the time somebody gets there, the car may have gone. They are particularly useless. There is much more modern technology in the form of, for example, silent alarms that contact a mobile phone or pager, and tracking devices under the car. Car alarms are 1970s technology that we ought to phase out. They are an environmental nuisance and do not perform any sensible crime prevention role. I hope that the Minister will look carefully at our proposals to strengthen the Bill in respect of car alarms and burglar alarms, with which there is a similar problem.

Of course, we must identify the culprit. If we are to be sensible about tackling environmental crime, there must be an expectation that whoever commits the crime is likely to be caught and prosecuted for it. I fear that at the moment we do not have that expectation. People believe that they can get away with it, that they are not going to be caught and that, even if they are, they will be fined next to nothing. A parliamentary answer that I received from the Minister following a question that I asked about the average fine imposed on businesses prosecuted by the Environment Agency in each financial year—businesses, not individuals who might be fly-tipping—revealed that the average fine last year was £7,229. That is for all environmental crimes, not simply fly-tipping. That is next to nothing for many crimes. If the business is a big one, and many of them are, £7,000 is nothing.

If the Minister talks regularly to Barbara Young at the Environment Agency, as I am sure he does—she is very competent at her job—he will know that she despairs at the level of fines that are given out for environmental crimes compared with, say, financial crimes. What about fines in legislation from the Department of Trade and Industry? I do not know the fines provided for in the Consumer Credit Bill, but I am sure that if somebody got caught in that context the fine would be a lot more than £7,000. There are £1 million fines in Treasury Bills. Financial crimes are taken very seriously, but environmental crimes are treated as afterthoughts. I would argue that £7,000 is nothing.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: The hon. Gentleman is making an extremely good point. Will he reflect on the fact that, although on this side of the Atlantic we are prone to being highly critical of the Americans for their attitude towards the environment, in fact the United States has a much more onerous system of fines for environmental abuse? We could learn a lesson or two from the Americans on that front.

Norman Baker: I entirely agree. One should not assume—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not—that George Bush epitomises the United States. He does not. A lot of good work goes on, both in the respect that the hon. Gentleman referred to and in relation to work on climate change by some of the north-east states. There is good stuff coming out of America. George Bush is not part of it, but never mind.

We have to ensure that the penalties that are given out for environmental crimes are commensurate with the level of the crime, the impact on the environment and the capacity of the person responsible to pay. If the level of fine is such that frankly it is no deterrent, why bother having it in the first place? I fear that that is where we are. We must find a better way of dealing with the situation. As was mentioned earlier, the Government are increasing the penalty for fly-tipping to £50,000. That is welcome, but it is not much good if the fines are not imposed. We have heard today about training for magistrates. Judicial training is quite rightly part of what is being considered by the Environmental Audit Committee. I wonder whether there is a case for an environmental court with specially trained magistrates who concentrate on these issues, come across them regularly and have experience of what level of fine is appropriate in particular circumstances. My fear is that environmental crimes come before magistrates relatively infrequently, if not rarely, which means—with no disrespect to them—that they do not have the experience to know what is appropriate. An environmental court might be one way of dealing with that. Will the Minister comment on that?

We must first identify the culprit. I am concerned about the resources that are available to the Environment Agency in particular. It is embarking on a so-called light-touch regulation strategy, which might be sensible in some regards, but seems like a way in which to deal with a budget that is not sufficient for its needs. If the Minister reads the parliamentary answers that he has given me, he will find that, given its intended inspection regime, the number of inspections carried out by the Environment Agency has decreased, despite the fact that its target has dropped by a third. It is inspecting far fewer premises than it used to, so the chances of it picking up on something are reduced.

As for cameras to pick up fly-tipping, they are few and far between. Particular sites in my constituency are notorious for fly-tipping. I am still waiting for the Environment Agency to provide cameras for those sites, but it has not got them, so there is clearly a need to examine the funding of the Environment Agency and to ensure that local authorities play their part and receive the commitment and understanding that perhaps sometimes they do not enjoy.

I endorse the Environmental Audit Committee's recommendation on banning vans. It is an interesting and innovative way in which to examine one of the problems. There are other ways, such as compulsory remediation, of which I am in favour. I am in favour of someone who is caught writing graffiti on a wall being made to scrub it off. It is not sufficient to leave that action to someone else. People should be confronted with the consequences of their crimes far more than they are now. That applies to environmental crimes as much as it does to anything else. However, sadly, people are not often caught.

According to figures given to me by the Minister, only 0.6 per cent. of instances of landfill pollution in one year—an environmental crime—resulted in a fine. What incentive is that for people not to commit a crime? Catching people is serious, as is what happens to them once they are caught. Although the Government have made some progress with the Bill that was debated on Monday, under which people will be prosecuted and have to pay higher fines, I am not sure yet whether they have done enough to ensure that people are caught in the first place. I should be grateful if the Minister assured me about that.

I come now to environmental liability insurance. Part of dealing with corporate environmental crime—if I can call it that—is to make sure that companies are properly covered and can pay and take responsibility for environmental crimes. On 16 June 2003, I tabled a written question to the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs asking what was its policy "on the placing on businesses of a requirement for compulsory environmental liability insurance".

That is important, especially if the consequences of environmental damage are significant. The reply stated:

"The Government's policy therefore is not to support compulsory financial security."—[Official Report, 16 June 2003; Vol. 407, c.7W.]

I do not agree. The Minister must reflect on that reply. As he will know, there is a proposal for the environmental liability directive winging its way round Europe. If he can say whether the Government are changing their position on such matters, I should be interested to hear it.

Mr. Ainsworth: Is there not a potential problem with the hon. Gentleman's suggestion? The last thing that we want is an increase in the penalty regime—which everyone agrees will happen—only to find that companies are insuring themselves against the consequences of committing environmental offences.

Norman Baker: I understand that point, but I suspect that the insurance industry itself would ensure that there was a cut-off point above which it would not pay out. We are talking about large environmental crimes, such as the pollution of water sources.

Mr. Ainsworth: Why should an insurance company pay out in the event of a company committing an offence? I am not even sure that that would be legal.

Norman Baker: There are offences that are committed intentionally and offences that are committed unintentionally. A distinction can be made between the two. Liability insurance is worth pursuing; it is being considered in Europe. As for personal liability, it is also worth pursuing directors of companies more often. Such measures would bring home to businesses the fact that they should take matters more seriously.

I welcome the Aarhus convention and the extra ability that environmental regulations now provide for securing information about the environment. I hope that local authorities in particular will respond to requests. I will certainly be asking the Minister for information under those regulations. I note with interest that under the Aarhus convention, oral requests are sufficient; they do not need to be put in writing. Can the Minister say whether matters we raise in debates—let alone in parliamentary questions—are now treated on the basis that is required of the Government under the Aarhus convention, or will they be treated on a separate basis?

4.31 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I warmly congratulate the Environmental Audit Committee, and especially its Chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth), on the reports. I want to put it on the record that I acknowledge that the Government occasionally do positive things, and I think that setting up that Select Committee was a very positive contribution to parliamentary scrutiny. We have had two constructive reports, as well as an excellent debate on them this afternoon.

At the outset, I should declare a relevant interest that is listed in the Register of Members' Interests: I am currently doing a placement with Network Rail under the Industry and Parliament Trust scheme.

Mr. Morley: Digging the tracks?

Miss McIntosh: Not quite.

I should also say that I am one of the many people in the country who chew gum—ENCAMS estimates that there are 20 million of us—although I assure the Committee that I dispose of it in an environmentally and socially responsible way.

I welcome this debate. The Select Committee has built up a high level of expertise through the evidence that it has taken and its study visits. I am disappointed not to have seen the photographs of its eminent Chairman being placed in front of the chewing gum extractor machine, but Committee members can share that moment with me later.

I want to explain my party's position on the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill. I relish the possibility of seeing the Minister and other Members present in this Chamber serving on the Standing Committee that scrutinises the Bill. Its first sitting is on Tuesday, and I hope that everyone has bid for a place on it.

We took a principled position on the Bill, and tabled, and voted for, a reasoned amendment. We did not vote against the Second Reading of the Bill. I contrast that with the position of the Liberal Democrats: they spoke at length on Second Reading of their support for the Bill in principle, but they have tabled a large number of wrecking amendments, which I am sure they will try to justify when the time comes. We have adopted a more positive approach, which we look forward to pursuing.

Norman Baker: It is difficult to describe the Conservatives' tabling of an unreasonable amendment as positive, and to criticise the Liberal Democrats as negative when we support the Bill.

Miss McIntosh: On Monday, the Liberal Democrat spokesman said that his party supported the Bill and would vote for it on Second Reading. However, the party has tabled a historically high number of what I would call wrecking amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I assist the hon. Lady? "Wrecking amendment" has a technical meaning in this context. It refers to an amendment designed to destroy the principle of the clause or subsection to which it relates, and it is not selectable by the Chair.

Miss McIntosh: In many instances that will indeed be the case, because many of the amendments merely delete subsections.

Can we dwell for a moment on the scale of the problem? I want to refer to ENCAMS written evidence, which is annexed to the Select Committee's ninth report, "Fly-tipping, Fly-posting, Litter, Graffiti and Noise". In September 2003, the Home Office antisocial behaviour unit stated that the estimated total cost per year of antisocial behaviour was £3.3 billion, with an antisocial act being reported on average every two seconds. It also said that the estimated cost of a one-off town centre clean-up of chewing gum alone was in the region of £25,000. That is staggering.

I referred briefly to Network Rail, which has told me the cost of one aspect of the evidence that the Select Committee considered. I do not know whether the Committee took evidence from Network Rail, but we on the Transport Committee took similar evidence on the clear-up by London Underground tube lines and Metronet. Under the performance regimes in the Network Rail regulated track access agreements, the average cost of delay to a train is £42 per minute. Using that average daily cost of delay, if 10 trains were delayed for one hour while graffiti was cleaned up, the cost would be £25,200. If we add that up over a year, we see that we are faced with substantial costs in one industry alone.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: I take it that my hon. Friend is talking about an entirely hypothetical situation as there is not much evidence that any graffiti is cleaned up on railway lines or bridges.

Miss McIntosh: It is not for me to speak for Network Rail, but I would be delighted to put my hon. Friend in contact with it. I am rather surprised that, if he is so concerned about it, the Select Committee did not take evidence from Network Rail.

Mr. Ainsworth: We may do so in due course.

Miss McIntosh: I certainly hope so.

In an early-day motion in July, we recorded the fact that litter has increased by 12 per cent. in 2003 according to the Department's figures. The disposal of chewing gum on town centre streets increased by 94 per cent. in the same year.

Ms Drown: Would the hon. Lady support the idea of some sort of levy on the chewing gum manufacturers, perhaps in proportion to their profits, to recover the costs of the damage that chewing gum does to our streets?

Miss McIntosh: I should have thought that a levy or a purchase tax would be the least-favoured option among Conservative Members, as we are a low-tax party. I assure the hon. Lady and members of the Environmental Audit Committee that I have been in contact with Wrigley's. Having studied at Aarhus university—I am half-Danish—I hope to make similar overtures to Stimorol. I shall return to the subject of chewing gum. We could focus a little more on the means of dealing with the problem, but I should have thought that a levy or purchase tax was the least favoured option.

Turning to the first of the Committee's two reports and its conclusions, I think that fines often focus on those who are easily identified, but they are often the poorest in society and the least able to pay. I believe that fines should reflect the ability to pay. I would not dream of encroaching on magistrates courts, perhaps because I am better informed on that subject. As a non-practising member of the Faculty of Advocates, I know that judges are given training on these matters, and I am sure that magistrates would welcome similar training.

I express my disappointment at the lack of a national database for environmental crime; that would be a positive step. The Committee's recommendation on compulsory remediation work is very welcome; it may be more appropriate than a custodial sentence. I shall be interested to hear the Minister's response to that because there was no Government response to "Environmental Crime and the Courts". It would be helpful to hear whether the Government support the Committee's recommendation on compulsory remediation work.

The Committee concluded that community sentences are inflexibly tied to custodial sentences, limiting the courts in passing an appropriate sentence for environmental offences. It will be interesting to hear the Minister's response to that. The Chairman expressed eloquently the need to operate the "polluter pays" principle and ensure that the fine is larger than any amount by which a company might have profited by perpetrating an environmental crime. The Committee rightly identified, in its report and in the evidence that it took, the problem of avoidance of fine payments. How the Government will deal with that is of great interest to us, too.

Turning to the ninth report and the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, the Secretary of State said during the Bill's Second Reading on Monday 10 January that fines will be reinvested by councils in cleaning up environmental crimes, but perhaps her most staggering statement was that the powers vested in the Bill are only discretionary and carry no corresponding duties on local authorities. I referred earlier to the regulatory impact assessment annexed to the Bill, in which it is estimated that local authorities' revenue from an estimated 50 per cent. take-up on fixed penalty notices would be £3 million. A 75 per cent. take-up would render more than £4 million.

I should like to reiterate this afternoon a powerful point that I made on Second Reading. If the take-up is lower than 50 per cent.—possibly as low as 20 to 30 per cent.—there will be a correspondingly low revenue stream to councils. The most pressing and impressive conclusion of the Committee's report was that there is a singular lack of resources, a point that was echoed by the Liberal Democrat spokesman this afternoon. Perhaps the Minister will respond to that. If, as the Committee has said, there is low take-up, how do the Government think the Bill will resolve that when the powers are only discretionary, as the Secretary of State herself said on Monday? The report also said that crime against the environment should be recognised as an aggravating factor before the courts. Does the Minister accept that?

On the problems of implementing fixed penalty notices, particularly in relation to litter, chewing gum and abandoned cars, what is the Minister's response to the Law Society's point that local authority and Environment Agency officers, who are to issue fixed penalty notices, must be sufficiently well trained and properly qualified to implement them, because of the consequences that will flow, not just from the fixed penalty, but from its not being paid? The Law Society is deeply concerned about that and I should like to know the Minister's reaction.

Will the Minister also look favourably on the suggestion, made in the debate this afternoon, that police officers maintain co-responsibility with environmental or local authority officers? Or does he think that residual responsibility for implementing the powers in the Bill should remain with the police, following the recommendations of the reports? Has he had the opportunity to give that any thought?

Defining chewing gum deposits as litter, which was touched on this afternoon, carries with it the round-the-clock duty on local authorities to remove it. As Westminster city council has said on the record, that brings a huge increase in costs. I wonder whether, having spent £60,000 commissioning a report on all the various ways of discarding chewing gum, the Government will consider providing resources to anything like that generous level if chewing gum is to be redefined as litter.

On the bigger issue of fly-tipping, recommendation 19 was very positive. In my view, it will have teeth only if the Government agree with the Conservative proposal to make fly-tipping an arrestable offence. At the moment, the Bill does not go that far. Does not the Minister agree that it is no good simply to seize a vehicle accused of dumping waste, abandoned vehicles, fridge-freezers or white goods or being used for any other form of fly-tipping, if the perpetrator of the environmental crime is allowed to walk away and repeat the crime using another vehicle? That would constitute a loophole in the Bill, and we have tabled an amendment to deal with that. I hope that the Minister will respond positively to that this afternoon.

I alluded earlier to the tremendous growth in fly-tipping since 2001: the Environment Agency has reported a 43 per cent. increase. As the Committee pointed out, other environmental crimes, such as fly-posting and creating graffiti or litter, are also on the increase. In 2003, Westminster city council reported that fly-posting had increased by 27 per cent. since 2002. It says that the current approach to fly-posting is not working.

As one hon. Member said this afternoon, the Environment Agency does not have adequate powers to deal with fly-tipping, so we look to the Minister to increase those powers, and not just on seizing vehicles; its powers of arrest must be extended as well. Would the Minister also look favourably on enabling the agency to access the DVLA registration database? At the moment, it is excluded from that.

Similarly, existing punishments are not a sufficient deterrent to fly-tippers, and if the two reports are to mean anything at all, we must extend powers in that regard. The Environment Agency should be given greater funding, stronger powers and more resources to deal with fly-tipping. Specifically, there should be more environment officers, who should be given the power of arrest in serious cases and, as I said, direct computer access to the DVLA database.

Local authorities must take primary responsibility for preventing and clearing up fly-tipping. Although the Environment Agency would become involved in the most serious cases, local authorities should take the lead in the majority of incidents because, although many authorities take their responsibilities very seriously, in our view some are happy to leave the burden to the agency, which maintains ultimate responsibility. The agency has neither the manpower nor the resources to deal with incidents of fly-tipping in a specific area, and thus the ultimate responsibility for more minor incidents should be shifted to the local authorities. Does the Minister agree?

Ms Drown: I would be grateful if the hon. Lady clarified her position. She is calling for more resources for the Environment Agency, but she is saying that local authorities should take the lead. Does she also think that local authorities need more resources to deal with fly-tipping? If so, how does that square with her being a member of a low-tax party, which will not even support a surcharge on the profits of the chewing gum companies to deal with the problem of chewing gum? Is not she then saying that income tax should sort out that problem as well?

Miss McIntosh: I think that the hon. Lady has bought herself a place on the Standing Committee that will scrutinise the Bill: she can then see how our amendments would deal with that. One of the principal reasons for opposing the Bill—as, I think, the Chairman of the Select Committee himself said—is that the resources allocated are inadequate. As I said, the fact that fixed penalty notices will probably not reach the 50 per cent. take-up threshold means that neither the local authorities nor the Environment Agency will have sufficient resources. That is something that we will return to when scrutinising the Bill next week.

Sentences for environmental crime are too low. In our view, the Government must take action to ensure that the law acts as a deterrent to all those involved in such crime, and that includes fly-posting. The Committee describes the current sentences for fly-posting as "derisory". Noise is not considered an environmental crime and data on noise incidence are not collated centrally. Does the Minister agree that such data should be sent to his Department by local authorities annually so that it can take an overview? Does he agree that noise nuisance should be a crime under the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003?

Recognising environmental crimes and acknowledging the increased powers for local authority and Environment Agency officers in the Bill, as recommended by both the reports before us, we have to ask where the necessary extra resources will come from. Where powers are, for example, transferred from the police to local authorities—that applies, in particular, to removing abandoned vehicles and dealing with stray dogs—will there be a corresponding transfer of authority? The Bill sets out the powers but not the corresponding duties of local authorities—those are not my words but those of the Secretary of State on Second Reading on Monday.

Will the Minister therefore confirm that the powers set out in the Bill are purely discretionary? If that is the case, the consideration of the reports is timely. As the operation of that excellent machine in Leeds shows, many of the powers to remove litter, chewing gum and abandoned cars already exist. Many Conservative-controlled councils, such as Westminster city council, are implementing those powers. Other councils, controlled by the Liberal Democrats and by Labour, are not. Therefore, in responding to the two reports, it is up to the Secretary of State to make the case that the Bill goes as far as the Select Committee wants it to.

4.52 pm

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): It is a pleasure to respond to an excellent report. It is also a pleasure to be under your chairmanship, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was pleased with the recommendations of the Committee and I thought that the Chairman, the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth), made a very good speech. It is not the first time that I have found myself agreeing with just about everything that he said. I agree with other hon. Members that he is missed from the Opposition Front Bench. I am sure that the Conservatives would not have made the incredible tactical error of opposing the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, which is a popular measure, were he on the Front Bench. As the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) said, the Conservatives oppose it because, they say, the Bill relates to urban and not to rural areas.

Miss McIntosh rose—

Mr. Morley: I am only teasing, but I will give way.

Miss McIntosh: I am most grateful to the Minister for giving way so early in his speech.

One reason that the Bill includes an imbalance is that, whereas waste dumped on urban ground will be removed by the local authority, waste dumped or fly-tipped on private land must be removed by the landowner at his own expense. Does the Minister agree that that is discriminatory against rural dwellers?

Mr. Morley: No, I do not. If the hon. Lady looks at the Bill, she will find that in relation to, for example, households, the person responsible for moving waste is the householder. If it is not the householder, it is the owner of the property—the landowner. Whether the waste has been dumped on property or land, the responsibility falls on the owner. The local authority can remove waste from backyards or gardens, but they can bill the landowner for it. Therefore, responsibility still goes back to the landowner. Therefore, the measure is not discriminatory. I am sure that we can explore that issue in more detail.

I welcome the comments of the hon. Member for East Surrey about the need for a cross-Government approach. Of course, these issues link in with the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003, the Home Office and quality of life issues. I agree that environmental standards, regulation and law must be given a high priority. That is why the Government are bringing forward a Bill now.

The hon. Gentleman gave a number of good examples to show that there is a need for reform. We accept that, and we accept the main thrust of the Committee's reports. He also mentioned the need for a national database. He welcomed the Flycapture database, as do I. The information on the database can, in some circumstances, be used for and related to other activities, although it is true that it is not designed to be compatible in all cases. There is an issue to do with defining "environmental crime". There are some complications, but I am not unsympathetic to the points that have been made. We are stepping things up.

I accept that the more information we have, the better. That is why we are improving all our databases and all information that gives us an idea about environmental activities and things such as waste flows. That helps us with regulation management and making decisions.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned intimidation of people who want to report environmental crime. I accept that that happens on occasions, but intimidation is a serious offence and there are already laws on that—and, incidentally, on the obstruction of an environmental officer going about his or her duties. Those laws can be applied if there is a problem. I am sure that that comes up from time to time.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Aarhus convention. We plan to ratify it this spring, so that it comes into effect in time for the UK to participate fully in the first meeting of the parties to the convention. We have every intention of doing that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Clark) rightly emphasised the fact that environmental issues affect quality of life. There is also a social justice aspect, because it is often people who live in the most deprived areas who suffer the worst environmental degradation. We take that seriously as a party and a Government and want to address that.

My hon. Friend mentioned councils not using their powers. Councils are in many cases obliged to report the environmental activities that they undertake under regulations. They are also accountable to the Environmental Audit Committee and, most importantly, to the people who elect them, whom they represent. Frankly, if councils are not taking environmental issues seriously, it will be no surprise to me if they pay for it at the ballot box.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Challen) mentioned a number of issues to do with enforcement, and touched on the evasion of fines for illegal fishing. As a former Fisheries Minister, I know all about that; in fact, I sanctioned some of those prosecutions and fines. In one case, there was a fine of £1 million. People do try to avoid the fines, principally by going bankrupt. On at least one occasion, people have just left their boat tied up in port and walked away from it. Companies go bust and so avoid the fines.

In other cases, we enforced the fines by seizing the fishing vessels and not allowing them to leave the port. That involves the wonderful, arcane legal procedure of nailing a writ to the mast. As masts these days are made of steel, that is a bit tricky. The procedure should be called sellotaping a writ to the mast. We will have no hesitation in using whatever powers are available to us in enforcing such fines.

On occasions, we despaired because very low fines were imposed on people who made very large sums of money. The report picked up on the point that environmental crimes can be very profitable and fines need to reflect those activities. A £1 million fine reflected the fact that there was large-scale fraud involving valuable fishing catches and environmental damage to fish stocks.

My hon. Friend mentioned the use in Leeds of pouches for gum and cigarette butts. I am very interested in that, not least because those pouches were drawn to my attention by one of my constituents, who is manufacturing them. I think that it is those that Leeds city council is using. I was intrigued by his product. It is very small and cheap. It can be used to dispose of chewing gum and cigarette butts properly. I have drawn it to the attention of my Department and of the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality because we may want to draw it to people's attention. It is an innovative and effective idea.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell mentioned the issue of hypothecation. I am a supporter of hypothecation. I have always been a fan. There are all sorts of ways in which it can be used. That might explain why I have never been a Treasury Minister—my enthusiasm is not universally shared. I have to be honest about that. However, fines go into the Consolidated Fund. I am sure that it would be possible to use that fund to put money back into enforcement, education programmes and perhaps reward schemes—all the various good ideas that members of the Committee have mentioned. I am sure that that is worth exploring. We may want to discuss it during proceedings on the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) mentioned that this issue is a priority for people. That was shown by the turnout for the debate on the Bill, certainly on the Government Benches. I am sure that all of us find, when we talk to our constituents, that fly-tipping, rubbish and graffiti are big, quality-of-life issues. That is particularly the case in certain parts of my constituency. People find those things offensive and should not have to live with them. That is why we are determined to take action. The Committee's report on environmental law, fines and procedures is relevant to how we can improve the situation and take it forward.

Ms Drown: The Minister mentioned some of the priorities of our constituents. Does he accept that noise, which the Environmental Audit Committee also looked at, is a priority as well? I am pleased that, in Swindon, we have an out-of-hours service, but some of our neighbouring boroughs and districts do not. Could he think about trying to co-ordinate with DEFRA, Chartered Institute of Environmental Health officers and the Home Office to ensure that there is an out-of-hours service across the country, so that, wherever there are appalling noise problems, an out-of-hours service is available?

Mr. Morley: Noise is certainly an issue. I am going to touch upon that, because it was raised by a number of Committees. Car alarms are a real nuisance in certain parts of the country. I must confess that I once had a surreal moment parking my car at the car park at Heathrow when Concorde took off. That wonderful feat of engineering was achieved before things such as noise were taken into account. The noise was so great that it made the ground vibrate, which set off about 500 car alarms around me. I understand the need to control that.

Burglar alarms are another issue that is addressed in the Bill. Again, I have to confess that I had to redesign completely the burglar alarm system in our house, because, when we went out and left the cat in, the cat set it off. I never thought that it moved enough to set anything off, but there we are.

Ms Walley: I return to a point to which I referred briefly on Monday. Given the expertise that the Chartered Institute of Environmental Health has, of which my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) reminded us, is there scope for the Government to forge an even closer working relationship with that institute on those issues, including noise, so that, when the Government are developing new powers, enforcement measures, staff training and expertise, the Minister receives the best possible advice? I speak as a vice-president of that institute.

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend is probably aware that we hold that institute in high esteem. It is an important stakeholder in the Department and one of our consultees. We appreciate its input and advice, and I will also look closely at what she has to say.

My hon. Friend mentioned the need to change the culture. That is absolutely right, and we are seeing a welcome culture change in recycling. More and more people are doing it and more and more local authorities are introducing the facilities for it. There is a lot that we can do to build community involvement. Allied with that is environmental education, which is something that my colleagues in the Department for Education and Skills take seriously. We have discussed it in the Green Ministers group. There is more we can do and the Government are considering some interesting ideas, including ensuring that there are appropriate recycling facilities.

My hon. Friend mentioned the potential of pilot schemes and kindly put forward Stoke-on-Trent as a candidate. That touches on what the hon. Member for Lewes said about incentivising schemes. One or two councils have experimented with incentive schemes, and I have been interested in their work. I am interested in considering several approaches. Members of the Committee may be interested to hear that, in our forthcoming five-year plan and budgets, we have put aside £5 million for councils that wish to join pilots to provide incentives for waste collection, and we will make that public in due course.

I assure the hon. Member for Lewes that we are taking forward incentivising. It is part of what my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North said about the need for leadership. I accept that there is a leadership issue when dealing with environmental crime and degradation and when looking for innovation and support. That is a small example of an incentivising scheme to encourage the separation of waste and to help us to meet our targets for minimising as well as recycling and reusing waste. We are trying to give a lead. We accept that the Government are responsible for that and we take it seriously.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned end-of-life vehicles. There are several ways in which one can address producer responsibility for ELVs, and there is a perfectly reasonable debate to be had. I want to emphasise that the responsibility proposed by the Department of Trade and Industry is producer responsibility. Although it is the responsibility of the last owner of the vehicle to take it to a recycling centre, which would be the case under any scheme, the cost of dealing with the vehicles will be met by the manufacturer, not the owner.

Norman Baker: As I understand it, and the Minister can correct me, the measure takes effect in 2007. The Government had the option of making the manufacturer responsible now and during the period up to 2007. Instead they chose to make the last owner responsible up to 2007.

Mr. Morley: I am keen to see that scheme introduced as quickly as possible, but the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that it has to be negotiated with the car companies, facilities have to be in place and there has to be agreement. That takes a little time and people have to be given time to adjust. It has been mentioned that it is important that EU directives are introduced properly. That involves a lead-in time and that is what happened in that case.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the issue of changing the way in which the Environment Agency carries out its enforcement. Its priorities are a decision for its board, its chief executive and its chair. I am keen for risk-based enforcement, whereby a body such as the Environment Agency would decide that its priorities are where the biggest risks of offences are. It could move its resources to that area. There may be other areas in which such a body has a regulatory function where the risks are very low. It makes sense to move more resources into areas with a high risk and to reduce resources where there are low risks. That is about good management and I would expect the Environment Agency to do that. I know that it carries out good management.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the use of cameras. I am keen on that. There are one or two sites in my constituency where I would like them to be used. The problem is not so much their cost, but the fact that it is a labour-intensive process. The issue is that quite a lot of staff and staff time needs to be allocated to undertake that work. However, it is effective in fly-tipping hot spots. I have talks with the Environment Agency. I am well aware that fly-tipping is not uniform around the country. Using its data, the agency can identify parts of the country where there are much higher instances of fly-tipping—for all sorts of reasons—than there are in others. There is also the issue of ensuring that the most effective enforcement takes place.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the environmental liability directive, which is coming in from the EU. We strongly support it and will ensure that it is up and running. He also mentioned insurance. Some of the doubts about that which were expressed by the hon. Member for East Surrey are correct. People cannot get insurance for environmental crimes. It is illegal to do so and it is not available. Insurance can be obtained for an accidental environmental incident. Of course, we want to concentrate on ensuring that we do not get the incidents, rather than on people insuring to pay for the clean-up afterwards.

There are problems about compulsory insurance. It is a difficult area. While insurance is desirable for all sorts of things, in most circumstances, it should be for individuals and companies to choose what to do. There are sometimes good reasons for compulsory insurance. For example, car insurance is compulsory. However, the issue has to be thought about carefully.

I will now discuss the points raised by the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh). She rightly talked about the costs of environmental clean-up, and we want to give more attention to enforcement, management and regulation. She talked about remediation orders. DEFRA funded an interesting conference this autumn in conjunction with the Environmental Law Foundation and we considered the issue of environmental justice with a broad range of stakeholders. Many of the proposals that were raised in the report, such as a broader range of sentencing tools for the courts, the possible introduction of civil penalties, and ticketing judges and magistrates who hear cases of environmental law, were touched on in that conference.

Ticketing means proper training for dedicated magistrates and judges for dealing with environmental cases. That could be done either with dedicated teams or by having courts at certain times dedicated to hearing environmental cases. Obviously there would be problems with the caseloads of such environmental courts and where they were located. If we wanted them to be spread across the country, the costs could be very high. It might be more cost effective to have properly trained judges who as specialists are brought in to hear such cases. We are interested in that. My right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General is a great enthusiast for that approach. An article written by her has been mentioned today. I have already met her to discuss this matter, and both she and I spoke at the conference, demonstrating the cross-Government commitment that the hon. Member for East Surrey rightly called for.

Miss McIntosh: I think that the hon. Gentleman's Department's response to the EAC's sixth report said that it would be particularly difficult, where magistrates sit in twos or threes only, to make sure that there are sufficient resources to ensure that the training on ticketing was effective.

Mr. Morley: These are some of these practical issues that we have to address. We are giving active thought to this because what the EAC report recommends, including the remediation orders, makes a great deal of sense. I like that idea, there is a lot of merit in it and we should explore it—and we intend to do so.

Ms Walley: I should be interested to know what talks are currently taking place on the future shape of the magistrates service. I admit that I do not know what discussions are ongoing. I saw something flagged up in the press about the possibility of magistrates being paid, so presumably there is consultation. I am looking to the Minister for confirmation that environmental crime is part and parcel of that consultation and not an add-on.

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend's remarks go a little wider than my area of responsibility. She will appreciate that it is for the Home Office to comment on magistrates and the paying of them. DEFRA sponsored the conference for a number of reasons, but one was to take forward the ideas from the EAC's reports and to have a broad discussion involving stakeholders and the legal profession. DEFRA is currently considering the conclusions from the conference, and we are talking to my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General about how we can develop them.

In some ways this is a deregulating measure for industry. Large companies are sometimes accidentally responsible for minor environmental crimes—when a permit is out of date, for example. At the moment, they have to be taken to court; that is an expensive and time-consuming criminal procedure. We accept the thrust of the Committee's arguments that sometimes action needs to be faster, and that can be achieved through civil rather than criminal penalties. In so doing, penalties can be designed differently—remediation orders, for example.

However, that is not to say that people should not still go to court for major environmental crimes; they should and will. Hon. Members should not think that we are suggesting removing criminal prosecution when appropriate in environmental cases. We want to be more thoughtful and more flexible and, as the Committee argues, there should be a greater range of potential penalties for the courts to apply.

The hon. Member for Vale of York also mentioned discretion and duties under the Bill, such as those regarding local authorities.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: I am extremely grateful for the very positive way in which the Minister is responding to our report and the debate. However, I do not think that I have heard him respond to the point raised by the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) about the lifestyle provisions of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 and their potential use to deal with environmental crime.

Mr. Morley: I planned to touch on such points, but in case I do not, I shall deal with that now. The Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 can be applied, in appropriate cases, to environmental crime. The hon. Member for Lewes used the example of hazardous waste. It is true that landfill disposal of waste is to become more expensive. That is because we want to move away from landfill towards more sustainable methods of waste treatment as well as towards minimisation. When there might be money to be made, a criminal element will try to exploit a situation. The courts can use the 2002 Act for crimes with potentially high profitability, and we might want to include that fact in training and in the way in which we apply environmental law. We take the point on board.

On duties and discretion, because there are differences in local authorities and in the scale of the problem, it is not unreasonable that local authorities should have such choices. They will get the proceeds from the fines. However, we know that many local authorities want the powers, and we are giving them those too. We are also signed up to the freedom and flexibility agenda that we negotiated with the Local Government Association, and we are trying to give local authorities an element of responsibility, discretion and choice.

There is the question of training staff on issuing notices. That is applied in training now, and the issue of on-the-spot fines or notices will, quite properly, be addressed. There are procedures for dealing with the non-payment of court fines. Hon. Members may have noticed a new campaign that involves clamping the cars of people who have not paid their fines, which is a very effective tool that demonstrates the commitment. The local authorities or the Environment Agency can use the courts—or bailiffs, for example—for collecting fines. Those facilities are there.

The hon. Member for Vale of York also talked about powers of arrest for Environment Agency staff. That is a difficult matter; if such staff had powers of arrest, they would have to comply with all the laws that go with such powers. Such laws represent an enormous issue and such a move would divert huge resources from the Environment Agency. I do not believe that that is necessary. The agency often carries out campaigns in conjunction with the police and/or local authorities. The police make the arrests or can follow up crimes reported by the agency. They will arrest people and use their powers, for which they are properly trained and for which they have the necessary legal cover.

Miss McIntosh: The Minister is generous in giving way. Do Environment Agency staff have powers of citizen's arrest? On an initial reading of the Bill, my understanding is that those powers—on abandoned vehicles certainly; it is not clear on fly-tipping—are transferring in many cases from the police to environmental officers. That raises the questions of whether there will still be co-responsibility with the police on fly-tipping, whether the police will have residual responsibility, and whether the powers will transfer completely? I pay tribute to the Environment Agency's work nationally and in my local area on this matter; it has pioneered some excellent techniques. However, it has put it to me that without the power of arrest, the commitment in the Bill is very hollow.

Mr. Morley: I wonder whether we are talking about power of arrest in relation to the crime. The hon. Lady seemed a bit confused about fly-tipping. I assure her that the Bill will introduce the power of arrest for all fly-tipping. The fly-tipping of hazardous waste is already arrestable; the Bill would harmonise the regulations for hazardous and non-hazardous waste. Fly-tipping of non-hazardous waste will become arrestable as well. I reassure the hon. Lady that that is in the Bill.

Miss McIntosh: Arrest by whom?

Mr. Morley: By the police. I am not sure that the agency is arguing for powers of arrest for its staff. Those powers are in the various police Acts. Statements must be taken and if the agency staff suspect that a crime has taken place they are usually accompanied by the police. I have talked to the agency about the various effective campaigns. The stop and search power is new, as is the power to confiscate vehicles, although that is for the courts.

Ms Drown: One issue that has arisen during meetings that I have had locally about matters such as fly-tipping is that they are not a top priority for the police. That is also the case with noise and some other issues that are of great concern to our constituents. I understand that such problems cannot be a top priority for the police who must deal with murder and violent crime, but they could have one-off events to highlight the matter and bring in other agencies to add support. Would my hon. Friend's Department liaise with the Home Office to ensure that that co-operation exists, because it could make such a difference to our constituents?

Mr. Morley: I absolutely accept that. As I said, there are very good examples throughout the country of extremely good co-operation. On co-responsibility, the powers of seizure and prosecution are not exclusive to the agency. The police can take action on fly-tipping in terms of seizure. Because of the legal complexity, the power of arrest remains with the police, but the agency can call on the police to assist it with enforcement and, as I said, there are good examples of that. However, I accept my hon. Friend's point that we need to ensure that the police treat the matter seriously.

The link between quality of life and crime is an important issue for the police. Sometimes, the police think that low-level nuisance crime is not a priority and that they should concentrate on more serious crime. They should be doing that, but cracking down on low-level, antisocial, nuisance crime, including environmental crime, will deter more serious crime. Sometimes, some individual forces do not think that through, and we need to have that debate.

I also accept the point about data. We are in the process of improving all our data capture, because that is essential. The hon. Member for Vale of York referred to resources, which will always be an issue. Whatever our programmes and budgets, we would all like a bit more money. The agency's resources have increased considerably year on year. It has increasing demands and I think that it uses its funds very successfully. It has a good record on efficiency.

Some of my hon. Friends made the point that the hon. Lady is calling for more resources but her party has an agenda of cutting public expenditure. If she wants more resources, she will have to explain where she thinks those resources will come from. It will be very difficult to square a tax-cutting, public expenditure-cutting agenda with more money for public services.

Miss McIntosh rose—

Mr. Morley: I shall leave that for the Committee considering the Bill, because the issue is a wide one and I do not wish to spoil the harmony that we have had in this Chamber.

As the hon. Member for Lewes said, this should be a cross-party issue and I know that that is accepted by the Environmental Audit Committee. I join those in this Chamber in paying tribute to the work of the Chairman, the hon. Member for East Surrey. The report is very welcome and well thought through. It raises a range of important issues, and I hope that in my response I have demonstrated that the Government treat it seriously and are looking at ways of implementing what the Committee wants.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Five o'clock.

[MR. JOHN MCWILLIAM in the Chair]

Global Warming and Climate Change

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Morley.]

9.30 am

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I advise hon. Members that there is no debate at 2 o'clock, so the sitting will be suspended when we finish this morning until 3.30?

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield) (Lab): May I say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that once again you have proved your timing to be immaculate? You arrived just in time for the clock to change and for this debate to start.

Before I present my argument, I wish to pay tribute to and to thank staff in the Commons Library and in the Council of Europe environment secretariat and others, including my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington), my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Syd Rapson), who is here today, and my hon. Friend the Member for Finchley and Golders Green (Dr. Vis), who have helped me to prepare for the debate today. The subject is global warming, climate change and, of course, the Kyoto protocol.

Threats to our world posed by the effects of global warming are currently levitating politically in a haze of contradiction and confusion. Indeed, the issue needs a thorough de-coke if it is to stand any chance of capturing the hearts and minds of today's world leaders, who, like all politicians, are regularly reminded that they were charged with their responsibilities primarily because of their constituents' interests. Unsurprisingly—Russia is probably the best example of this—it will take a well orchestrated campaign to convince them that their public fully understand the nature and seriousness of the current situation. High degrees of clarity and understanding will have to be achieved to win over sceptical audiences into accepting the many fundamental changes that will have to be made in their everyday lives to tackle global warming and climate change.

How do we start to approach such a difficult task? My opinion, for what it is worth, is that things will begin to become clearer only once the many sections of informed expertise start to act much less competitively towards one another, taking a back seat rather than vying for pilot status. Removing such players from the central narration will not be simple. Prophets of the apocalypse have never been the easiest of hecklers.

The reality, however, is that a high degree of calm and unison, rather than competitive international trading and production nightmares, largely highlighting individual nations' concerns about such things as finite resources, need to be introduced into the public arena, so that ordinary people can absorb the facts and then grasp some understanding of the clear and urgent need to find ways of quickly and safely solving the many man-made problems causing global warming.

At the outset of the debate, I feel obliged to point out that, amazingly, some people still argue that global warming is not actually occurring. Probably the most well known of those is the Dane Bjorn Lomborg, who expressed the view in his book "The Sceptical Environmentalist" that global warming is a conspiracy and a mere cyclical mathematical formula devised mainly as an academic concept by theoreticians to gain both stature and ongoing research funding. That is, to say the least, a ridiculous scenario.

To be fair, Bjorn Lomborg is not the only one. A small number of other sceptics also argue against scientific data, for a variety or reasons, including research methodology. One cited the use of seawater rather than freshwater in calculations. Another contradicted research because of the time of year used for statistical breakdowns of thinning ice sheets, and yet another because of measurements devised from felled tree stumps in north America.

Stranger still is the narrow intellectual thesis espoused by top thriller writer Michael Crichton, most famous for his far-fetched tale "Jurassic Park", the plot of which had at its heart the return of dinosaurs via the use of ancient DNA acquired from mosquitoes trapped for thousands of years in precious amber gemstones. To say the least, that was a novel plot. Disappointingly, his latest scribble, "State of Fear", is much less rigorous. It is about eco-terrorism and has a plot that unfortunately allows him the opportunity to rant against science and, in particular, to state his view that the dangers of global warming are little more than "the interminable yammerings of fear mongers who use it to keep ordinary people perpetually anxious."

I hope that most people, ordinary or otherwise, will dismiss such idle polemic as dangerous nonsense, invented mostly to bolster book sales or, at the very least, as alternative script material for Hollywood movie moguls. As Mr. Crichton is well aware, commercially, they want nothing more than to produce more sci-fi blockbusters to equal the recent box office success of the film "The Day After Tomorrow", which he did not write, but which had a more realistic scenario.

The Minister may be wondering why I am discussing a man who deals in imagination. It is important that we burst Mr. Crichton's bubble. He is appearing on platforms around the world espousing those views, which are dangerous because they confuse the public. Ignored he must be, especially his logic. Again, he said:

"The near-hypercritical preoccupation with safety is at best a waste of resources and a crimp on human spirit, at worst an invitation to totalitarianism."

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there are others who deny global warming and present themselves as scientists, who sometimes end up writing articles in the daily papers? When they are tracked down, they turn out to be members of or supported by institutes in America that are funded by the oil industry.

Mr. Meale: It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman should say that, as I am about to name another one. His analysis is right. Unfortunately, as I said, Mr. Crichton is not the only one. There are many such people.

[Mr. Meale]

Stranger still is the opinion purveyed by Myron Ebell, director of the business-sponsored Competitive Enterprise Institute, based in Washington DC, who recently outstripped previous first world critics when arguing that describing climate change as "a crisis for humanity" was based on "a tissue of improbabilities, which really only had one true objective", that being

"for Europe to attack America's economic superiority".

He forgetfully, and rather conveniently, put aside the reality that most European member countries signed up for the Kyoto protocol at considerably higher levels than those proposed for the United States. He also failed to mention in his illogical analysis that leading American scientists have recently established that concentrations of carbon dioxide gases have risen to the unprecedented level of 375 parts per million. That is especially worrying, as the level was only 280 parts per million at the time of the industrial revolution.

In order to discuss such detailed and complex substance, or, in the case of the examples previously mentioned, the lack of it, let us examine the facts. Hon. Members must realise from the outset that it is freely accepted in today's scientific community that CO_2 and other gases play a crucial role in global climates and that, without them, global temperatures would be much lower. Similarly, it is crucial to understand that global warming statistics have not been recently discovered and are not mere theorised academic opinions. They have been well documented over many decades by eminent scientists and institutes the world over.

The role of gases in the environment, in trapping heat close to the earth, was first recognised as far back as 1827 by Jean Baptiste Fourier. The phenomenon was then observed and proved in 1861 by John Tyndall, using the then novel technique of quantitative spectroscopy. In 1896, the Swedish chemist, Sven Arrhenius, promoted the idea that CO_2 emissions from the combustion of coal could enhance the greenhouse effect and thus lead to global warming, a subsequently proven theory.

Since those times, the broad consensus of scientific opinion is that there has been an anthropogenic effect in our atmosphere. That is to say, changes stemming directly from human activities have taken place, which have consequently increased the amount of trapped heat close to the planet's surface, a view supported by work undertaken by United Kingdom scientist G.S. Callendar in 1949, when he directly linked the estimated 10 per cent. increase in CO_2 in the Earth's atmosphere from 1850 to 1940 with the warming of northern Europe and north America, which he calculated had begun as early as the 1880s.

As importantly, further studies carried out as recently as the 1970s identified that other gases, including chlorofluorocarbons, methane and nitrous oxides, were greenhouse gases. They also identified that global surface air temperatures had increased by between 0.3° C and 0.6° C since the late 19th century, and that between 0.2° C and 0.3° C of that increase had occurred in the last 40 years. That warming had already led to considerable loss of snow coverage and noticeable weather variations.

From those scientific discoveries emerged a series of converted academic programmes, which predicted that a doubling of CO_2 levels could eventually warm the Earth further, by anywhere from 1.4° C to 5.8° C. Bearing it in mind that a shift of less than 6° C caused the end of the ice age, international climate programmes were rapidly established to enhance individual nations' ability to respond to climate variability, including improved forecasting techniques, international co-operation, research and assessment.

Thankfully, and contrary to the views espoused by the likes of Lomborg, Crichton and Ebell, so successful was the evidence gathering that, by the mid-1980s, a major conference was held, sponsored by the United Nations Environment Programme, the World Meteorological Organisation and the International Council of Scientific Unions. That conference recommended that a global treaty addressing climate change should be promoted urgently.

As we are all aware, the conference resulted in the establishment in 1988 of the intergovernmental panel on climate change, led by Government scientists, but also involving several hundred independent, academic scientists and researchers throughout the world. In 1990, that body calculated that a 60 per cent. reduction in CO_2 emissions could, if applied, halt the build up of global warming. So seriously were its predictions taken that 116 countries took part in a second conference in 1990. By the time of the Rio summit in 1992, the panel's climate change convention had been signed by 155 nations and, by 1993, 50 had ratified its proposals and some had put them into effect.

Inevitably, with so much evidence and concern, by 1997, there was general consensus that climate change was occurring because of human activity. That view ultimately led to international recognition of the Kyoto protocol—an agreement to reduce the emissions of greenhouse gases. Smaller targets than the 60 per cent. calculated as necessary in 1990 were set, but the protocol was an avenue that was thought necessary by industrial, first world nations as the first step in a long process of providing good faith to the lesser developed world.

As well as recognising the magnificent efforts of the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and especially the Minister present today, I want to pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister. Everybody knows that it was his steady chairmanship that went a long way towards delivering the essential landmark of the Kyoto protocol. I mention that because, contrary to some Fleet street cynics who seem at times interested only in his love of a certain type of motor car, it needs stating that he forced the pace to achieve that admirable and necessary objective. So strong was his determination to achieve an agreement that he and others, particularly the support team from the UK, tasted the success of their endeavours almost on the departure runway of the airport at the end of the conference.

As we all know, President Putin and the Russian Duma recently signed the protocol, undoubtedly influenced by the predicted world shortage of oil and gas and their nation's ownership of at least 23 per cent. of remaining reserves. In February 2005, it will come into force legally in those countries that are signatories to it, with its targets binding upon all of them. The delivery of the protocol has been a vital stage in the global strategy for dealing with climate change and the planet's warming, not least because it represents, as I stated earlier, acceptance of its being caused by human activities.

Of course, there will still be the doubters—those whom I mentioned earlier—together with a small number of others who continue to argue that "measurements were incorrect" and "calculations wrongly based". However, the truth is that even President Bush has finally accepted that climate change is occurring. The debate has moved on, despite the doubters. Now the question is no longer whether we respond, but how we respond. In America's case, that has been settled by the White House. The President has decided to use taxpayers' dollars over the next 25 years to fund the American energy industry's research into cleaner technologies, and in particular into hydrogen and fuel cell technological development.

Only time will tell whether we have 25 years and whether such a decision is correct. Perhaps chance, ingenuity and/or discovery will produce something that will halt or even reverse current worsening situations. However, if one looks at what is happening to our world, the signs are not good. For instance, the United Nations has recently compiled clear evidence of further worrying trends, which indicate that, despite the major collective efforts made by countries to counter world poverty, climate change that results directly from global warming continues to cause more consequential weather-related disasters—droughts and floods—and in doing so forces even more people into poverty and destitution.

In relation to droughts alone, according to the United Nations, between the mid-1990s and 2000, almost 300 sq km of land were turned into desert each year. The same study estimated that, at the present rate, by 2025, two thirds of arable land in Africa will have disappeared, along with one third of such areas in Asia and one fifth in south America. As a result, 135 million people are being put at risk of displacement. Most of those affected are likely to be from the edges of existing deserts—in particular, poor farmers currently barely able to achieve sustainability or even basic subsistence levels. There will also be others from areas where people do not at the moment struggle to eke out a living, thus adding to the numbers suffering. Many of them will be least able to help themselves. What the immediate future holds for them is crop failure, followed by loss of quality, fuelled by soil degradation and subsequent further demise.

That is borne out by another recent United Nations study, which predicts that the proportion of people living in countries suffering significant water stress will double by 2025, proving conclusively that global warming is, as it has been described on the international stage,

"the mother of all ecological debts, owed by the North to the South".

Contrary to what the sceptics think, poverty and climate change are inextricably linked, with the poorest paying the heaviest price.

It is not just desert areas that will be affected by global warming. At the other end of the spectrum, changes are already taking place. For example, in the past few years, major areas of the earth's ice mass have already been lost. The Arctic and Antarctic continents regularly report big losses of ice shelves and major recessions of ice. In that respect, another recent report—one prepared for the eight-nation Arctic Council—reported a 10 per cent. loss of ice in the past 10 years. Worse still, it predicted that, if that continued, even at a slower pace, not only would it threaten present ecosystems, but another outcome could be the cooling of the gulf stream. If that occurred, according to the UK's Tyndall Centre for Climate Change Research, it would have devastating consequences, especially for northern Europe.

I mention that because, according to other expert opinion, it has been calculated that such combinations of cooling and melting could ultimately lead to a partial thawing of the Siberian tundra. If that occurred, it would subsequently release vast amounts of methane, the highest burning gas, which is eight times more volatile than CO_2, into the Earth's atmosphere, thereby seriously spiralling the warming of our planet.

Syd Rapson (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): How does the Opposition's policy of opposing the use of hydrofluorocarbons in firefighting square with my hon. Friend's warnings about the heat situation?

Mr. Meale: That is a good point. The Opposition should reflect on their policy on the use of HFCs in firefighting. It has been calculated that, by 2010, the use of HFCs to combat fire will make up less than .0005 per cent. of total emissions. If one puts that against what I shall say a little later in relation to fires, it is more than balanced by how they will combat a range of fires.

Is that alarmist nonsense? The reality is that we dismiss such warnings at our peril. Let us consider other likely outcomes if the problems of global warming and climate change are not tackled urgently. Many delicate indigenous native plants and wildlife eco-systems would disappear as temperatures rise or fall. Many marine species would either be lost or would migrate from their traditional breeding grounds. For example, according to recent reports by the British Antarctic Survey, climate change is already causing serious problems for aquatic life such as krill, the tiny shrimp-like life forms that flourish in their billions in cold waters, which are the staple diet of such species as penguins, seals, whales and others. In winter periods, those important life forms depend upon thick mats of green algae that flourish on the undersides of ice shelves. However, because of global warming, that foodstuff is either seriously retreating or is vanishing, leaving those species and many others without their necessary food supplies.

On another front, large areas of forest would either die or be destroyed by fire caused directly by the change in heat patterns. Last but not least, vast amounts of property and infrastructure investment would either be lost or put at risk by rising sea levels, flooding, coastal erosion and ground subsidence. I cite as evidence what has already occurred on the roof of our world. Some scientists have recently calculated that the Earth's highest ice fields could completely disappear within the next 200 years unless urgent action is taken to combat global warming. In a recent study, "The Glacier Inventory", produced by the Chinese Academy of Sciences, we were warned that, unless urgent measures are taken to stop further deterioration, those fields may be lost for ever. Proof for such claims are contained in the worrying statistics of that report, which reveal that at least 5.5 per cent. of the ice volume in China's 46,298 glaciers, representing 15 per cent. of the Earth's total, has already melted. That is equal to at least 3,000 sq km of ice.

Changes are taking place not only on the tops of Chinese mountains or in far-off continents. The UK Government chief scientific adviser, Sir David King, recently stated that even the most ambitious targets may not be enough to avert the worst effects of global warming. He warned that by 2050 carbon dioxide emissions may have to be cut by as much as 80 per cent. to avoid such catastrophic effects as the melting of the Greenland ice sheets, which would raise sea levels by as much as 20 ft, putting a number of cities in northern Europe under water as a consequence, including London, Paris, Amsterdam, Copenhagen and Helsinki.

At the same time, on the other side of the globe, because of similar ice loss, many small, poorer, vulnerable nations,—for example, small islands such as the Maldives, Mauritius and Tuvalou—could disappear entirely. Other countries would face horrendous and more regular flooding, especially such nations as India, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka and Indonesia—as if they have not suffered enough already.

Finally, we need to consider what the financial effect would be if global warming continued unabated. The reality is almost incalculable and certainly unaffordable. In the UK alone, the cost has been initially estimated to be as high as £26 billion at today's prices. To my mind, that is a surprisingly conservative figure when one considers the likely heavier and more frequent rainfalls, especially in winter periods. There will a further rise in sea levels, followed by more consequential flooding. On a much wider scale, the immediate causal effect world wide would be that public bodies and private property owners had to invest massively in flood protection, especially in urban areas and areas that house important but delicate structures such as nuclear power stations, chemical plants and transport infrastructure, especially underground railway networks.

As the Minister is aware, some direct effects of global warming and consequential climate change have already been experienced around the globe, most recently on the home front in Cumbria. Carlisle was recently devastated by 100 mph winds and extreme flooding. In such an unlikely place as Florida, home of Disneyland and Mickey Mouse, inhabitants witnessed the awful, frightening and confusing reality of climate change when preparing for their fourth hurricane of the season. They experienced that traumatic event at the same time as the United States Congress debated and voted down some moderate and modest amendments to alter America's stance on the problem of climate change and global warming. That represents a lesson for all politicians at home and abroad, and particularly those in the United States Congress and Senate, who on that occasion let their people down badly, having been fooled, or should I say blinded, by misinformation readily supplied to them by industrial and commercial interests.

Unsurprisingly, and no doubt because of Congress and Senate inaction at that time and since, it is the unlikely allies of corporate USA who are now calling for change. American companies large and small suddenly realise that they are trapped inside an environment creaking on its very foundations because of what modernisation and a lack of Government action have created—an environment with a polluted atmosphere that suicidally destroys its own safety by continuously depleting for naked profit whatever rain forests remain. It is a world whose very future is put at risk by the short-term combination of industrial power and financial greed, set against people's needs, welfare and aspirations.

How do we combat the problem? Can we discover another way? Is choice dead? Can we trust business, or is it yet again performing corporate tricks to expand or just to keep its market share? Unfortunately, the truth is not as simple as that, as it is not only Government or business who are to blame, but all of us. Due to our selfish appetites, energy consumption is at its highest ever level and rising, with the numbers of individual electrical devices dramatically increasing year on year. Walkmans, iPods, mobile phones, and digital radios and TVs are standard tools for modern living.

It is not just electronic gadgetry but our style of living that is making things worse. The worst example is that, while the use of public transport world wide diminishes, 26 per cent. of all harmful carbon emissions are linked to the cars we drive. If that were not enough, because of our insatiable appetite for fresh, "exotic" and even ordinary "out of season" food, we are responsible for flying such nutrients in the least fuel-efficient way. Planes produce 19 times the greenhouse gas emissions of trains and 190 times that of ships. We conveniently erase from our intellect the simple fact that it takes 66 calories of fuel to airfreight one calorie of carrot or no calories of orchid to London from South Africa or Singapore. Selfishly and stupidly, we daily develop collective economic amnesia and instead consider the immediate short-termism of taste, price and availability.

Not purchasing modern energy eaters, using public transport more and altering our eating habits are only some of the many ingredients necessary for a solution. Things have already gone too far for the tempering of lifestyles alone to be the leading factor in achieving the necessary change. The urgent development of a series of concise, clear and coherent choices, which are understood and supported by everybody, is also required. That said, I accept, and suspect that the Minister will agree, that it will not be easy for politicians or Governments, but then again representation and responsibility rarely are.

As I stated earlier, being positive is vital. We must not express the view that there are no solutions. Answers are there. It is simply a matter of best managing the present while trying to find them. To that end, we should all try to keep a clear head and to accept the scale of the problems connected with global warming, while at the same time not losing sight of the facts. For example, the natural cycling of carbon in the natural environment is 30 times greater than that released by human activities, and nature's main tool—plant life—is the most efficient, continuously converting solar energy into chemical energy and then releasing it back as oxygen into our atmosphere. Even if atmospheric particulate pollution is taken into account—it was recently identified as being responsible for the strange phenomenon of global dimming—heat from the sun, which touches our planet, is 15,000 times greater than the world's annual use of fossil burn and nuclear energy.

Solutions may be found in any of those avenues of knowledge. In the meantime, a number of practical ways exist to help to ease the current situation. For example, using the knowledge outlined, we should, at the very least, consider why we are today producing more energy than we use and why we fail to conserve as well as we should. We should also establish whether it can be stored safely for longer periods and examine the extent to which alternative methods of creating it can play a role in future energy use and production.

Before examining such questions, it is necessary to consider some of the many different energy options that are currently available, including solar energy, radiant energy from thermonuclear reaction, mechanical energy produced by machines, potential energy from water, chemical energy from molecule reaction, incineration, electrical energy produced by charged atoms, nuclear energy from the splitting of atoms and thermal energy from heated matter.

In our modern environment, most of those energy converters are in operation every day, lighting, heating or cooling our homes and buildings, propelling vehicles and helping mankind to survive and to communicate. Mankind's problem is the maintenance of such energy supplies safely, efficiently and in sufficient quantity. There lies the nub.

At present, most of the available energy production capable of providing the required scale of power either has low efficiency and causes pollution or has other faults such as high costs and safety worries. Improving the efficiency of such energy converters will help, but it will not solve our problems completely; it will merely move them on. For example, obliging car manufacturers to fit vehicles with catalysts substantially decreases carbon monoxide and nitrogen oxide in the environment, but the subsequent release of carbon dioxide, which is a greenhouse gas, affects the environment on a larger scale in the consequential greenhouse effect and what follows is global warming.

At the heart of any solutions, whether in the short term or otherwise, lies the reality that the environment and energy sectors cannot be separated because they are intrinsically linked. Nowhere is that seen more starkly than in the coal sector, which produces more of the world's electrical power than is produced collectively from oil and gas—one third of our power in the United Kingdom, half of the power in Germany and the USA and, frighteningly, three quarters of the power in China.

Contrary to its image, the reality is that that fossil fuel need not be as filthy a fuel as currently portrayed. Modern combustion techniques can both clean emissions and use less coal to reach energy production targets. Indeed, fluidised bed combustion—burning coal on a bed of particulates suspended in flowing air—can capture most emissions. Similarly, pulverised coal used with high temperature burn techniques can greatly increase productivity, while coal burnt with oxygen rather than air can be gassified and transferred to power gas turbines with surplus heat to supply conventional steam heating.

Those cleaner methods are relevant to any solution to global warming, especially when the likely scale of future use of coal by countries such as China and India is considered. At present, such countries are relatively undeveloped compared with other first world nations, but they are beginning to achieve rapid periods of growth for their billions of citizens.

The choice of oil and gas as Earth's long-term alternative fuels is not a realistic option. That will be starkly exposed to United Kingdom citizens next year, when, 40 years after the discovery of gas in the North sea, Britain will become a net importer of gas.

The truth, as I am sure that the Minister will agree, is that today's large-scale world reserves of both oil and gas are estimated, based on current levels, to be sufficient only for the next 40 to 50 years. Many believe those predictions to be generous, particularly as they conservatively give major credit to as yet non-negotiated, non-developed conservation measures. Moreover, they take little account of the fact that such gains would be more than offset by rapid population, production and service growth. What is more, with such finite reserves, it is only a matter of time before huge price hikes occur, especially once fierce competition for them develops in the chemical, agricultural and other sectors. In such circumstances, it is almost certain that oil and gas will no longer be readily available as a primary energy production source, simply because of market economics. In time, that is also likely to be the case with related by-products, such as liquefied petroleum.

I turn to the question of nuclear energy. In addition to the safety worries connected with that source of energy, together with its long-term, ongoing cost, there is, again, a problem with the availability of scarce chemicals. In that case, the chemical concerned is uranium 235, a rare isotope found only in certain types of ore. Based on present usage rates, its estimated lifespan is also less than 100 years. That factor, for the time being, bursts the bubble of the long-term availability of nuclear energy, as expounded by the pro-nuclear lobby.

I accept that there are ongoing research programmes into ways of producing huge quantities of energy from fusion. I am advised, however, that, as yet, the scientific community is unsure about whether that is, or will be, safely possible.

Therefore, there remain only two areas in which solutions might be found to provide sufficient energy production for the future. The first is renewables—the use of energy from biomass, geothermal hydropower, solar, wind and tidal flows. The second is the as yet undeveloped hybrid technologies such as methane hydrate extraction, although leading scientists predict that there will not be much immediate practical progress in that area for some time to come.

As the Minister will be aware, our planet has an abundance of natural resources capable of generating energy via the use of renewable sources—wind, hydro, co-firing biomass schemes, tidal technologies and incineration. However, the reality is that, as we attempt to drive forwards a low-carbon economy, the current energy production technologies in those areas dictate that those sectors are not collectively capable of delivering the majority of our energy needs. The role of those sources will remain, for the foreseeable future, as a secondary, although important, part of a balanced, diverse energy mix.

Cleaner energy is vital to any strategy that aims to combat global warming, and should be included, especially when one realises the amount of electricity that even comparatively small hydropower stations, offshore wind farms and co-firing biomass plants can contribute. Solar power, influenced especially by architectural and spatial planning processes, can also be an important contributor, as can tidal flow technologies.

Last, but not least, the vexed question of waste incineration offers a great deal, especially in relation to recycling and the problems of generations of landfilled waste, which is leaching gases into the atmosphere. However, before large-scale development of that sector can take place, there will have to be major development of purification processes.

Based on such knowledge, we can clearly identify the problems facing mankind. First, the reality is that global warming is occurring due to human activities. Secondly, most current sources of energy are likely to be finite. Thirdly, the world's biggest polluters seem intent on not pursuing a collective approach and, fourthly, the Kyoto protocol represents only one small step in the right direction.

As I have indicated, many as yet undeveloped hybrid technologies and structural theories are currently in their early experimental and/or theoretical stages—there are far too many of them to discuss today. However, even those in today's scientific community who are most optimistic are generally of the opinion that any major energy discovery—enough to take the place of what we are running out of at present—is too far ahead for future generations to rely on. We therefore have no alternative. We must discover new sources while at the same time conserving present reserves and using them in a way that will not worsen the damage that has already been done.

Such aims lay at the heart of the IPCC process, so the question must be asked as to whether the latest conference of the parties, which was held in Buenos Aires in December, was a success. Being honest, I must admit that it represented a mere tap dance on the international dance floor rather than the vigorous south American tango for which all of us attending had hoped. Neither my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs nor the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment should find any personal criticism in what I am saying. I know how hard they worked to get an agreement. For instance, both of them were involved in achieving agreement to allow the negotiations to continue. Compromises were reached only after lengthy discussions—36 hours after the conference had finished and following two all-night negotiating sessions.

Of course, particularly troublesome were the representatives of the United States and several major oil-producing nations, which tried extremely hard to scupper progress. That factor bodes ill for the international community, as it flies in the face of President Bush's promises in 2001. He said that, although America was withdrawing from the Kyoto protocol, he personally would not obstruct other countries trying to reach agreements. Clearly, the United States has been jolted by its miscalculation of global energy economics and, in particular, by Russia's decision to ratify. Because of that, it has decided actively to adopt a significantly different and more aggressive strategy that is geared mainly to the sabotage of any further development of international measures, at least until such time as it can guarantee its vast energy needs.

I do not make such criticism lightly. Examples of the USA's attitude at the conference of the parties were many. For instance, Chairman Raul Estrada Oyuela's proposals to hold a series of meetings in the next year to prepare the ground for talks were vigorously opposed at every turn by the USA contingent, which argued that there could be only one meeting and that no ideas that examined future scenarios should be tabled at such a conference. It even objected to a mention in the proposed conference description of the need to tackle global warming and argued instead for the phrase "adapting to it".

Even more stark and very worrying indeed was the delegation's support for the demand from Saudi Arabia that oil-producing nations should receive billions of dollars of compensation from the rest of the world if they sold less oil. That was an astonishing proposal, especially when one recalls the "good faith" purpose contained in the Kyoto protocol agreement by first world nations and the substances that have been found to be largely responsible for the need for such a protocol. Those of us who care about the environment know about the destruction, poverty, famine, death and misery that have been caused by global warming and climate change, the worst effects of which are felt most by those least able to cope with them. I mentioned some of those earlier. I was pleased that the Secretary of State gave assurances last week during Environment questions that the Government had no truck with deals such as that which I have just described.

Thankfully, agreement was eventually reached in Argentina to hold the next meeting in May 2005. It will give more sensibly minded politicians another chance to work towards finding a global solution.

In conclusion, I congratulate the Government and the Minister on the work that they are doing to deliver our commitments—and more—on Kyoto, in particular the decision to launch an extensive and open consultation on the nation's climate change programme and to build towards the Government's goal of reducing carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent. below 1990 levels by 2010. I also congratulate them on their support for the Carbon Trust, their agreement to give financial and other support to environmental improvements in our society and their encouragement of the EU emissions trading scheme, which is an important step towards a co-ordinated approach to tackling climate change. I hope that it will one day be extended beyond the 45 per cent. of industry that it currently covers and will move from being an EU-only scheme to a global one. I say that because it is important that we bring other industrial sectors into the emissions trading scheme, in particular the transport sector.

I also welcome the Government's leadership in Europe in pressing to include aviation emissions in the scheme from 2008, as I welcomed the UK aviation industry's pressure on all airports and airlines across the EU to support emissions trading for aircraft emissions. Last but not least, I praise the Prime Minister's own commitment, shown by his decision to put the Kyoto agreement, global warming and consequential climate change at the heart of his chairmanship of the G8.

10.15 am

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I welcome the fact that the hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) secured a debate on global warming and climate change, but I am disappointed that so few Members are here. Given that, according to Sir David King, the issue is the most important of all, including terrorism, one would have thought that the turnout would be better. I know that the debate was arranged late; nevertheless we in the House need to take a more serious and consistent approach to the matter across all parties than sometimes appears to be the case.

I agree with most of the hon. Gentleman's analysis on the science of climate change. There is no doubt that climate change is with us. Those of us who saw the excellent "Horizon" programme on global dimming last week will be even more depressed than we were when we started watching the programme. In terms of the effects of climate change kicking in, it may be early days, but it seems to me that, as far as we can tell, the projections of its consequences tend to be understated by scientists. There must be a real danger that we will reach a runaway situation in which it is impossible to retrieve the position. That is why radical action is needed early by, in particular, all countries in the industrialised world. Action must also involve developing countries and as I will explain shortly, that can be done.

I concur with the analysis of the WWF and others that there is a 2° tipping point: we must not allow average temperatures to rise more than 2° C above pre-industrial levels. I ask the Minister whether he shares that analysis or whether, as has been suggested, the Government are adopting a policy of a 2° C barrier above 1990 levels. Does he agree that we need to measure that variance from pre-industrial levels?

As this is such a serious issue, I will not indulge in party politics, except to say that I have concerns about the tactics being adopted by the Government in their diplomatic discussions with EU partners, the US and others. I do not dissent from the analysis that the Prime Minister has made in his speeches on climate change. I welcome the fact that the Government have adopted climate change and Africa as the key issues on which to make progress during our G8 and EU presidencies. That position is absolutely right and nobody can dissent from it.

I wonder, however, whether the tactics that the Prime Minister is adopting, in particular towards the US, are right. I want to explore that issue in the time available. I wrote to the Foreign Secretary on 2 December. It was a joint letter with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), the Liberal Democrat shadow spokesman on foreign affairs. I am pleased to say that we received a long, detailed reply on the matter from the Foreign Secretary. In our letter we said:

"It seems to us that there are two possible strategies to deal with" the US position on climate change.

"One is to assume that the US still needs to have the science proved and to spend much of our capital getting them to sign up to the science, but then probably little else. That of course would be a step forward, but a limited one if it were not accompanied by a commitment on the part of the US to cut emissions.

The second strategy is to assume that the US does privately accept the reality of climate change, and to spend our capital on trying to bring them in principle into negotiations for a post-Kyoto arrangement, perhaps based on contraction and convergence, which meets at least one of their objections, namely that the Kyoto excluded developing countries. This would provide a greater sense of urgency, which is badly needed, but is it too far for the US? Does the FCO believe that contraction and convergence is the way forward?"

In a letter dated 11 January—so it is quite recent—the Foreign Secretary replied that the UK aims to use the presidency of the G8

"to build on a solid foundation on the science to promote greater understanding of the size and scope of the problem of climate change"

and

"to reach agreement on a process to speed up the science, technology, and other measures necessary to meet the threat".

That is unobjectionable in itself, but it sounds as though the Foreign Secretary is opting for the first option of making slow progress with the US on the basis that nothing faster can be achieved.

It is clear that we have a problem with the Bush Administration on climate change; everyone accepts that. It is also clear, however, that other parts of the US are making good progress, whether it is the north-eastern states that want to engage in emissions trading and have consulted the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs for advice, what Arnold Schwarzenegger is doing in California or what US business itself recognises to be in its own interest. Clearly, there are progressive elements in the US that can be mobilised and will eventually lead to a change in response from the White House Administration, whatever that Administration are. However, that may not happen for some time.

What should be our response to the Bush Administration's intransigence? One response, the one that I favour, is to say that Kyoto is now in place. We have finally got the Russians on board and the treaty takes effect in February, in the teeth of US opposition and determined efforts by the US to scupper it before it comes into force. The US has failed and we have won on that: Kyoto is coming into force. Given that, we must now ensure that Kyoto works, build on it and build around us a coalition of willing partners, including not only the EU but Russia and others, who are prepared to take forward the Kyoto process, based on emission cuts and targets. Targets are essential in that process. We cannot survive without targets and a system for measuring what we are doing to find out whether we are on track. Aspirations, good wishes and voluntary agreements are not sufficient in the face of the challenge that the hon. Member for Mansfield set out and the changes to our world, which are taking place at a rate of knots. I want to see firm direction.

The way to bring the US on board is for us to make Kyoto work, for the industrialised world to go ahead without America, and for America to learn that it has to catch up and join the process. That is what needs to happen: the firm and effective introduction and implementation of Kyoto by willing partners. That is the message to the US. That is not to say that we should not talk to the US; of course we should. We should also encourage the US where we can do so. There are technological developments that the US Administration support. Of course we must work with them on that and see what we can gain from technological advances.

[Norman Baker]

What we must not do is bring the US on board at any cost, and I fear that that is what the Prime Minister is trying to do. I am making a serious point to the Minister. I am not trying to score a party point; this issue is too serious. I understand why the Prime Minister wants to bring the US on board. How wonderful it would be if he could produce an agreement during our presidency of the EU and the G8 and say, "I have got the Americans to agree to this. I moved them forward. Here is a piece of paper that we have both signed." It would be great if he could get such a piece of paper, but it must not be a Chamberlain piece of paper that he and President Bush have signed.

I fear that the US is giving nothing but is using the Prime Minister cynically to try to wreck Kyoto from the inside by trying to have the targets abandoned. It is giving the Prime Minister the message that if only the targets could be got rid of and things could be watered down a bit, it might come on board. I think that the Prime Minister is undermining Kyoto, not deliberately of course, but, in effect, that is what is happening in his negotiations with the Americans. I do not say this with any pleasure, but I think that he is showing dangerous naivety in his diplomacy with the US. All the lessons from Iraq and everything else in recent years show that the Prime Minister gives a great deal in this one-way street of a special relationship and gets very little back from President Bush. President Bush does not negotiate as other people do; he gives nothing back. The Prime Minister is a decent person; he expects a bit of give and take. He is giving a lot and getting nothing back, and he needs to understand that. Unpleasant as it may be, the way to get the US on board is to show that Kyoto is working and to proceed on that basis. Eventually, the US will come back.

Mr. Meale: On the radio this morning, someone said that President Bush's second term would probably be "Bush on steroids", which is a bit frightening.

The hon. Gentleman did not mention the support that we can give to partners adjacent to the US, especially Canada and Mexico, which have been very helpful. Does he think that we should concentrate much more effort on giving them the support that they need at this sorry time?

Norman Baker: I certainly do. We should also support those elements within the US, whether business or individual states, that show a willingness to understand the need to take urgent action to deal with the appalling reality that we now face.

I raised the issue of diplomacy because it is clear from the minutes released—or leaked—from the Council of Ministers that the British Government supported amendments in the Council to remove references to the EU cutting 50 per cent. of carbon dioxide emissions by 2050 compared with 1990 levels. I have been handed a copy of the minutes. There is no doubt that the Government supported those amendments—

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Norman Baker: I will in a second.

Yet when I asked the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs about the matter in the House she said that she was absolutely committed to the 50 per cent. target; there was no question of watering it down, abandoning it or resiling from it. That seems to be at odds with the Council minutes.

Mr. Morley: It is not. There is a firm commitment to targets in those minutes. The only issue is the actual figure, and we want, first, to encourage those EU members who have doubts and worries about signing up to challenging targets; secondly, we want proper scientific evaluation and cost-benefit implications, so that people can make informed choices. The Commission is working on that and does not report until the end of this month. I made a speech in the Council on behalf of the UK making it clear that it was essential to have challenging targets to which members of the EU must sign up.

Although the hon. Gentleman is right about the need to encourage the US and to demonstrate that Kyoto can work, he has no evidence from those minutes. Greenpeace, about which I will say more later, knows very well about tactics. I assure the hon. Gentleman that our commitment is firm and unwavering; there is no evidence to the contrary. We want to work with, and encourage, the US. As the hon. Gentleman rightly says, when we can co-operate in technology and science we will do so, and when we can go further in relation to American states we will do that, too.

Norman Baker: We must work with the US, but we must not do so by watering down our position. That is what I fear the Government are doing to get the US on board, which is a fundamental diplomatic error.

Mr. Morley: It is not.

Norman Baker: The Minister says that it is not, but the British Government moved that the phrase

"substantial reductions by up to possible 50 per cent. by 2050 compared to 1990 levels" be removed.

Mr. Morley: I want to make it absolutely clear that the decision on targets has not yet been taken. The discussion in the committee of officials was not about determining a target, but about the future in relation to agreement within the Environment Council, which will take place in the spring. It is not removing the figures; it is part of a process, a matter of when we put in the figures and what the figures are. In relation to scientific assessment of the 2°, the figure may be more than 50 per cent.

Norman Baker: Time will tell. If the Minister achieves that figure, I will be happy. I can only tell him that it was proposed that the phrase be removed, which shows the Government's attitude. The Government also proposed that the commitment to between 60 and 80 per cent. reductions be replaced with the phrase "significantly enhanced reduction efforts." That is not very detailed.

Greenpeace is aware of the Government's negotiating skills and their approach. Since we released the minutes, Stephen Tindale has said of the Prime Minister:

"He thinks that getting the US to sign-up at any cost can be spun as an historic achievement, but it's classic Blair—appearance trumping substance. He's undermining the progressive position of the EU and reneging on promises he simultaneously boasts about."

That is his analysis.

Mr. Morley: I want to address this point because it is complete and utter nonsense, and Stephen Tindale knows that. What shred of evidence is there that the UK wants the US to sign up at any cost? It is the UK that has driven forward the Kyoto agreement and worked ceaselessly to get Russian ratification. It is the UK that has been arguing for binding and meaningful targets, not empty gestures and rhetoric.

Norman Baker: Time is limited, but I can say that it is the UK that has proposed these amendments to the minutes and negotiated with President Bush over Iraq, giving everything and getting nothing. With respect it is not the Prime Minister who has been dealing centrally with this issue but other Ministers, such as the Foreign Secretary and the Environment Secretary, who perhaps understand diplomacy better. I fear that the Prime Minister, having now put his fingers into this, does not understand how best to approach the matter diplomatically. That is the issue.

Now, if the Minister tells us that all will become fine during the spring Council—that there will be splendid targets, that the position will not be watered down and that the US will be brought on board—I shall be very happy, but the Prime Minister must not make the historic mistake of getting the US to come on board at any cost. That is the message that I want to give the Minister today.

10.32 am

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): This Government have spent eight years pandering to popular prejudice and patronising the public. The more they have established citizens' juries, focus groups, stakeholder forums or consensus conferences, the more we have seen the public disengaging from the real processes of democratic policies. The Government may think that that is participative democracy, but it has allowed them to say one thing and do another. Therefore, I am grateful to the hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) for his tour d'horizon, which gives us the opportunity to look both at the record and to the future.

Speaking of saying one thing and doing another, what the Minister has just told the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) will not wash. It is as clear as mud. Although the Minister said that the Government were not removing the figures, that is precisely what they were doing. When they sought to delete from the draft spring 2005 European Council conclusions 21 words that would secretly change policy on global warming and climate change—in the UK and throughout the EU—they were tampering with 21 words that could literally change the world. I hope the Minister will explain to an astonished world what on earth the Government were up to in Brussels. The explanation that he has given so far is completely inadequate.

Labour has been all talk on the environment. The Prime Minister personally committed himself and his Government to leading the march towards a more sustainable world. In the 1997 Labour election manifesto, he promised to go beyond the Kyoto commitment of a 12.5 per cent. reduction in greenhouse gas emissions and set a target of a 20 per cent. reduction in CO_2 emissions by 2010. A further goal was set: a 60 per cent. reduction in CO_2 emissions by 2050. In 2004, the Prime Minister reaffirmed his commitment to "the single most important issue that we face as a global community".

However, in December 2004, the Government admitted that, based on current policies alone, the UK will not achieve the 20 per cent. reduction target by 2010. Instead, current policies are likely to lead to a reduction of around 14 per cent.

Therefore, since coming to power in 1997, Labour has failed to deliver any measurable reduction in carbon emissions. In fact emissions rose in four of the first six years that Labour was in power. Interestingly, Conservative policies achieved a 7.3 per cent. reduction between 1990 and 1997. Carbon emissions in the transport and household sectors, which account for around 40 per cent. of the UK's emissions, are expected to grow.

Labour has let the country down on sustainable development. Even the green movement—at least 5 million citizens in the United Kingdom—has now declared war on the Government. The executive director of Greenpeace, Stephen Tindale, declared in November:

"So far Blair's record on climate change is almost entirely a record of fine words and no action."

The Government have failed to resolve the energy crisis resulting from the decline of indigenous energy supplies and increasing reliance on imported gas. Energy production from coal-fired power stations has increased since 2000 and now represents about one third of electricity production. Between 1997 and 2000, Labour blocked the construction of 15 gas-fired stations, which would have cut CO_2 emissions by 5.5 million tonnes a year.

The Government have also failed to deliver on renewable energy. They set a target for 10 per cent. of overall energy use to be renewable by 2010, but it now stands at 3 per cent. They have put all their eggs in the wind farms basket and alienated many local communities, which have been bypassed in the planning process. They have neglected to stimulate the growth of other renewable technologies, such as tidal and wave power, in which Britain should have an obvious natural advantage. Even the Prime Minister revealed his own nimby instincts when he opposed a wind farm in Sedgefield.

Labour has failed the combined heat and power industry miserably. The target of producing 5 GW of energy by 2000, which was set by the Conservative Government in 1993, has only just been reached. Combined heat and power output fell between 2000 and 2003, and 64 CHP plants have been mothballed.

The Government have broken their pledge to assist the most vulnerable in eliminating the blight of fuel poverty. They have even reduced insulation standards in social housing, causing extra CO_2 emissions and leaving nearly 2 million people in cold homes and fuel poverty.

[Mr. Robert Key]

The Government have piled unnecessary tax burdens and regulations on business, while failing to provide incentives to improve environmental performance. According to the CBI, environmental regulation costs business £4 billion a year in compliance. The CBI has also criticised too much environmental regulation as being "badly designed and poorly implemented."

The Government have alienated the business community by failing to provide certainty and a secure framework of targets and objectives for long-term investment. The business community does not deny that it has a role to play but, if the targets and objectives are not clear, it is bad for everybody. Industry has looked for transparency, long-term certainty and fairness but has suffered from delay, vacillation, incoherence and short-termism.

The Government's notion of a green transport strategy is also called into question, because it seems to consist of trying to tax people out of their cars. Fiscal support for alternative fuels and cleaner cars has been so limited that the greenest fuels and cars still have less than 0.2 per cent. of their respective markets. Meanwhile, aviation emissions have risen by 85 per cent. since 1990 and are set to double again by 2020.

The Prime Minister has committed his Government and himself personally to lead the march towards a more sustainable world. He played a leading part at the United Nations Rio plus 5 conference in 1997, which led to the Kyoto agreement, and again at the world summit on sustainable development in 2002. Last April, he reaffirmed his commitment to, in his own words,

"the single most important issue that we face as a global community".

In a speech on climate change last September, he said that timely action to cut carbon dioxide emissions was essential to "avert disaster." During the speech, he cited the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution's report and the need to reduce emissions by 60 per cent. by 2050, and stated:

"We are committed to this change."

However, the latest prediction from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is for a reduction of about 14 per cent. in CO_2 emissions by 2010 on the basis of current policies. According to DEFRA's estimated emissions and removals of greenhouses gases on an IPCC basis, carbon emissions have risen for four years out of Labour's six years in power from 1997 to 2003, and emissions are 100,000 tonnes of carbon higher for the latest period for which figures are available than when Labour came to power. That is largely due to the continuing increase in the use of coal for electricity generation. Last February, the Government revealed that carbon dioxide levels had jumped by 1.5 per cent. over the previous year.

Then we have seen the spectacle of a feud between DEFRA and the Department of Trade and Industry, involving the intervention of the Prime Minister, which has caused an unnecessary delay in the submission of our national allocation plan for the European emissions trading scheme, which started on 1 January 2005. A new plan was submitted requesting a more generous allowance in October 2004, but then the Prime Minister stepped in on the side of the DTI, which argued for a more generous base allocation. Meanwhile, the Commission has approved allocations for 9,108 installations in 21 member states, representing 4.6 billion tonnes of carbon dioxide over the period 2005–07. The Government have thus subjected business to delay and uncertainty. Will the Minister please explain to us what on earth they are up to in this row between DEFRA and the DTI over the national allocation plan?

Norman Baker: The Liberal Democrats do not support the more generous allowance that the Government have applied for. Will the hon. Gentleman tell us what the Conservative position is?

Mr. Key: Yes. We want to know what the Government's position is. [Laughter.] If the hon. Gentleman will listen for a moment, he will understand where we are coming from.

On 16 January, The Observer revealed that the Government were secretly trying to have key commitments to long-term targets deleted from European documents. We have discussed those already. There is no doubt—I have the document in my hand—that the Government sought to delete the words:

"developed countries' will need to reduce their aggregated greenhouse gas emissions by up to 60–80 per cent. by 2050 compared to 1990 levels".

For the Minister to say "It is not removing the figures", which were his exact words, is frankly absurd. Will he take this opportunity to own up to that blunder and stop trying to pretend that Greenpeace knew all along exactly what the Government were doing and understood the Government's tactics? He must do better than that.

On 14 September 2004, the Prime Minister made a keynote speech on climate change, in which he reiterated that this was "the world's greatest environmental challenge" and said that it would be a "top priority" for Britain's presidency of the G8. He highlighted the three key parts of the Government's G8 strategy:

"First, I want to secure an agreement as to the basic science on climate change and the threat it poses. Such an agreement would be new and provide the foundation for further action.

Second, agreement on a process to speed up the science, technology, and other measures necessary to meet the threat.

Third, while the eight G8 countries account for around 50 per cent. of global greenhouse gas emissions, it is vital that we also engage with other countries with growing energy needs".

So say all of us. However, it is notable that climate change or global warming did not feature in the Prime Minister's 2004 Labour party conference speech, and domestic measures to tackle this global problem did not form any part of his 10 priorities for a third term of Labour Government.

The Minister has implied that he did not think there was much in my comment about the environmental groups declaring war on the Government. That is certainly not true of Greenpeace, because Mr. Tindale said in The Independent in November 2004 that Mr. Blair's reheated, tub-thumping speeches on the world stage were undermined by his failed record in Britain.

Tony Juniper, executive director of Friends of the Earth, pointed out that there was a gaping gap between the Prime Minister's rhetoric and leadership on the world stage and his record in the UK:

"The leadership position of this country is jeopardised by the position at home."

He went on:

"The credibility of this country on climate change is essentially derived from the policy choices taken by the Conservatives in the 1980s when they decided to shift from coal to gas generation".

Charles Secrett, former head of Friends of the Earth, who now heads Active Citizens Transform, said that Mr. Blair was "all talk and no action".

He went on to say:

"Blair thinks he can get away with boosting his green credentials by making a big speech every year on climate change. It's always about the grand scenario and when it comes to putting his own house in order it is always business as usual."

I pay tribute to the Government's chief scientific adviser, Professor Sir David King, who will be retiring far too soon for our liking. In a recent interview, he talked about the imperatives for action and warned that measurements of atmospheric CO_2 taken at the Mauna Loa observatory in Hawaii and published earlier this year showed that, while carbon levels had increased in recent years by an average of 1.5 parts per million annually, in 2002–03 the increase was more than 2 parts per million. Levels have risen so much that, according to Sir David:

"This is taking us up into relatively dangerous levels of CO_2 for our planet."

Anyone who is sceptical about the concept of climate change should listen to Sir David King. They do not need to look further than the Thames barrier. It was built to protect London from catastrophic floods and was used six times a year, not once every three to five years as planned. Sir David said:

"It's a damned good thing we put it up. A flood would knock out the City of London and cost about £30bn."

Quite so.

What would we do instead? Where are we coming from on this? We believe fundamentally in conservation of the past and preservation for the future. We have always supported the dual concepts of citizenship and duty as related to environmental stewardship and protection of the environment and countryside. Environmental goods and services are a common advantage and present generations should save and enhance such benefits for the good and security of future ones.

Conservatives do not see environmental protection and economic growth as mutually incompatible. We believe that market mechanisms can achieve sustainable development. We believe that excessive regulation may be bad for business but that targeted taxation and fiscal measures that provide industry with a long-term framework for investment are more likely to deliver environmental benefits. We support the proximity principle, which encourages localised decision making and local procurement. Local sustainable communities require and deserve more local empowerment and more local autonomy in decision making, such as over planning decisions.

We uphold the polluter pays principle. We acknowledge that pollution costs and hence we support life cycle costing—the internalisation of environmental costs in design, production, construction and operation. If products included the cost of pollution in their production, the marginal social cost would be higher. Thus, if all goods and services had to internalise their external environmental costs, only those most environmentally sensitive should succeed within the free marketplace. We would devise a policy framework to incentivise responsible consumption or the purchasing of environmental goods rather than environmental bads. The consumer should be able to make environmentally sensitive choices. Therefore, we support clear and coherent labelling of products to indicate the environmental consequences of design, production and distribution.

Conservatives are fully committed to the Kyoto process and the 2050 target for a 60 per cent. reduction in carbon emissions. We will pursue policies in government to achieve a 21st century world of resource efficiency and sustainable consumption in order to achieve climate stability.

Any Government must have the courage to consider all the options. They must look at scientific evidence, not scaremongering, for their policies. They cannot afford to resort to easy attention-grabbing fixes. To deal with climate change, Britain must become a low-carbon economy. It is the only option and we are committed to achieving that goal.

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): If the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) wants to bandy quotes, I can give him a few of my own, but that will not take us very far. I will come back to his points.

First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale), who attended COP 10 and made a useful contribution to the discussions organised by the EU in the pavilion. I am glad to say that they were extremely well attended.

I also welcome my hon. Friend's incisive dissection of the climate change sceptics, who have done much damage by arguing against the whole concept of climate change without the slightest analysis of the evidence. They should know better. Michael Crichton is a very good writer, but I am not aware of his qualifications in climate science. Those sceptics do not seem to take into account the international consensus of the international panel on climate change, which involves large numbers of scientists from all over the world. Those sceptics really are the flat earth tendency and are becoming increasingly isolated as our knowledge and understanding of climate change science increases.

Global warming is a reality. The scientific evidence for that is overwhelming and we need to take action to deal with it, while increasing our understanding of it all the time.

My hon. Friend is right: there is a role for clean coal technology. He is right to point out that the UK receives a third of its power from coal, and we cannot simply wipe out coal burning power stations through the use of gas. We must have a balance of energy. We also cannot deny the fact that emerging economies such as China and India will utilise their coal reserves. There has to be development of the science of clean fuel technology. There is a role for biomass, energy from waste and biogas.

I agree that the Kyoto process is very much the first step and there is much more to be done. We need to look beyond Kyoto, particularly for the second commitment period. That is why my hon. Friend was absolutely right to say that the outcome of COP 10 was very important. It was bitterly contested. It is certainly true that there were countries there that did not want to have the seminars. They did not want to start considering future commitments or even to talk about them. The seminars are intended not to create binding agreements or as a place to conduct negotiations, but to allow us to start to examine the steps that we need to take concerning the work that needs to be done.

The opposition from countries such as the oil-producing states led by Saudi Arabia was a complete and utter disgrace. There are few countries as well placed as Saudi Arabia to adapt to the sort of changes that will come with a low-carbon economy. With the best will in the world and the fastest technological advances, there will still be enormous demand for oil. That country is extremely well placed and its position was completely destructive, negative and irrational. I was also disappointed with the position of India, which has a good grasp of the implications and the science of climate change. We are working closely with India, but it must recognise that no one will escape the consequences of climate change, rich or poor, large or small. We must deal with it.

Regarding the comments of the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), I can say straight away that we recognise that the 2° C figure being discussed is in relation to the pre-industrial level. There are scientific issues that must be examined. We need to discover whether 2° C is the tipping point—that is not absolutely certain. We believe, however, that 2° C is a useful target to work with, even though there may be some doubts and there may be some acceleration of carbon intensity in the atmosphere. Nevertheless, it is an important commitment and the science conference that the UK is sponsoring in February will consider stabilisation of greenhouse gases and the long-term consequences of that. It is a helpful way of using proper scientific analysis in determining the right way forward.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the question of tactics in dealing with the US and the December Council. I want to make something absolutely clear to him and to the hon. Member for Salisbury about the leaked minutes It has been ignored that, within them, there was a clear commitment to targets—this is the problem when people leak bits of minutes. The commitment was written in the minutes. What was under discussion was whether a figure should be put to the December Council or the March Council. It is as simple as that. There was no intention of removing any figure because a figure will have to be agreed. The UK understands that, and one of the reasons that we are acknowledged as a world leader on climate change is the quality of our science: we approach things in a methodical way. Incidentally, that also means that sometimes we may have to adjust our figures in the light of new findings and new understanding.

We want to encourage some EU member states that have just gone through the national allocation plan process and feel rather bruised by it. The last thing that they wanted to do in the December Council was start talking about major new commitments. We want to prepare the ground for that by reassuring people that we can have challenging targets without destroying our economy. That is our belief and what we have signed up to, and we are keen to have challenging targets for the whole EU.

Norman Baker: The Government amendment to delay the targets was not carried, so the majority of the European Union does not take their view. The DEFRA spokesman who responded to the leaked minutes said that they did not want to use a figure "plucked out of nowhere". Why is a figure of 60 per cent. for the EU "plucked out of nowhere"? The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs apparently said last week that she would not resile from a 60 per cent. figure in any circumstances.

Mr. Morley: That is absolutely right. We are committed to our figure. We have made the decision in relation to our own circumstances, and we are keen to see figures of that order in relation to long-term commitments for the European Union. The figures may need to be greater, given what we know about carbon intensities and the link with that, but what the hon. Member for Lewes said is wrong. The UK position was accepted in the December Council and supported by countries such as Germany. Is he saying that the Germans are trying to do some sort of deal with the US? Is that his argument? The Germans were wholeheartedly in support of what the UK was saying at the Council. In fact, there were no dissenting voices from any country to what the UK was saying in the December Council. Does that mean that the whole EU is signed up to do some deal with the Americans? What the hon. Gentleman is saying does not make sense.

With the greatest respect to Stephen Tindale—I have a great deal of admiration for what he has done—he is ignoring reality. I met the non-governmental organisations at COP 10 to explain exactly what the UK position is. We have been open about it. I cannot remember whether Greenpeace was in that NGO delegation, but there is no sense in what the hon. Members for Salisbury and for Lewes are saying or in the allegations from Greenpeace. I simply say that we are committed to challenging and binding EU targets. He will have to wait for the outcome of the spring Council, but we shall seek to ensure that those targets are based on firm science and meet the objectives that we want, and we shall seek to convince people who may have doubts about that.

I am disappointed that the hon. Member for Salisbury was reading his central office brief, because I have a bit more respect for him than that—it was utter fantasy. It was in the same category as a party that claims that it can cut taxes and increase public spending. The idea that we have not spent money on renewables other than wind is complete nonsense. We have committed £50 million to developing marine renewables, for example, which is £50 million more than the Conservative Government committed. Where does the idea that the Conservatives did brilliantly by reducing greenhouses gases by 7.3 per cent. come from? They have reduced by 14 per cent. under this Government—a far greater increase.

It is claimed that renewables are only at 3 per cent., but we have a commitment to 10 per cent., and renewables were at less than 1 per cent. under the previous Government, with no commitment and no programme to take them forward. I shall take no lessons from the hon. Gentleman, given the record of the Conservative party, which inhabits a fantasy world in terms of what can and cannot be done and which cannot demonstrate anything apart from reducing greenhouse gases by wrecking the economy. We have reduced greenhouse gases by 14 per cent., with 35 per cent. economic growth. When he can demonstrate a similar record, I may take seriously some of the nonsense that he stated this morning.

Water and Sewage Utilities (Regulation)

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): I am pleased to introduce the debate. It is a short debate rather than a one-and-a-half hour one, so I shall focus on a narrow aspect of the problem with the regulation of water and sewage utilities which is of particular interest to my constituency. It relates to sewage works. There is one very important and controversial establishment in the neighbourhood at Mogden. As it happens, Mogden is just across the border from my constituency, in that of the hon. Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Ann Keen), who has also been active on the issue. It is in the borough of Hounslow. However, the problems that it generates are shared by my borough, Richmond.

The issue is a long-standing one, but its seriousness—or, at least, the public perception of its seriousness—has grown. The plant was built 70 years ago. No doubt it was, in its day, state of the art and effective. Several things have changed. Technical standards have moved on to a much higher level. When new sewage works are established, as one was in Reading recently, they are fully covered. The environment is completely different. When Mogden was established in the 1930s, the population of south-west London was much smaller, and the pressure on Mogden's equipment and facilities much lower. It was built in a largely greenfield area. I have photographs from the 1930s of the rugby union stadium, which is just across the road from Mogden sewage works; it is surrounded by fields and orchards. My house, which is about half a mile from the sewage works and rugby stadium, is a 1930s semi that was built in a largely rural area, which is now heavily built-up. In the last few decades in particular, thousands of homes have been built within a few yards of the establishment.

Consequently, public exposure, particularly to problems of odour, has become much more acute. In the last three to four years, there has been considerable growth in public anxiety, frustration and, in some cases, anger about the environmental problems presented by the Mogden establishment. What seems to happen is that, particularly at times of heavy rainfall, the plant does not have the capacity to handle the volumes of sewage that it receives. There are potent and unpleasant smells hanging over large areas, depending on the prevailing wind. That has become a significant source of concern for thousands of people across south-west London.

Perhaps I can break the concerns down into several specific points. The first relates simply to the smell. It may seem self-evident that the smell of sewage is unpleasant, but it was not until I read a helpful document from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, a consultation on a draft code of practice, that I realised that there is much more science involved than I had appreciated. Smell consists of several different elements. First, there is the concentration of gases. With sewage works, that means hydrogen sulphide, ammonia, methane and various other complex gases. Secondly, there is the intensity of the smell. I had not distinguished those points, but intensity is not the same as concentration. As the atmosphere becomes more heavily concentrated, the intensity of its impact on people rises exponentially. There is a logarithmic relationship.

[Dr. Vincent Cable]

Thirdly, there is an interesting concept called a hedonic scale. Scientists who deal with odour have constructed the scale, which ranges from plus four for a very pleasant smell, such as a bakery, the example that is given, to minus four, which is for the very unpleasant smell that one would associate with rotting flesh. Scientists have constructed a scale that enables smell to be measured qualitatively as well as quantitatively. Odour pollution from sewage is clearly at the bottom end of that scale. The point that emerges from that is that smell is not simply subjective. It has an objective base, though measurement is difficult and complex. That is one of the problems involved in regulation.

However, stench is not the only problem. Another problem that we have become aware of in the last few years is that of mosquito infestation. Until recently, Thames Water, the owner of Mogden, denied categorically that there was a problem associated with mosquitoes. It used to blame the residents for scaremongering and told them that the mosquito problem arose because of standing water in people's gardens. On the basis of consultancy studies, Thames Water has now acknowledged that the sewage works generate a problem and, moreover, that there is potentially a serious health hazard. There are growing worries among environmental health officers and people concerned with public health that British mosquitoes can now serve as a vector for quite dangerous tropical diseases. I know that the Department of Health and local primary care trusts have carried out some serious scientific investigation into the extent to which the mosquito infestation could be a serious hazard in relation to diseases such as West Nile disease.

The third problem at Mogden, after the problems of odour and mosquitoes, is that of sewage overflow. Increasingly, at periods of high rainfall, raw sewage is being washed into the River Thames. That does not directly affect my constituency, but is a matter of great concern to people living along the Thames. Raw sewage in the river causes great damage and loss of life to fish and other river-borne life forms, as well as creating an unpleasantly polluted environment for people, such as canoeists and sailors, who use the river for pleasure purposes. That is becoming a substantial issue.

The question therefore arises of how those various problems are being tackled, and the extent to which the regulatory framework is adequate to deal with them. I shall introduce that point by running through the sequence of events that have occurred over the past few years, which partly reflects the growing frustration.

A few years ago, a residents action group was established, and that has brought to a head the political activity in the area, enlisting support from local MPs and councils to bring pressure to bear on Thames Water to take action. About 18 months ago, there was a visit to Lord Whitty and one of the Minister's colleagues in DEFRA, who, I believe, were sensitive to local concerns. That was followed up with a visit to the site. Partly as a result of those representations, and partly as a result of questions in the House, DEFRA initiated its consultation process on a code of practice, and a number of streams of activity were then set in train.

The other important recent development is in relation to the law. In principle, it has been possible for local authorities tackling issues such as this to use abatement notices under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, in much the same way as such notices can be used against excessive noise. However, until recently, attempts to use the law in that way were frustrated by objections from Thames Water. There have also been comparable issues in Liverpool and Plymouth, and the law has proved a very weak instrument in defence of local concerns. A few months ago, however, that changed, when a precedent was established. In the case of Hounslow council v. Thames Water, an appeal by Thames Water was dismissed. I understand that it is now possible for action to be brought in the courts, and that, in this case, it shortly will be. However, there are questions about whether the law will be strong enough, given the rather modest level of fines available under that legislation. In my conclusion, I want to question the Minister about that matter.

The final step in the sequence of events relates to finance and the current determination by Ofwat and the Department of the permitted levels of price increase by the water companies. That is critical to the resolution of the problems. When Lord Whitty came to Mogden with MPs and local residents, Thames Water unveiled a very impressive engineering project covering the whole plant, with the introduction of new equipment. It argued, and I am sure that it was right, that the project would have provided a final solution to the earlier problems that I mentioned. Thames Water also proposed other solutions to the problem of sewage overflow.

However, the investment required for those projects was substantial and, for that investment to be made, it was important that the Ofwat judgments about the passing through of investment into prices should be sympathetic. In practice, as is inevitable with the regulatory process, a compromise has been reached. Thames Water has been allowed a price increase of 24 per cent. over the next five years. It asked for 39 per cent. It is not clear whether that will permit it to undertake the Mogden work. I had a letter a few days ago from Mr. Sexton, the managing director of Thames Water, who says that he is still reflecting on whether it will be possible to carry out the work. There is now considerable doubt about it.

What is clear is that some of the other important environmental work will no longer be possible. The much bigger problem—at least in a wider London sense—of sewage overflow into the river probably cannot be solved as a result of Thames Water's investment plans. Indeed, the Environment Agency has expressed some frustration that the Thames tideway project will now have to be abandoned. Its recent press release stated that "we are disappointed that some of the savings have only been achieved by shelving essential schemes to benefit the environment."

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I want to make it clear that no decision has been taken on the Thames tideway, so it is quite wrong to say that it has been abandoned.

Dr. Cable: I hope that the Minister is right. I was only reading from a House of Commons Library note, which states that "particular concerns have been raised about the abandonment of the Thames Tideway Project."

If that is not the case, I am delighted to hear it, and I am sure that the residents will be, too.

I will conclude by posing a series of questions to the Minister that arise out of the background that I have described. First, the Department has laid a good deal of store by the ability of local councils—mainly Hounslow, but to some extent Richmond—to issue abatement notices against the water company when odour pollution is a nuisance, and now the way has been cleared for action to be taken. Is the Minister satisfied that the sanctions available through that route are on a scale that is appropriate to the problem? We are dealing with billion-pound companies and rather nominal fines under environmental legislation. I simply ask him whether he is satisfied that the legislation is robust enough to deal with a problem of this kind.

The second point is that DEFRA has now undertaken a helpful exercise: a code of practice. There is a lot of technical detail that I do not understand, but clearly a great deal of work has gone into it with the industry and the regulators. That is all welcome. How does the Minister see the code of practice acquiring greater statutory force? I know that he has been giving consideration to how it can be included in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, which is passing through the House. Certain aspects of the code of practice, particularly relating to mosquito nuisance, could be included in the Bill, and that is planned.

Why, though, is it not possible to include odour nuisance in that framework legislation? My colleagues and I strongly support it, and it would seem to be an appropriate vehicle. I know that there are difficulties with objective measures in relation to smell—that is somewhat more difficult than in relation to noise—but given that a great deal of effort has gone into producing quantitative measures, it does not seem totally impossible that the code of practice could acquire statutory force. I invite the Minister to give me some hope that that might be taken on board in the Standing Committee.

The third point relates to funding. The Minister has already intervened, so he may be able to give me some reassurance. I am concerned that even if it was generally agreed that major investment was required, it seems that there could be some difficulties in funding the investment stream required to make things happen. I invite him to tell me whether he believes, after the Ofwat determination, that those needs can be met.

The fourth point relates to independent monitoring. It is clearly crucial to the maintenance of high environmental standards that there should be a genuinely independent assessment of the ability of Thames Water, and other utilities in other parts of the country, to meet their capacity requirements. At the moment, as I understand it, the Environment Agency is totally dependent on the company to produce estimates of flows in and out of the works, so there is no basis for independent monitoring of its performance. Perhaps the Minister can tell me whether any thought has been given to strengthening the element of independence.

My final point is perhaps offbeat. On Saturday, I attended the annual conference of the National Association of Plumbing Teachers at my local tertiary college, the high-level Richmond upon Thames technical college, which does excellent work on trades and is a centre of excellence for plumbing teachers. I was questioned by some of the country's leading authorities on plumbing who said that a major crisis is emerging—I have no basis on which to judge whether this is a technically sensible point—as a result of large-scale installation of condensing boilers. The point was made that condensing boilers issue about 2 litres of acid into the sewerage system every hour. A typical sewage works with 10,000 condensing boilers in its vicinity could probably generate 140 million litres of acid every year. Even if diluted substantially, that could, and is beginning to have, a damaging effect on the bacteriological processes necessary for the treatment of sewage. The Minister may be unfamiliar with that problem, as I was when it was put to me. Could his technical advisers consider whether the problem is real and whether any action has been taken?

It is clear that there is greater awareness now of the problems, particularly that of odour, generated by Mogden and other sewerage works. A substantial momentum has built up for action. I would like some reassurance from the Minister on my specific points about enforcement, providing a statutory basis for the code of conduct and ensuring that there is adequate investment to ensure that improvements take place.

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on securing this debate and on the detailed and measured way in which he made important points that are of concern to local residents. As he rightly said, my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Ann Keen) has also been active on the issue and arranged for my noble Friend Lord Whitty to visit the sewage works to see for himself and to talk to Thames Water about some of the issues.

Some of the points raised by the hon. Gentleman are right, including that about insects. We are dealing with that matter in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, which will provide the power to deal with issues such as mosquito nuisance, although such issues may not currently exist.

The hon. Gentleman asked about making the code statutory. As he rightly said—I shall touch on this in more detail in a moment—it has been established in court that local authorities can apply abatement notices in relation to odours, so regulation is in place. The problem with a statutory code for smell nuisance touches on issues that he recognised: how can a subjective test be devised?

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned independent monitoring. It is true that the Environment Agency relies on the figures provided by companies on matters such as flows. However, those figures comprise part of their investment programmes in relation to the size capacity of treatment plants, and their business plans are subject to careful scrutiny by Ofwat, as he knows. There is an element of independent assessment.

[Mr. Elliot Morley]

The hon. Gentleman also referred to storm overflows and I should like to deal with that straight away because I do not want any misunderstanding about the Thames tideway. Mogden is one of four major treatment works that are currently unable to deal with storm flows, and that leads to a discharge from the treatment plants into the River Thames. I am pleased to assure the hon. Gentleman that, with the business plans that Thames Water put to Ofwat, there has been approval for a considerable investment in the upgrade of those treatment works, including Mogden, to enable them to cope better with storm flows. That in itself should considerably improve the River Thames.

The working group examining the Thames tideway has been considering whether there are quicker and potentially cheaper ways of dealing with combined sewage overflows in the long term. In the end, there may not be and, in the final analysis, the tideway scheme may be the best option. I do not rule that out. I am waiting for the group's report at the end of this month or the beginning of next month, and we will make an evaluation based on it. I want to see rapid progress, and that is why I am very pleased about the investment in the four sewage works.

The Thames tideway project will be five years in development; it will be five years just working it up. It will be at least another decade in construction. It is a long-term scheme that will cost billions of pounds. We must consider that option. I do not want the hon. Gentleman to think that the scheme has been abandoned, because it has not. We are just waiting for that report.

The hon. Gentleman will understand that the prime responsibility for tackling odour problems rests with the water company; in this case, Thames Water. I do not know the history of the site, but I wonder what was there first: the treatment plant or housing. If housing was built there, I wonder what consideration the planning authority gave to those issues. The hon. Gentleman knows the history better than me. Again, I can provide him with some assurance, because the original determination by Ofwat allowed Thames Water £10.8 million for odour works, mainly at Mogden where, it is recognised, there is a major problem. That would have covered the inlet works in the first determination. The final determination has almost quadrupled that allocation to £42.8 million. In addition to the inlet works, that will allow Thames Water to cover storm tanks and some of the sewage tanks. A considerable amount of money is available. The work programme is for Thames Water to decide, but, based on the business plan that the company put forward, Ofwat has made a considerable amount of money available for the approved programme.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we need an effective regulatory scheme. There must be a stick and a carrot. The stick is regulation and enforcement, including fines on occasions, and reasonable standards and real action to deal with complaints, which is the job of local authorities. The carrot is ensuring that the company is in a position to fund its operations. That is a matter for Ofwat.

The legal position has been clarified by court judgments on odour. The High Court judgment confirmed that odours from sewage treatment works can be considered a statutory nuisance within the terms of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. As a consequence, local authorities have a duty to investigate such problems, and they have the corresponding enforcement powers. I understand that in this case the local authority has used its powers to issue abatement notices.

The Government published on 23 December 2002 the outcome of our first public consultation on odour, and that is where we developed the policy of supporting the use of a statutory nuisance regime to resolve odour problems at sewage works. We also recognise that local authorities and water companies need a clear idea of what procedures and standards ought to be met under that regime, and we have been working with them to try to clarify the situation. As a result, we launched a new consultation on the draft code of practice and local authority guidance on odour nuisance from sewage treatment works. Responses are invited up to 4 April 2005, and our aim is to implement the code by the summer. At the same time, DEFRA and UK Water Industry Research are collaborating on best practical means guidance that will be aimed primarily at the water industry.

We recognise that there are obvious local problems with odours from sewage treatment works. Water companies do not have to wait around for the outcome of the consultation and guidance, but should act now. As I said, funds have been made available in respect of the business plans.

If water companies need to do more at particular sewage works to manage odour problems, it may mean that better management or maintenance is required. We recognise that capital investment is a consideration, but I emphasise to the hon. Gentleman my understanding that the way in which sewage treatment plants are operated also has a bearing on odour. Issues of good practice, good management, good operation and good maintenance are separate from the capital programme. Ofwat rightly has an obligation to scrutinise the business plans in order to ensure good value for money.

Nationally, companies propose in their final business plans to spend more than £292 million between 2005 and 2010 to fund works on odour control. Ofwat allowed £96 million for that in the draft version. In the final version, the amount was increased to £134 million, which is a recognition of the representations that Ofwat received, including those of the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth. Considerable progress is being made on the matter, and we expect work to be carried out during the next five years. I very much hope that progress is made on the issues raised by the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether enforcement was adequate, given the steps that can be taken. Ofwat will lend weight to the proposed code of practice by not allowing the cost of any fines that might be incurred by water companies as a result of prosecution under odour nuisance regulations to be passed on to customers. The company will have to pay for any fines directly out of its profits and not pass them on in consumer bills. I make that point to the hon. Gentleman, as that is an important assurance.

Fines of up to £20,000 may be levied for such nuisances, but we should not forget that all water companies—Thames is no exception—take very seriously their image, environmental commitments and customer relations. They do not want to be seen as being in breach of any of the regulations, whether on odour, pollution or discharges, and they spend a great deal of time on ensuring that they have the mechanisms and management in place to deal with such matters.

As I said, there is also the issue of capital investment. I hope that I have assured the hon. Gentleman that significant capital investment has been allowed for in the current price review. On enforcement, there are court judgments, and DEFRA is finishing its consultation on the code of practice, which will help people who suffer from the problem. It will also help companies, which clearly need some guidance and some certainty as to how they should approach the matter. Those are important issues, and I am optimistic that the hon. Gentleman will see considerable progress, which will be of benefit to his constituents.

Installation of Oil Fired Heating

3.30 pm

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise another important environmental issue. When there is a huge leak of oil at sea, we are quickly made aware of it through the media. The damage to the environment is widely known and understood. The work that has been done to prevent oil spills at sea has been so effective that the names of past incidents are readily remembered. Torrey Canyon, Exxon Valdez, Amoco Cadiz and Sea Empress are just a few that come to mind.

The problem of oil spills that are not at sea is far less publicised. One example, which occurred in July 2003, was reported by my constituent, Phil Hope of Colemansmoor road in Woodley. The name is pure coincidence; I do not believe that he is related to the Minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. I am glad that the hon. Lady clarified that. I was about to call her to order for not referring to the hon. Gentleman by his constituency.

Jane Griffiths: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My constituent reported that his daughter had led him to warn the Environment Agency of pollution to the River Loddon at the bottom of his garden. He stated:

"My daughter was at the bottom of the garden on Wednesday evening and she noticed a terrible smell and a substance floating on top of the river. It looked like oil and smelled of petrol. With our neighbours we called the Environment Agency and people came out to remove the swans. I am sure if they hadn't been taken out they would have died. We have been feeding the family of swans since they were very small. There is a mum and a dad and seven cygnets."

As an aside, I am not a fan of swans. They cannot break a man's arm, as reputed, but they are nasty, fascist birds, and I do not like them.

Some of the pollution reached nearby Dinton Pastures, and a spokesperson for the country park said that staff there smelled the oil and contacted the Environment Agency. So far, wildlife has not been badly affected. A spokeswoman for the agency stated:

"There are rainbow colours on top of the water which means that the oil there is minimal. The main problems are aesthetic, it doesn't look or smell nice. But in large quantities oil can be toxic so we advise the public to be aware of what they put in the water."

The leak is believed to have come from a school via a surface water drain. That report was not from the national media, all of which beat a path to the door of my constituent, but from the local Reading Evening Post. It comprised the sole report of the incident.

The following are not my words but those of the Environment Agency in its February 2004 position statement on oil pollution of inland waters:

"Oil and fuels are the most frequently reported type of pollutant of inland waters in England and Wales."

Oil is a persistent and toxic pollutant. Agency figures show that there are more than 5,000 oil spill incidents a year in England and Wales. Although some of them affect land, the vast majority affect the water environment: rivers, streams and ground water, including sources of drinking water, which can be tainted at very low concentrations, making them unsuitable for use.

In one example, a root was left in the base of a newly installed oil tank. It punctured the tank, and the oil headed towards a water borehole. The only way to deal with the problem was to drill a borehole into the polluted area and try to pump out more oil than was emptying into the ground. The water borehole at risk provided the water for four or five villages, and there was no other nearby source.

The effects of oil spillages may be long term. They can and do harm or kill wildfowl, mammals and fish. Of course, oil is carcinogenic to humans. As I indicated, I am aware of spillages that have had damaging effects in particular areas. They have been reported in local newspapers and on local radio.

The problem is by no means confined to spills from commercial premises. I am happy to say that those have been addressed by measures on agricultural fuel oil storage dating from 1991 and 2001 which set minimum standards for oil storage at industrial, commercial and institutional premises. Ten per cent. of all sites designated as contaminated by local authorities were contaminated as a result of domestic oil spillage, according to the journal Property Matters in March 2003.

Although it can be hard sometimes to track the exact source of oil pollution because of the diffuse nature of the problem, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister estimated that between 1995 and 1998 there were

"on average 1,250 substantiated pollution incidents in the domestic and residential sector. However, in 1999 the number of incidents rose significantly to 2,855."

The latest Environment Agency statistics show that the problem persists. The agency believes that the current level of pollution of inland waters by oil is unacceptable and that, according to the position statement on oil pollution of inland waters of February 2004,

"effective steps need to be taken to reduce the number and severity of such incidents."

Oil-fired domestic heating has been a growth area. Since 1993–94 the market for oil-burning appliances has doubled. Oftec, the Oil Firing Technical Association, estimates that 80,000 tanks were sold to the domestic market in Great Britain in 1998, half of them with a capacity in excess of 2,500 litres. The industry estimated that in 1997—the latest statistic that I have—the market was growing at about 30 per cent. per annum. The vast majority of oil tank installations are plastic, with the balance being steel. Half of them have a capacity of over 2,500 litres.

The ODPM has expressed the following concern:

"It is thought that many of these new installations are being constructed by non-specialists and that nearly all of these installations lack satisfactory means of containing escaping oil and detecting and warning of leakage."

That is from the regulatory impact assessment on part J of the building regulations on combustion appliances and fuel storage systems. However, the problem goes beyond that. Spills sometimes occur during delivery. There is evidence of vandalism being a significant factor. According to Oftec:

"Steel tanks fail, mainly due to age, and plastic tanks split. Across the board manufacturers have reported disfiguration due to rapid filling."

On that basis the condition of an oil tank stands out as a prime candidate for inspection and report during the forthcoming home condition inspection process. Alternatively, could the tank be inspected at the same time as the householder has their boiler inspected? I would be grateful for the Minister's views on those points.

There are 1 million domestic oil storage tanks of which only 10 per cent. are bunded. Bunding is the addition of a secondary containment system, a second skin. Oil is five times more likely to be lost from a non-bunded tank, mainly because leaks and overflows from a tank will be contained by a bund. The new Control of Pollution (Oil Storage)(England) Regulations 2002 are welcome as far as they go. Under those, oil tanks must have a secondary containment system with a capacity of at least 110 per cent of the tank's storage capacity.

There is, however, an exemption from those controls on oil tanks for private dwellings where the storage capacity is 3,500 litres or less; in contrast, they bite on industrial premises where the storage capacity exceeds 200 litres. It stretches belief that an industrial tank containing 201 litres is somehow more hazardous than a domestic tank containing 3,499 litres. I would be grateful if the Minister could explain why the requirement to bund should not be extended to new domestic tanks, at least the larger ones.

Another part of the answer may lie in professionalising Oftec. Oftec was set up in 1991 as part of the Government's competent persons scheme in a broad and commendable attempt to improve standards in the construction industry. Every Oftec-registered technician must hold a current certificate of competence. Under the building regulations self-certification scheme, Oftec may exempt individuals and companies from the requirement to notify local authorities of work to install oil-fired combustion appliances and oil storage tanks and pipes.

In 2003, the ODPM undertook an assessment of Oftec's success. At that time—12 years after its establishment—Oftec covered around 30 per cent. of all installers, but membership is voluntary. Oftec registration is merely a sign of quality within the industry, not a requirement. The Department noted that 1,600 registrations lapsed in December at the end of the three-year registration. Given the ODPM's express concern about non-specialist installers, I suggest that oil-fired systems should be installed only by properly qualified and competent technicians. A healthy Oftec with an equivalent status to the Council for Registered Gas Installers—CORGI, as it is known—and with 100 per cent. coverage of installers is highly desirable. Would the Minister consider making membership of Oftec mandatory for installers and services? Oftec could then play a leading role in professionalising the oil heating installation industry in the pursuit of higher standards and environmental protection. I believe that there is scope to raise training requirements for Oftec registration and for Oftec to assume a greater regulatory and supervisory role.

Taking effective action against this problem stands to be a net benefit to the economy as well as the environment. It was estimated that the benefits of the oil storage regulations on existing tanks would amount to £250 million, from avoiding clear-up costs, reimbursement to the Environment Agency and the cost of replacing lost fuel, together with between £15 million and £56 million a year from regulating new tanks; and that is from a limited assessment of benefits.

Let us not forget also the costs to householders and businesses. An oil leak can spread the fumes and smell of the heating oil throughout the house. In one extreme case a house had to be demolished because the oil had got so far into the foundations that it was the only way the problem could be treated. Yet most householders are not aware of the possible problems.

The United Kingdom is required by European Union directives on dangerous substances and groundwater to prevent pollution of the water environment. That is simply good sense. It is much better for the environment if we prevent pollution rather than having to clean it up afterwards.

The Environment Agency's latest survey shows what a steep hill this will be to climb. It must be right to batten down now on this avoidable source of pollution. No wonder the agency is currently calling for "Government to consider further measures which could reduce the environmental burden of oil pollution. This should include a review of the scope of the Oil Storage Regulations, a review of Part J of the Building Regulations and alternative measures, such as a requirement for technicians installing oil fired equipment to be appropriately qualified and registered."

It would be helpful to know how the Government will respond to this call. I hope that, as I have had an opportunity to give the Minister advance notice of some of those points, he will be able to respond in some detail.

I conclude by saying that when hon. Members' constituents have a gas boiler installed in their home, they can be confident that the person coming to install it will do a quality job. Our constituents with oil-fired heating systems and tanks have a right to have similar confidence.

3.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) on securing this debate on oil installations. I was interested in what she said about pollution incidents, the way in which they are being controlled now and might be controlled in future and in her suggestions. I also congratulate her constituent on an excellent choice of name.

Addressing oil pollution risks is an important part of the Government's overall policy on sustainability. In relation to oil installations, sustainability means using oil efficiently to avoid extravagant consumption and carbon emissions as well as limiting oil spillage in transit, dispensing and through leaks from storage installations, so that pollution incidents and expensive clean-up operations are minimised.

I want to begin where my hon. Friend began—with the problem of oil pollution affecting fresh waters. Throughout the late 1990s, the Government introduced legislation to set minimum standards for oil storage facilities at industrial, commercial and institutional premises in England. Similar regulations have been proposed for Scotland and Northern Ireland, and the Welsh Assembly Government are also considering their introduction.

The control of pollution regulations for oil storage for England were introduced, as my hon. Friend said, on 1 September 2001, and they are being implemented in three phases. The final phase, starting on 1 September this year, will affect all oil storage tanks not previously covered and associated pipe work at industrial, commercial and institutional installations and tanks above a 3,500-litre capacity serving dwellings, a point made by my hon. Friend.

The regulations will provide minimum standards for larger domestic installations, but there are no other requirements under those regulations aimed at controlling pollution risks arising from the majority of domestic storage installations, which generally have a much smaller capacity—600 to 1,000 litres is most common. However, it is a statutory offence under the Water Resources Act 1991 to cause or knowingly permit the pollution of controlled waters, including ground and surface water. In 2002, there was a 10 per cent. fall in the number of all categories of oil pollution incidents—the second successive year of reduction since the regulations were introduced. It is obviously too soon to make positive judgments about the overall effect of the regulations, but the signs are pointing in the right direction. We will not be able to evaluate them all in practice until there is a full year of incident data following the final enforcement date of September this year.

Although the oil storage regulations do not address the risk arising from most oil tanks that serve dwellings, those have been controlled on a risk basis in England and Wales under part J of the building regulations introduced in April 2002. Similar provisions again apply in Scotland. My hon. Friend mentioned part J, the regulatory impact assessment that was published in support of it in October 2001 and the possibilities for improving the controls on storage tanks. The requirements for measures against oil pollution in those regulations came into effect on 1 April 2002. They require that oil storage tanks and the pipes connecting combustion appliances be properly constructed to reduce the risk of oil escaping and causing pollution, and that tanks bear durable notices containing information on how to respond to an oil escape.

Approved document J, which was published in support of the regulatory requirements, provides guidance on how to comply with the regulations. To control the risk of oil pollution, it calls for risk assessments. Where the risk is considered unacceptable, it calls for storage tanks to be protected by secondary containment. My hon. Friend described them. There are impervious bunded enclosures and catchpits, and there are also certain types of double-skinned tanks that serve this purpose.

It is true, however, that views are changing about the pollution risk from domestic central heating. It seems that the provisions in approved document J may only partially address the risks as they are now perceived. I am pleased to say that my officials have therefore begun discussions with representatives of the Environment

[Phil Hope]

Agency and the oil industry to see what additional guidance might be needed and how best it might be conveyed.

My hon. Friend mentioned the Oil Firing Technical Association, Oftec. It is one of the organisations approved under the building regulations to operate competent persons schemes. Membership of its scheme enables firms to carry out oil installation work covered by the building regulations and to self-certify the compliance of their work with all relevant requirements. The Oftec scheme began in April 2002. In order to register, firms must demonstrate their competence at meeting building regulation requirements, including those covering pollution.

Periodic, random inspections by Oftec help to ensure that the standards of scheme members do not slip following their registration. Although a number of registrations are not renewed each year, I am told that, overall, numbers are healthy and rising, and I welcome that. The approved Oftec scheme covers the installation of oil fired combustion appliances and related storage tanks and pipe work. It does not deal with maintenance, because those ongoing activities are not covered by the building regulations.

The competent persons scheme relieves much of the regulatory burden and allows local authority building control departments to concentrate more on checking the activities of unregistered firms. I am also pleased to say that my officials are pursuing with local authorities, industry and others how such enforcement can be improved.

My hon. Friend raised a number of questions in her presentation, and I shall try to address them now. First, on the issue of inspecting existing tanks—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence has just walked in and sat down. When I say "tanks", I am referring not to anything in his Department, but to oil installation tanks. I wanted to ensure that he did not feel that there was a cross-departmental—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As a former member of the Defence Committee, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that tanks leak oil.

Phil Hope: The regulations governing the leakage of oil from Ministry of Defence tanks will be quoted by my hon. Friend, but I think that I should move on rapidly.

I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East that home information packs will contain information about inspecting existing tanks, but they will cover only what can be visually inspected. The home information pack reporting system will come into effect in the first half of 2007. Although the packs will cover only visual inspection, they are a step in the right direction and will make an impact.

Tanks may also be inspected as part of regular combustion appliance servicing visits, but those are currently not mandatory. Section 2 of the Building Act 1984 enables such requirements for regular inspections, but those powers have not yet been used. National benefits in terms of combustion safety and efficiency could be obtained from such visits as well as from pollution risk management, which was the main focus of my hon. Friend's concerns, and I have asked my office to look into those possibilities. There would need to be wide consultation before new regulations were made, but we have started to consider what could be done.

My hon. Friend asked about the bunding of at least the larger domestic tanks. The difficulty is that the building regulation requirements on this matter came into effect less than three years ago. It would be premature to revise them before we have had a comprehensive survey of implementation planned for the next financial year. Her comments are welcome, but we have only recently introduced the regulations and we are undertaking that comprehensive survey. However, as I said earlier, my officials are working with colleagues, particularly at the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and also at the Environment Agency, and considering how best to publish further advice, given the concerns that she and others have raised.

With regard to my hon. Friend's question concerning making membership of Oftec for installers and servicers mandatory, I have to say that to do so now would be premature. She drew parallels with the CORGI system, which is covered by the Gas Safety (Installation and Use) Regulations 1998. The strict provisions in those regulations arise as a result of the severe risks of carbon monoxide poisoning that can occur because of defective gas installation work. As I have said, the Oftec competent persons scheme relieves much of the burden on building control departments, thereby giving those local authority departments the opportunity to concentrate on unregistered workers, the group that my hon. Friend mentioned and is concerned about.

I believe that the competent persons scheme is a good scheme and that the consequent ability of building control departments to concentrate their efforts on unregistered workers is working. I do not think that we need, or would wish, to proscribe unregistered work again until we have surveyed implementation of part J and, as I mentioned earlier, the final step in implementing the oil storage regulations. My hon. Friend's points were well made, but we need to allow existing regulations to take effect and the schemes to operate. We need to survey the impact before we make a decision on any further action.

In general, we are doing a lot. Although it would be premature to alter things now, I hope that I have made it clear that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is investigating how the regulatory powers may be used to include maintenance, should that eventually be shown to be necessary. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment met the Environmental Industries Commission last week to discuss its ideas for reinforcing the storage regulations with provisions for regular inspections of tanks—an MOT test for tanks, in the same way that cars are regularly inspected. That would go a long way towards meeting the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East. I am pleased that my colleagues in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs are meeting with relevant bodies to consider the possibility of more regular inspections of tanks. I have received other representations calling for more regulation of the oil installation industry, and I believe that many of the things that I have described are positive responses to those calls and concerns.

Although we may not be doing everything that my hon. Friend asks for, I hope that she has been persuaded that there is a lot happening. We are working hard on the oil storage regulations; we are currently surveying information that has been returned to assess the impact of the regulations and their efficiency; and there is ongoing dialogue between my Department and DEFRA and representative bodies in the industry to establish whether there may be better ways forward.

We are mindful of the pollution risks associated with domestic heating fuel and we are following an appropriate course of action, given that the regulations were introduced relatively recently, the need to monitor their efficiency and the discussions that are currently taking place to bring about progress in this matter.

Gulf War Syndrome

3.58 pm

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South) (Lab): I thank the Speaker for calling the debate so early. As we have recently had the reports from Lord Lloyd of Berwick, this is an opportune occasion to debate the question. I would rather not be here; I would rather all the problems that have been encountered by the veterans had been addressed by the Government. Unfortunately, however, that is not the case.

The debate surrounding the question of Gulf war illnesses is particularly relevant to Garry Hope, one of my constituents. Garry was born on 4 July 1973. He joined the Army in September 1989 as a signaller in the Royal Highland Fusiliers and went on to fight against Saddam's regime in 1991. Subsequent to that he did tours of Northern Ireland and Belize, before leaving the Army in June 1994. He now works as a residential child care worker in Ayrshire.

Because of the problems that have been identified as affecting Garry, he has been awarded a 40 per cent. war pension. That is based on him suffering from what is known as post-traumatic stress disorder. He has a claim outstanding—I think that it was submitted a couple of months ago—in respect of Gulf war syndrome, but he has been informed that he may have to wait an inordinate amount of time for his case to be heard. That is the first point on which I seek a response from my hon. Friend the Minister today. Why are claims that have been submitted taking so long to be resolved? I want him to address that question urgently.

All the troops involved argue that, as a consequence of being in the Gulf war, they suffer from various physical problems. They have swelling of joints and muscular pain, and many suffer from permanent dizzy spells as well as periodic memory problems. Those are all problems for them in living a life as near to normal as possible.

I have been steeped in the subject of Gulf war syndrome for a considerable time, since March 1997, and have perhaps considered it more closely than I would otherwise. Like many Members of Parliament, I have become very concerned about what I am learning and about what has not been done but could have been done by the Government. I last secured a debate on the subject for another constituent on 8 January 2002, which is just over three years ago, but in many ways nothing seems to have moved on since then. More than anything, I want to establish what has happened between that date and today.

In the debate in 2002, reference was made to a number of different research documents that were being explored and research projects that were being undertaken by various people. In responding to me on that occasion, my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie), then the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, said:

> "The Government accept that some Gulf veterans have become ill and that many believe that their ill health is unusual and is related to their Gulf experience. There is now scientific evidence that Gulf veterans report more illnesses than other comparable groups, but there is no medical or scientific consensus about the causes of those illnesses. We remain open-minded about the causes, and important research is under way."

[Mr. Brian H. Donohoe]

At that point, I asked whether the Minister could clarify the time scales for that exercise. He said:

"It might be helpful if I point out to my hon. Friend, since the matter is one of my responsibilities, that some 12 research studies are still proceeding. Most of them will report during the coming year. Some of them are very detailed, others much more general. The various problems should be resolved within the next 12 months or so. However, we are afraid that we will again find that there is nothing specific involved after having expended a great deal of time, effort and money—resources have not been stinted in our attempts to identify the cause of the conditions that are complained of. We may be left with an inconclusive result and have to recognise that we will never get to the bottom of the matter. However, I assure my hon. Friend that any suggested causes will be actively followed up and that we will do our very best to find the cause, if there is one to be found."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 8 January 2002; Vol. 377, c. 183WH.]

I want to know from this Minister today or, if that is not possible, perhaps in writing, exactly what has happened to all that research undertaken some three years ago, and where the Government are intent on taking this matter.

Part of the problem concerns the inspections undertaken at, I believe, St. Thomas' hospital by Professor Lee. Among the veterans attending there is a consensus that the process and system is not structured to investigate the historical nature of the veterans' health, in the way that they believe should be done. They argue that this is due to Professor Lee not having access to the civilian medical records. I checked this and found that Garry Hope's own GP, a Dr. Walker of the Frew Terrace surgery in Irvine, was not contacted by Professor Lee. Something has to be done because if a history is not used, the investigation does not show an up-to-date position of the persistent problems and erratic nature of an individual's health.

It is widely thought among the veterans themselves that the process is somewhat prejudiced—that it is almost part of a propaganda machine. That is wrong and it has to be addressed. There is, it seems, a trend of belief developing from the medical assessment programme to the effect that veterans are imagining the illness or becoming paranoid about their situation, and that there is no truth in the fact that they are suffering. This has clearly been contradicted by a document published by the research advisory committee on Gulf war illnesses in the United States on 12 November 2004. It was then stated by the veterans themselves:

"Yes, there was a very high level of stress"— that would be obvious in the circumstances—because

"it was known that the Iraqis had chemical and biological weapons, and it was thought likely that they would be used. But stress alone could not explain the illnesses. There was something else as well. Once again we see no reason why the MOD should not admit that fact."

In addition, as I mentioned, there was the Lord Lloyd report undertaken in the summer. The Government and MOD argued that that was an unofficial investigation into the question and did not choose to have a representative present. In calling it unofficial, for whatever reason—I would like to know the reason—they raise some questions. Why do they refuse to recognise the inquiry, and why did they not choose to show that they were willing partners by being represented at it?

We have to bear it in mind that the Americans have recognised the condition of Gulf war syndrome and we have not. They are now working toward a better understanding and a way forward for veterans—a way that is far more proactive than veterans in this country have perhaps seen. That, it is argued, has been achieved by dedicated finance being made available to resolve the situation and to draw a conclusion as speedily as possible. If the Government and the MOD do not feel that enough time has passed, that may be due to their dedicating only around £2 million to research on the issue. It could be argued that that is a lot of money, but in terms of the consequences that we are really faced with, I suggest that the veterans see it as no more than a token gesture in comparison with the funds made available on the other side of the pond.

Something is needed to demonstrate to all involved that the Government may be in a position to reach a conclusion to the whole question. It would be good if the MOD could do something to reinstate the legal aid which was, I understand, withdrawn when the last group action for the veterans concluded. That would allow other solicitors to relaunch an action. Otherwise the tendency for veterans to think that there is a conspiracy, as they say whenever I meet them, will grow. The Government's actions have not put that tendency to bed. We are moving towards a situation that I do not like: the Government are almost discredited in the eyes of those people. That is the last thing we want in people who fought for their country.

Another aspect concerns what happens in other countries. I have referred to what happens in the United States, but other countries who were allies in the Gulf offensive have come to terms with the situation and dealt with their veterans more progressively. I understand that a lot of research has been done, and I want all those resources to be harmonised internationally so that the troops concerned are satisfied and we can put the matter to bed once and for all. Until we have another inquiry to draw all the strands together in a way that is acceptable to the veterans, we will not be able to bring the matter to a conclusion.

Finally, I draw the Minister's attention to paragraph 35 of the Lloyd inquiry, in which it is recalled that before the 1997 election the Prime Minister said:

"If we get into Government, we will leave no stone unturned and we will get a Public Inquiry".

Nothing like that has happened, and unless and until all the issues that I have raised and others are addressed by the MOD and the Government, people will continue to come to our surgeries about the matter Recent early-day motions on the subject have been signed by more than 100 Members. All of that would come to an end if the concerns that I have raised were examined and we were able to tell our constituents that the Government were listening.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe) on securing this debate to discuss the important case of his constituent, Mr. Garry Hope. My hon. Friend will realise that, because he advised my office only a little over an hour ago of the details that he related to the Chamber, I will not be able to be specific about Mr. Hope in my response. However, I will write to him about his constituent and I can respond to the general points that he made this afternoon.

This Government have always given the concerns of the 1990–91 Gulf veterans the highest priority. This important and highly complex issue will continue to receive the close attention that it deserves. However, I remind the House of the Government's approach to Gulf veterans' illnesses, about which my hon. Friend concluded his comments.

By way of background, I can tell the Chamber that more than 53,000 UK armed forces personnel were deployed to the Gulf in 1990–91, a minority of whom are ill. We all want to know why that is, but there is no medical or scientific consensus on the cause or causes of ill health among some Gulf veterans.

I remind the Chamber about the key facts concerning Gulf veterans' mortality. The latest statistics, which were published yesterday, 17 January 2005, show that, overall, there have been 687 deaths compared with 688 in a comparison group that was not deployed to the Gulf. That is significantly lower than would be expected in the general UK population, for which the equivalent number is 1,085.

I am sure that my hon. Friend will recall that in July 1997 we published a policy statement, "Gulf Veterans' Illnesses: A New Beginning", which set out how we proposed to address the health concerns of veterans. Many of the commitments that we made in that document have been fulfilled, but I assure the House that it continues to underpin our activities at the Ministry of Defence.

The policy statement says:

"First, that all Gulf veterans will have prompt access to medical advice from the"—

Gulf veterans—

"Medical Assessment Programme. Second, there will be appropriate research into veterans' illnesses and factors that might have a bearing on these. Third, the MoD will make available to the public information it possesses that is of potential relevance".

This afternoon I will say something about each of those areas.

I shall deal first with the medical assessment programme, which has been running since 1993. In that time it has seen more than 3,400 patients, some more than once. Mr. Hope attended the programme on 22 November 2004. I strongly recommend that veterans of the 1990–91 Gulf conflict and of Operation Telic attend the programme if they have any concerns about their health.

Mr. Donohoe: Why is it that, when veterans attend the programme, no record is sent by their GP to the professor, or whoever it is, who examines them?

Mr. Caplin: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I will come back to him on that issue. I want to talk about further details that are available about the programme on the MOD website—www.gulfwar.mod.uk. We plan to publish a revised information pack about the programme next month.

I have stated the importance of research in this area to the House before. There is scientific evidence that 1990–91 Gulf veterans report more ill health than comparable groups, but the pattern of ill health is not unique to Gulf veterans. They report the same symptoms and conditions as do UK Bosnia veterans and UK military personnel who did not deploy to the Gulf. The only difference is the increased frequency with which Gulf veterans report such symptoms.

It is worth recalling that specific diseases, disorders or medical conditions and syndromes each have common features such as a set of physical signs and/or symptoms that distinguish them from other medical conditions. Gulf veterans do not present with an identifiable and distinct pattern of symptoms or signs. The consensus of the international scientific and medical community, following extensive research on the matter, continues to be that there is insufficient evidence to enable that ill health to be characterised as a unique Gulf-related illness or syndrome.

I know that my hon. Friend will accept that the Government's approach must be guided by the scientific and medical evidence. That is why we do not recognise Gulf war syndrome as a medical condition. The term "Gulf war syndrome" is not found in the international standard used around the world by physicians and scientists for distinguishing diagnosable disease categories, which is stated in the World Health Organisation's "International Classification of Diseases", 10th edition. Therefore, the Government simply cannot accept the recommendation in the report by Lord Lloyd that the term "Gulf war syndrome" be used as a label.

However, that does not stop Gulf veterans who are ill receiving a war pension and attributable benefits under the armed forces occupational pension schemes. Such pensions are not awarded for a list of disorders but for any disablement that can be accepted as having been caused or made worse by service. That will be the case for Mr. Hope.

At the end of September 2004, about 2,800 Gulf veterans were in receipt of a war disablement pension. Additionally, 2,290 Gulf veterans had received a gratuity for disablement assessed at less than 20 per cent. There will be some overlap between those figures as some individuals will have received first a gratuity and then a pension. Those figures include awards for both Gulf-related and non-Gulf related injuries or illness, because our statistics do not enable us to distinguish the origin of the disablement. MOD officials liaise with their colleagues in the health service to ensure that periodic reminders are issued to hospitals and GPs about the priority treatment arrangements available to Gulf and other veterans for injuries and conditions for which they receive pensions. Veterans of the Gulf conflict can and do receive compensation in the form of war pensions and armed forces pensions on the same basis as all other veterans.

We see no case for another of Lord Lloyd's recommendations—that one group of veterans should be singled out for preferential treatment by way of an ex gratia payment on top of the pensions they already get.

We want to find out why some Gulf veterans from that first conflict are ill. Our current research programme, to which my hon. Friend referred, will cost at least £8.5 million to complete. The Medical Research Council provides independent, scientific advice on the research programme. It has undertaken an independent, scientific review of all the UK research work that has been carried out into Gulf veterans illnesses in an international context. The results of that review, including recommendations for future research, were published in May 2003. The MOD has noted the MRC's conclusions and recommendations for further research, and additional funding will be made available as necessary.

The third strand of our approach is openness. We have made an enormous amount of information public in response to inquiries from veterans and others and we will continue to do so. I stress that the well-being of personnel whom we deploy is of the greatest importance to us, and we have made some important improvements since the 1990–91 Gulf conflict. For example, we have introduced a new operational medical record form that is now in use. We ensure that troops are immunised routinely so that personnel do not receive a combination of vaccines upon deployment, and we have arrangements to limit the effects of post-traumatic illnesses within the armed forces which have been developed over a number of years. They will continue to be reviewed in the light of medical developments in the field of stress management and treatment.

On 4 November last year, I announced the publication of a paper entitled "The 1990–91 Gulf Conflict: Health And Personnel Lessons Identified". That set out what we have already done to improve policies and procedures since the Gulf conflict and assesses how those have been applied to the current Iraq deployment. Of course, the MOD is aware of the report of the US research advisory committee on Gulf war veterans illnesses, and we have noted it with interest. Its report is a review of some existing research with which we were already familiar.

There are areas in the report that we believe are not supported by the balance of scientific evidence. For example, it does not take into account a recent important paper by the US Institute of Medicine, which states that there is insufficient or inadequate evidence to determine whether an association exists between low-level exposure to sarin and long-term adverse health effects. We also note that much of the research that is drawn on to formulate the recommendations was carried out by members of the committee, which raises some concerns about objectivity. I also say to my hon. Friend that the US does not, as he stated, recognise the term "Gulf war syndrome"; I have explained why in relation to the WHO document.

MOD officials work closely with their US counterparts to ensure that the UK has full visibility of all American research into Gulf health issues. A senior international forum meets regularly at official level, and includes representatives of the United States, Canada, New Zealand and Australia who share information of benefit to all veterans, not just those from the 1990–91 Gulf conflict. I have invited ministerial colleagues from those countries to a summit on veterans issues in the UK, which will be held in March.

My hon. Friend raised the matter of Lord Lloyd's report. I have touched on some of its recommendations, but I would like to take the opportunity to comment on it further. We have studied it carefully, but we believe that it contains no new substantive or scientific evidence to support its conclusions and recommendations. It also fails to take into full account the large amount of written evidence and material provided by the MOD to Lord Lloyd's inquiry. We did not participate in person in his investigation because we believe that it is only through independent scientific and medical research that we are ever likely to establish the causes of ill health in some Gulf veterans. The possibility remains that we may look again at the issue of a public inquiry on this matter, but Lord Lloyd's report does nothing to change the Government's view that an inquiry will not answer the basic question about why some Gulf veterans are ill.

The report gives the impression that 6,000 veterans are suffering from ill health due to their service in the conflict. I must point out that only a minority are receiving a war pension for Gulf-related illnesses. Although these veterans served in the Gulf, many of the claims relate to physical injuries suffered in the Gulf or to disablements and illnesses unrelated to their service in the Gulf conflict. The number of veterans in receipt of pensions or gratuities for unspecified symptomatic Gulf-related illnesses is approximately 1,400, less than 3 per cent. of the personnel who served in the Gulf.

Additionally, only about 100 claimants have failed to receive an award for Gulf-related illnesses, not the 272 recommended for review by the Lloyd report. Other claims, as I said to the House at the time, relate to physical injuries suffered in the Gulf or to disablements and illnesses unrelated to their Gulf service. As my hon. Friend will be aware, I announced at Defence questions on 29 November that the MOD will re-examine the 100 or so cases that do relate to Gulf-related illnesses, where those can be identified. I can tell the Chamber that that review is advancing well.

In conclusion, we at the MOD have been surprised by Lord Lloyd's reluctance to disclose who sponsored and funded his investigation. That contrasts directly with the Government's policy of openness and transparency, set out in our policy document, "Gulf Veterans' Illnesses: A New Beginning", which we have consistently followed for eight years and will continue to follow in the future.

Question put and agreed to.

Gas (Integrated Energy Policy)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Ainger.]

9.30 am

Mr. David Stewart (Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber) (Lab): I welcome the opportunity to initiate this debate about the future of gas in an integrated energy policy.

As I looked back over the past 40 years, I was struck by a series of images, in all of which energy was a factor. They included Ted Heath and the three-day week; the winter of discontent, when oil prices boomed, reaching four times their previous level; and, more recently, the fuel protestors of 2000. In the few moments that I have this morning, I want to ask a few questions and, I hope, get a few answers.

The key issue is how important gas is for the United Kingdom's energy needs. Are the tabloid headlines correct when they say that lights will go out all over Britain? Is that fantasy or foresight? How secure are our sources of imported gas? How much gas is left in the UK continental shelf?

Is European market liberalisation the answer, or should we be building our indigenous energy market? Perhaps both objectives are right, and we should be aiming to achieving both. What will be the impact of the change in the UK's status from being a net exporter to a net importer of gas, perhaps even this year? How important are our gas interconnectors to Europe?

What about storage? What about LNG—liquefied natural gas—which will be a much more attractive prospect over the next decade?

What is the view of industry, particularly that of the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association? What is the view of the Office of Gas and Electricity Markets, which was set up to regulate the industry?

The UK's natural gas reserves come mostly from indigenous supplies in the North sea and the Irish sea. There is a debate about when we shall become a net importer of gas, although the fluctuating balance between imports and exports already means that we are a net importer of some months. In answer to a parliamentary question, my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and E-Commerce told me that the UK would become a net importer in about 2005.

Another factor comes into play, however, because previously uneconomic reserves in the UK continental shelf may now be recoverable as the price of gas increases. Much the same argument applies to oil, as hon. Members who heard my Adjournment debate on oil last year will appreciate. A recent Library brief tells me that between 70 and 90 per cent. of UK gas will be imported from 2020; that is obviously a very high level of importation, and it will grow as UK reserves dwindle and—there are, of course, two sides to the equation—demand increases.

There is a variety of risks to domestic and imported gas supplies. At the most general level, there is political instability in exporting regions and the possibility of terrorist attacks on pipelines; there is a lack of peak-demand storage in emergencies; there are economic pressures during price spikes and levels of peak demand in cold weather. Let me be clear, however: I am not for a second suggesting that all those factors will come about, and I would certainly be very surprised if they all came about at once.

What we need is a rational, cool and calculated debate about this country's future energy needs. We must assess future demand and supply trends so that we can plan now. Although my emphasis is on gas, right hon. and hon. Members may wish to throw into the equation the other important energy sources, such as nuclear, oil and renewables.

The Government have made security of supply a key plank of their energy White Paper and energy policy. They propose a variety of means, such as the diversification of energy resources, particularly renewables. They also envisage demand reduction and energy efficiency, which we must never forget: it is not enough to produce more; we must also consider how efficiently we use these scarce resources.

Action on fuel poverty is a subject dear to my heart. I represent a highland seat, and, of course, the temperatures there can be very severe, as I experienced at first hand yesterday. Our fuel consumption is therefore higher and, arguably, we are not that strong on conservation issues such as house insulation.

It is important to consider how well our market is regulated, particularly through Ofgem, and that is an issue that the Government have pushed. However, what about gas, specifically? The key point, as I mentioned earlier, is that we have to consider this debate through the lens of becoming a net importer. A series of factors not so relevant to exporters comes into play for importers. For example, the reason why we do not have such a well developed LNG industry is that we had so much gas offshore that it was not economically useful to start tankering it round the world. There is a different argument about balance now that we are importing gas.

A mixture of inputs is needed in relation to gas. First, we must examine the important issue of adequate storage. What is adequate now—we have 4 per cent. storage—will not be adequate for an importer, but we can perhaps come back to that later. We have to consider demand modulation at peak times and a variety of secure sources of gas for importation. At present, with natural gas, there are two natural not barriers but choke points, and those are our interconnectors, which are crucial to the future development of natural gas.

Importation is complicated because it is about negotiation—part commercial, part political. A mix of issues to do with location and technical matters has to be considered. When I was undertaking research for the debate, I was surprised to find that there is an issue about quality of gas. From an outside perspective, we might think that gas is gas is gas, but that is not quite right; we have to consider the quality of what we are importing.

Of course, we cannot have only two interconnectors. A number more are planned, and of course I support that, but let us throw one statistic into this argument: the input capacity through our interconnectors is 8.5 billion cu m per year. That sounds all well and good, but we must consider the other side of the equation: what are our gas needs? Current gas demand in the UK is 100 billion cu m per year. I am sure that hon. Members' mathematics is better than mine, and that they can work out that there is a choke point, in terms of reliability of importation. New interconnectors are coming on-stream, but they will not be available tomorrow. There is a lead-in time, and that is crucial.

Sometimes there is too much tabloid chat about instability in imports. Norway and the Netherlands are our main sources at present, and I would not argue that either of those countries was particularly politically unstable. We have fairly secure agreements with them, and I do not have particular worries about that. It is perhaps countries further afield that we need to consider.

A key point is our 2003 energy pact, signed with the Norwegian Government, and the agreement to develop the Brit pipe. That is an excellent development that I warmly support. The capacity of the Brit pipe, when it is on-stream, will be 25 billion cu m a year, which is a quarter of current UK gas demand. That will be an effective new interconnector when it comes on stream in 2007.

Further interconnectors are planned, and there will be upgrading of our current interconnectors, which will give us greater capacity. That is useful for increasing security of supply. There are future proposals, which include a Russian pipeline, although the press had questions about how viable that would be in the short term. Increasing the number of pipeline entry points for imports is important. It would make the UK less vulnerable at a critical time when we are changing the import-export balance.

As we all know, Russia is the world's largest gas exporter, but reserves are often in remote, isolated locations, and that makes them more vulnerable to disruption. There are arguments about terrorist attacks in Russia that I would not want to overstate, but that worry certainly makes Russia a higher risk than Norway and the Netherlands. Further afield, African countries with exportable gas include Algeria, Egypt, Libya and Nigeria. In the middle east, the biggest player is certainly Iran, followed by Saudi Arabia, Qatar and Abu Dhabi.

What about storage, an issue that I touched on earlier? On one level—arguably a naive level—storage is relatively low in the UK. We have about 4 per cent. of storage of annual consumption. That compares with 20 per cent. in some European countries, but we have to consider the context. Four per cent. is fine. We have large reserves in the United Kingdom continental shelf and are exporting. We could argue strongly that part of our storage is the UK continental shelf itself, particularly the Rough field in the southern North sea. It could be argued that storage is effectively in pipelines going to the St. Fergus or Bacton terminals.

The Government have kept security of supply under review. Through the Department of Trade and Industry, the Ofgem Joint Energy Security of Supply working group—the JESS group—warned in 2002 that peak demand could exceed peak gas supply by 2004–05 if investment in gas storage or infrastructure is delayed.

What about LNG? That is a vital prospect for the future. LNG—this is where my chemistry and physics are sorely tested—is, as the name suggests, natural gas refrigerated as a liquid, reducing it to one 600th of the volume of gas vapour. Here my chemistry really struggles, but this suggests that an LNG tanker contains 600 times more energy than a tanker of the same size filled with natural gas. I would appreciate it if there were no questions on this, Mr. Taylor—I would be sorely tested.

The first LNG tanker came to the UK way back in 1964, to Canvey Island, from Algeria, the leading LNG supplier. Algeria has spare capacity to supply the UK, which is encouraging, looking at the global resources available to us, and creates a great advantage for LNG—that is, ease of supply via tankers. As I understand, it is not economically productive to tanker natural gas, because the sums do not add up. It is worth while tankering LNG.

I predict a major growth in this sector, through tanker links with global reserves, which are easier than the costly and more vulnerable pipelines. I am not arguing for a second that these things are mutually exclusive. We need to see a development of importation of natural gas and of LNG. I just wish to make a point about the security risks.

New markets in LNG may well be stimulated by pioneering new gas-to-liquid technology. Again, I do not feel comfortable about advancing such an argument, but I understand that the new process is the Fischer-Tropsch process, which develops LNG for the future.

New LNG importation facilities are planned and I warmly welcome them. There are at least three different proposals to develop terminals—for example at Milford Haven and the Isle of Grain. They will not come on stream immediately, but will make a huge difference to our LNG market in future.

What is the European perspective on this? That is important. The first gas directive was in 1998, and the Lisbon council of 2000 urged rapid liberalisation of gas as part of a drive to complete the single market and improve EU competitiveness.

As we become a net importer, access to a liberalised and competitive market is important. The Commission gave evidence to the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Union—House of Lords paper No. 105—which said that 80 per cent. of the world gas reserves were in economic reach of the European market. That is good news. The key is diversification and security of supply. What that Committee recommended, as I understand it, is that more strategic stocks should be held from when we stop becoming a net exporter. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister might comment on the change in status, as we become a net importer. Will there be any change and will the Government have to increase the immediate strategic gas reserves held in the event of an emergency?

Demand is also changing. There is going to be a growth of about 3 to 4 per cent. per year, boosted by the new gas-fired electricity-generating power stations. To make a quick constituency point, I can suggest to the gas industry how it can increase demand in the highlands and islands, particularly on the mainland. That is by providing for more remote and rural communities to have access to mains gas. Giving remote communities access to the mains transmissions lines is a real problem, although I would give honourable mention to Transco, which has been helpful in my campaigns in efforts to link communities such as Ardersier in my constituency.

The issue in future is not so much the availability of gas so much as the ability to move it from place to place, from where it is produced to markets. As I suggested earlier, by 2010 the statisticians suggest that we will be importing 50 per cent. and that by 2020 we will be importing between 70 and 90 per cent., which is a tremendously high statistic. There is then a higher risk regime of power cuts, vulnerability and so on. As I said earlier, I would not over-stress those risks, but we must have a cool and rational discussion about what the security threats are.

So, in the jargon, what happens is a low-probability, high-impact event. We understand that the Government have an emergency committee and incident response plans which are geared-up to consider these matters. Yet, as Dr. Robert Skinner, Director of the Oxford Institute for Energy Studies, said in The Parliamentary Monitor, page 8, in December 2004:

"Absolute security of supply is an illusion, its pursuit unacceptably expensive. Energy security is a concept based on meeting likely risks at acceptable cost."

The United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association, UKOOA, also recently produced a helpful paper entitled "Security of gas supplies", arguing that although UK gas production has reached maturity, there are still considerable reserves. It argues that there are four issues that we should consider: first, maximisation of the exportation of our current gas reserves; secondly, diverse and secure gas supplies; thirdly, availability of transmission infrastructure; fourthly, tools to meet short-term demand peaks. The first issue I welcome warmly. As a member of the all-party group on gas safety, I have looked very closely at this and am a particular fan of the "fallow fields" initiative, where we can exploit fields which might not be worth developing by some larger companies, but which have worked well for some of the smaller companies. I know PILOT has particularly pushed that. I am keen to see our reserves on the UK continental shelf fully exploited. Clearly that goes for oil as well.

I have already touched on secure and diverse gas supplies in LNG, looking at Russia via long-distance pipelines and developing more interconnectors. Thirdly, in looking at the availability of transmission infrastructure, the main argument is to bring in a stream of new interconnectors. The final issue is about tools to meet short-term demand, and issues about supply swing, looking at cutting supply to key industrial customers when there is peak demand, and looking at storage. With LNG, that will be above-ground storage.

The key point for UKOOA

"is the ability of producers to exploit their gas reserves fully and deliver that gas at minimum cost to the market, rather than the availability of those gas supplies per se."

Ofgem has also examined this issue and commented on the assessment by the National Grid Transco that security of supply in gas can be maintained this winter under average and severe winter conditions. In case of very severe winter conditions, NGT says that security of supply can be maintained by large users reducing gas demand. I thought it lovely that they are called "interruptible customers". It is a new part of our argument that those large industrial users have a deal where they will cut off at peak times.

Ofgem says that UK gas supplies are declining faster than expected. Though there is no immediate threat, more expensive options might have to be used in the long term. Clearly gas is a key player in the UK's energy mix. We know that demand will double by 2030, because gas will be the fuel of choice for electrical power generation. Global reserves, particularly in Russia and the middle east, are more than large enough to meet the likely increase in demand. There is an argument that gas is a different market from oil, where with OPEC there is more of a cartel operating than in gas production. Of course, until construction of our new interconnectors, and upgrading of one of our two existing interconnectors, the House of Lords Select Committee on Gas may have a point that there will be a tightness of supply in the short term—perhaps over the next two or three years.

LNG, although first seen in the UK in the 1960s, offers greater portability than conventional gas. The three UK developments planned provide a greater security of supply of gas. The maximisation of gas on the UK continental shelf, through the "fallow fields" initiative and others, is vital. It is key that we have security of supply, which means that we have a wide and diverse range of suppliers.

What are the key issues for Government? I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will comment. It is a complex mix. We must say that is it not only about Government or industry, it is also about Government, industry and the consumer. We must maximise security of supply of natural gas through, as I said, a wide and diverse range of suppliers, through as many interconnectors as are practical and affordable. We obviously cannot build entirely as many as we need, because there are such huge costs involved. We need to build up and develop the liquefied natural gas business—because we have less vulnerability in terms of tankering—while emphasising energy conservation and supporting poor or vulnerable consumers, as well as keeping a watch on price, product and emissions levels. That is a heady mix indeed, not an easy series of points to sort out. Gas will continue to play a vital role, however, in meeting Britain's energy needs in partnership, of course, with oil, coal, nuclear and renewables. The dash for gas may well be past, but natural gas, in my view, will be the fuel of the future.

9.51 am

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): I thank you, Mr. Taylor, for the opportunity to participate in a very important debate this morning. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) on securing the debate. I know that he has been deeply involved in the energy markets, especially gas and oil. That is recognised by the business community in his constituency, by the trade unions and, in particular, by his constituents.

For my part, I would obviously like to associate myself with an integrated energy policy. We should have a debate on that and examine it in depth. Security of supply is a major issue, which we have to continue looking at to ensure that the lights in this country do not go out. We can talk about the impact of their doing so.

I should first declare an interest as chairman of the all-party nuclear energy group. I feel strongly that any integrated energy policy should include a nuclear component. My concern is that the Government are promoting not an integrated energy policy, but a policy where most of the energy of this country will be dependent on imported gas. It would be a monumental blunder to continue along that line. It may be that we are in the run-up to a general election, and maybe we shall look at the policy in depth after that. We have had the Energy Bill, with much discussion in the House of Lords and the House of Commons. Those discussions have led us to believe that it is necessary to look seriously at the energy mix.

My hon. Friend made a point regarding the three-day week. I am old enough to have experienced the three-day week, when I worked at a small engineering company. I went to work from 7am to 7pm, and we were only allowed Monday, Friday and Saturday. I know the impact that that had on the business. Without the workers in that company working long hours—for bare time, by the way, not overtime—the company might have gone out of business. My view at that time was that it was necessary to accommodate businesses. However, we have now moved into a new age. We live in a highly technical age. We have computers, laptops, control of traffic lights and aircraft. If the lights went out in this country, the effect on its infrastructure would be devastating—we had such a situation last year when London had a short blackout. The impact on traffic, air and transport would be enormous. It is important that we look at just what the effects would be if we got the energy mix wrong.

People take it for granted that when they walk into their home, they can switch on the light and leave it on. With fridges, freezers and televisions, they have come to expect that that will happen. Energy efficiency is one of the issues that has been pressed very hard, to safeguard future energy supplies. Unless the population of this country realise the major problems that exist—realise that unless we get the energy mix right we could have energy problems—I do not think they will move towards energy efficiency. No matter how much we preach energy efficiency, they will ignore it to a degree. It is only when they find themselves with a major problem that they will move towards it. This country could be facing a frightening prospect unless we get the energy mix right. I am not against renewable energy and I want to make that clear.

The UK has targets. By 2010 we want 10 per cent. of our energy to come from renewable energy. I understand that at present some 3 per cent. does. I am sure that the Minister will correct me if that figure is wrong. The feeling is that we shall not make the 10 per cent. by 2010. There is also an ambitious target for 20 per cent. of our energy to come from renewables by 2020. That is fine; it is part of an energy mix and I would be delighted if it were to happen in the UK. Scotland is even more ambitious. At present, 12 per cent. of its electricity comes from renewable energy; its target is 18 per cent. by 2010 and it is believed that that is achievable. It also has an aspirational target of 40 per cent. of its energy from renewables by 2020. I do not know whether it will make that or not.

The renewable obligation has made it very attractive for energy companies to pursue wind farms. I understand that there are some 270 applications in Scotland this year for them. There has been some opposition, not only in Scotland but throughout the UK, to wind farms on that scale. An enormous amount of turbines, all over Scotland, would be involved in 270 wind farms. We must consider the matter carefully.

Within the Scottish Parliament, the Environment and Rural Development Committee has examined the growth of wind farms. I understand that it came to the conclusion that without looking at wave, tidal, solar and alternative sources, not to be dependent on wind farms would be the best way forward. The Committee is encouraging the Scottish Executive to move in that direction.

The rush for renewables by the power companies is generated by the fact that that there are substantial financial incentives for British Energy and Scottish Power to seek planning permission for wind farms. It is possible that we will achieve the targets that we have set ourselves. Even in an integrated energy policy and even if 40 per cent. of our energy was coming from renewable energy, we would still have to examine the mix and where the other 60 per cent. would come from.

There seems to be a determination to move to gas. I understand that 35 per cent. of energy in this country comes from gas. As my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber said, the intention is that that would move to some 70 or 75 per cent. being imported.

Last week, the Financial Times had an article about energy. Its headline was, "Fear that gas supply gives Russia too much power over Europe". Leaders are concerned that over-reliance on Moscow could be an economic and political hazard. The article stated:

> "'Schroeder never speaks out on Putin's human rights abuses in Chechnya or his interference in Ukraine's affairs,' . . . Mr. Putin's increased authoritarian style at home and with neighbours has raised concern and prompted a re-examination of Europe's links with Russia. The French and British Governments are particularly worried" about

> "Moscow's rising prominence as an energy supplier."

I am sure that the Minister will correct me if that is wrong.

We shall be in the same situation. We shall be depending on imports from Russia and the middle east for our gas supply. We shall be at the end of the pipeline. China, India, the United States and Germany will all be competing with us for the same gas from the same supplier. Does the Minister believe that that is the best option as regards stability of prices? Is he convinced that security of supply can be done on that basis?

Recently, there has been the announcement that the AP 1000 has received certification. I would promote that nuclear module in an integrated energy policy. At present, 23 per cent. of our energy comes from nuclear plants. If we are to close the nuclear power stations—I understand that there will be one left by 2025—the alternative at present is to move to gas, but gas is not the cleanest source of energy that we know of.

I attended a conference with Professor James Lovelock, who said that his green credentials were impeccable; he has planted 20,000 trees in his time. He said that the Earth was in a profoundly dangerous state and that the Government listened more to the green lobby than to scientific evidence. He said that the green lobbies had intervened, that they understood better than the Government how people worked and that they had convinced the Government that green energy through renewables was the way forward. Consequently, he said, such lobbies were recommending inappropriate remedies and the outcome was nearly as bad as if a mediaeval plague had returned in a deadly form and we had been advised to stop it with alternative medicine instead of scientific medicine. He said that the Earth was sick and could not be cured by green solutions alone; it needed a dose of nuclear energy. When someone with Professor Lovelock's credentials feels as strongly as that, Governments have to take notice.

I should like the Minister to consider seriously the energy mix that we shall have in the future. Coal-fired power stations will close unless there is investment in clean coal technology. I know that the Babcocks plant in Renfrew has the capability and the methods to convert coal-fired power stations to clean coal burning. I have spoken to people there; they are looking for investment from the Department of Trade and Industry. That would be costly, but we have to consider it. Using coal is the most flexible method that we have of generating electricity. I attended Longannet last year and watched people bringing up the boilers to heat during the peak load.

The flexibility of coal power should be involved in the energy mix. European emissions targets mean that coal-fired power stations in this country will close. Clean coal technology is one solution to move us towards an integrated energy policy. Nuclear power is essential; it is the cleanest power of them all and does not produce CO_2 emissions. The Committee on Radioactive Waste Management has started its consultation, and I hope that it reports back sooner rather than later. With the solutions that it finds for dealing with nuclear waste, we could change public perception and reaction against nuclear power.

I ask the Minister to consider seriously an integrated energy policy, which would include gas, clean coal technology, nuclear power and renewable energies. It is important that there is the proper mix in the energy portfolio. If we have that, there will be security of supply. Without it, we would depend on gas for 70 per cent. of our energy needs into the future, and that would be a mistake on a monumental level. I ask the Minister to consider seriously my contribution today.

10.4 am

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) on securing this debate. I am grateful to him for two reasons. First, he spoke with great thoroughness and insight; he made light of his knowledge of engineering and physics, but I certainly learned a great deal. Secondly, I drew Question 9 in Prime Minister's Question Time last week and was going to ask about gas prices. The problem was that the Prime Minister got only to Question 8. This debate will allow me to go on longer than I would have in the main Chamber.

In his concluding remarks, my hon. Friend said that there were at least three main interests in the gas industry: the Government, the industry itself and the consumer. During my brief remarks, I shall turn my attention to the industrial and domestic consumers of gas.

According to the best estimates that I have seen, the consumer is facing considerable increases in the price of gas: Energywatch suggests an 18 per cent. increase over the winter period. British Gas had a significant price hike in September and lost many customers and EDF, which owns a lot of companies in the south of England, raised its gas prices in January. The best estimates over the past 18 months are that industrial consumers have suffered a 40 per cent. price increase, which the CBI is beginning to emphasise and which is being reflected in hon. Members' postbags. The price of gas for manufacturing industry is probably the major issue raised with Members of Parliament, and that is reflected in two early-day motions that are before the House.

I shall quote briefly from two letters that I have received from local companies—one from Mr. Slater, managing director of Plasmor, a concrete products company with factories in Knottingley and Great Heck in my constituency. He says that his production director has calculated that "given the 'future' gas prices" that are predicted,

"our gas prices are set to rise by £50,000 per month."

He alleges that the market is somehow being manipulated by speculators making prices unnecessarily high.

Dr. McLenaghan, the site director of Saint Gorbain Glass UK, a French glass factory that has invested at Eggborough in my constituency, says that the price increases are putting it at a competitive disadvantage. He points out that UK prices are now

"some 25 per cent. higher than our competitors in other parts of the EU . . . these energy price increases jeopardise not only future investment, but employment as well."

The price increases are a concern for industry. Looking back at gas prices over the past two or three years, we see that in October 2003 there was a particularly large hike of 40 per cent. in just a couple of days. My hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East Nairn and Lochaber mentioned the regulator, Ofgem, which has produced a report on the price hike and another on the large price rises during the past two or three years. Ofgem identified four different reason for the price rises: 30 per cent. was due to the connection of gas and oil prices in Europe, 19 per cent. was due to the fall-off in yields from North sea fields, which was more rapid than expected—although as my hon. Friend said, it is worth noting that we still produce 105 per cent. of what we consume at this stage—5 per cent. was due to increased storage costs, and the remaining 46 per cent. was down to market sentiment and risk.

[Mr. John Grogan]

It is worth putting on the record that at the time of the main price spike in October 2003 there was no shortage of gas, no spike in demand and no problems with any of the pipelines. The main pipeline—the Bacton to Zeebrugge interconnector—was opened in 1998 and will almost have doubled capacity by 2006. If people looked at what happened in that period, they would imagine that if wholesale prices were rising rapidly in Britain and were higher than on the continent, gas would flow from the continent into Britain through the interconnector.

I have half a degree in economics, although I hasten to add that I did not fail the other half, rather it was in history. I have a basic knowledge of economics and find the situation a little strange. It also seems strange to Energywatch, which has championed the consumer and is good at that. It is a model consumer body; it has a certain edginess, it champions the consumer unashamedly, puts a bit of creative tension into the industry and is, perhaps, a little less supine than bodies like Postwatch. It is to be commended for that.

What could be done? Energywatch makes various recommendations. First, it points out that, basically, Ofgem has no purchase at the moment.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): I was unavoidably detained and missed the start of the interesting debate secured by the hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart).

The hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) has laid out the problem of the direction in which gas was flowing through the interconnector, but he did not use his half-degree in economics to tell us what he thought the reasons were. Will he do so?

Mr. Grogan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. I was going to deal with that. The wholesale gas market is now a European market, not just a British one, although it is not as liberalised in the rest of Europe as it is in Britain. Energywatch and other experts wonder whether the market is being manipulated in other parts of Europe. They also question whether the regulator has the powers to obtain the necessary information to ascertain how the market is being manipulated. It seems strange that Ofgem does not oversee the offshore industry. As I understand it, that is the responsibility of the DTI. I would have thought that the entire industry should be regulated under one regulator, Ofgem, so that it would have a better picture.

Mr. Salmond: Unfortunately, Ofgem normally has no problems with what happens offshore, but it ignores price differentials offshore. Hence, pipelines go offshore for 600 miles, which would normally be an uneconomic thing to do, and avoid the regulation of Ofgem to go to land at points such as Bacton.

Mr. Grogan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for developing that argument for me. Are there any plans to change the situation and to give Ofgem greater powers?

As I understand it with my basic economics, information is crucial to a market and how it operates. In the electricity market, anyone can look at the National Grid Transco database, see the likely state of the market in the days ahead and modify their purchase behaviour accordingly. In the gas market, purchasers know of price increases only when prices increase. That fuels panic buying, as buyers do not know whether the price is the best that they are likely to get in the near future or whether prices might fall. The inclination, especially with the price rise curve over the past 18 months, is to buy immediately, whatever the price. For a market to function properly, it needs information and informed market participants. It is worth noting that producers have to provide information on exactly how much gas is being produced and will be produced to both Transco and the DTI. That information is already known, and should be publicised to market participants.

On behalf of British manufacturing industry, the Government should be much more aggressive in Europe. They should make it one of the priorities of our presidency to try to persuade the competition authorities in Europe to mount an investigation into wholesale gas prices across the continent. That is the only way that we will get to the bottom of what exactly is happening.

Energywatch is well led by Allan Asher, and he and his staff, Ed Wilson and Richard Bates, who have been to the House and have briefed Members, recently held a seminar for 60 people from across the gas industry: producers, regulators, and industrial and domestic consumer representatives. When the basic question was asked of how many people thought that the wholesale gas market was working properly—the room was rather more full than the Chamber—only two hands went up. One belonged to a representative of the offshore industry, and the other to the chief executive of Ofgem. Everyone else disagreed, which tells us something.

That is a political issue, which is ticking away in the background. However, it is the No. 1 issue for manufacturing industry. I hope that the Government do not listen only to the operators who have produced a report. Allan Asher said that the UKOOA report is > "little more than gas producers voting themselves a £5 billion windfall each year, at the expense of consumers . . . Consumers are paying the price for the lack of transparency in the market. If industry can't provide the information that the market needs to work properly, then it must be imposed."

I agree.

10.14 am

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): I am delighted to be able to contribute to this well informed debate. I thank the hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart), who probably has the second longest constituency name in the House, for his obviously thorough and well researched overview of the gas industry and its prospects nationally and internationally. I shall not comment on that in detail, but he left two questions hanging in the air to which I very much hope the Minister will respond. One related to the provision for storing gas in the coming years. The hon. Gentleman rightly pointed out that the UK has less storage capacity than other European Union nations, and given that we are importing rather than exporting, perhaps the Minister should turn his attention to that matter. The hon. Gentleman's second question, which is of some importance, is whether there will be a time lag in connecting up the necessary interconnectors. If there is such a time lag, the supplies will not be accessible to us in this country even though they are on the other side of the sea.

The hon. Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) made a passionate pro-nuclear case, which I have heard before. He knows that I do not agree with him, but I hope that the Minister will respond to his plea for investment in clean coal technology. There is no doubt that there will be a continuing demand for coal not only in this country but overseas, and bearing in mind coal's very high carbon emission potential, investment in clean coal technology is not simply an economic benefit to the coal industry in this country, but potentially a major export industry.

The hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) drew attention to the paradox of gas from a high-price market being exported to a lower-price market, which may be accelerating the price spike in the UK that is hitting domestic consumers and the manufacturing industry hard. So there are already quite a few questions for the Minister to answer before I make any contribution to the debate. I hope that the Minister will have effective answers.

One issue that I wanted to discuss but which has not yet been raised in this debate is the fact that the UK's consumption of energy is not as strongly connected to its economic growth as commentators suggest. Figures for UK energy consumption show that between 1993 and 2003, which is the last year for which complete figures have been published, there was a rise of only 3 per cent.—that is, 3 per cent. in 10 years. Over the same period, the UK's gross domestic product rose by 33 per cent. So we have to some extent managed to decouple economic growth and prosperity from energy growth. That is important to remember when we consider some of the doom-and-gloom scenarios described by the most alarmist commentators.

Interestingly, the German economy has grown by an almost equal amount and has reduced the gross consumption of energy in the same 10-year period, so we should not completely dismiss the possibility in future decades of continuing growth, wealth and prosperity and a reduction in energy consumption leading to a significant reduction in carbon dioxide emissions.

In 2003, gas was 38 per cent. of total energy consumption—a very large slice and the largest contributor to our energy mix. What happens next is clearly of great importance, and the hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber was right to bring it to our attention today. We need to know the future cost of gas and its future availability and environmental impact on the UK.

The hon. Gentleman gave a very good overview of the wide range of sources of gas. His analysis was at least as good as any that I could provide, but I have a striking anecdote to relay. Members of the energy industry select committee of the Nigerian Parliament visited Westminster and the UK last summer, and I discussed with them the state of their industry in Nigeria. They confirmed what I already understood to be true, which is that they cannot find a market for the country's gas and are burning off huge volumes each year.

Subsequently, I saw a night-time, satellite photograph of the globe provided by the National Geographic Magazine of America and one of the brightest spots was the sea off the west African coast where the gas is being burned off. Some of the hysteria that we hear about gas running out and so on needs to be tempered by a realisation that, throughout the world, many sellers are eager—indeed, desperate—to get rid of their product as there are many buyers who are equally eager to purchase it. Future investment needs to go in the direction of making sure that the connection is made between the two. The hon. Gentleman referred to liquid natural gas as being a means of transporting that.

We must maintain the objective of future growth in wealth and prosperity, a direction in which I am sure that a future Government would go. Moreover, we must ensure a lower energy intensity and we must ensure that conservation, efficiency and substitution of fossil fuels by other fuels receive high priority. We must remember that it should be not only transport fuel use that is a common target, but that buildings and the built environment use 50 per cent. of the energy that we consume and I hope that my Sustainable and Secure Buildings Act 2004, which received Royal Assent last September, will play a part in moving us towards that end.

Given that background, it is absolutely essential that we focus a great deal of Government attention on reducing the energy intensity with which we will have a future growth in wealth and prosperity. That means that conservation and efficiency must play a much bigger part in the strategy of any future Government. Furthermore, we must maintain investment in renewables. The hon. Member for Hamilton, South was a little dismissive of what might be happening with renewables, but rightly drew attention to the uneven focus that there has been on the development of wind energy as the sole renewable source. I say to the Minister and to him that we do not need a huge surge in the investment in renewables to achieve the Government's targets by 2050. A 1 per cent. per year growth in renewables during the next 50 years would provide us with 50 per cent. of our energy coming from renewable sources and not all from wind—we must fully accept that that would be impractical.

The hon. Member for Hamilton, South mentioned several other technologies and no doubt there will be further technologies in 50 years' time of which we are not aware at the moment. If we reached a position in 2050 when about half of our energy was coming from renewable sources of one sort or another and were successful in turning the current energy growth of 0.3 per cent. per year into a reduction in energy of 0.7 per cent. per year—a 1 per cent. per year change in our energy use in a downward direction—that would reduce our overall energy demand by 2050 to 70 per cent. of what it is now. It would leave 20 per cent. of our current energy demand to be filled by a fossil fuel or, if the hon. Gentleman had his way, by nuclear.

Even if gas provided all the 20 per cent. of energy demand, it would mean that our demand for gas in 2050 would only be half of what it is now and that we had comfortably met the Government's current targets and those of the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution of a 60 per cent. reduction in fossil fuel. I ask the Government to listen to the points that have been made and to focus on a longer game, tackling conservation and efficiency to a much greater extent than at present.

There may even be a misconception in the original title of the debate. "The future for gas in an integrated energy policy" assumes that there is an integrated energy policy now. As the Minister knows, I have been a critic over the years of what I see as the disjointed and fluctuating range of policies that the Government have talked about. I have been critical of the slow implementation even of those on which they have passed legislation. It is extremely disappointing that whenever a target, such as carbon emission reductions or the achievement of any energy policy, is missed it is simply dropped. It seems to the Opposition that they are often blown about more by lobbyists and market forces than by any real vision or determination to get to the end of the job.

It is always a pleasure to be in a debate with the current Minister, but he knows that he is the sixth holder of his portfolio in seven years. Although he is a good and well briefed Minister, and a hard worker, that underlines the fact that we are still some way from an integrated energy policy. I hope that the Minister will tell the Secretary of State that we must try harder in future.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) on securing this important debate and on having the foresight to do so at a time when energy is being widely discussed. There are unfortunate reasons for its being talked about—the power cuts in London and the midlands a while ago. Those cuts were not caused by a shortage of supply, but they focused people's minds on what might happen, and prompted a television programme that caused little concern.

Although the cuts were to do with infrastructure rather than supply, we should take note of them. The hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber and, more particularly, the hon. Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan), talked about the dangers and difficulties of bringing gas from as far away as Russia. That is of course a problem of infrastructure, and if infrastructure went wrong in our own country, it has the potential to go wrong again if we bring gas from across the world. The hon. Member for Hamilton, South made a good and wide-ranging speech, which covered many of the issues that I intended to raise, so I shall keep my comments fairly brief, to allow the Minister time for his reply.

The hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) made some good points about gas prices. He will know as well as anyone about the decline of the coal industry. Three mines in Selby have, I think, closed recently. He will have first-hand experience relevant to what the hon. Member for Hamilton, South was saying on the subject. I regret the industry's decline; my father was a miner and I have natural sympathy for the mining industry. However, we must recognise that there are environmental pressures on the coal industry. It may be possible to deal with those to some extent through clean coal technology, although that will require a great deal of financial input at a time when there is not as much investment in the energy sector as we might want—something that we should be concerned about.

As coal and nuclear power decline and as renewables come along—but slowly; they are at slightly less than 3 per cent. now—we must consider where our energy supplies will come from. At present, nuclear energy provides about 22 or 23 per cent. of our electricity needs. In 20 years, that will be down to only 2 per cent. unless there is further investment in the nuclear industry. We cannot predict exactly what the production from coal will be, other than that it was 66 per cent. in 1990 and it is now about 33 per cent. We do not know what it will be in 20 years, but even if it reduces considerably, and even if renewables come along as we hope that they will, somewhere between two thirds and three quarters of our energy needs will come from gas. I have made a few assumptions, but they are not outrageous assumptions; what I have described could well come to pass.

Over the past 30 years—perhaps not quite that long in terms of gas—we have had a lot of reserves from the North sea: They are starting to decline, although there are still a lot of gas and oil reserves there. We are having to look further afield for our gas supplies. I do not think that that is necessarily a terrible problem. I read in the Financial Times this morning that the Minister is going to Norway next month to finalise the treaty for the pipeline from that country, which is welcome. However, it will supply only about 20 per cent. of our gas needs at most. There is also the interconnector with Holland, which will come on line in 2006–07. I do not know exactly how much gas will come from that.

As we increase our dependency on gas, we will have to go further afield to get it. Russia is the obvious place to go. There is the theory that it needs the money, and therefore it will not cut off gas supplies, but tell that to Belarus, which had an interruption in its supply because of a political dispute. I do not claim to be an expert in what is happening in Yukos, the giant oil company in Russia, but I cannot persuade myself that there is not some political manoeuvring going on. I will not put it any stronger than that, but I think there is enough concern about that to give me some concern about becoming over-dependent on supplies from Russia, or any other country that does not have a stable political history.

There is also concern about the infrastructure that brings the gas to our country from so far away. The Government are right to focus on the threat of terrorism in its many forms. We cannot exclude the possibility of some terrorist-inspired interruption to our gas supply if it comes all the way from Russia. How could we get the gas here? We could bring it in a liquefied form, but we might be looking to bring it here by pipeline, in which case we would be at the end of a very long pipeline.

Just over a year ago, I visited Finland to see its new nuclear reactor plans and the way that it deals with nuclear waste. The public were persuaded to go for a fifth reactor by the Finnish Government saying, "It is up to you, Mr. And Mrs. Elector; you have a choice. We either build a fifth nuclear reactor or we depend on gas from the Russians." Unsurprisingly, they chose to have a fifth nuclear reactor.

It is interesting that 23 countries are building or planning to build new nuclear reactors. That will increase the civil nuclear capacity of the world by 33 per cent. We need to ask whether those countries are all wrong and that we are right to allow our nuclear industry to decline to just 2 per cent. and to virtually nothing in 20 years. With regard to security of supply, we must have a balanced energy policy. That has been described in previous contributions as an integrated policy; I do not think there is much difference between those phrases.

The hon. Member for Hamilton, South is not the only Member present who is old enough to remember the three-day week. Sadly, I also remember it. I think that the slogan at the time was, "Vote for Ted and stay in bed." As I am a Conservative, I should not have said that, but I remember all the slogans that were going around at the time. In our industrialised country, we had a three-day week. The television was compulsorily turned off at 10 pm. We sat in the dark for many nights—although, as I was a teenager with a girlfriend at the time, I do not think that I was too perturbed by that. However, from an industrial point of view, it was a disaster That was only 30 years ago, within our living and working memory. My point is that we were in that situation because of an over-dependence on one source of energy. We should not put ourselves in that position again in relation to coal or gas or any other single form of energy.

Mr. Salmond: While we all want to hear more about the darkness and his girlfriend, is the hon. Gentleman working his way round to saying that he and the Conservative party are as enthusiastic about a new nuclear building programme as the hon. Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan)?

Mr. Robertson: Hon. Members will be glad to hear that I am moving off the previous topic. However, I am very sympathetic to that idea. The Government are in a difficult position with regard to the nuclear industry. Any Government will be, because the most likely builder of a new nuclear plant is British Energy, and it is in severe financial difficulties. It is also constrained by the European Union judgment on its aid package—the Minister will interrupt me if I am wrong—in that it cannot run a new nuclear plant for, I think, six years. That is a further difficulty. Therefore, I am sympathetic to the idea of a new generation of nuclear plant, not because I have a greater regard for that industry than I have for any other, but because I cannot see how, without a nuclear industry, we are to secure supply or cut emissions.

If, in 20 years, we replace our entire nuclear production with renewables—that is a very big "if"—we will have got nowhere with cutting carbon emissions. We will have only replaced one carbon-free industry with another. We will not have affected emissions. If we are reducing emissions, we have to have three things: renewables, the generation of nuclear power and a reduction in electricity use—it is not a case of "either/or". If the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) is asking me whether, as Energy Minister on 6 May, I would sign a cheque for the nuclear industry, the answer is that no, I would not. It is a matter of getting the industry together, and asking, "What is the position? How do you see the future?", and, "Are there things that Government can do apart from signing a cheque that might encourage you to address the imbalance of supply that will happen in the near future—in our lifetime?" I hope that that is a reasonably clear answer to the very sensible question that the hon. Gentleman asked. We have to move towards a balanced energy policy if we are not to be over-dependent on one source of energy.

Nothing that I have said should be taken as an attack on the gas industry. Gas has provided a great deal of security of supply over many years. It has provided a great deal of money to the Exchequer and I congratulate those who operate the industry. They have a bright future, and they will continue to play a significant role in the supply of energy to this country. However, I would not want us to be dependent to the extent of, say, three quarters of our energy coming from gas if much of that gas were to come from countries that do not have proven records of political stability.

The difficulty is, how can a Government control that? I am not an interventionist politician. I came into Parliament to try to persuade Governments of all colours to withdraw from many areas of life—the Government are involved in too many of those. So how does one get the country to move towards the balance of energy supply that we need without being interventionist? I sympathise with the Minister, and that is not an easy thing to do. Our energy market is not a free market. It has many environmental constraints and a regulator, and a demand on it to persuade its customers not to use as much of its product as they do. I do not know whether that is a unique situation, but it is very unusual. We do not have a completely free market; we have a situation in which the Government have to keep their hand on the tiller, while at the same time not interfering to the point that makes matters worse.

As we look to the future, the Government need to give an idea to the energy industries—particularly to the coal industry—about how they think that things will go. That is not to interfere beyond where it is right for Governments to interfere, but so that we have some confidence about the medium-term future.

I do not think that we are facing electricity cuts this winter or next, unless an absolutely terrible winter coincides with a number of breakdowns in power generation across the country, events which are beyond anything that we can ordinarily control. We do not have a short-term problem. However, the hon. Members for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber and for Hamilton, South have said that the medium term does not look quite so secure. I do not want to be alarmist, and no one here today has been, but we are right to raise the issues and say, "Let's not wait until the last minute and then panic."

Let us think five or 10 years ahead. Where do we see electricity supplies coming from? Is it right that we should be burning gas to produce electricity when gas itself can be used, and when there are other ways of producing electricity, including renewables and nuclear? As well as the Government indicating what sort of future they see for nuclear and coal—and therefore, by implication, for gas—we need more of a steer on the subject of renewables. The hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) said that to get half of our electricity from renewables, we need only to increase renewable usage by one percentage point each year. That is sound mathematics, and achieving it does not sound very difficult, but 1 per cent. of our electricity production is quite a lot. In round figures, it is about half what a nuclear power station would produce. It is quite a challenge to bring on renewable production to that extent.

Our party's policy is to retain the renewables obligation and the targets within it. It is also our policy to examine the internal workings of that obligation to ascertain whether it is actually producing what we want, and I know that the Government have already set about doing that. At present, the obligation is not producing what we want. There is an over-emphasis on wind power. Anyone who thinks that we can solve this country's energy problems simply with wind is living in cloud cuckoo land. I am well aware of the opposition to wind power, certainly in some areas of Scotland. We need a mixed policy, and we need to know where we are going with renewables, nuclear power and coal, which would enable us to know where we are going with gas. Once again, I congratulate the hon. Member for Inverness, East Nairn and Lochaber on initiating this important debate.

The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce (Mr. Mike O'Brien): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) on securing this important debate, which has been useful for the House. I apologise for arriving somewhat late due to traffic jams in south-east London, but I did receive full notes from my hon. Friend the Minister for Small Business and Enterprise and heard most of the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East Nairn and Lochaber.

I thought that the contribution of the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) was thoughtful, and I sympathised with much of what he said. He also reminded us of the importance of energy supplies by referring to the three-day week, his activities in the dark and the slogan "Vote for Ted and stay in bed." Now we know why he joined the Conservative party.

The White Paper set out our plans to ensure sustainable, secure and affordable energy delivered through competitive markets. By 2020, we envisage a more diverse energy system. It is important to stress that wind provides about a third of our renewables today, and we want that extended, but we want to see investment in a range of other renewables that is not focused on wind alone. For the next decade, however, wind will be an enormously important source of energy. Scotland, in particular, will play a substantial part in providing much of that electricity. I will return to renewables in due course.

Gas is set to remain the most significant part of the energy mix. Our estimates are that during 2004 the UK was, overall, a net importer of gas on an annual basis for the first time since, I think, 1996. Although there are variations from month to month, the long-term trend, by which we shall become a net importer of energy as a whole, is obvious. It is clearly important to reflect on the challenges for security of supply that will result from becoming a net importer again, as well as some other challenges—notably the need to update our energy infrastructure.

In today's global markets, secure and diverse sources of energy are essential for producers and customers. Ultimate responsibility for security of supply rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and we firmly believe that that responsibility is being discharged by leaving key functions with those who have the expertise to carry them out, such as Ofgem, the national grid, and other market participants.

Mr. Salmond: I just wonder whether Ofgem's expertise is something that the Minister should rely on. Does he accept that some of the problems in the gas market identified by the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) are a direct result of Ofgem's decisions on locational pricing in the early to mid-90s, which have been revised, sensibly, in the past couple of years? Does that not suggest that a close examination would be wise before rushing headlong to the introduction into the electricity market, by the same people, of a similar system or philosophy, which would create a heavy disincentive to the sort of expansion of electricity production from renewable sources in the north of Scotland that the Minister just welcomed and anticipated?

Mr. O'Brien: As the hon. Gentleman knows, whatever phrase can be used about the consideration that Ofgem is currently giving to the issues, "rushing headlong" is not an appropriate one. Arguably, there has recently been something of a delay in re-examining some of the suggestions. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should revise his phraseology, whatever his views about Ofgem. It is important that the Government should have a regulator that can obtain the best information and make judgments based on the need for the market to operate effectively and efficiently. In due course, we shall receive the results of Ofgem's current consideration of the issues.

Mr. Salmond rose—

Mr. O'Brien: I see that the hon. Gentleman rising, and will give way to him once more, because he has been present for much of the debate, and I know that he is interested in the issue.

Mr. Salmond: I am meeting the Minister later today, of course.

What the Minister says would be right if Ofgem recognised the Government's renewable energy targets, but, as he knows, I and colleagues asked its representatives three times, during a meeting with them, whether they acknowledged and were abiding by the Government's targets on renewable energy; each time they refused to answer, saying that they were bound by different criteria.

Mr. O'Brien: Ofgem is set up under statute and is bound by the statute that set it up. The Government have renewable energy supplies targets to be reached by 2010 and 2020, and we are pursuing them. No doubt Ofgem conducts its regulatory activities with awareness of those targets, because its objectives are clearly set out in its statute, and no doubt its representatives were merely communicating the fact that Ofgem is governed by Parliament, which has legislated to decide the basis on which it operates.

The hon. Gentleman should not read too much into his brief discussions at Ofgem. I meet its representatives regularly and am satisfied that they will consider all the issues seriously and try to ensure that the market operates effectively. We need a policy framework for energy that provides appropriate incentives, and that is one of the issues that Ofgem will continue to examine. The White Paper recognises that competitive markets can provide suppliers with incentives for reliability and the diversifying of sources. That, we believe, is the strength of our regulatory system; and, since liberalisation in 1990, the market has begun to deliver more secure energy supplies. We have made some changes to the way in which it operates, and we seek to ensure that it continues to deliver secure supplies. The national grid is forecasting that Britain's plant margin will rise over the next few years, reaching more than 30 per cent. in 2007-08, and remaining at that level to the end of the decade. In the longer term, market signals will show when new build is both needed and economically viable.

After a difficult period, there are signs of growing optimism in the power generation sector. New capacity has come on line at Immingham and Spalding, and earlier this year Centrica bought an option to build another power station at Langage in Devon.

E-ON UK, formerly Powergen, recently announced that it was to convert its Isle of Grain power station into one of the world's largest gas-fired plants at a cost of £80 million. The station is currently oil-fired, and runs only part time. Running full time on gas, the power station should produce enough electricity to power as many as 2 million homes. RWE Npower recently confirmed that it had made an application for consent to build a 2,000 MW gas-fired power station on its former oil-fired power station at Pembroke in south Wales. Those two projects alone represent more than £1 billion of investment in the future of UK energy supplies, which shows that the market is capable of anticipating and responding to future needs. We will continue to watch such issues with a great deal of care. We cannot be complacent, and we need to ensure that we have broad, diverse energy sources.

For markets to work, firms need to be confident that the Government will allow them to operate. That is why we made the commitment in the White Paper that the Government would not intervene unnecessarily, but only in difficult circumstances such as a potentially serious risk to safety. That does not mean that we are less than active. The Government have an important role in monitoring developments and creating an informed and competitive market both at home and abroad. If barriers arise, such as difficulties with planning permission or inadequate price signals, we aim to address them in partnership with business. The Government will ensure that the legal duties of the market regulators are clear and appropriate in relation to security of supply.

What particular challenges does a greater dependence on gas imports imply? First, being a gas importer is not at all unusual—either internationally or, historically, for the UK. All G7 countries except Canada are energy importers. Moreover, the UK imported more than 25 per cent. of its gas in the 1980s—we spoke earlier about the 1970s, but the 1980s is certainly within most people's recollection.

Some commentators have raised the spectre of UK gas imports being held to ransom for reasons related to political factors in other countries. Indeed, reference was made to Russia as a source of energy. We do not buy gas from Russia now, although a number of EU member states do so. They have found over the past 20 years that it is a reliable source of gas; and, despite various issues at different stages, gas supplies have not been interrupted. Indeed, as far as I am aware, the Russians have not sought to use gas supplies as a negotiating card in political discussions. They obviously want to secure a commercial advantage from the sale of their gas, and no one can blame them for that. After discussion with EU member states, we understand that that has not extended beyond the commercial operation into politics; they would be very concerned should that happen.

I understand the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber, but so far we have had no indication that the Russians are playing that sort of political game. In any event, we are not at the moment buying from Russia; we may do so in future, but we have no plans for a direct connection between Russia and the UK.

We deal with other countries that have political and stability issues. We must buy energy from a range of sources, so that if a problem arises with one of them we can switch to the other sources and ensure that our security of supply is maintained. Several hon. Members have referred to that diversity; it is the source of our security. Diversity equals security.

It is always possible that there will be stability issues in some countries, but a move to a more globalised market does not necessarily increase the likelihood of that. On the contrary, it becomes less likely as more countries move away from state-controlled monopoly towards systems in which they deal with other countries. That means that their wealth depends on them being able to deal on a commercial basis with other countries, rather than a political basis. The broader global market in energy can be a source of increased stability, rather than instability.

Given the inevitable decline of indigenous gas supplies in the UK, new infrastructure developments are required to ensure that we continue to meet high winter energy demand. A number of projects are currently under review or under active construction, as the market responds to that opportunity. One example of that is additional import connections to Norway. I hope to visit there shortly, and to discuss with my opposite number the conclusion of treaty negotiations with the Norwegians to ensure that we have strong supplies of gas from the country. The details of those negotiations are being completed. We have almost agreed the treaty; all that we are looking at now are some issues around translation and some administrative issues. We have almost got there; I hope that we can get the treaty signed in the not too distant future. That will provide us with a good source of supply from a country with which we have an extremely friendly relationship, and which is very stable.

[Mr. O'Brien]

LNG terminals are also necessary to import gas from other worldwide sources, and they are being built. We need more interconnection with the European Union. We need pipeline upgrades to increase interconnector import capacity, and we need both onshore and offshore gas storage facilities, as well as access to EU supplies.

Before all of these projects are completed, gas supplies might be tight if demand rises to high levels in the coming winter or the one after that. In such circumstances, we would look to the market to provide the appropriate response through demand management. The ability of the market to deliver large-scale demand response has to be tested, but we have already seen some small-scale examples of large customers choosing to curtail their demand in response to high gas prices. National Grid Transco has calculated that large amounts of demand-side reduction could be delivered by the electricity generating sector itself, without threatening any security of electricity supply.

The electricity generating capacity position is another crucial issue. There has been some wild talk in the newspapers about lights going out and so forth. Some things are possible but unlikely, and the prospect of that happening is extremely unlikely. However, I cannot give a 100 per cent. guarantee that that will never happen; we have just seen how storms have produced problems in the north of England and in Scotland, where thousands of people have been cut off, so such situations arise from time to time.

Last year's experience provides an interesting example of how the market responded. The March 2003 update to the seven-year national grid statement showed the projected plant margin for the winter as being only 16.2 per cent. That seemed low compared with the actual margin in previous years, which had been about 20 per cent. We signalled our concern, and by October the margin had risen to 19.3 per cent. Therefore, the forward price signals, coupled with the summer of power cuts which has been referred to, appear to have worked.

Mr. David Taylor (In the Chair): Order. I confirm that in the light of the conditions in the Chamber it is acceptable for hon. Members to remove their jackets.

Lockerbie

11 am

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): This is my 17th and probably last Adjournment debate on Lockerbie. On the sixth occasion, 10 long years ago on 1 February 1995, Douglas Hurd, who I am told was the first Foreign Secretary to answer a Back-Bench Adjournment debate since 1945, said:

"All significant information relevant to Lockerbie obtained by the intelligence agencies—or anyone else, to my knowledge—is invariably and as a matter of course provided to those who are responsible for the investigation."—[Official Report, 1 February 1995; Vol. 253, c. 1058–9.]

I am sure that Douglas Hurd spoke in good faith, but I just ask to wonder.

In 1998, Lady Symons told a group of Lockerbie relatives that Her Majesty's Government had a duty to find out why British nationals were killed at Lockerbie. Who was responsible, and how could it have happened? I wonder, as do Pamela Dix and Dr. Jim Swire of the Lockerbie families group, who are here today, whether Her Majesty's Government are fulfilling that duty.

In the Prime Minister's letter of 19 July 2004 to Lockerbie relatives, he writes:

"I entirely share your concern that we learn from Lockerbie and do all we can to prevent such a tragedy happening again."

How can we do that if we do not know the whole truth?

The aim of my next question is to try to establish some part of this very complex truth. Did British intelligence know, or was it informed, that a fifth improvised explosive device, allegedly not recovered but once in the possession of a terrorist cell of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine general command in Germany in late October 1988, was larger than the Toshiba Bombeat single-speaker radio cassette recorder adapted to become an improvised explosive device and found in the possession of the same PFLP-GC terrorist cell, and that the twin-speaker device, which was used in the Lockerbie murders, was larger than the Toshiba Bombeat single-speaker version?

If the UK intelligence services did know or were informed that the so-called fifth device was larger than the Toshiba Bombeat single-speaker radio cassette recorder, adapted to become an improvised explosive device, and that the twin-speaker Toshiba radio cassette recorder was larger than the single-speaker version, was that information given to any police force in the UK? If so, to whom was it given and when?

What were the total costs, incurred directly or indirectly, in connection with the visits made by the prosecution witness, Anthony Gauci, and members of his family, to the UK and Holland between 1 September 1989—a decade before the Scottish Parliament was set up—and 1 September 2002, including travel, accommodation, allowances, subsistence, police time and transport? Who authorised such costs? Do Her Majesty's Government know of any direct or indirect payments or payments in kind offered or made to Anthony Gauci, or to any members of his family, by any organ of the UK Government? Do HMG know of a payment of about $4 million to Gauci from American sources? What was the approximate value of any such payments or payments in kind to Gauci? When were they made or provided, by whom and out of what vote? Does the United Kingdom know, through any British agency, of any offer or arrangement to meet the costs or provide funds, directly or indirectly, for the actual or prospective resettlement of Anthony Gauci—a Maltese citizen and prosecution witness in the Lockerbie trial—or any member of his family, in Australia or any country south of Malta? If so, what were the details of any such offers or arrangements and when, and by whom, were they offered or made?

The Crown Office issued a press release on 10 May 1995 about the late Alan Francovitch's film "The Maltese Double Cross", acknowledging that the US Drug Enforcement Administration was running controlled drug deliveries through Frankfurt and London to the USA in 1988 and 1989, in collusion with the German Government. Do HMG still believe that that was so? I have given 48 hours' notice of these questions, and I hope that I have left time for a serious Foreign Office reply.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I am sorry for asking the Father of the House to give way just as he is ending his speech. However, is he aware of my constituents, Martin and Rita Cadman, who are the parents of one of the victims on the aircraft? Above all else, they want closure. They want the truth; for them that is very important. They want to get on with their lives. Is the hon. Gentleman also aware that most of the relatives feel that the Libyan leader was forced into making his offer to them, for purely political reasons? They are not impressed by it; they want the truth more than anything else.

Mr. Dalyell: I simply respond that Martin Cadman is an extremely serious and well informed member of the Lockerbie group of relatives. He and his wife had a most terrible loss, as did the other relatives.

I say to hard-working Ministers and Foreign Office officials that, at one level, I am sorry to bother them about events that began 16 long years ago and that perhaps could only have been fully explained by the late Abu Nidal—who was murdered in Baghdad, probably by associates of Saddam Hussein—or by people, either dead or long since retired, in Washington. However, on another level, I do not apologise. Those relatives passionately believe that they are entitled to the truth. In Barlinnie prison there is a man—Abdelbaset al-Megrahi—who I believe was a sanctions buster for Libyan Arab Airlines and the Libyan oil industry, and not a mass murderer.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): I take the opportunity to congratulate the Father of the House, my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), on securing this debate to discuss matters relating to Lockerbie and talk about the recent developments in the UK-Libyan relationship, which are also relevant. I pay tribute to his persistence and sustained interest in his inquiries as to what happened with regard to Lockerbie. He referred to the fact that that horrific and tragic event took place 16 years ago and said that this was his 17th Adjournment debate on the subject. He has persistently pursued the matter in a way that is remarkable and to his credit.

I also pay tribute to the Lockerbie families. Their courage and determination throughout the years and in the face of such a tragedy are impressive and humbling. Nothing can ever bring back their family members, but Libya's formal acceptance of responsibility for Lockerbie, and the payment of compensation to the victims' families, are important and have been recognised as such by the families.

Before I turn to the foreign policy aspects of Lockerbie, I wish to underscore this Government's satisfaction with Libya's reintegration with the international community in the past 12 months. As the Prime Minister rightly said when he visited Libya in March 2004, we are aware of Libya's past record but we should acknowledge and support change where we judge that it is real; otherwise, we never make progress in international relations. It is right that we should seek to consolidate and build on that improvement in relations.

Libya's dismantling of its weapons of mass destruction programmes and the formal acceptance by its Government of responsibility for the Lockerbie bombing are particularly welcome and important developments. It is worth noting that there have been other signs of progress, including rapprochement between Libya and the EU, payment of compensation to the families of the Lockerbie victims and settlements in the French and German claims for compensation.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way and for what he has said so far. Would he not agree that the families have said that the compensation is a step forward, but is pretty meaningless in the absence of getting the truth out? The total amount of compensation that Gaddafi is offering is minute compared with Libya's oil revenues. The families really want some progress on the truth.

Mr. Rammell: On one level I accept the thrust of what the hon. Gentleman is saying. We left the negotiation on the compensation to the lawyers, because that was the correct course to take to get the best deal and justice for the families of the Lockerbie victims. I will deal later with the issue of wanting truth and closure.

It is clear that a policy of engagement with Libya has the potential to bring this country and its people further benefits—political, strategic and commercial—in the future. A Libya that has renounced terrorism and abandoned its weapons of mass destruction programmes is a safer neighbour for the EU and the UK. I should like to say a final word on this subject: the case of Libya demonstrates that international relationships can be transformed. Difficult problems, such as the proliferation of WMD, can be resolved through discussion and engagement if political will and commitment is present on both sides. What has happened with Libya is a model that I hope North Korea will follow, recognising that it is possible to make progress on such issues by genuinely engaging with the international community.

I have set out the Government's approach to UK-Libya relations. Let me turn now to the points that my hon. Friend raised in his speech. I am grateful for the fact that he gave advance notice to my office of his line of questioning, but he has asked many detailed questions and if there are gaps between what I am able to say and the fullness of my answers, I shall write to him. Some of my hon. Friend's points are the responsibility of the devolved Administration in Scotland, and I will ensure that those issues are passed on to the authorities there, but I shall certainly try to deal with his main points.

Mr. Dalyell: As to the responsibilities of the Scottish Parliament, that is a very grey area, because many of my questions referred to the knowledge of the Government in London before the Scottish Parliament was set up in 1999.

Mr. Rammell: Certainly, I will do my best on the points that relate to the responsibilities of the UK Government, either today or subsequently in writing. However, there are elements that relate to devolved responsibilities and functions that have been transferred to the Scottish Parliament and Executive. It is appropriate for me to ensure that they are aware of the issues that my hon. Friend has raised, and I will do my level best to ensure that they respond to him.

Let me now deal with what, in many senses, is the central thrust of the argument of my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham): the case for an independent inquiry into Lockerbie. I know that my hon. Friend has long taken the view that there should be an independent inquiry into Lockerbie. Some 270 people died, and in such circumstances, as Ministers have said before, there is both a moral and a practical imperative for Government to seek answers to the key and fundamental questions.

The search for answers about Lockerbie involved unprecedented police, diplomatic and legal efforts. The unique format of a Scottish court sitting at Camp Zeist in the Netherlands led to the trial and conviction of Abdelbaset al-Megrahi. His conviction, as my hon. Friend will know, has since been upheld on appeal. The trial and Mr. al-Megrahi's conviction answer many of the key questions about what happened at Lockerbie. The court heard evidence about how the bomb was loaded on to Pan Am 103. It established that the attack was carried out and that Mr. al-Megrahi, an agent of the Libyan intelligence services, had been involved in the conspiracy to bomb the plane.

"in furtherance of the purposes of the Libyan intelligence services"

I appreciate that there are other questions that some feel were not addressed in full by the trial. I fully understand that this is undoubtedly a particularly sensitive issue for the victims' families, many of whom have pressed for an independent inquiry into the tragic events at Lockerbie. Let me assure hon. Members that we take the families' concerns extremely seriously. Ministers and officials have had regular contact with the families over the years and have listened very carefully to them. The Prime Minister met representatives of the families in spring 2004 when he returned from Tripoli. The Foreign Secretary has also met the families, rightly, on a number of occasions.

The Government have given proposals for a further inquiry into Lockerbie careful consideration on a number of occasions; I know that to be the case. In regard to the case that my hon. Friend made for an independent inquiry, I have to say that such an inquiry would be a further inquiry because, of course, a number of inquiries have already taken place. Those include the Camp Zeist trial and the fatal accident inquiry, a published report following the expert investigation by the Air Accidents Investigation Branch, and Mr. al-Megrahi's appeal against his conviction. Much information came to light, perhaps inevitably, in the course of those inquiries and trials.

I do respect the view that the issue should be reconsidered in light of improvements in the bilateral relationship established between the UK and Libya. The improvement is welcome and we remain determined to continue the process of bringing Libya back into the international community, but that does not alter the fundamentals that led us, after long and careful consideration, to reject the idea of a further inquiry.

As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has told the families and Parliament, given the absence of any significant new information, the fact that the key issues have already been extensively explored, and action taken, including substantial changes to airport procedures, it is most unlikely that any further form of inquiry would unearth further lessons to be learned—some 16 years after the event, as my hon. Friend said—that had not been identified during earlier investigations.

There undoubtedly remain a host of theories and issues on this subject that have developed over time. It is not the place of the Government to assess those theories. That was, and must remain, a matter for the prosecuting authorities. It is clear that such theories can be based only on an incomplete knowledge and understanding of the mass of evidence that was available to the prosecuting authorities, through which these matters were investigated in extraordinary detail.

It also remains a matter for the Scottish prosecution authorities to decide whether further inquiries into the criminal case are appropriate. As the independent head of the prosecution authorities, the Lord Advocate addressed the Scottish Parliament following Mr al-Megrahi's conviction for murder in 2001. On that occasion, he made it clear that the criminal investigation remains open as regards the involvement of others with al-Megrahi in the bombing, but that there was insufficient evidence to justify bringing criminal proceedings against any individual. That remains the case, as I understand it.

As anyone who has followed the case knows—certainly my hon. Friend the Father of House does—the possibility that an extremist group might have been responsible was thoroughly investigated on a number of occasions. No credible evidence has been found to substantiate any theory other than that which led to charges being brought against the two Libyan individuals—that was certainly the assessment of the prosecuting authorities.

The case was put together after the largest investigations to take place in respect of any crime that has been committed in the UK. The crime committed was unique in the history of crime in this country, and our concern, as always, was rightly that justice should be done. The dedication of the Dumfries and Galloway constabulary, and the efforts of the families in their pursuit of justice, was rightly admired by all. [Interruption.] As we certainly know, the Scottish judges in the Netherlands returned their verdict on 31 January 2001, and one of the two accused, al-Megrahi, was found guilty of the murder of 270 people on Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie. The second, Mr. al-Fhimah, was acquitted. Mr al-Megrahi's appeal was not upheld.

In view of the time that has elapsed during the investigation, and the fact that some of the detailed matters raised by my hon. Friend are properly for the devolved Scottish Administration, the information relating to some of his questions lies outside the grasp of the Foreign Office. I will nevertheless deal with the specific points raised, with the knowledge that has been made available to me.

Mr. Dalyell: What is not outside the UK's purview is whether moneys were paid to Mr. Gauci, and if so from what sources. If the Minister cannot answer that today, I do not make any complaints—but he has had 48 hours' notice and I really would like a detailed letter on this.

Mr. Rammell: I will happily address that point, but let me refer in turn to the points that my hon. Friend has raised.

My hon. Friend has raised the possible use, by the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine general command, of a Toshiba radio cassette as an improvised explosive device. On the face of it, it is indeed striking that the radio cassette player was of the same make as that used in the attack on Pan Am 103. As my hon. Friend points out, it was, however, a different model. More importantly, the timers were found to be of a different kind. The court looked in detail at the apparent connections between this case and Pan Am 103—they had the full information before them—and concluded that there was no connection.

My hon. Friend has also raised a number of detailed questions about the prosecution witness Mr. Gauci—with notice but, with the time it takes to pull information together, at short notice. On his request for the detail of the costs of Mr. Gauci's visits to Scotland, I have not been able to pull together the costs within the time available, but I will write to my hon. Friend. However, for the record, let me make it absolutely clear that any visits to the United Kingdom were appropriate and necessary, and were related to the proper investigation and prosecution of the case. There is no question of any inducements having been offered by the UK authorities to any individuals during the Scottish authorities' inquiries.

My hon. Friend asked about Mr. Gauci's possible relocation to Australia. I am not aware of any such arrangement. However, I will write to my hon. Friend once I have had the opportunity to look at that claim in detail. He should not assume anything from that. I am not aware of any information about that, but I will check it out further. I will do the same as regards the $4 million payment.

My hon. Friend also raised the issue of the press notice issued by the Crown Office in 1995. I am not sure he quite does justice to what was said in that statement, which quoted from a statement made in the House on 1 February 1995 by the then Foreign Secretary, who was himself quoting a United States official. The press statement said:

> "As the Foreign Secretary told the House of Commons on 1 February, the acting Administrator of the United States Drug Enforcement Administration stated publicly to United States Congressional investigators in 1990 that while they did conduct controlled drug deliveries through Frankfurt in 1989 with the co-operation and supervision of the German authorities no controlled deliveries were conducted anywhere in Europe during or immediately before December 1988."

I think that that addresses my hon. Friend's concern.

There may be parts of the detail that I have not picked up from my hon. Friend but I hope that I have managed to deal with the fundamentals of the Government's approach to the case. I shall certainly look carefully at the record of my hon. Friend's remarks to see whether I can usefully write to him on any other matters. If this does prove to be my hon. Friend's last Adjournment debate on the subject, I want to take the opportunity to recognise the diligence with which he has pursued these issues and the spirit in which he has raised them. He has done an enormous service to the families of Lockerbie, and it is right that that is recognised.

In conclusion, my thoughts and concerns remain with the families whose lives were fundamentally devastated by the Lockerbie bombing. It is one of the most appalling terrorist attacks ever to beset this country. The investigations and compensation are progress, but nothing will ultimately ever reverse the appalling events that took place back in 1988. Nevertheless, I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate and giving it a further air.

Mr. Dalyell: I should like to take the opportunity to thank the Minister and his officials. There are terrible problems for things that happened, not in the time of his father, grandfather, great-grandfather or great-great grandfather in Foreign Office terms, but long ago. I can imagine that it is difficult to go through archives. However, there is also a general problem with the responsibilities of the House of Commons and of the Scottish Parliament. You would have ruled out of order some of the questions that one would have liked to ask, Mr. Taylor, because they concern the Crown Office. The Crown Office has a moral obligation to be forthcoming in all that it knows.

Mr. David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. Mr. Rammell.

Mr. Rammell: Briefly, in response to that point, there is a proper division of responsibilities between the UK central Government and the Scottish Parliament. Nevertheless, I will ensure that the points that my hon. Friend has raised will go to the Scottish Parliament, Executive and relevant authorities, and I will ensure that he gets an answer.

Mr. Dalyell: Thank you.

United Nations

2 pm

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I welcome the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell), and I am delighted to have secured the debate on this day, as it is my birthday. My interests are declared in the Register of Members' Interests, and I remind Members that I am parliamentary adviser to the human rights charity, Christian Solidarity Worldwide.

Some people, notably political isolationists and extreme nationalists, might think that the United Nations is a threat to national sovereignty, but I do not. I shall put my cards on the table. I speak as an internationalist. I do not accept the law of the jungle, I have no desire to turn a blind eye to the conflict and injustice in the world and I think that the multilateral machinery for addressing inter-state and intra-state conflict and for tackling the abuse of human rights is far from perfect, but that it is better than nothing.

The UN stands at the apex of that multilateral machinery. Set up in 1945 as the chief agent of collective security, it was described only four years ago in the UN millennium declaration as "the indispensable common house of the entire human family".

However, today it is mired in controversy: corruption in the oil for food programme, administrative incompetence, rampant cronyism, and sexual harassment of staff are among the welter of accusations it faces.

Freedom lovers might accept a plea in mitigation for all the other sins of the organisation if it at least acted to protect the oppressed; sadly, it does not. The grim record speaks for itself. In the 1990s, the UN was a craven bystander in Angola, Rwanda, Afghanistan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Kosovo. More recently, its troops in the Democratic Republic of the Congo have been slated as poorly equipped, badly trained and lacking in commitment. UN soldiers are accused of abusing vulnerable refugees, and 1,000 people are still dying every day. To cap it all, with regard to Darfur in western Sudan, the UN has imposed no sanctions on the Government of Sudan and sent no troops, even though the former UN humanitarian affairs co-ordinator for the region has described the situation there as "the worst humanitarian and human-rights catastrophe in the world."

Equally disgracefully, the UN Security Council has never made an agenda item of Burma, whose brutal military junta savagely violates human rights every day.

In 2003, in the aftermath of the Iraq war, Kofi Annan, conscious of the crisis of confidence in the UN, appointed a high-level panel to consider the UN's future in the face of threats, challenges and change. Its report covers a vast terrain. I intend to focus narrowly on three issues: the UN Commission on Human Rights; the criteria for humanitarian intervention; and the scope for a peace-building commission.

The UN Commission on Human Rights was set up by the UN Economic and Social Council in February 1946. It first met in 1947. It meets annually for six weeks in March and April in Geneva. It can make statements, adopt resolutions and appoint special rapporteurs, but it cannot directly refer abuses to the Security Council. Instead, its resolutions can go to ECOSOC, which is a main organ of the UN. If it adopts them, they can go to the General Assembly. If the General Assembly adopts the resolutions, they can go forward to the Security Council for consideration. The words cumbersome and circuitous spring to mind as descriptions of that protracted process. At its best, the commission can shine a light on abuses; at its worst, it is an organised hypocrisy for tyrannies to shield themselves from scrutiny.

The essential problem lies in the three Cs: composition, chairmanship and credibility. Seats are allocated according to regional grouping: there are 15 for Africa, 12 for Asia, 11 for Latin America and the Caribbean, 10 for western Europe and others, and five for eastern Europe. At present, there are 53 members, including China, the Congo, Cuba, Eritrea, Nepal, Nigeria, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Zimbabwe, to name but 10 states that are not renowned for their commitment to pluralism or respect for human rights. Yet, on 10 December 1948 when the United Nations universal declaration on human rights was issued, reference was made to the pursuit of a "common standard of achievement for all peoples" in terms of respect for, and observance of, human rights.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I have attended many sessions of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that one of the deepening flaws in the process is the reduction in status of non-governmental organisations? This is their one voice in many cases; they arrive at a UN forum and voice serious detailed criticisms, often of their Governments or other Governments. Those criticisms have been systematically curtailed at the behest of a strange coalition of world powers.

Mr. Bercow: Yes, I agree. The commission would not shut out those organisations if it were committed to pluralism; a big "if", as the hon. Gentleman will concur. If its members have nothing to hide, they should not be resistant to independent voices offering their view of the behaviour of a range of Governments, including those of their own countries.

I remind the Chamber that article 4 of the charter describes the proper behaviour to be expected of peace-loving peoples. Article 6 says that, if a state persistently violates the terms of the charter, it can, in certain circumstances, be expelled from the General Assembly. Not only has none of those 10 countries been removed from the General Assembly, all are members of the Commission on Human Rights. By convention, the chairmanship of the commission has rotated by region. That has produced some shocking results. In 2000, Nepal held the chairmanship despite well-documented abuses of human rights highlighted regularly by Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, including extra-judicial killings. In 2003, Libya was in the chair even though it has been regularly exposed for its denial of human rights. This year, it is the turn of Indonesia.

That is a bizarre irony, given that several UN special rapporteurs have had their requests to visit Indonesia denied by its Government. Those include the special representative of the Secretary-General on human rights defenders; the special rapporteur on the promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression; the special rapporteur on freedom of religious belief; and the special rapporteur on torture. The country has neither the humility nor the confidence to allow UN inspection of its own record on human rights, but the self-same country chairs the UN's body on the subject, thereby pontificating on the behaviour of others. In terms of stomach-churning hypocrisy, that is a gold-medal-winning performance.

What is the high-level panel's assessment of such a chronic state of affairs? It states:

"The Commission on Human Rights suffers from a legitimacy deficit that casts doubts on the overall reputation of the United Nations".

Referring to the commission's responsibility to uphold and promote human rights, the panel states that its capacity to do so

"has been undermined by eroding credibility and professionalism".

Worse, it adds:

"standard setting to reinforce human rights cannot be performed by states that lack a demonstrated commitment to their promotion and protection. We are concerned that in recent years, states have sought membership of the Commission not to strengthen human rights but to protect themselves against criticism or to criticise others. The Commission cannot be credible if it is seen to be maintaining double standards in addressing human rights concerns".

What a sound verdict that is.

Yet, from that conclusion and alongside some reasonable recommendations about the need to use prominent human rights figures in its work, the benefit to be gained from an advisory council, the merits of an annual report on human rights worldwide and the imperative of regular reports to the Security Council by the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, the panel report drops its bombshell:

"We recommend that the membership of the Commission on Human Rights be expanded to universal membership".

Extending it in that way would admit a further 138 countries, including such noted champions of human rights as Uzbekistan, North Korea, Burma, Iran and Uganda. It is hard to see what more cowardly counsel the panel could offer. It does no service in abandoning any attempt at value judgment, plumping instead for the soft option of universal access.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that there should be a pure human rights organisation that excludes large numbers of states? The whole basis of the United Nations is that every single state in the world can be represented in international forums. The logic of the hon. Gentleman's position is that the international organisation that we have established over the past 60 years should be destroyed. I am not sure that that would be helpful.

Mr. Bercow: My response to the hon. Gentleman's intervention is as follows; I am not arguing for purity, nor do I have any expectation of it. However, states that palpably fail to respect human rights, do not acknowledge the fact of their transgressions and show no interest in or commitment to improving their record cannot credibly sit on the UN Commission on Human Rights if that body, which is bigger than any individual state and the sum of its members, is to retain credibility.

The notion of allowing universal membership is so transparently absurd as to deserve no further discussion. Yet the status quo is plainly unsatisfactory. The root cause of that unsatisfactory situation is the geographical basis for membership and the Buggins's turn criterion for chairmanship. If the UN is serious about wanting the commission to regain respectability—let alone legitimacy—I suggest that it should stipulate that membership of the commission should depend on states' respecting the human rights of their citizens. What is the Government's view?

I now turn to humanitarian intervention, the case for which needs to be made on two grounds; legal and moral. A tension exists between those who seek to uphold the principles of non-intervention and sovereignty and those who claim that the international community has a responsibility to protect fellow human beings from extreme abuse wherever that occurs. That second group has emerged as the forerunner in the debate. The Canadian Government established the International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty, which reported in 2001. It built on the "just war" tradition developed by academics such as Michael Walzer, who stated that the use of force was legitimate "when the violation of human rights within a set of boundaries is so terrible that it makes talk of community or self-determination or 'arduous struggle' seem cynical and irrelevant, that is, in cases of enslavement or massacre".

When a state is visiting horrors on its people, as is the case in Darfur, such notions of self-determination are meaningless. Interventions to prevent such violations of human rights do not violate the rules of sovereignty, as their purpose is to "uphold the values of individual life and communal liberty of which sovereignty itself is merely an expression".

This argument that human rights are at least the equal of the principle of sovereignty is central to the case supporting humanitarian intervention.

The commission's principal findings were that sovereignty implies responsibility and that the principle of non-intervention yields to the international responsibility to protect, establishing the just-cause threshold. Force would be justified in certain cases; first, large-scale loss of life, actual or apprehended, with genocidal intent or not, which was the product either of deliberate state action, or state neglect, or inability to act, or a failed state situation. The second case would be large-scale ethnic cleansing, actual or apprehended, whether carried out by killing, forced expulsion, acts of terror or rape.

The findings stressed the precautionary principles of right intention, last resort, proportional means and the reasonable prospects of success. The report stated that the Security Council was the appropriate body to give authority to such missions, but warned that where it failed to discharge its responsibility to protect in conscience-shocking situations crying out for action, concerned states may not rule out other means to meet the gravity and urgency of that situation.

The high-level panel report drew on the work of the Canadian commission, establishing five criteria to judge the merits of humanitarian intervention: seriousness of threat; proper purpose; last resort; proportional means; and balance of consequences. Moreover, it ruled unequivocally that the rights of individuals—this is of the essence in the debate—take precedence over the rights of states. The international community not only has the right to override state sovereignty in cases of major breaches of humanitarian law, such as genocide in Rwanda or ethnic cleansing in Kosovo, but has the responsibility to protect the human rights of the victims.

That said, in practice, the panel believes that genocide should be tolerated unless the Security Council authorises the use of force to stop it—[Interruption.]—Does the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) wish to intervene?

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD) indicated dissent.

Mr. Bercow: He merely raised his finger innocently.

I may have described a misguided modus operandi, yet if it is to be the working assumption of the UN, it follows that the working of the Security Council must be improved. The panel's failure in its report to make any concrete recommendations to that end is surely a damning indictment of its work.

Let me propose to the Government one such positive recommendation, which was made by the Canadian commission. Permanent members of the Security Council should pledge not to use their veto to prevent action against genocide, massacres or other crimes against humanity unless their vital national interests are at stake. What is the Government's view?

Finally, I turn to the important topic of the prospect of a peacebuilding commission. The high-level panel recommended the establishment of such a commission. Its task would be to identify countries under stress and at risk of sliding towards state collapse, to organise proactive assistance to prevent the process developing further, to assist in planning for post-conflict transition and to marshal the efforts of the international community in post-conflict peacebuilding for the necessary period. It would be a small body assisted by a support office and an inter-agency advisory board.

That is sensible. The problem of failed states and state collapse will vex the international community for the foreseeable future. The commission would be vital in providing the information and analysis to enable the UN to act to prevent state collapse and the inevitable suffering that follows. It would also play a crucial role in the delicate post-conflict transition stage. It is a travesty that states tend to fall off the radar of the international community when the peacekeepers leave. That is precisely when they need the most assistance.

Peacebuilding missions must be developed so as to ensure that countries do not slide back into failure and conflict. Essential work that the commission could co-ordinate and oversee includes the demobilisation of combatants, the funding of the reintegration and rehabilitation of former combatants, the building of effective public institutions and the support of civil society to establish a framework for governing within the rule of law. While I favour such a commission, far more needs to be done to improve the practice of peacekeeping. That is a crucial prerequisite of the rebuilding of states and societies.

A powerful argument against peacekeeping operations is that they simply do not work. A quick survey of recent media reports on the activities of UN peacekeepers in the Congo would seem to support that. In addition to the disturbing accusations that UN troops sexually exploited the vulnerable refugees whom they were supposed to protect, the cold truth is that they have failed to keep the peace. Conflict and skirmishes between factions continue to kill and displace civilians and prevent the difficult transition to peace.

The faults of the peacekeeping structure were highlighted by Madeleine Albright, who wrote, in 2003,

"that traditional UN peacekeepers lack the mandate, command structure, unity of purpose, and military might to succeed in the more urgent and nasty cases . . . Such weaknesses, sadly, are inherent in the voluntary and collective nature of the United Nations. When the going gets tough, the tough tend to go wherever they want, notwithstanding the wishes of UN commanders."

The panel noted that

"peace agreements by governments or rebels that engage in or encourage mass human rights abuses have no value and cannot be implemented. These contexts are not appropriate for consent based peacekeeping; rather, they must be met with concerted action."

The operational principles and rules of engagement of peacekeeping need to be developed. Troops must be made aware of the need to respect human rights and minimise the destructive impact of their actions upon civilians. Resources are fundamental. The UN needs troops, intelligence and logistical support. It needs a dependable capacity and standby arrangements so that it can deploy well-trained troops to conflict zones.

It is unfortunate that the countries that contribute significant forces—including Pakistan, Bangladesh, Uruguay and Nigeria—are often lured by the cash and military hardware they receive just for turning up. The major powers need to agree to deploy their troops. Unless they do so, the UN will be a hapless horseman riding for another fall. This is evident in Darfur, where the Security Council is relying upon the inexperienced, under-resourced African Union to enforce a fragile peace. The omens are not encouraging. One possibility might be to establish peace-enforcement missions where the Security Council would depute an appropriate major power to organise a coalition and enforce the world's collective will. This worked well in Haiti in 1994, East Timor in 1999 and Sierra Leone in 2000. What is the Government's view?

The UN has a noble mission—to provide collective security, uphold human rights and execute humanitarian missions—yet it cannot rest on its laurels, thinking that its successes in the past, or the principles of its charter, are an effective riposte to those who criticise its failures in the present. On the Commission for Human Rights, the basis of humanitarian intervention to underpin civilised values and the tools of effective peacekeeping, there is a need for reform. That reform should be bold and principled; that reform should be now.

2.23 pm

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I welcome this debate and congratulate the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) on securing it. It is timely indeed; the UN needs examining and we need to think seriously about that. However, we should also remember why the United Nations was founded in 1945, the guiding principles behind it and how important it is that we show serious respect for, recognition of, and support for, it. That is crucial.

I shall concentrate my short contribution on two aspects; the Human Rights Commission and the non-proliferation treaty review conference that will be held in May. I know that other colleagues want to speak. As I indicated in my intervention, my experience of the UN Human Rights Commission goes back a few years. I have represented a British-based group called Liberation, in my role as chair, at the UN Human Rights Commission and at the sub-commission meetings, and short they are not. The commission lasts for six weeks, but the sub-commission—with a show of respect for people's needs and the pressures on their lives—lasts a mere three weeks. I do not pretend that I have been to all of any of the sessions—I could not possibly stay that long anywhere—but they are interesting and informative.

I concur to some extent with what the hon. Member for Buckingham said about structure. The establishment of the UN Commission on Human Rights was recognition that, since 1945, there has been a role for the world body in examining in detail allegations of human rights abuses around the world.

The UN is permanently, irrevocably and indefinitely bedevilled with the problem of being inevitably representative of national Governments around the world. Those Governments may or may not be representative of their peoples, be in control of what is happening in their own societies or be repressive of people in their own societies. The UN charter recognises all that, and includes a very special and important provision allowing non-governmental organisations to be represented. The UN Human Rights Commission is an example of that.

The pressures placed on the staff and directors of the UN Human Rights Commission are enormous. I had a great deal of time, support and respect for Mary Robinson when she was the director of the commission. She was bluntly and unceremoniously dumped because she asked too many questions, raised too many difficult issues and fell out of favour with too many Governments. We should be careful to remember the good contribution that she tried to make to the commission.

I have been to the commission as a representative of NGOs. Governments used to get 10 or 15 minutes to introduce their topic or resolution, and a plethora of NGOs could then apply to take part in the debate on the topic at the appropriate time. However, I have noticed that, gradually, the opportunities and the time allowed to NGOs, and the seriousness with which they are taken, has reduced further and further, so that we are now down to two and three-minute contributions. To say that one can adequately describe human rights abuses in Colombia in three minutes is frankly ludicrous.

We should remember that NGOs are not at the commission on a freebie; they are there, often at enormous cost to themselves, because they care passionately about human rights abuses in one part of the world or another. Unless they are given a voice, space and opportunities, Governments will simply club together and shut them up; that is exactly what is happening now at the commission.

When the Under-Secretary replies to this very important debate, I hope that he will assure me on a couple of issues. First, I mean no disrespect to those who have attended the commission over the years. As officials, they have been diligent and helpful, and I have no individual complaint against any of them—indeed, some have been extremely helpful, providing bits and pieces of advice when I or others have sought it—but the reality is that we should have a much higher level delegation there. It should certainly include Ministers, at least for the opening and closing sessions. Obviously, they would not be expected to stay for the whole six weeks, unless they wanted six weeks in Geneva every year; a very pleasant place it is, too, but six weeks is a bit long. However, they should at least be there at times.

Also, we should not continually hide behind a common EU position. Doing so often means that when issues come up, not all Governments have a position on them. Therefore, the EU delegation does not take a position, and nothing is said. We need a re-examination of that.

Also, more pressure has to be applied to give far more time, space and opportunity to NGO representatives from around the world who want to take part in the commission. I go back to the example of Colombia. There is much debate about human rights abuses there, but everyone here would agree that there are such abuses. Whether we believe that Uribe and the Government of Colombia are adequately or effectively dealing with those abuses would be an item for debate, but we would all recognise that it is legitimate for Colombian people to be represented at the commission and to put their case adequately. Remember, many of the people who attend are putting themselves at great personal risk in order to make their voice heard. The UN in its very basic charter recognised all that, and therefore gave them that voice. I think that we should recognise that too, and do our best to support them. That is very important.

Secondly, in May this year, the non-proliferation treaty review conference will take place in New York. Ironically, this comes on the 60th anniversary of the first ever use of nuclear weapons at Hiroshima and Nagasaki. I quote briefly from the founding charter of the United Nations:

> "We the peoples of the United Nations determined . . . to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind, and . . . to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small, and . . . to establish conditions under which justice and respect for the obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law can be maintained, and . . . to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom."

This year's conference takes place five years after the non-proliferation treaty review conference in 2000. The UK and the other declared nuclear states took part in the conference and were asked to take a number of steps forward. These included to sign and ratify the comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty without delay, to honour a moratorium on nuclear weapons testing pending entry into the force of the comprehensive treaty, immediately to commence negotiations on a fissile material cut-off treaty, immediately establish in the Conference on Disarmament a body with a mandate to deal with nuclear disarmament, to honour the principle of irreversibility in relation to nuclear disarmament, to "accomplish the total elimination of their nuclear arsenals leading to nuclear disarmament in which all states are committed",— and facilitate—

"the entry into force and full implementation of START II and the conclusion of START III as soon as possible",— ensuring the completion and implementation of the trilateral initiative between the US, Russia and the International Atomic Energy Inspectorate.

The reason I quote that is because this year's conference takes place at a time when we are in danger of not going forward to a process of long-term nuclear disarmament, but quite the opposite; we are starting a process of nuclear armament around the world. At present, there are five declared nuclear weapon states, which, happily for them and utterly logically, are the five permanent members of the Security Council; Russia, France, Britain, China and the United States.

The undeclared nuclear weapons states—Israel, India, Pakistan and North Korea—are there, and of two others, Iran is in negotiations for the removal of possibility of constructing nuclear weapons. The only other state that has ever had nuclear weapons and unilaterally got rid of them is South Africa, and I think we should pay enormous credit to Nelson Mandela and the government of the ANC who did that to bring about a nuclear-free continent of Africa.

I hope this treaty review takes place and, optimistically, I hope that India, Pakistan, North Korea and Israel will all attend, own up to having nuclear weapons, say they are going to get rid of them, and fully sign up to a disarmament process. I also hope that the five declared states will do the same; it would be wonderful. My concern is that the opposite will happen. Israel will simply refuse to take part or to say anything other than that it has got its nuclear weapons. I have just returned from Palestine where I spent many hours in the company Mordechai Vanunu who spent 18 years in Israeli prisons for telling the world about Israel's nuclear weapons.

India and Pakistan are both countries with enormous social problems and needs. They cannot afford nuclear weapons and should not have them. The idea that a nuclear weapon could be some kind of defence for either Delhi or Islamabad is ludicrous. It would not take long for a rocket to get from Delhi to Islamabad. If either side bombed the other, the effect would be on their own countries. I recognise that things have moved on from the threats of a year ago and that negotiations are taking place, and I hope that that will lead to a common disarmament position.

However, those who heard President Musharraf of Pakistan when he spoke in Committee Room 14 were not very encouraged that that would be the case. In fact, we left with the opposite impression; he seemed rather proud of the fact that Pakistan had nuclear weapons, and he saw the development of the nuclear capability and its delivery systems as something of which to be proud.

I hope that the Government's contribution to the NPT review conference will be to set out in advance a statement on how to bring about worldwide nuclear disarmament; secondly, that we will not be developing a new range of nuclear weapons, nor will we be buying a new generation of nuclear weapons from someone else. As Trident reaches the end of its what some would call its useful life—others would be less complimentary—we should become a non-nuclear power.

Surely to God, nothing that has happened in the world, including the increasing gap between the richest and the poorest and the needs of the poorest, is aided by nuclear weapons. For all the nuclear weapons and all the power that the United States has, it was not much good to them on 11 September 2001. The only way to bring about peace and justice throughout the world is to examine the causes of injustice, and the poverty that goes with it. I look to the United Nations as the body to achieve that.

All hon. Members experienced the build-up to the war in Iraq. We saw how the UN was used and abused in the build-up to that war. As well as what I would call the misuse of the UN charter by those who were keen to go to war—I believe that the continuation of the inspection programme might have brought about a different result—we saw the development of the legal pre-emptive strike by President Bush and later by the Prime Minister, and subsequently by President Putin. That is a dangerous departure. We possess the power to go to war, and the ability to destroy an awful lot of the planet, but we would be better off if we concentrated on strengthening the only world organisation that can provide a forum for peace and the opportunity to bring about justice.

I have before me an interesting book, written by Linda Melvern and called "The Ultimate Crime: Who Betrayed the UN and Why". It is interesting, thought-provoking and, in some places, upsetting for those who believe passionately and strongly in the United Nations. We have to consider why the UN has often been so undermined and why it has been so weak when it should have been strong, and we must put our efforts into strengthening and supporting it. That would be a good way forward.

This year the UN has a great opportunity, but not as a remote body. All the Governments that make up the UN, including ours, should show, through the non-proliferation treaty review, that the UN can mean something, and that it can bring about disarmament around the world. We should put those precious resources to peaceful use, rather to the creation of weapons of mass destruction; we are all supposed to be dedicated to their removal.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. Four hon. Gentlemen seek to catch my eye. I propose to call the first of the three Front-Bench speakers at 3 o'clock. I mention that in case hon. Members wish to accommodate each other.

2.38 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): The contribution of the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) may have seemed a trifle long for the amount of time available, Mr. Gale, but I am sure that, compared with those speeches that he was telling us about that he had heard in various United Nations bodies, it was short. I shall endeavour to do even better.

In response to the hon. Gentleman's observation that the nuclear deterrent was not much good to the United States on 11 September, I would point out that the nuclear deterrent was certainly a lot of good to the US and the rest of the free world during the 50 years of the cold war. It is a question of horses for courses. During the cold war, the hon. Gentleman argued with complete consistency that we should unilaterally abandon nuclear weapons. I would not expect him to change that position now that the cold war has ended.

I do not share the hon. Gentleman's views, but this is not meant to be a debate about the efficacy or otherwise of nuclear deterrence. It is meant to be a debate about the need to reform the United Nations. In that respect, surprisingly enough, I share a lot of common ground with the hon. Gentleman.

The UN was certainly set up with the mistakes of its predecessor, the League of Nations, firmly in mind; it was set up with a limited and pragmatic mandate. During the years of the cold war confrontation, I remember people saying, "You know what's wrong with the UN? The big powers have a veto on the Security Council." That is not what was wrong with the UN, but what was right with it. It was designed to reflect the reality that big-power capabilities could keep the peace or destroy it, and recognised that it had to come to terms with the realities of the world if it was to make a contribution to peace and tranquillity. In short, the UN is a handmaid to, not a substitute for, action by the Governments of sovereign states; it is a reflection of, and a facilitator for, the states that make it up, enabling them to act where they have got the will to do so. We must not over-invest it with a sanctity that it does not possess.

As has been said, the UN is not a democracy; it is not made up, depending on one's definition of the term, of a majority of democracies. Therefore, it is not, and it should not be regarded as, a world Government or the fount of international wisdom and morality. One thing that concerned me in the run-up to the war in Iraq was the degree to which responsibilities were shuffled from Governments to the UN. Governments were trying to say, "We will do this, but only if we get a vote in the Security Council." The reality is that the UN is comprehensive; as the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) rightly said, it includes everybody. As such, it cannot be expected to represent the best practices of nations around the world, although it does enable them to work together when they have a mind to do so, without having to set up ad hoc machinery.

It is hardly surprising, therefore, that many of the pungent criticisms voiced by my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) carry such weight. It is true that we can have a totally inappropriate country chairing a human rights body at the UN. I do not share the view that that should be ruled out, because it gives us an opportunity to use that country's record to embarrass it in the eyes of the world. I do not know that it did Libyan legitimacy a lot of good to be stuck in the chair, where it was subject to greater scrutiny than it would have been had it been excluded.

I am gratified to see the hon. Member for Ilford, South nodding in assent, but there is another side to the coin. If we recognise that the UN is a universal structure, designed to incorporate the mad, the bad, the dishonest and the murderous, just as much as the peaceful, saintly and democratic ideal, we must also recognise the limitations on the legitimacy of its pronouncements. That is why the case that my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham is making is worth pushing forward, despite all the organisation's in-built limitations. By its existence, the UN enables those who wish to work together to do so, but it also allows those who wish to get away with misbehaviour or atrocious and inhumane behaviour in the dark to be dragged into the spotlight and forced to justify that behaviour.

Let us not kid ourselves that the United Nations will ever be a substitute for the responsibility of Governments. There are two forms of club. There is the form of club that is made up of members who think and act alike and believe in the same codes of conduct. That is not what the United Nations is about. There is also the form of club that everyone belongs to, but which cannot then expect a spotless reputation. That is what the United Nations consists of. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham is absolutely right to bring the matter forward and to shine the piercing intellect for which he is renowned on the abuses by member states of the United Nations.

Although my hon. Friend has not over-exaggerated the role or the legitimacy of the body concerned and his admiration for it, he has been able to use the lip service that everyone at the United Nations tries to give to certain principles to show up the hypocrisy of nations that fall short of adherence to those principles. I know from the cold war years that there were many times when the stench of hypocrisy, particularly over arms control, rose to high heaven from the United Nations, its sub-committees and subordinate organisations. I also know that the work done there to link up baskets of human rights, for example, with disarmament initiatives for the east-west confrontation was extremely valuable. All of us would agree that, had the organisation not existed, when the time came for change in the totalitarian societies of the USSR and eastern Europe it would have been much harder to bring that about and formalise it.

Let us go forward with hope in the utility of the United Nations. Let us not exaggerate it for its ability to do the impossible and let us always remember that the United Nations is as good, but no better, than the members who make it up.

2.47 pm

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): For some, especially the so-called neo-conservatives in the United States, the United Nations is a moribund talking shop. It is said that it is wasteful, corrupt or unwilling or unable to take action. It is said that it is a friend of dictators, an unwelcome restraint on the United States. To be honest, some of the criticism that such people make is unfair or overstated. Other criticisms are not. It is significant that in the aftermath of the war in Iraq, the United States of America has recognised that it needs the United Nations. After the tsunami of 26 December, there is widespread recognition throughout the world that the United Nations, in some form or other, is desperately needed.

If the United Nations is not the sort of organisation that it should be, the question inevitably is: how should we change for the better? That is the view of the high-level panel mentioned by the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow). The panel is extremely distinguished; the United Kingdom is represented on it by Sir David Hannay, former United Kingdom representative to the UN. Just before Christmas, it came forward with a report, which is modest, it is true. However, because of that it is realistic and realisable.

The report has 101 recommendations in its close to 100 pages. Briefly, I want to focus on one or two of them. First, it identifies new ground rules for members of the United Nations to resort to force. Significantly, the Security Council is urged to consider early authorisation of action against certain types of urgent but non-imminent threats. The threat of terrorism across the globe is one that springs to mind. Terrorism is identified as a new threat, and is accurately defined as "any politically motivated violence against innocent individuals". That, the panel would argue, has tremendous significance for the future of the UN if the report is adopted.

Moreover, the report talks about the principle of humanitarian action and urges that that principle be adopted. Again, that is of tremendous significance. Without going into the debates we had in this House in the run-up to the war in Iraq, many Members, myself included, said that there was a moral justification for the intervention in Iraq for humanitarian reasons. It is significant that the report echoes what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister argued as long as five years ago in Chicago.

Fourthly, a reform of the Security Council is proposed, an issue that has tended to hit the headlines. Two options are put forward. Both involve increasing the size of the Security Council to 24. I understand that the favoured option talks about six new permanent members of the Council. The so-called aspiring four are Germany, Japan, Brazil and India, but also two African states—one from the north of the continent, one from the south. However, the implications of a possible extension of the veto are not considered. I would be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about that delicate but important issue.

When I was in the United States, in New York, just before Christmas, I happened to be there when the high-level panel report was leaked and then published. Generally speaking, it had a reasonable response. Certainly it was welcomed by our Government and most other Governments across the world. However, at that time, the United States of America had very little to say about it. We all must acknowledge that the response of the United States is crucial to how the UN develops and whether this report is welcomed and received positively. I very much hope that the United States will step back from ritually assaulting the United Nations, and Kofi Annan in particular, and recognise that the world, including the United States of America, needs the UN.

The report is of tremendous significance—the most important report that has been published since the United Nations was formed. I hope that Members will not say that the report does not go far enough and that we would ideally like to see this, that or the other happening. The report offers a road map to the future that is, as I said at the start, realistic and realisable. We would also do well to recognise the words of one former US representative to the United Nations, who said some years ago that this organisation, the UN, was created to prevent us from going to hell, not to take anyone to heaven. If we think about that, we will be realistic and take the United Nations forward to help create a better world.

2.53 pm

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) on a constructive and—whether one agreed with all his points or not—thought-provoking presentation.

I start with a paraphrase of the same quote. I think that it was Henry Cabot Lodge who said that the United Nations was not a vehicle to transport us to paradise, but a means of saving us from hell. It is important to stress that when some of the criticisms made by the hon. Gentleman are valid. Some of the faults though are those of the member states. We need to reform and not to condemn.

Some of us were disturbed to see at the Republican convention, in response to a renegade Democrat senator and to Vice-President Cheney, people almost baying in hatred of the United Nations. I do not think that that is too strong a term. That there is an element of that hatred within the Bush Administration is worrying. That is why, as my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) suggested, a reversal of that attitude was welcome, when it was recognised that the UN should take the lead over the tsunami.

The UN is the only hope for the major issues that the high-level panel was dealing with—war, internal conflict, poverty, nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction, terrorism and trans-national crime. Those are interrelated issues. Indeed, the underlying issue is development and the need to tackle poverty, which has such a root effect on all the other problems. The British Government are right to say that we want to use our presidency of the G8 and the European Union to press that issue.

Preventing wars and trying to deal with civil wars are controversial subjects. I must rush through my remarks, so let me just say that what happened in Sierra Leone was an admirable example of that being done at its best, with regional and UN support.

Terrorism and criminality is an important subject, and it has been regarded as even more important with the concern about weapons of mass destruction. We should never forget that the greatest fear of all is the combination of war and nuclear weapons. As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) said, the nuclear non-proliferation treaty will be vital. We wish the Minister well in the negotiations on that. The UK played a positive role last time, but we must prove that the states with nuclear weapons are prepared to fulfil their own parts of the agreed positions. Peacekeeping and a peace-building commission are also important matters.

On human rights, we need to work out a balance because realpolitik is involved in that. If we are to talk about countries respecting not only their own citizens but those of other countries, people could refer to Guantanamo Bay. We have difficulties with a number of large countries about their human rights records.

We need to strengthen the post of UN Secretary-General. We need also to rebalance the Security Council. It cannot simply reflect what happened at the end of the second world war forever; it is right to think about expanding it. There needs to be a new balance in it, because the General Assembly does not reflect population. That rebalance could involve some form of weighted voting. However, I want to stress that the UN is our only hope, and therefore we must improve and reform it.

2.57 pm

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): The United Nations was never established as a world Government or a democracy, and if it did not exist we would have to establish something like it. Some of the criticisms made of it are justified, but it is important to recognise that when there are allegations of troops committing rape, theft or looting, those involved are not UN troops; they are national troops of member states of the UN that happen to be operating under a UN mandate.

The UN does not have a standing army. Perhaps we should return to the recommendations of the Boutros Boutros-Ghali document, "An Agenda for Peace" of 1992, and consider how we might have an effective international intervention force of a sort that can move quickly, so that we do not have to wait for weeks and months. The UN has problems with the deployment of forces to a number of areas around the world. It is not the only organisation that has difficulties in that regard; NATO has similar problems in getting adequate forces into Afghanistan, where it currently has responsibility.

There are issues about the structure and organisation of the UN that need to be addressed. The Security Council must contain India, but it needs also to include a large and preferably democratic Muslim state. In the world in which we live, it is vital that Islam and Islamic countries do not feel that others are ganging up against them. I hope that that matter will be taken seriously, and be addressed.

I turn to the big problem. During the cold war, the UN could not be effective in places such as Angola because that could have led to a third world war. However, since the end of the Soviet Union, the United States has become what the French call a hyperpower, and if we now want intervention on a global level, the US must be involved. I hope that Condoleezza Rice's remarks of yesterday show that the US will move towards a more multilateral approach than in the past. Four years ago, when Dr. Rice was in Russia just before her appointment as National Security Adviser, she is reported to have said that there are three positions in American politics: the left, which was internationalist; the right, which was isolationist; and the realistic position to be followed by the Bush Administration, which was unilateralist. Things have moved on since then; in many respects, the US Administration has not been unilateralist. I hope that there will be a fourth position to be put forward by Condoleezza Rice as Secretary of State, on realistic engagement and co-operation with allies through the UN system and with partners in Europe.

3 pm

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes), with whom I am happy to serve on the board of governors of the Westminster Foundation for Democracy. His was the last in a range of thoughtful and challenging contributions.

I join other hon. Members in paying tribute to the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), who secured the debate. He has been on something of a political odyssey in recent years. Who knows where it might take him next? It is our great good fortune that it has brought him at this time to focus on the United Nations as a key issue. In doing so he has done us a great service.

The debate is very timely. It is not long, as other hon. Members have said, since the report of the UN Secretary-General's high-level panel on threats, challenges and change. That comes in the same week in which the UN millennium project's report, "Investing in Development", has been published, under the direction of Professor Jeffrey Sachs. It is not long since our last debate on the UN. We focused then on the White Paper. I appeal to the Minister that today's debate should not be the House's last word in debating the UN. Perhaps now that these serious reports are available, we shall have time seriously to consider them on the Floor of the House.

I take issue slightly with the hon. Member for Buckingham. I know that he would have said more had he had more time, but I felt that on balance some of his criticisms of the high-level panel report would have left the impression that he was highly critical of it. For all its limitations, it is a serious piece of work, which has rightly focused our attention on the shortcomings of the institution and the need to reform it properly. In this year of the UK's presidency of both the G8 and the European Union, the Government have a special responsibility to ensure that the reports are recognised in the international agenda, and taken forward.

The preamble to the UN charter sets out the lofty ambition

"to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war".

It asserts the need "to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights," and, among many other things,

"to promote social progress and better standards of life".

Those bold ideas gave rise to the UN. Whatever difficulties it may now face, they remain as relevant today as they ever did.

The world is of course very different from 1945, and the panel has set that out carefully in its report. Threats are based not only on states attacking one another. They arise from diverse sources such as poverty, the spread and possible use of weapons of mass destruction by non-state actors as well as countries, trans-national organised crime and international terrorism. It is not only states that are the problem and it is not only state security that is now at issue. Along with the panel, we must recognise that in the modern world the threats do not recognise national boundaries. No state, however powerful, can protect itself on its own. Nor can we assume that every state will be able or willing to meet its responsibilities towards its own people, or not to harm its neighbours.

Achieving consensus may be relatively straightforward in the Chamber, but the panel is right to highlight the difficulty of reaching an international consensus. For some, HIV-AIDS is a horrible disease but not a security threat; for others, poverty is a development issue but hardly one to make us concerned about security. For me, it is pretty simple: poverty creates instability, which leads to conflict, which deepens poverty.

Such recognition is not always present, and one of our most serious tasks—it has been implicit and sometimes explicit in the comments of other hon. Members—is to ensure that the UN, although it needs to reflect the realities of modern power, is not simply a rich man's club or a rich man's Christian club. Without that new consensus and mutual recognition of threats, there is little prospect of any new security consensus, and therefore little prospect of reforming the UN to enable it to tackle the threats that we face. Only with consensus can we adapt the tools of collective security that we surely need now more than ever.

The panel rightly focused on prevention. The adage that prevention is better than cure is as true at an international level as it is in the home. The panel properly identifies that as a key requirement of our new collective security, so that threats that are distant do not become imminent, and those that are imminent do not become destructive. Action, as the panel says, is key. It needs to be taken early, decisively and collectively.

The panel is also right to focus on the importance of development, which is essential to any framework that is to be taken seriously. In a year in which we will focus on the achievement, or lack of achievement, of the millennium development goals, the panel's report may, like others, be an impetus for further efforts.

Too often, efforts to prevent conflict fail. When we should allow force is the big question that dogs current international relations and may be the most fundamental question of all. There are critical situations in which we are likely to see conflict. The high-level panel has said that it believes that article 51 and chapter VII are sufficient for the modern threats and challenges that we face. Perhaps we will have more time to debate that in future. I certainly agree that the Security Council should be the principal source of international authority. We must surely take cognisance of the panel's criteria, which the Member for Buckingham set out carefully, for judging whether or not force is allowable.

There are so many aspects to the UN that we need to tackle, and many hon. Members have focused properly on the need for institutional reform. As the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) made clear, however, none of the institutional reforms will be of any relevance if the member states have no political will to implement proper reform or to put leadership at the forefront of their activities in the UN.

Like the hon. Member for Buckingham, I consider myself an internationalist. I am aware of the difficulties facing the UN and its shortcomings, but 60 years after its foundation, surely we can get the political impetus to get it right and to get it ready for the 21st century.

3.7 pm

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) on what has been a very worthwhile debate, and on his birthday. He spoke with his customary clarity and eloquence, perhaps even more so on this special occasion. Perhaps we can look forward to this becoming an annual occasion on which to revisit these important events.

I have not been a political oddity, but I am happy to agree with much that the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore), said. I especially agree about the importance of us having a full debate on the Floor of the House on this very important and very large issue. We have the high-level panel report to consider and we are moving towards taking decisions at the special summit in September, so it is right that the House of Commons should have a proper opportunity to consider it.

Time is short, and the Minister has a great deal of ground to cover, so I shall endeavour to be as helpful as I can in allowing him the time and the opportunity to do so. My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham rightly stressed particular aspects of the reform of the UN, as well as the importance of the UN as an institution and the importance of getting it right and improving it to make it an effective international body. He also dwelt appropriately on some of the problems and difficulties that the UN has had. As he said, it seems sometimes to be mired in controversy; he referred to problems of fraud, corruption, and perhaps worst of all, inactivity in the face of massive humanitarian crises, such as Darfur, as well as the failure even to discuss the fate of Burma and the abuses involving peacekeeping troops in the Congo.

My hon. Friend also focused on the UN Commission on Human Rights and its cumbersome processes, and considered some of the other important aspects of the criteria under which humanitarian interventions can be appropriate. One strength of the high-level panel report is that it attempts to address the appropriate circumstances in which intervention should take place, especially on humanitarian grounds. The report considered what it calls an emerging norm, namely, that there is a collective international responsibility to offer protection, which is exercisable by the Security Council, and to authorise military intervention as a last resort. The report goes on to discuss genocide and so forth.

Given the shortage of time, this debate has inevitably only skated over some of the big issues raised in the high-level panel report on threats, challenges and change. The report shows an understanding of some of the ways in which the UN has failed to live up to some of the challenges of the past, but also attempts to apply the principles of the UN, which we share in all parts of the House, to a changing world. Much of the report is aspirational and much in it would be difficult for us to disagree with. The report sets a real challenge for the UN and the countries that form it, particularly those on the Security Council, to try to establish effective principles so that we can co-operate as nation states.

The report sets out five criteria for the appropriate use of force. They have been examined in some detail so I will not repeat them. Importantly, the report attempts to clarify the appropriate roles of prevention and pre-emption. I hope that the Minister will deal with that, as much as he is able, in the short time that we have. The report recognises some of the weaknesses in the structure and the practice of the Security Council and suggests greater clarity about the circumstances in which prevention and pre-emption may take place.

There has been relatively little mention of the oil-for-food scandal. My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson), who has been able to join us belatedly, has taken a close interest in the scandal and the vast sums that Saddam's regime skimmed off. That episode emphasises the importance of improvements in both the secretariat of the UN and in control and audit, and of proper financial control.

I return briefly to some of the questions that have been asked. I hope that the Minister will answer the three questions that my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham asked, about the appropriate membership of the UN Commission on Human Rights, the possibility of a presumption against a Security Council veto on humanitarian intervention and the proposal that the Security Council might depute a major power to organise a coalition to take action where appropriate. The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) asked a further important question regarding the Government's attitude to the expansion of the Security Council and the danger of paralysis.

I promised to be brief. The UN is one of the most important issues facing the Foreign Office, Ministers and, indeed, the country. Now is a critical time for us to deal properly with the recommendations and discussions that have emerged from the high-level panel. I look forward to the Minister's response.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): We have had an exceedingly good and well-informed debate. I start by congratulating the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) on his birthday. He is at an age when birthdays are still a celebration and I wish him many happy returns. He demonstrated conviction and a commitment to multilateralism and to the UN. In that respect, I share his agenda.

Reform of the United Nations is fundamental for anyone who believes genuinely in the organisation. When the Secretary-General launched the reform debate, particularly the setting of the high-level panel in 2003, he summed up the necessity for reform more succinctly than anyone else has done. He said:

"It is not enough to denounce unilateralism unless we also face up squarely to the concerns that make some states feel uniquely vulnerable. We must show that those concerns can and will be addressed effectively through collective action."

That is the fundamental key to the whole reform debate.

The British Government, from the Prime Minister down, have very much welcomed the high-level panel report. Of course, it contains various elements that people might want more or less of, but it sets out a challenging and constructive agenda for change. The principal reason why it is an essential force for good is that it faces squarely the three key challenges that we face as an international community: proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, terrorism and global poverty. To paraphrase what Kofi Annan said, unless we can demonstrate that collectively we have the capacity to face those challenges, then, to put it bluntly, the UN and all of us will not endure such circumstances.

As well as the high-level panel report, it is important to remember that 2005 will see another significant milestone in UN reform: the millennium review summit. It will not only discuss the high-level panel report, but measure what progress we have made against the millennium development goals. It is no secret to suggest that, when the review takes place, we will be facing a situation in which we are acknowledging that sufficient progress has not been made, if we are to meet the targets that have been set for 2015 with the millennium development goals. It is a fundamentally important year.

The panel report and the summit are part of the same process. The high-level panel is based on the important core premise that security and development are interlinked and go hand in hand. Neither is possible without the other. That is the high-level panel's view and I strongly endorse it. I had the opportunity at the UN conference to meet the Secretary-General last week and we discussed UN reform in some detail. Between the Secretary-General and the Government is a shared agenda about the importance of the year ahead.

Kofi Annan will be publishing his own report on the implementation of the high-level panel report in March. We are intending to work with him and seize the opportunity that exists for the international community. The United Kingdom is uniquely placed, especially this year, to be able to do that, given our dual presidencies of the European Union and the G8.

I turn now to the oil-for-food crisis and scandal to which several hon. Members have referred. In recent months, there has been a great deal of criticism of the UN over the programme and, most recently, about the allegations of widespread sexual exploitation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo by members of the United Nations Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo—the MONUC peacekeeping mission. The Secretary-General has acted through the appointment of an independent inquiry into oil for food, a series of investigations into the MONUC allegations and the appointment of Prince Zeid of Jordan as a special adviser on sexual exploitation, with the task of making recommendations throughout the peacekeeping system to tackle such appalling behaviour. We certainly support him.

We want to see UN action on such issues and we should not shy away from the lessons that should be learned. Nevertheless, the Government continue to support fully the Secretary-General, which is an important point to make. His leadership has been important and we must continue to register that fact. We will fully support him, along with those with whom we work closely and who share our vision for the future of the UN. Undoubtedly, while problems deserve our attention, 2005 has also seen the best of the UN.

[Mr. Bill Rammell]

Following the tragedy in the Indian ocean with the tsunami, the UN is playing a leading role in co-ordinating the huge and essential relief effort. A challenge for the UN will be sustaining that work beyond the initial relief to help a long-term recovery, and we are certainly willing to work with the UN on that.

I am pleased that the high-level panel has dealt with the United Kingdom Government's major priorities. It sets out an ambitious agenda for a UN that is much more proactive; deals comprehensively with threats to peace and security by recognising the importance of conflict prevention and peace building after a conflict; responds to the threats of terrorism and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction; explores the circumstances in which the UN should authorise military action to prevent a threat from materialising or to deal with a humanitarian catastrophe; acknowledges the need to address the link between poverty and conflict; and recognises that environmental degradation, particularly climate change, is a threat to be tackled like any other. That is an enormously substantive agenda, and one that we positively welcome. The other recommendation that is particularly welcome is that for a peacebuilding commission. I shall come on to that.

I shall address some of the points that have been made during the debate. I started with the hon. Member for Buckingham, who made a powerful and coherent speech. However, he voiced some significant criticisms of the UN as well. I believe that he said that there are too many occasions on which the UN does not act to protect the oppressed. One can undoubtedly adduce evidence in support of that statement, but I would not take it as a criticism of the UN as an institution—the UN is no more than the sum of its parts. A criticism of the UN is a criticism of the whole international community, and what happened with regard to Rwanda is probably the best example that we can think of. It was a lamentable failure on the part of the UN that not enough was done in Rwanda in 1994, but more importantly it was a failure on the part of the international community. We must criticise ourselves, not just the institution. People do that too often, without recognising our responsibilities.

The hon. Member for Buckingham also spoke of the horrifying events in Darfur, and argued for sanctions. In such a complex situation, any sanctions must be designed to have the desired, coercive effect, with the minimum risk of negative side-effects. For example, we must not undermine the recently signed peace deal in southern Sudan. However, one of the difficulties, and it will always persist, is to get Security Council agreement on the right framework for sanctions. It is no secret that some major powers, members of the permanent five, have significant reservations about the use of sanctions. I am not referring to the United States of America. That needs to be taken into account. Our stance is that if the commission of inquiry that has been established concludes that genocide has occurred in Darfur, and urges reference to the International Criminal Court, we will strongly support that and would urge other states to do likewise.

Mr. Bercow: The Minister is addressing the issues comprehensively and I much appreciate his kind remarks. He is right; I would have favoured sanctions. However, I put it to him that the debate has moved on. A great many people have been slaughtered, and it is probably too late to talk about sanctions. Unless a sizeable international peacekeeping force is sent soon, it will be too late.

Mr. Rammell: The hon. Gentleman underestimates the importance of the African Union taking a lead in that regard. The recent signing of the peace deal for the whole of Sudan offers the best hope for everyone within Sudan, particularly those in Darfur. I do not rule out that at some stage an international force might be necessary, but that is not what we are advocating at the moment, and it is not the best way forward in the present circumstances.

The hon. Gentleman also talked about the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. That is, without doubt, a troubling and problematic body, which is the sum of its parts. He referred to the regional blocs, which form the current mechanism for election. If we respect the integrity of the process, and allow regional blocs to put forward their candidates, countries will sometimes emerge that—to say the least—have questionable records. We could address the issue—I think that the hon. Gentleman touched on this—by agreeing a set of criteria to which a state that wanted to join the commission would have to adhere. The problem with that is that all the members of the commission would have to agree to it and, to use the parlance, turkeys tend not to vote for Christmas.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the case for humanitarian intervention, which we strongly support. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister first articulated that notion in Chicago in 1999; he put forward the powerful case, as we have done consistently, that the world has moved on since the 1940s, when state sovereignty was supreme, and that the notion that a state can do whatever it likes to its people as long as it happens within the confines of its boundaries—and that the international community has no right or responsibility to intervene—is no longer acceptable. The high-level panel has put forward some useful criteria that we need to debate.

The hon. Gentleman also asked whether the use of the veto should be reformed, restricted or abolished, particularly in cases of genocide. The failures of the League of Nations demonstrate the dangers of an organisation that does not give due weight to the major powers; the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) referred to that. We continue to believe that the existence of the veto is a factor in ensuring that major powers work through the UN in dealing with threats to international peace and security. However, although we would not support formal restrictions on the use of the veto, we believe that it should be used with restraint and in accordance with the principle of the charter. We are practising what we preach: we have not used our veto since 1989.

The hon. Gentleman also talked about the importance of the peacebuilding commission and of using that mechanism to ensure that when states have failed, been recaptured and recovered, they do not fall back into chaos and conflict. That is one of the key challenges.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) made a powerful contribution, as he usually does on issues such as these. He said that non-governmental organisations should have more time and space at the UN Commission on Human Rights. My hon. Friend knows that we have supported that argument; the UK Government have always been at the forefront of making that case. He also said that the UK delegation should be widened to include greater representation from human rights and non-governmental organisations. I will consider that case; if my hon. Friend wishes to put further detailed arguments to me, I shall consider them as we construct our delegation, which will go to Geneva this March.

The hon. Member for New Forest, East made a succinct and profound point in saying that the veto was needed, or very powerful states would walk away from the UN. We need to learn the lessons from the disintegration of the League of Nations; that is sometimes forgotten in this debate. The hon. Gentleman got it absolutely right when he said—I paraphrase—that we should move away from some of the dewy-eyed views of the UN and recognise that, at its core, it is an organisation that enables states to act when they have a will to do so. It is no more and no less than that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) made some important points. He said that the United States has recognised that it needs the UN, but that similarly—this is a key part of this debate—all of us need to recognise that the UN needs the United States if it is to be a credible organisation. That should be a key thrust of our arguments. My hon. Friend referred also to the case for the reform of the Security Council. We are on record as positively supporting the expansion of the permanent and non-permanent membership. However, although the case for enlargement is important, it is not the only key issue that the United Nations is considering at the moment. There is a real danger that the whole of this debate will get subsumed into the jockeying positions of various countries that want to get on to the Security Council, and that those other important points will be missed and lost.

The hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) said that the hon. Member for Buckingham was on a political voyage. Many criticisms can be made of the hon. Member for Buckingham; being a Liberal Democrat is not one of them.

This has been an important debate. The responsibility to protect criteria for humanitarian intervention is a debate whose time has come. We need further progress on the millennium development goals and we need a peacebuilding commission. Finally, this is such an important issue and debate that we will hold a seminar at the Foreign Office in the coming weeks on this very issue. The Secretary-General has agreed to come; that is an important indication of his leadership and the importance we attach to this debate.

Army (Command Structure)

3.30 pm

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): I am pleased to have gained a further opportunity for a short debate on Army matters. On this occasion, it is on the future operational command structure. Since the announcement last July, the Army has been a focus of debate from both a military and a political point of view. I suspect that that state of affairs will continue for some time to come, bearing in mind the many contentious issues that must be addressed.

During that time, Ministers have poked fun unfairly and without justification at hon. Members who have expressed opposition to the culling of infantry regiments, alleging that they wanted to return to the days of biplanes. That happened in the main Chamber. Yet the Cheshires are to be relegated from being a regiment to becoming merely the first battalion of a new regiment named after Mercia, an Anglo-Saxon kingdom that was in existence more than 1,000 years ago. If that is not looking backwards, I do not know what is. I am pleased that Soldier magazine described the Cheshires as one of the magnificent seven—those regiments which to date have never been amalgamated. Only time will tell whether the promises of Ministers and the Army hierarchy to keep regimental identities will materialise.

I was intrigued to read the other day that the Scottish regiments are to keep their cap badges while the English regiments are to lose theirs. The reason given was that the colonels of the English regiments did not request that cap badges be retained. Quite frankly, I find that difficult to believe and I would be grateful for confirmation of that. In addition, will the Minister confirm that no further discrimination is taking place?

I confess to having a foot on both sides of the border, as members of my late mother's family served in the Black Watch. Second Lieutenant Tom Gillespie, who was my mother's uncle, was killed by Turks in the first world war and my own uncle Bill ran away from home to serve in the Black Watch in India for six years. I believe that there should be parity of treatment between English and Scottish regiments, as both are part of the British Army.

I have found the confusion about how many trained Army personnel we have extraordinary; a figure of 103,780 is given. How many are to be made redundant? Is the future establishment figure of 102,000 the rough, or the exact, target? As the whole purpose of the shake-up is to move personnel around, why is the future establishment of the various corps not known? It is nonsense to say that all 36 future battalions will be operational, because training free of call-up always has to continue.

It was said a year last November that there would be no infantry battalion cuts. However, the chief of staff stated on 16 December that two years had been spent looking extremely hard at what capabilities and structures will be needed in the future. The result is that three battalions are to go and that one battalion of the Parachute Regiment is sensibly to be moved sideways. It is somewhat confusing. A tangled web has been woven, no doubt as a result of continually changing financial constraints, which have also continually been denied. That has done nothing for the morale of our soldiers, especially those away on operations in hot spots such as Iraq. They have no idea what they will be coming home to.

We have heard much about the future Army structure. The chief of staff has made it clear that it could take up to 12 years to achieve, with much emphasis being placed on the medium sector. One of the main areas of concern is the future operational command structure, which I believe may turn into something very different from what it is at present. It could come under tremendous strain. That is apparently unforeseen by the generals and defence staff.

The worst-case scenario is one in which the United Kingdom loses operational control of its armed services and UK defence industries are also adversely affected. The present restructuring of the infantry could pale into relevant insignificance compared with what may come in the future. A week ago, the Foreign Secretary stated that he expected the European Union's arms embargo on China to be lifted, claiming that that would have little practical effect. Nothing could be further from the truth, however, because that will leave the Government siding with the EU against the interests of the United States. While the Foreign Secretary is totally unconcerned and thinks that everything can be smoothed out with the US, the indications are that the US Congress will find the situation unacceptable. If the ban is lifted, the already strained special relationship with the US will go up in flames, putting a stop to technology transfer and the flow to us of information from the US. Any possibility of the UK obtaining a waiver from the international traffic in arms regulations has now disappeared, pushing us further from American arms and towards EU arms.

That brings me neatly to the Galileo satellite navigation system, in which, it must be noted, China has a 20 per cent. stake. On 18 December last year, French Defence Minister Michèle Alliot-Marie, speaking at the launch of the French Helios 2A military reconnaissance satellite, confirmed that the EU's Galileo system would be available for French military use. That was just one week after EU Transport Ministers, at the Transport, Telecommunications and Energy Council in Brussels on 9 10 December, had reiterated in their written conclusions that Galileo was a civil programme under civil control, as the Ministry has claimed here in the UK.

On 22 December, Andrew Brookes, an aerospace analyst at the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies, stated:

"One of the justifications for Galileo is that it will allow any new Euro defence force to have access to the same space assistance as is provided to U.S. forces by their Global Positioning System."

He went on to say that it could be used for pinpointing the location of weapons and troops on the ground. The USA has already said that if Galileo were used against American interests and it could not jam the system, it would take it out. Even the recently issued EU Commission publication, "Looking beyond tomorrow: Scientific research in the European Union" says that Galileo will play a role in security operations such as humanitarian aid, the evacuation of refugees, peacekeeping and crisis resolution, which implies military use without actually admitting it.

That brings us to the future rapid effects system—FRES—which is key to the medium sector of the infantry, on which so much emphasis is placed. Following the interview with the Chief of the Defence Staff in the winter edition of Defence International magazine, one wonders whether the top brass understands what FRES actually is. General Sir Michael Walker gave the impression that it was about vehicles. Vehicles are an important aspect, but FRES is a system that is put in them. It is supposed to be a totally integrated battle information system, equivalent to the American future combat system. It allows realtime intelligence from multiple inputs to be processed, electronically integrated and then disseminated to all individual units in a fighting formation at vehicle and sub-unit level, all with amazing speed. Furthermore, input is permitted from the sub-unit level, and it can be integrated into the overall battle plot and shared immediately with all other units. We could end up with a bodged, halfway position in which we get a medium-weight transportable armoured vehicle with some highly sophisticated battlefield surveillance platforms, but multi-feed processing and system integration and the widespread distribution of information may be absent.

There are two issues. The first is money. As we know, the Chancellor has thrown prudence out with the bath-water and the UK is heading for a financial black hole. Other than the first stage of FRES, the assessment phase, costing £113 million over two years, the overall cost of the project will be £6 billion. Neither those costs, nor the onward anticipated running costs, have been budgeted for. That might seem like a lot of money, and it is, but in defence terms it is not nearly enough; it is only one eighth of what the Americans are spending on an identical system. When the money dries up and the Army is well and truly on its way to reorganising around the medium sector, the salvation proposed will be to take on a partnership arrangement—but you can bet your bottom dollar that the Americans will not become our partners, as I will explain in due course.

Secondly, the FRES technology will depend on accurate navigation—the Galileo system—because future partners in this project will demand it and compatibility with the US system will be virtually impossible and too expensive. FRES, or what we understand FRES to be, will be ideal for conventional warfare, but today that is low on the list of probabilities. FRES will not stop terrorist activities or add to the social side of peacekeeping and reconstruction. Each unit will be expensive and, as I have said before in my previous debate, can easily be taken out by someone dressed as a civilian at little expense to them, so it is a very vulnerable system.

If FRES gets up and running, it will change the concept of how the Army operates. At the moment the commander has the facts and makes decisions based on the information available, giving orders to the troops who do not have access to the information on which those orders are based. Under FRES, unless the information is coded to keep it from the troops—which would defeat its objective of speed—they will know as much as, if not more than the commander, and that will put the whole command structure under horrendous strain.

If FRES is a botched job, which is the most likely option, commanders will still have to analyse and interpret data from diverse sources. On a modern battlefield, with so much input, the problems are data management and information overload. The more information is put into the system, the more difficult it gets to rank its importance and analyse it. The volume increase simply adds to stress and confounds good decision making.

Procurement is another vital issue for both the armed services and the UK's defence industry. In keeping with the general ethos of the Monnet method, the European Commission has elected to secure greater defence—and thence political integration—through economic means, pursuing the route of integrating EU member state defence industries. Extending the remit of the procurement rules to defence is one of the ways chosen to achieve that.

The Green Paper published last September is alarming. It talks about the Commission's intention to contribute to the gradual creation of a European defence equipment market,

"supporting the development of the Union's military capabilities under the European security and defence policy" and proposes establishing

"an appropriate regulatory framework for the procurement of defence equipment."

At the centre of the Commission's initiative is the newly formed European Defence Agency, which will work with the Commission to promote common, EU-wide procurement and standardisation through the armed forces of member states.

If the Commission gets its way, the standardisation programme will become compulsory, managed through CEN—the European Committee for Standardisation—rather than NATO. Given that the United Kingdom is already co-operating with Galileo, and will possibly do so in future with FRES, the point will come when we are so absorbed into the EU system and equipment programmes that we will no longer have the technical capacity to act independently and we will be so far removed from the US systems that we will be incapable of operating alongside US forces.

All this appears to be happening in slow motion, without anyone really understanding what is going on or any conscious political decision to cast our lot one way or the other. We think that we can steer a middle course, which will most likely end in disaster as we are locked into further European co-operation whether we want it or not. Let us not forget that the headline goal, and one of the several milestones identified within the 2010 horizon, is the improvement of performance of all levels of EU operations through appropriate compatibility and network linkage of all communications equipment and assets, terrestrial and space-based, by 2010. That, not surprisingly, happens to be the same date stipulated for FRES.

Finally, we come to the UK's involvement with the EU deployment. An EU battle group would have a force commander and an operation commander who would be directly responsible to the Political and Security Committee, acting by unanimity. The force commander would be determined on a case by case basis. For a battle group operating under the Berlin plus arrangements, the operation commander would be the Deputy Supreme Allied Commander Europe. Outside the Berlin plus arrangements, the operation commander would be determined on a case by case basis, possibly drawn from the nation providing the major troop contribution. As in all EU involvement, there would be a transitional stage. Some future crisis will no doubt prove the present system cumbersome, far from the situation that our chief of staff correctly envisages—that is, meeting an operational need for a more agile, deployable and flexible force. This would result in calls for streamlining, and no doubt a future EU treaty would turn the Defence Council into a defence commissioner, and unanimity would change to qualified majority voting, as we have so often seen before.

While the future Army structure is laying the foundations for the next decade and beyond, it will be future financial difficulties, coupled with inept political decisions about where our loyalties and responsibilities lie between the USA and the EU, while we slip and slide deeper into integration towards an EU army and defence force, that will result in the disappearance of parliamentary accountability.

I do not want to see the traditional role of our armed services subverted away from the defence and security of the United Kingdom. I do not want to see British troops under the command of anyone other than a commander answerable to the Secretary of State for Defence, who is himself answerable to the British people through Parliament, which remains sovereign.

3.48 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I congratulate the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) on obtaining time for this debate. I am grateful to her for giving me the opportunity to explain an important element of the armed forces structure, and at the same time hopefully deal with what I believe to be a number of misconceptions surrounding this issue.

The hon. Lady addressed a wide range of issues in her speech. I shall try to deal with the many elements that she raised. However, I open my contribution on the subject of this debate, which is the operational command structure of the Army. The best way to illustrate that is to look at the main operational deployments in which British forces are currently engaged, and to set out the different command structures that apply and why. The main deployments are, of course, Iraq, Afghanistan, the Balkans and Northern Ireland.

I will deal with Iraq first, where we have just over 8,000 troops. They form part of the coalition force, which is operating under UNSCR 1546. The vast majority of our troops are in the south of Iraq and come under the direct command of the General Officer Commanding Multinational Division (South East), who in turn comes under the US General Commanding Multinational Forces (Iraq) who is headquartered in Baghdad. However, at all times British forces remain under the operational command of the Chief of Joint Operations at the Permanent Joint Headquarters in Northwood. Indeed, the CJO, or another British officer retaining operational command of British Forces, is a feature of all the command structures that I want to mention today. All British forces are also operating under rules of engagement agreed by British Ministers and within a British legal framework—regardless of the coalition or international security organisation they are operating within. There was much discussion in the House recently, and of course in the media and among the wider public, about the command arrangements for the Black Watch battle group that deployed last year to North Babil. The arrangements that I have just set out were essentially the same. Although the commanding officer of the 1st Battalion the Black Watch reported to a US officer, he ultimately remained under the operational command of the Chief of Joint Operations and the UK rules of engagement.

In Afghanistan, the UK forces are deployed under two complementary command structures. Those form a part of the international security assistance force around Kabul, and those in the provincial reconstruction team are part of a NATO operation under the command of a French general. Those forming part of the US-led coalition focusing on counter-insurgency operations are under the command of the US commanding general. However, as in Iraq, all British personnel remain under the operational command of the CJO and, again, operate within a British legal framework. In the Balkans we find two different structures, but the same overriding principles apply. British personnel in Kosovo form part of KFOR, which is a NATO operation, again under the command of a French general. Those in Bosnia now form part of an EU operation, EUFOR, under the command of a British general.

I hope that the hon. Lady will accept that British forces in operations overseas remain under British command, and in all these cases, under the overall command of the CJO. We do not envisage any change to the way in which we work with our international allies and partners in coalition operations. Indeed, improving interoperability is at the heart of what we have in mind.

The hon. Lady raised the subject of the development of EU battle groups. She accurately set out some of the issues associated with that. The precise command arrangements for any EU battle group mission would be determined, as she said, on a case-by-case basis, and would be subject to unanimous agreement by the 25 member states. However, as with EUFOR and other current operations, it is likely that operational command of deployed forces would be retained by the CJO.

I have said that there are no plans to change the way that we operate. We are still in the process of putting the concept together. What I find intriguing about the hon. Lady's position is that it is as if she is denying the need for international effort. If she is not denying that, she is unable to articulate how partners work together. They cannot operate in separate stovepipes. They must come under one single command in theatre. There then has to be a national reference point for all of that, and, as I pointed out, we work clearly through our chain of command to British Ministers—ultimately to the Prime Minister—and also within the British legal framework. There are no plans to change that, and I feel that setting this hare running is based on nothing but prejudice.

Let me just also comment on the command structure for forces operating in Northern Ireland, because there is a slight variation there. The 11,000 personnel in the Province are under the command of the General Officer Commanding Northern Ireland, and he reports to the Commander-in-Chief Land Command. However, on a day-to-day basis, the GOC works to support the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Northern Ireland, who retains primacy on security issues.

I have covered a number of disparate operations, but it is important to understand that in all circumstances British forces deploy in a coherent command structure, and with the right guidance and ROE. With current operations, the retention of operational command safeguards that. Future operations may see it achieved through different command and control arrangements, but the outcome will be the same. I have in mind here the possibility of a large-scale NATO operation. Nothing of that nature is envisaged, but if such an eventuality had to take place, we would have to work with our NATO partners—I assume that the hon. Lady is a strong supporter of NATO—to work out the best structures to achieve our objectives, so the issues are real.

We choose to operate with trusted allies and partners precisely because this type of co-operation provides operational benefits over and above those available were we to operate alone, for which last option I think the hon. Lady was arguing. For example, through operational burden sharing, UK forces are able to call upon the deployed assets of other nations, thus making support available when it otherwise might not be. Ultimately, operating with allies and partners can enhance the safety and effectiveness of our troops.

Let me deal with the future Army structure, which the hon. Lady touched on in her opening comments. The future Army structure is underpinned by two complementary changes. The first is a move towards a more balanced force, organised around two armoured brigades, three mechanised brigades, a light and an air assault brigade, and a Royal Marines commando brigade.

It is important to emphasise that we cannot use front-line forces that we are unable to deploy, and we cannot sustain operations if we lack sufficient supporting forces. That is why we are moving ahead with the second element of the reorganisation, which is making the Army more robust, resilient and able to sustain the enduring expeditionary operations that have become standard in recent years. The requirement is for us to make significant enhancements to key specialist capabilities—including those involving communications, engineers, logisticians and intelligence experts—that underpin what we need for an expeditionary Army in a new, strategic context. We also want to make fighting units, including the infantry, more robust by ensuring that they have adequate numbers.

The hon. Lady asked about the size of the British Army today. Of course, it is significantly bigger now than it was in 1997. The current figure will remain broadly the same, depending on normalisation in Northern Ireland. When normalisation in Northern Ireland comes along, it will create a new set of conditions that have to be dealt with. Six battalions are tied up in dealing with the issues in the Province. I hope that that will not be required in future. If those six battalions are no longer required there, that will create a set of new conditions that will allow us to do different things.

Of course, we are talking about more than just infantry and boots on the ground. We also have to create a deeper and broader strength in the British Army. That is why enhancements on which we have already decided include the creation of a new commando engineer regiment, a new port and maritime unit, an additional strategic communications unit and a new logistics support regiment for each deployable brigade. We are also creating a number of new sub-units for surveillance and target acquisition, bomb disposal and vehicle maintenance capabilities.

Those are new capabilities, not cuts. The hon. Lady said that some people in this Chamber were treating the issue with some humour. These are very serious issues, but the issues that I point out—the way in which we are adding new capabilities—and the extent of the debate have been missed by many commentators. Of course, what I say also applies to equipment.

Sadly, I will not even be able to touch on Galileo or China, as I have only two minutes left, but I shall try to. In future, we can deliver effective armed forces through network-enabled capability, something that other nations, primarily the United States, are looking at. That is why we have to move down the road of major procurement strains and of introducing Bowman and Falcon, enhanced intelligence collection assets such as Watchkeeper—the unmanned aerial vehicle—Soothsayer electronic warfare capability, and modern vehicles such as the Panther armoured reconnaissance vehicle. The hon. Lady touched on the undoubtedly ambitious FRES armoured fighting vehicle programme, which will modernise the armoured vehicle fleet and be the basis of medium-weight capability.

Ann Winterton: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ingram: I have one minute left. On Galileo, let me just say that it will be a civil system, under civil control. That has been confirmed by successive EU Transport Councils. The UK has emphasised that that should remain the case. In December, as the hon. Lady correctly pointed out, the Transport Council stated that any decision to alter the civil status of Galileo would have to be agreed unanimously by member states under pillar 2 of the EU treaty. That is the constitutional structure under which Galileo exists. It is quite clear that what we have laid down with our NATO partners will protect the integrity of that system. The global positioning system, not Galileo, is currently the basis of NATO operations, and will remain so into the future. Galileo will be a civil system. That has been expressed time and again in the Chamber and elsewhere.

Sugar Beet

4.12 pm

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): It is a great privilege to gain this Adjournment debate to raise the concerns of a large industry and, particularly, of some of my constituents. I am pleased to see the Minister responding, and I know he will engage with a lot of my points. Is he pleased to be here, out of the rough and tumble of the main debate, which has come quite by coincidence?

I have lived in Kidderminster for over 30 years, downwind of a sugar beet factory. Every October we noticed the aroma, which went on without fail until January. To begin with, I thought it was appalling and could not stand it. Towards the end, I began to think it was like roast beef and did not mind it. The factory closed relatively recently, and I talked to some farmers to find out the impact that had had on them. To my surprise, they were not at all fed up that the factory had moved. There were very few job losses, and instead of the labour of loading up their own 14 tonne trailers and taking masses of loads, they were able to use hauliers with 30 tonne lorries, which was much easier. However, as the Minister will know, their worry was the proposals from the European Commission for sugar sector reform.

All parties I have talked to accept that some reforms are necessary. It is the scope, speed and severity of the proposals that alarms people. I will talk first about the local significance, secondly about concerns with the proposals and thirdly about the consequences if the proposals go through as they stand. I shall finish by asking the Minister specific questions.

On the question of local significance, I realise that the west midlands is a relatively small part of the beet-growing picture across the country. I also realise that, in the global picture of agriculture, beet accounts for only about 2 per cent. of the output and about 4 per cent. of the cropped area. Beet growing is therefore not a huge industry or a huge part of the agricultural economy, but in my area alone, the relatively small growers have been the ones who have coped with the sugar beet. Some 20 farms are dependent on sugar beet and average production of only about 1,000 tonnes a year. One of the largest farms grows about 4,900 tonnes a year, and the farmer hopes to yield about 60 tonnes per hectare. He contracts out his machinery to the smaller firms, making the point that the smaller farms are on a very tight rotation and that a third of their land may be used for growing sugar beet.

On the concerns to which I referred, all the people to whom one speaks, whether it is the National Farmers Union, British Sugar, the British Beet Research Organisation or my local farmers, agree that some changes are necessary, but that the proposed changes are not necessary and should not be implemented so rapidly, because one must be fair to the efficient producers in this country and to the growers in other places such as Africa, the Caribbean and the Pacific. Concerns about biodiversity have also been expressed, particularly by English Nature and by the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds.

I shall talk briefly about the concerns of farmers, which are very well known. The first concern relates, of course, to the price cut, which is 25 per cent. for the first two years and 37 per cent. thereafter. The farmer of the largest farm in my area tells me that his growing costs are about £18 per tonne, which is extraordinarily good as the average is between £20 and £25. A 37 per cent. cut would wipe out all profit and immediately make it uneconomic to grow beet, so the price cut is desperate.

On cuts in quota, all point out that the UK grows only about 50 per cent. of our needs. The rest comes from the Caribbean countries and elsewhere. We have a balanced market and are helping the other countries. In contrast, some of the countries in mainland Europe are overproducers, and it seems only fair that the quotas of overproducers should be cut more and sooner than those of our producers.

On compensation, I believe that it is proposed that compensation of 60 per cent. be paid to all farmers, including the non-beet growers, which strikes me as incomprehensible. Compensation of 100 per cent. must be paid, but only to beet growers who are forced out of the market. There is also the problem of the time scale. I understand that radical reforms are not required until July 2006, but the aim is to introduce them by July this year.

I shall move on to the consequences. Many farmers, particularly small ones, will face difficulties. British Sugar will face the difficulty of too many factories, so some factories—including, presumably, the one in the Shropshire in the west midlands—will have to close. That will make it even more difficult for growers to go on growing beet in my part of the country, even if they want to, so choice is removed.

The loss of employment may not be as great as it might be because the factories are relatively low employers as a result of automation, as we discovered when our factory moved from Kidderminster. I believe that in 2002 about 7,200 individuals had contracts with British Sugar to grow beet. Obviously, hauliers and the extra workers needed in the factories during the campaign will be affected.

I turn now to something that I know a little more about. For information on the farming industry, I rely on friends at home and on many of the briefings that I receive. I turn to the natural side of things and to the loss of habitat, particularly the loss of food for the birds. Sugar beet is the ideal break crop. It provides broad-leaf, fairly open cover, particularly in the breeding season. It seems amazing that farmers should say that they welcome good weed growth, but those broad-leaf weeds provide food, seed and cover and the cover goes on late into the year, as does the food supply.

In Worcestershire, unfortunately, we do not see much of the stone curlew—it was last seen in that county in 1996—and we do not get many pink-footed geese, but we still get a few. Those, of course, are the prime species dependent on sugar beet in East Anglia. To me, Worcestershire is the skylark and the lapwing. As a lad, I remember walking in the country, and wherever I walked it seemed that the skylarks took off and soared singing into the sky. Skylarks are now listed by BirdLife International as a species of conservation concern in Europe. Their population has suffered a massive decline, down in Britain by 54 per cent., with a loss of 1.5 million breeding pairs. They are insectivores in the breeding season and vegetarian in winter and they are territorial. I did not know that a pair apparently needs between 2 and 8 hectares. They dislike the winter-sown cereals, but beet is ideal.

Lapwings, too, are in decline. Again, in the days when there were lots of lapwings around, if one was lucky enough to be below them while on a country walk, when they were wheeling and circling above, one could hear the scrunch of their wings. That is what gives them their Latin name of Vanellus, or little fan.

The consequences abroad are even worse. Prices will go down in the Caribbean, and the only place likely to profit is Brazil, which has cheap labour and virgin land. One forecast is that the Brazilian sugar industry has expansion plans to take over 90 million hectares of virgin savannah. I have also read that, by using only 14 per cent. of that land, Brazil could meet the world's entire need for sugar. If sugar production is thrown open without sustainability safeguards, we will be risking the destruction of an amazing habitat, one which I am told is home to 837 species of bird and 14,425 species of three orders of insects alone, including butterflies and moths. The consequences if the proposals go through unchanged are possibly very serious.

I move on to my specific questions. First, I am sure that the Government are taking this challenge seriously. I should like the Minister to confirm that and to tell us about the plans that the Government have to oppose these changes, in so far as they are drastic, severe and rapid, and to modify them into something acceptable to all who agree that some changes are necessary.

Are there alternative crops, including non-food crops, as opposed to winter wheat and winter barley? What crops with the same sort of financial rewards and with equal benefits to biodiversity could replace beet?

I am aware of the questions that the Secretary of State answered last week and looked at the impact study she mentioned from Cambridge university and the Royal Agricultural College. I cannot say that I read every word, because it was a huge tome. It does give alternatives; what can happen with a 25 per cent. cut in quota, with a 25 per cent. cut in price and with a 40 per cent. cut in price. All of those alternatives have pretty awful consequences, particularly for small-scale sugar beet growers.

To conclude, I cannot avoid going back to the skylark, because it is such a treasured feature of the English countryside. The skylark was celebrated by Spenser, George Meredith, A.E. Housman and Shakespeare himself. One of my favourite quotes is from a sonnet written by Shakespeare when he is extremely down in the dumps and thinks of his love:

"Like to the lark at break of day arising

From sullen earth, sings hymns at heaven's gate."

What a picture.

I am appealing not only on behalf of the lark, but on behalf of biodiversity as a whole and on behalf of the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries—which must not be disadvantaged—and our growers at home, particularly mine in Worcestershire, who may have as much of a third of their land under sugar beet.

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) on obtaining the debate and on the well-informed case he made on behalf of his constituents. I have listened carefully.

I hope that I can touch upon some of the points the hon. Gentleman raised in the detail of my reply. I regret that a lot of the detail is still under negotiation, so I cannot give him definitive answers on all of them. He raised issues on biodiversity and I shall touch on those, but there is one point that I want to respond to right away—the issue of Brazil is not in my notes and I do not want to forget.

There has been some misunderstanding about the issue of Brazil. There is no doubt that Brazil is a major and efficient producer of sugar. What people need to understand is that even with the Commission proposals, sugar prices in the EU will still be double the world rate. There will still be tariffs in place, and the only countries that will be exempt will be those African, Caribbean and Pacific countries that have access to the EU. That does not include Brazil. When people talk about Brazil gearing up, that is more speculation than fact, although I do not dispute that it is an extremely efficient grower.

I quite understand the point that the hon. Gentleman made about the importance to his constituents who are sugar beet growers. I have a few growers in my own constituency, in north Lincolnshire, where sugar beet is a major crop. I also share his fondness for sugar factories. There was one in Brigg, which was very important for seasonal employment to many of the rural communities that I represent. The beginning of the campaign was part of the seasons to me. I was very sorry when Brigg closed and production shifted to Newark—a similar case, with similar effects, to the hon. Gentleman's experience.

This is not the first time in recent months that the House has debated sugar sector reform, and I understand the reasons—particularly because the issues are being discussed in the absence of detailed legislative proposals from the European Union. We do not expect to see the detail of those proposals until May or June. That makes it difficult for the Government to give a detailed response at this stage. The honest truth is that we do not know; we have not seen all the details and we have not formulated a detailed response. We shall have to do that in due course.

I also understand the point that the hon. Gentleman made about the time scale, but we believe that the issue needs to be resolved as soon as possible. Farmers and processors need to know exact details, and the implications for their businesses, as soon as possible, so that they can make decisions accordingly.

Sugar beet reform has implications well beyond beet-growing in this country, because it is a complex negotiation, which also takes into account the effect on ACP countries and cane production. I accept that there are also more general economic and environmental implications, as the hon. Gentleman said. Reform also has an impact on trade and development policies and our international obligations, in the World Trade Organisation in particular. We have a difficult balance to reach in relation to the Commission proposals.

I must be honest and say that the current regime is 36 years old; it is seriously out of line with other reformed sectors and remains the most distorting and protectionist element of the entire EU common agricultural policy. I know that people accept that there is a need for reform, because of those factors. EU sugar prices are three times the world level. That is not sustainable and it affects other sectors—particularly food manufacturing and confectionery, which are big exporters. There are many jobs in that sector as well. That is not to say that we underestimate the importance of the reforms and the effect on the growers, but we must recognise that other players are involved. They do not always speak with the same voice; there is not a lot new about that where different sectors are involved.

The pattern of the CAP has been changed by the June 2003 reforms, which we very much welcome. Overall, the CAP reforms benefit the environment. I was very impressed by the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of skylarks; the Latin was particularly interesting. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we recognise the biodiversity issue, but we are attending to that through the CAP reform, cross-compliance measures and expansion of our agri-environment measures. Many of those are geared towards trying to reverse the decline in numbers of farmland birds in particular.

Farmland bird species are one of the Government's indicators of sustainability—we take that seriously—and of quality of life, for the reasons that the hon. Gentleman articulately outlined. I am pleased to tell him that from our latest figures it appears that the downward trend in farmland bird numbers, which has continued for a long time, has stopped. The trend has bottomed out. There appear to be welcome signs of an upward trend, although it is too soon to say. We need to be a bit cautious, but the easing of the downward trend is very welcome, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman welcomes it too.

The reform of the sugar sector should be consistent with the principles that we have already agreed on CAP reform. The hon. Gentleman will know that the European Commission published a communication on sugar in July 2004, which set out the reform principles. The point was made that the existing regime is unsustainable and that early and radical decisions are needed. That, incidentally, was also the view of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, which recently went into the issue of sugar reform and produced a helpful report. It was certainly very thorough and has been of great interest to the Government.

There is consensus that doing nothing is not an option. There must be change and reform. I regret that negotiations have been moving slowly in the EU. That is partly because the EU is awaiting the outcome of an appeal against the findings of a WTO panel on sugar. Incidentally, as those findings stand they reinforce the need for action. However, that is an added complication for the Commission when bringing forward its detailed proposals.

When the proposals are published, the Government will publish our own regulatory impact assessment of their effect on various sectors of the sugar industry, including the effect on sugar beet growers in the west midlands and elsewhere in England, so that we can have some kind of evaluation of that. We will also launch a second full public consultation once the proposals have been published, so that we can get some reaction from the people who are affected. It is important that we recognise the significant implications for UK beet growers.

It is possible that the industry will not continue at its current level, as the hon. Gentleman said. Farmers who receive the single farm payment decoupled from production may choose not to continue to grow sugar beet at all, if other crops appear more profitable. That would be a rational response to market signals, allowing resources to be used to the best effect.

The hon. Gentleman asked about alternative crops. There is a range of alternative crops, and the Government are putting a great deal of funding into research and development: for example, into energy crops and industrial crops. I visited the Central Science Laboratory, where I saw a range of products that had been produced with materials such as flax and hemp. I saw what looked like a denim jacket, which had actually been made from nettle stems. I saw car dashboards and door panels made from hemp. Farmers have some quite interesting potential alternative crops, with new markets and developments. As a Government, we are funding the work, the development and the research into that, which is quite well advanced.

There may well be options, but in the end it is surely better to have a system where farmers are free to make judgments in relation to what they grow, where their markets are and who their customers are, according to the demands of their own priorities, skills and land. That must be the right way forward, and that is the position that we want to be in.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the independent research commissioned from Cambridge university, which looked at the implications for the UK of EU sugar reform. I think that that is helpful, as it gives us an idea of the implications and their extent. We have made that publicly available.

As I have said, we need to take account of all the players in the equation, including the cane refiners, industrial sugar users, consumers, taxpayers and of course the EU's actual and potential suppliers from developing countries, especially the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries, who have been sending cane sugar to the UK for refining for a long time. That is the historical reason why, as the hon. Gentleman rightly states, some EU countries have a much larger quota for sugar beet. Since before we joined the EU, as a country we have always made a large proportion of our market available to Commonwealth countries such as New Zealand and the ACP countries. When we joined the EU, that was recognised and protected so that our traditional links and markets were reflected in our membership. That explains the quota situation.

Our aim remains to achieve liberalising reform in line with what has been agreed in other sectors—a simplified, decoupled, market-based approach that is consistent with our sustainability policies. I am confident that that is in the long-term interest of all concerned, including sugar beet farmers and processors. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Commission is thinking of elements of compensation to reflect the general changes in agriculture, and in sugar beet in particular. We will have to take into account the detail of that when we see the Commission's proposals.

The hon. Gentleman has articulated concerns that are widespread in the sugar beet sector, which I also hear as a constituency MP. I have letters written to try to give my farmers an update on where we are. I regret that I am unable to go into a lot more detail, as I would prefer to do and as the hon. Gentleman deserves, because there is still a range of unknowns in the negotiations and the detail from the Commission. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that, as I said, the sugar beet sector will have the opportunity to comment on the Commission's proposals and the Government's reaction to them, and we will of course listen carefully to its submissions.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nineteen minutes to Five o'clock.

Health and Safety Commission and Executive

[Relevant documents: Fourth Report from the Work and Pensions Committee Session 2003–04 HC 456 I.]

Motion made and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watson.]

2.30 pm

Sir Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): The House owes you a particular vote of thanks, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for having the wisdom to understand that the last time this important subject was down for debate, the distractions in other parts of the House were such that no sensible debate could take place. Thanks to your guidance, we will be able to spend some constructive time this afternoon doing justice to this subject. We are grateful to you for that service.

The Work and Pensions Committee published its report in July 2004 on the work of the Health and Safety Commission and Executive. We had just started to examine the subject, as it had just been transferred and brigaded with the Department for Work and Pensions after the 2001 election. We were anxious to answer the important question of whether the 1974 health and safety framework set up by the Act of that year was still fit for purpose. The answer to that is yes. The House should be reassured by that. Everyone to whom we talked, internationally and throughout the United Kingdom, no matter what side of the employment divide, was clear that subject to some concerns, which we will come to in the course of the debate, the framework and hierarchy within which the public policy was delivered was appropriate and robust. That is worth recording as the main finding of the Committee's work.

There are obviously concerns, and I can see Members in the Chamber, particularly those with trade union backgrounds, who have a great deal of direct experience in this area—much more than I have. No doubt, they will raise their own concerns. The Committee highlighted some areas that deserve further and better attention. They include concerns about resources—rather obviously because that is always a key part of public policy development—target attainment, legislation on corporate killing, which I am sure will feature in the debate, occupational health, and work force consultation. Perhaps one of the bigger but less recognisable problems facing the Health and Safety Executive is the significant challenge to health in future.

Since the publication of the report, the Government have rightly adopted a new policy for reducing working days lost in the civil service. There is a new programme called "Government Setting an Example", and the HSE will have to deal with that. The Government's target is to reduce working days lost by 30 per cent. by 2010, so another layer of responsibility has recently been added to the important work carried out by the HSE.

In the report's conclusions and recommendations, to which I draw hon. Members' attention, the conclusion that deserves the most attention, because it determines how we take policy forward, is about the direction of travel of the HSE: whether its apparently new approach to and emphasis on promoting business cases, developing partnerships and advising and educating, is to be substituted or given more priority at the expense of some of the more tried and tested ways of enforcing compliance through inspection and established procedures in the working environment. It should be helpful if the Department and the Minister helped us to understand whether we are right to be worried about that.

The conclusion that my colleagues came to, which may be old-fashioned and wrong, is that in a situation where resources are unarguably limited, the promotion of untested approaches that emphasise information and guidance in preference to inspection and enforcement flies in the face of the existing evidence. It is an important issue which we will obviously discuss.

The Government's response, which we received in October 2004 was more positive in some areas. Their response on migratory workers, for example, was positive and on procurements some good reinforcing messages were coming from the Department. However, the most disappointing response—which is neither new or unusual—was on resources, about which we were hoping for something better.

Looking around the Chamber, I realise that my colleagues are probably more expert in this area than I am. However, since the 1974 Act was put on the statute book, levels of injury have fallen significantly—the evidence is clear. Furthermore, Great Britain's record compares favourably on an international basis. Great Britain, at 1.7 per 100,000 workers, has the second lowest rate of annual workplace fatalities, which compares to an EU average of 2.8. Some of our European partners, such as Sweden are doing better than we are, but we are doing relatively well and that has to be acknowledged.

Nevertheless, it is slightly sobering to be reminded that there were 235 fatal injuries to workers in the last year for which figures were available—in 2003–04. That was an increase from 2002–03, so there is no reason for complacency. The increase is also true of major injuries. They were up 9 per cent. on the previous year, standing at 30,666 which is quite a lot of pain and misery for a large section of our employed work force. Finally, incidents of self-reported work-related ill health stood at 2.2 million in 2003–04, which accounts in total for 33 million lost working days. These are heavy prices that we are paying in the working environment. It is right that we should be paying attention to them.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury) (Con): I am aware, as the hon. Gentleman is, of the pain and sadness caused by any workplace death and by serious workplace injuries, but there is more to it than that in terms of the economy. As I am sure he will acknowledge, the cost of every death, and in particular the long-term cost of looking after those who are seriously injured, is very important as well.

Sir Archy Kirkwood: That is absolutely right. It is a helpful intervention as it takes me on to my next topic, which is resources. There is a cost-benefit equation. If we are careful and secure the appropriate level of support for inspections and workplace environment safety, we can save a lot of money.

Colleagues will recall that the 2002 spending review set a baseline for resources, which rose in the fiscal years 2003–04 and 2004–05. The figure then fell back to £271 million in 2005–06 and it will remain at that level until 2007–8. It does not take an economist to work out that when rising costs are taken into account, that is a reduction. Some argued to the Committee that that was a significant reduction in actual spending power. In addition, the overall budget settlement that was set out in the 2004 spending review committed the whole Department for Work and Pensions, where the HSE/HSC is now brigaded, to achieve annual efficiencies of at least £960 million by 31 March 2008, and at least half of that saving must be cashable. There was therefore a new pressure resulting from the 2004 comprehensive spending review on top of the one which was announced in 2002.

The fine print of the Treasury's technical notes shows that to live within its own financial settlement, the Department for Work and Pensions will have to make annual savings year on year of 2.8 per cent by the end of March 2008, and the HSE/HSC will have to take its fair share of that unless something different happens.

It was interesting to the Select Committee—we alluded to it in our report—that the August 2004 minutes of the HSC state:

"HSE believed that a 'flat cash' settlement was the most likely outcome".

The HSE was right about that. The minutes go on to state that that would have "a significant effect on HSC/E's spending power, requiring more savings through efficiency gains and some tough decisions on priorities."

One can see that the HSE is well aware that it is under some pressure.

As if that were not enough, there were also the announced staff cuts, which will apply across the Department. A net reduction of 30,000 full-time equivalent posts and the relocation of 4,000 posts out of London and the south-east are to be achieved by 31 March 2008. This part of public policy is being delivered within a tight fiscal envelope.

It is true that the Government made it clear that they were prepared to consider the HSE as a front-line service. We welcome that, as it gives the organisation some protection, and rightly so. The Government response said that they would ensure that HSE/HSC

"has resources to carry out its duties effectively."

We are grateful for that, but there is some scepticism about the ability to achieve some of the Government's targets with the resources that are available. It may be difficult to do that.

One recommendation that attracted more than the usual number of press headlines after the publication of the report was that we should double the field operations directorate in order to do the job properly, and that we would need substantial additional resources during the next three years to be absolutely sure that the work that needs to be done is carried out. We received compelling advice on that point from Prospect and other organisations that know about such things. The truth is that we still do not know exactly what the spending profile will be or what the staff cuts will be for the HSE. It may be too early for the Minister to share information on that.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman is making an excellent presentation of the report on behalf of his colleagues. I wish to make one point before he moves off staffing. The Select Committee's recommendation was to increase the work force. We heard evidence from the trade unions that an increased number of people are now in employment. Does he agree that that reinforces our argument for the need for more inspectors?

Sir Archy Kirkwood: I am grateful to the hon. Lady, who is a distinguished member of the Select Committee. She is right to say that we received powerful and cogent evidence that, even if nothing else happened, an expanding work force required further consideration of such matters and additional resources. Her comment is helpful and takes me to my next short section on targets.

The main targets were identified in 2000 in HSE/HSC's strategy document, "Revitalising Health and Safety". The targets were to run to 2010, and there are interim targets along the way. The three major indicators are all very ambitious: to reduce the incidence rate of fatal and major accidents by 10 per cent. by 2010; to reduce the number of working days lost per 100,000 workers from work-related injury and ill health by 30 per cent. by 2010; and, finally, to reduce the incidence of work-related ill health by 20 per cent. per 100,000 workers by 2010. I do not believe that any members of the Select Committee felt in their heart of hearts, knowing what the HSE/HSC is facing, that there was any realistic prospect of achieving the targets.

If that is the case, it is a serious matter that we must consider carefully. The autumn performance report for the Department for Work and Pensions showed slippage against all three targets in 2004, and there is no clear evidence of progress since the base year. We are right to draw attention to that. In addition, given the scale of the task ahead, including the huge job to do on health and the need to reduce working days lost in the public sector, we began to wonder whether it is not necessary to devote more resources to this important public policy area. It would be extremely helpful if the Minister could give us some idea of the expectations as measured by the Government's official targets.

Although it is important, I shall skim across the next section because other Members have more to contribute to it than I do. It is an important area of omission in the legislative Department because the Committee clearly identified some complacency in how to deal with the legislative commitments that the HSE made in its 2000 document "Revitalising Health and Safety". In that document, it identified the urgent need for higher fines and clear legislation. I will be party political for 27 seconds—that was a manifesto commitment. That is the end of the party political contribution.

It is scandalous that we have not had a draft Bill. The Committee was prepared to spend serious time giving it pre-legislative scrutiny. The Government have promised one on many occasions. Others know more than I about the issue, which, I am sure, will feature later in the debate.

I hope that the same is true of the removal of Crown immunity. The employment community is looking for answers. There is no doubt that, as the evidence confirmed, it is a tricky business that involves dealing with prisons and hospitals. Everyone understands that Crown immunity is not something that one wanders into casually, but how long does it take to get a draft Bill? Even if the draft were rough at the edges, if there were serious people willing to take time considering it in Select Committees to try to find a way through, I hope that the Government would respond positively and quickly.

My penultimate point is about inspections. I am sure that other colleagues will also make this point, and I am repeating what I said. If it is a choice between education and seeking to influence matters in a proactive, anticipatory way, as opposed to formal enforcement activities, there are questions to ask about that choice. There are also questions to ask about how inspectors spend their time—whether they are engaged in proactive activity, anticipating accidents and going in to try to prevent them, or spending their time investigating accidents.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman is making a compelling case on behalf of his Committee. However, as he was talking about inspectors, I bring to his attention the fact that, according to the Public Accounts Committee's report on the 2003–04 Session, there is one inspector for every 3,333 sites in the construction industry. How can an inspector possibly keep a handle on that many sites?

Sir Archy Kirkwood: That is an important question. I do not think that it can be done, but I defer to the hon. Gentleman's greater experience in the area. I am grateful for his support. I hope that we will be able to pursue some of those matters and get evidence to illuminate that question from the first-hand experience of hon. Members, which is one of the key questions of the afternoon.

At present, we are able to investigate only a small proportion of incidents. The best figures that we could find were that 11.4 per cent. of major injuries were investigated. Of course, all fatalities are investigated, as is right and proper. The HSE investigated 5.6 per cent. of all incidents that are due to be reported under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1995—RIDDOR, for the cognoscenti. That is also a small percentage. Finally, 6.4 per cent. of work places in the jurisdiction of the field operations directorate were inspected. That confirms and reinforces the intervention. We must be careful that we are covering the territory to the length and depth that we think it needs.

The Committee came strongly to the view that inspection backed by enforcement was the most effective approach in motivating duty holders to comply with their responsibilities under health and safety law. Therefore, we recommend to the HSE that it should not proceed with the proposal that we think it is working on, which would shift resources from inspection and enforcement to fund an increase in education, information and advice. We have evidence that that is under consideration. If resources for inspection are scarce, they should be spent in the tried and tested way.

I shall address an issue that is not covered at length in the report but adverted to in passing. Since the publication of the report, we have had a chance to consider the Hampton review more closely. Colleagues will remember that the review was announced by the Chancellor in the 2004 Budget, and Philip Hampton was asked to consider with businesses and regulators, and in consultation with the Better Regulation Task Force, the scope for promoting more efficient approaches to regulatory inspection and enforcement while continuing to deliver excellent regulatory outcomes. In the interim report of that review, which was published with the pre-Budget report papers on 2 December 2004, I found the following worrying sentence:

> "Activity in the regulatory system has been skewed towards inspection rather than advice and compliance; regulations have been applied inconsistently both between different regulators and between individual inspectors; the cumulative burden of paperwork has been disproportionately burdensome on small business; different regulators have had difficulty joining their systems and operations; and the penalty regime has been cumbersome with few positive incentives for compliance."

In response, Philip Hampton has presented some policy solutions for consultations, including a number of suggestions that possibly contradict some of our recommendations. The first proposal is to ensure that in future no inspections take place without a good reason. To be fair to Mr. Hampton, it has to be said that he is dealing with the generality of the regulatory world, only a part of which is looked after by the HSE and HSC. However, if that proposal were rigorously and unthinkingly applied to HSE and HSC territory, I would be deeply concerned because it would clearly indicate a different approach to the suggestions in the Committee's report. We expressed concern about the low level of investigation of accidents and proactive inspections for reasons that I will explain.

Philip Hampton's second proposal was to concentrate more on advice than inspection outside high-risk areas. We must recognise that the world is now focused on a lighter-touch regulatory burden, and I am as in favour of that as anybody. However, we must be careful, and I hope that the Minister can reassure us that this approach will not be used as a front behind which significant changes can be made subliminally to the future tactics and direction of the HSE.

The Government have generally responded positively to Philip Hampton's work, and the Prime Minister seems to be committed to ensuring that that agenda is driven through. The Centre for Corporate Accountability expressed concern that the prime source of information for the Hampton review was conversations with employers, and it argued that it would be fair to talk to the work force before any final conclusions and decisions were made. We need reassurance that if the Philip Hampton agenda is gaining currency and momentum, employees and trade unions will be fully consulted before it is brought to bear on this important area of public policy.

A couple of terrible accidents occurred during the course of the inquiry—for example the fire in the Glasgow plastics factory in May. Such accidents bring the point home to us that unfortunately this area of policy gets attention only when there are disasters. It is a crucial area of direct importance to anyone with an interest in the work force environment in the United Kingdom. Emerging risks such as stress, smoke-related illness and road traffic accidents all need urgent attention. It is not a subject that can be tackled adequately on the cheap. I hope that the Select Committee report has made a positive contribution to the consideration of future debate, and I look forward to this debate and the Minister's response.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the next speaker, can I help hon. Members? It is important that the Minister be given adequate time to respond to the debate. She has told me that she would like at least 15 minutes to respond. I hope that hon. Members will bear that in mind when making their contributions. Similarly, I ask the Front Bench spokesman of the Liberal Democrat party and of Her Majesty's Opposition to bear that in mind. At least six Members have indicated to Mr. Speaker or me that they wish to contribute to the debate, so again I hope that Members will be disciplined.

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, Maryhill) (Lab): I wish to place on record my congratulations to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood) and his Committee on this timely and thorough report. As many hon. Members will be aware, sadly, on the day that the Committee was taking evidence from Scottish witnesses—11 May 2004—the dreadful explosion at the Stockline plastics factory in my constituency took place. It was the worst industrial accident in Scotland since the Piper Alpha disaster almost 20 years ago. A four-storey building built more than 100 years ago was reduced to a pile of rubble within a couple of minutes. Nine people lost their lives—two of them parents of infant children—and 40 people were injured, many seriously. Some lost limbs and some suffered serious head and spine injuries. All the workers, even those who managed to walk out, suffered from severe shock as their workplace was thrown into darkness and chaos.

The explosion occurred not on a stand-alone site on an industrial estate, but close to the city centre of Glasgow, immediately next to a shopping arcade and almost within touching distance of blocks of flats. Some of the injured included local people who were walking on the street. To some extent, perhaps we were fortunate that debris did not blow out any further from the site, as that would have greatly increased the number of injuries to the many people who were walking about—the explosion occurred at lunch time—or driving past in their cars and to local residents who were in the shops.

I want to put on record again today my sympathies for the bereaved and injured, who are still recovering from that dreadful incident, which will stay with them for the rest of their lives. I also want to take this opportunity to praise again the magnificent response at that dark time from the local community, who were unstinting in their generosity, and from members of the emergency services, who were drawn from all parts of the United Kingdom and showed great professionalism and skill. The additional investment over the past few years in new specialist recovery equipment and training was undoubtedly a key reason why the final fatality total was not much higher. The emergency services' remarkable and relentless efforts to recover the victims at that difficult time was a real source of comfort.

However, after the initial shock, questions inevitably begin to be asked. It would not be appropriate today to discuss the cause of the explosion, as the investigation is still ongoing, but we hope that some answers will come in the next few months. I acknowledge that my right hon. Friend the Minister had a private meeting with workers and their families in November last year. I know that they very much appreciated not only the opportunity to speak to her directly but the obvious concern that she expressed.

It is vital that there is a full and exhaustive inquiry into the factors behind the incident. I welcome the approach of the procurator fiscal's office in Glasgow—it is conducting the inquiry in conjunction with the Health and Safety Executive—and its efforts to keep families and workers up to date with developments. I also commend the response of the Scottish Trades Union Congress in setting up a support group at an early stage to ensure that the voice of workers and their families is properly heard in what will inevitably be a long legal process, especially as none of the workers were members of a trade union at the time of the incident.

The Stockline workers and their families are entitled to full answers. They deserve no less, and I will press for the fullest of inquiries. It should not be acceptable that people can go to their work in the morning and end up in a pile of debris a few hours later. However, on the basis of the Committee's report I want to raise a number of more general issues that have arisen as a consequence of that dreadful event which I hope the Government will consider when determining changes in policy.

The health and safety record in Scotland is much more mixed than that of the United Kingdom as a whole. The numbers of both fatal accidents and major injuries in Scotland have increased over the past few years against an overall decline in the UK. In 1999–2000, there were 40 work-related fatalities in Scotland, but in 2002–03 there were 46. Over the same period, the number of major injuries jumped from 2,695 to 2,796. Also of concern is the fact that the number of convictions dropped over the period, with 125 in 1999–2000 but only 94 in 2002–03.

Wide disparities between Scotland and the rest of the UK are identified by the Centre for Corporate Accountability. Scotland is the worst performing of the seven regional offices, with the midlands ranked first. The centre points out that only 26 per cent. of deaths in Scotland resulted in prosecution, compared with 46 per cent. in the midlands. Those differences are marked and as we approach the point at which 50 per cent. of the targets under the revitalisation strategy should have been reached, it is clear that Scotland is unlikely to meet those outcomes. That could indicate the unwillingness of a significant proportion of Scottish employers to endorse the strategy. It may also mean, as argued by the Scottish Trades Union Congress, that they are more willing to take the risk of not fulfilling their legal obligations in the absence of adequate deterrents or the reduced likelihood of being prosecuted.

I do not believe that this is an issue for which blame can be laid on HSE inspectors. The report highlights the evidence from a number of different organisations of the severe pressures that they currently face, to which the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire referred. I also recognise that in raising prosecutions in Scotland, there is the additional burden of showing corroborative evidence. There is also the disappointingly low level of fines imposed by Scottish judges compared with our English colleagues. An average of only £20,000 as a fine for a fatality in Scotland certainly does not assist the work of the HSE.

Accordingly I urge my right hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that the particular challenges that are evident in the Scottish statistics are given specific attention. It is important that there is a universally agreed strategy and better co-operation between the HSE, the Scottish Executive, the Crown Office and local authorities to increase standards, and that sufficient resources are made available to ensure swift progress. Such a strategy should identify not only how to spread good practice but how to provide employers with training, especially in the small and medium-sized enterprise sector. That needs to be backed up by a targeted increase in enforcement practices. Sadly, there will always be a minority of rogue employers who will take a chance on their health and safety requirements on the basis that it will save them money and that the chances of being caught or being caught and having to face an onerous penalty are slim—so why not take the risk?

Just as with any other form of criminal activity, the rate of detection and appropriate penalties are the only effective deterrents for such employers. When assessing risk priorities there can be a danger of concentrating only on those areas that have been the subject of either intensive lobbying or are based on an assessment of recent court judgments. Those indicators have validity, but they may omit areas of work or types of workplace which on a completely objective assessment also pose a high risk of personal injury and death. The status of plastics factories in the current assessment would appear to me to fall in the latter category.

The plastics industry is characterised by many SMEs scattered throughout our towns, cities and industrial estates. Many of them are non-unionised workplaces. Employees frequently work with highly toxic chemicals and high levels of dust deposits. Very simple failings can lead to a major explosion if risks in the workplace are not properly understood, so the need for a strict regulatory environment would appear to be self-evident.

I was concerned to note that, at the time of the explosion, the chief executive of the HSE in Scotland, Mr. Stewart Campbell, was quoted in the Sunday Herald on 22 May as saying:

"The HSE sets itself a list of priorities identifying business sectors it currently deems as dangerous such as agriculture, construction and the health service. The plastics industry is not a priority. The types of injuries the HSE prioritises include falls, slips, trips and stress."

That raises the question why the plastics industry was not a priority, but falls and slips were. Was that decision based on the number of reported incidents over, for example, the past five to 10 years rather than on a scientific assessment of risk? The fact that there have been no major incidents over a period does not mean that there is not a risk. We need only look at recent flooding incidents in this country to show that risk does not necessarily manifest itself at regular intervals.

In 2002–03, there were two major plastics factory explosions in the USA, which killed 13 people and injured more than 50. Although the HSE issued new guidelines as a result of those incidents, it did not change their priority status. Can my right hon. Friend advise me today why not and why, in her correspondence to me, she accepts that some processes in the production of plastics are of potentially high hazard? Can she advise me how information on the new guidelines was disseminated throughout the industry and, given the high number of non-unionised workplaces, how extensively her Department believes the information has reached both employers and employees in the relevant factories? Will she say whether she is prepared urgently to reconsider the priorities of the HSE in light of those matters?

The Committee's report rightly highlights the apparent lack of consultation with employees in non-unionised workplaces. The TUC points to a number of recent academic studies that show much higher injury rates where there is no union presence—a difference as high as 24 to 50 per cent. I understand that in 2003 the HSE ran a number of pilots in which trade union-appointed worker safety advisors went into non-unionised organisations. The report on those pilots showed a promising record. More than 75 per cent. of employers said that they had made changes as a result and almost 70 per cent. of workers had seen an increase in their awareness of health and safety issues. Obviously, I would argue that joining a trade union is an excellent way to increase safety at work, but I also welcome the Committee's recommendation that the HSE publish proposals to develop improved rights to consultation for employees.

The Government's challenge fund is a worthwhile initiative, but, frankly, it will not be used by rogue employers and at the current level of funding it will reach only a very small proportion of small businesses during the next three years. Lack of union involvement appears on objective scientific analysis to be an important risk factor. It deserves to be treated as such and to be tackled with appropriate statutory regulation, rather than on just a voluntary basis which will continue to fail to pick up the worst offenders.

Finally, I would like to say a few words on the report's comments on a Bill covering culpable manslaughter—in Scotland, that is referred to as culpable homicide. I very much welcome the fact that since the report was issued, the Government have undertaken to issue a draft Bill and that in Scotland the Scottish Executive have announced similar proposals for consideration. However, I urge both Administrations to reconsider the absence of any new offences on individual directors, as I believe that that would be a major weakness in our attempts to strengthen the law.

In Canadian law, which was radically reformed in 2003, a party to an offence—for example, a company director—can be prosecuted as an individual if they aid and abet the offence. The Canadian example also provides for a wide range of penalties rather than merely fines, and extends the liability to injuries as well as deaths. Any future proposals should fully consider penalties such as corporate probation, prohibition of business activities associated with the offending, dissolution for particularly serious and repeat offending, and equity fines that reduce the value of shares, thus preventing the cost of large fines from being passed on to consumers and the smaller client firms of the company concerned.

We have achieved a great deal since the 1974 legislation was introduced, but none of us are under any illusion about the task that we face to ensure that every employee can benefit from a safe workplace. I again congratulate the Committee on a well thought out report and urge the Government to ensure that any future changes in legislation and policy are focused on the most vulnerable groups and that we do not lessen the enforcement culture in a manner that encourages rogue employers to operate at will.

3.11 pm

Mr. Stephen Hepburn (Jarrow) (Lab): This is an important debate. I want to concentrate on the issue of directors' responsibility—I have a private Member's Bill on that coming up for debate in the not-too-distant future. This is also a chance to raise the issue of Mr. Tom King, an elderly gentleman who lives in my constituency and who lost his only son in a disastrous oil rig accident in Scotland some years ago. Despite going down every channel and following every path that he could, he has never been able to get justice for himself and his family following the tragic death of his son.

I welcome one of the key recommendations in the report: to place legally binding health and safety duties on directors. I was most upset and sad that the Government rejected that without any real consideration. Instead, they insist on continuing to rely on a combination of existing law, which was great in its time and is good today but needs to be strengthened, and a voluntary code of practice, without the strength of law behind it, which is no good whatever. One worker or member of the general public is killed in workplace and work-related accidents every day of the year. The Health and Safety Executive, which is no left-wing think-tank, and the trade union movement have turned round and said that two thirds of the deaths that occurred in 2003-04 could have been avoided had directors taken on proper responsibilities for health and safety in the workplace.

Let us look at the voluntary code of conduct, which does not have any legal backing, and what is happening in actual fact in the workplace. First, the code of conduct says that directors should assume responsibility for health and safety. That is ideal, but what is happening in the workplace? One third of large companies are ignoring the code of conduct altogether on that issue. Secondly, the code of conduct says that company boards should nominate a director specifically responsible for health and safety. Two thirds of large companies have not done that. Thirdly, company boards are asked to discuss—merely discuss—the welfare of their workers and the health and safety issues of their work force at their normal boardroom meetings. More than half do not even bother to do that.

The facts show that, without the full backing of the law, the voluntary code of conduct is not worth the paper it is written on. There are no incentives for directors to participate in the voluntary code and there is no punishment if they ignore or breach it. At the end of the day, not only are the workers who are creating the profits for those companies putting themselves in peril, but good companies are being affected detrimentally because they are participating in the code of conduct and bad companies are ignoring it altogether. That is why I praise the Work and Pensions Committee—the Chairman, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood), gave a very good account of its work at the beginning of the debate—which has called for responsibilities to be placed within the boardroom. I agree, which is why I will shortly introduce my private Member's Bill.

I will take your guidance and be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I would like the Minister to address a number of points. We must remember that every day that goes by and every day that there is a delay in introducing corporate responsibility in the boardroom, another worker or member of the public dies. What would the Minister say to people who have been bereaved and who have to face the fact that their loved ones went out to work one morning and did not come back at night? How do we explain to those people that we are not introducing a proper law of corporate manslaughter?

Why should we rely on a voluntary code for health and safety when the full force of the law is brought down on directors on matters of company financing? It is absolute nonsense that a company director can get away with murder through negligence when a worker is killed, but is locked up for years if he is caught fiddling the books. How, morally, do we explain that nonsense to the working people of this country? I do not think that we can.

Why should we have to rely on a voluntary code when, owing to the very good work of my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan), there are quite rightly legally binding regulations for other aspects of industry, such as for gangmasters and in the security sector? What is the argument? How can they have those regulations, yet they are not good enough for other workers who, on many occasions, are just as much at risk of being killed in the workplace?

I ask the Minister to reconsider her rejection of the Work and Pensions Committee's proposals. I know that legislation will come along, which has been referred to today, but without legally binding responsibilities on directors, that legislation will be as useless as what we have now. We will never be able to pin anyone down, which is why so few prosecutions of directors and people in positions of responsibility take place. I urge her to reconsider that, and I urge the Government to support my private Member's Bill when it comes before Parliament to ensure not only the safety of workers in the workplace, but to put responsibility where it should lie: with the fat cats in the boardroom.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the next speaker, I say to the hon. Gentleman who has just concluded his speech that the occupant of the Chair is addressed as Mr. Deputy Speaker. Although I am very happy to be called Mr. Winterton, I received a knighthood under this Labour Government, and I am very grateful to them for that.

3.17 pm

David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): I do not know whether to address you as Sir Deputy Speaker now, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

First, I pay tribute to the Chairman of the Work and Pensions Committee. He diligently presided over many of the Committee meetings and if it were not for his impartial politics—he does not really involve himself in politics—he would not have run the Committee as efficiently and effectively as he did, and his report reflects that.

I welcome the Government's response in relation to the report in part. I am pleased that they have accepted some, if not most, of the issues that were put forward in our recommendations. The Committee covered a substantial amount of work through the visits and the evidence sessions. I believe that the conclusions and recommendations are pretty accurate, based on the evidence that we received.

During our evidence sessions, the Committee was mindful of the Scottish dimension. It is important to recognise that the Scottish Trades Union Congress is independent of the TUC. Many people do not realise that; indeed, it is older than the TUC. It is important to recognise, however, as my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Ann McKechin) stated, that it is not just a question of the Scottish dimension in that sense. The Scottish legal framework is entirely different, and the administration of health and safety is carried out in a different way, too.

We took evidence in my beloved Midlothian constituency. It was the first time that the Select Committee had visited Midlothian, and it was well-recognised for doing so. I pay tribute to my colleagues for doing that. We took evidence from the Scottish Hazards Campaign, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, the GMB, the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians and the Construction Confederation, representing 75 per cent. of the industry. I shall return to that because it is an important part of the process.

While in Midlothian, the Committee visited the building site of the new Royal Bank of Scotland world headquarters on the outskirts of Edinburgh. The main contractor, a firm called Mace, set up the structure and organisation by putting trust and respect at the top of the agenda. I shall concentrate on the building industry because I was well aware that some of my colleagues on the Committee were widening its scope quite substantially. A number of lawyers serve on the Committee, so I can imagine what direction they will be coming from. As I said, I shall concentrate on the building industry, because I believe that that is one area in which we can make a fundamental change for good. In my trade union days, I happened to be one of those unfortunate people who had to go to people's houses to tell them that they had lost a loved one—in one case, a son. That is what drives me on the question of how best we can improve health and safety at the cutting edge. The issue is not only about fatalities, but about the long-term stress, injury and suffering that people experience following accidents.

The building site that we went to has 1,000 people on it; it will have 3,000 when work is completed. The site was more like a good factory than a building site; I have never seen a building site like it before. The safety record was exemplary. It was proved beyond doubt that a willingness by management to work with UCATT was an essential ingredient in delivering the health and safety programme. Here was a work force for whom absenteeism and sickness were virtually non-existent. Regular meetings took place between the contractor and UCATT, ensuring that safety precautions were a priority. The canteen facilities were excellent—we should remember that this is on a building site. They had televisions continually putting the health and safety message across. The key ingredients were the right working environment, a winning culture, in which everyone can succeed, a healthy work force, strength in training, the development of core and transferable skills—a very important area in industry—communication of success and reward for achievement.

Let us contrast that with what happens elsewhere throughout the UK. We received evidence that even when health and safety inspectors gave notice of their coming on to a site, telling the management the day and time of their visit, management representatives still did not comply with the legislation. UCATT general secretary Alan Ritchie gave evidence relating to what happened in 2003. The HSE did a blitz throughout the Glasgow area, and despite the fact that everyone was told in advance of the visits to the sites, 70 were issued with prohibition notices after the visits and 94 per cent. were issued with improvement notices. I emphasise that that was after the health and safety inspectors had told them that they were coming, including the day and the time. That shows how most employers treat health and safety: they treat it with contempt because the penalties are not appropriate. This is an important area that Ministers must address. How much longer is society willing to allow building workers to leave their home and go to work in the knowledge that they are working in what is possibly one of the most dangerous industries in Britain, and that they might not come back?

A major contributor to accidents is the lack of site training. I see the HSE as the last resort. The biggest benefit that the Government could provide is a relationship between employer and employee whereby that work is done on site, because that will be the factor that reduces the number of accidents. If we have to depend on the HSE—which would be ill equipped even if it was fully equipped—that would be as a response to an accident, rather than being on the scene before an accident.

What I am saying is especially true of subcontractors and those who are self-employed. A substantial number of people who do not have English as their first language now work on sites. That is a new dimension to some of the major problems that we face. One example concerns the Scottish Parliament building. When it was being built and inspectors arrived on site, a number of the contractors did not understand the signage that they were looking at, never mind the rules and regulations. That is a good example of a public building for which we were not demanding certain standards.

We must encourage the construction industry and all who are employed in it to start working in a relationship of trust. How do we achieve that? The answer is to give the management and the work force a high-calibre workplace; to invest in time, resources and people at all levels; to have strong communications that allow the sharing of knowledge; to have safe and productive working conditions; and to have a well planned logistics strategy.

That is the policy of a company called Mace. It also works with a safety league table for all its contractors. I think that there were some 60 contractors at any given time on the site. A league table of safety figures was produced every week, and if someone was at the bottom of that league, the major contractor pulled them in to find out what was going on. It was important that that incentive was there.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend accept that the Government have a procurement role? They should ensure that the major contractor follows the health and safety procedures, and the major contractor should ensure that the subcontractors do likewise.

Mr. Hamilton: I was going to come to my hon. Friend's point later, but I will do so now.

The Construction Confederation's evidence stated that 40 per cent. of nearly all contracts in the UK were with the public sector—Government, local authorities, Parliaments or Assemblies—but health and safety is not part of the assessment of best value when the contract is agreed. If we do not get that right we cannot talk in financial terms about best value, as a company that has bad accident rate statistics could be taken on. The confederation proposed a list system of registered companies, and those on that list should be the only ones that can tender for the contracts.

Under European legislation, foreign companies can now bid for public contracts but they are not required to have the health and safety standards that we have in this country. For example, in Spain, safety standards in the construction industry are somewhat lower than they are here. The Government can lead by discussing the matter with the unions and with the Construction Confederation, which represents 75 per cent. of the industry. They could have their own penalties for taking people off the list if they did not comply with some of the standards agreed by the unions.

I return to the issue of the Royal Bank of Scotland site. One misconception is that contractors try to break the regulations and do things on the cheap; this site will come in before target and under budget, but it has high standards. I have been to the site several times and talked to the director, and what has been gained is a high attendance record and the value of job sharing and flexible working. There are computer sets on the site, and employees can gather information and knowledge for when they go to the next site. That translates itself into better working conditions and indeed better responses to the company. That is seen as a long-term investment, which is important.

Some employers and employees see the unions on construction sites as a threat when it comes to health and safety issues, when they should be seen as an asset in preventing accidents. As I said, I worked in the coal mining industry for 20 years, when health and safety was at the top of the tree in every discussion with the National Coal Board. The benefit was that the board was national and publicly owned, which meant that the profit motive was not the key issue. Profit is extremely important; we all tried to make a profit for the industry and the company, or the colliery where we worked, but every week, the unions would assist management in ensuring that health and safety was uppermost in everyone's mind. It was not uncommon for management to dismiss or discipline employees and the union, which was part of that disciplinary process, would not support a member who broke regulations that put other people in danger. That was accepted in the industry.

When I left school at 15 years of age and went into the coal mining industry we had to buy our own health and safety equipment. Hon. Members can imagine my shock when I first met building workers to find that that practice still exists. Many construction companies deduct the cost of a worker's helmet, gloves and boots from their first wage packet. We must address that issue because that shows clearly that such companies are not interested in health and safety issues.

The report of the HSE found that union-organised workplaces were up to 50 per cent. safer than those in a non-unionised area. Many companies, especially small-to-medium-sized firms, value the trade unions' input in terms of understanding what their responsibilities are. When I was young in Midlothian, there were 12 companies that employed 1,000 people; there are now 1,000 companies in Midlothian employing fewer than 12 people. They are not union-organised, nor are they work force-organised. Those employers often know every individual in the company; indeed, in many instances they are personal friends. Many of those small companies are fighting to survive, and health and safety issues are not their priority. It is fortuitous and good that the trade union movement has said that we should be examining the possibility of roving health and safety representatives, who would go round the various areas, not with a negative agenda, but to assist many such companies.

The Construction Confederation said in Midlothian that there had been a pilot scheme in the midlands in 2004, through the confederation, with roving representatives who went round 30 small and medium-sized enterprises, looking to see how they could assist. I would be interested to know whether the Minister has any information on that scheme. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill indicated that she was aware of that pilot scheme. I would like to know whether a report on it is available.

Many small companies that have fewer than 21 employees have indicated that they would benefit greatly from the roving commissioners. Greater enforcement of health and safety legislation would expose the minority of companies which flout it because they think that they will not get caught. Even when they do get caught, they consider that the benefits that they gain by not accepting the health and safety legislation compensate for the slap on the wrist.

I agree with my hon. Friends who said that there should be a tightening of the corporate manslaughter Bill. I am disappointed that it has had to be delayed again, after the Select Committee appointed three people to consider it. I hope that that Bill will be implemented, because it will be a major development in ensuring that employers take a serious position on health and safety issues.

The Construction Confederation representatives said that they felt quite bitter about the Government imposing certain regulations on them, while at the same time not assisting the industry in doing what it could to ensure that only those who complied with health and safety legislation should be on tender lists. I support the confederation's position on that matter. It is not a question of hammering employers; I support all good employers. The industry, by its nature, will continue to be dangerous. The Government should try to ensure that when a man or a woman leaves their home in the morning, they will return breathing, and with every limb intact. We can do much to ensure that. I congratulate the Chair and members of the Work and Pensions Committee on coming up with recommendations which, I believe, can achieve some of our goals

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): For the record, I state that I am a member of the National Union of Mineworkers, that my constituency is sponsored by the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians, and that I chair the all-party group on occupational safety and health, which is sponsored by the Trades Union Congress and the British Safety Industry Federation.

I congratulate the Committee on a first-class and comprehensive report. It illustrates the structure of the Health and Safety Commission and the Health and Safety Executive and shows that, within the framework of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974, they have facilitated major improvements over the past 30 years.

I fully support the Committee's recommendation 15, at paragraph 142, which concludes that the evidence shows that it is in ensuring that employers comply with their health and safety duties.

"inspection, backed by enforcement, that is most effective"

My hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (David Hamilton) referred earlier to his experience in the mining industry. He will be aware that the Robens report of 1972 was the report from which the 1974 Act evolved. Lord Robens had finished his 10-year stint in the mining industry and was aware of the important part that lay safety representatives played in making British collieries the safest in the world. He used that experience in the recommendations that he made and that were taken up in the 1974 Act.

In my contribution, I want to refer to two sections of the report: first, section 8, which deals with the changing world of work, in relation to which I want to make reference to the construction industry and the NHS; and secondly, section 16, in particular, recommendation 33, about which I want to say a little bit about occupational health support.

It is clear to everyone that the world of work has changed dramatically in the past two or three decades. We have seen much more outsourcing and the introduction of agency workers, and those changes present greater challenges for health and safety. Greater outsourcing has undermined the safety culture in some industries. We saw that in the accidents that occurred on the railways when the focus was on outsourcing. It is good to see that much of the work on the railways that was outsourced has been taken back in-house.

The construction industry in particular is fragmented because of the way in which it is organised. The sub-contracting culture has fragmented it and makes health and safety difficult to control. A recent study commissioned by the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians showed that problem quite clearly. The study concentrated on false self-employment. It is the only industry in the UK where the self-employed have their tax deducted at source, and the report made recommendations that the Treasury has taken up. I understand that a pilot study may be introduced to consider the way in which one defines work status in the construction industry. Things are beginning to move, but I note that in last autumn's Building Worker, the paper produced by UCATT, the outgoing general secretary, George Brumwell, who was also a health and safety commissioner, said that he was still concerned about what is happening in the building industry. He said that "although the number of fatal accidents has remained roughly the same"— about 70 a year—

"there has been a 35 per cent. increase in fatalities amongst the self-employed."

We need to concentrate our efforts there. There is a way forward, through enforcement and partnership, and I suggest to the Minister that we need a round table with the unions, their solicitors, the solicitors for employers and, in particular, the British insurance industry.

We must reach an understanding whereby sub-contractors on building sites have to sign up to the overall health and safety policy of the main contractor. That policy should be vetted by the Health and Safety Executive. The sub-contractor should be encouraged to sign up to it and offer training to its workers by virtue of reductions in their employment liability contributions, to be agreed by the insurance industry. If we concentrated in that way, using enforcement as well, we could start to get to grips with the accident rate in construction.

David Hamilton: Would my hon. Friend agree that, as a by-product of his proposal, the Treasury would gain more money? Many of those bogus self-employed people are regulating themselves, therefore their wages are not being calculated. Financial fraud is being committed by many of those bogus workers.

Mr. Clapham: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The report produced by UCATT suggested that the

[Mr. Clapham]

Treasury is missing out on between £1.5 billion and £2 billion. By defining employment status properly for application, the Treasury would benefit.

Another industry where we have seen enormous changes is the NHS. We see agencies working within the NHS and one of the main causes of injury is needlestick injuries. It is estimated that there are up to 100,000 such injuries each year, and they cause great anxiety because there is always the potential of transmitting a blood-borne disease, such as HIV or hepatitis B or C. Last year, the union Unison suggested that 80 per cent. of such injuries could be avoided by the introduction of a safer needle policy. There are needles that retract and needles that can be capped.

I suggest to my right hon. Friend the Minister that she should have a word with her colleagues at the Department of Health, who some time ago promised to issue guidelines for the whole of the NHS. Those guidelines have not yet gone down the line, but they are required. Some hospitals have a strict needlestick policy, such as my own district hospital in Barnsley. That hospital is leading the field in its safer needle strategy, and the Royal College of Nursing has referred to it as an example. There is a lot to be done to encourage hospitals to adopt a safer needles policy and to spend extra on buying in needles that are safe.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Before my hon. Friend leaves the NHS, is he aware that in recorded injuries—in contradistinction to those that are not recorded—the worse sector in this country in which to work is the NHS? In terms of recorded injuries, it is actually worse than the construction industry, although there are many more serious injuries in construction that do not get recorded. Does he agree with me that it is shocking that the vast majority of nurses, who have the highest rate of needlestick injury and back injuries, are employed by the Government? The Government are responsible for the sector that has the worst record of reported injuries in the country.

Mr. Clapham: My hon. Friend's intervention was pertinent. I hope that the Minister will take it on board and pass it on to her colleagues at the Department of Health.

An occupational health service is extremely important. I have referred to the changing world of work. The number of people now covered by an occupational health service is less than it used to be. When the large industries, such as British Coal and British Steel, were producing their labour forces were covered by their occupational health service. In the coal mines, for example, the specialists employed were doctors. Many collieries had a doctor who visited regularly. Some collieries had a doctor based at the medical centre. All that has gone and many of the workers in the new, smaller industries are not covered by an occupational health service. It is important that that point is addressed, as it was by the Committee, which referred to the NHS taking on that core job of providing an occupational health service. That could be done, but I urge caution as well. It is not just a matter of providing the service, but of ensuring that research and longitudinal studies are done.

In the British coal mining industry, for example, our occupational service was second to none, yet communities were let down because no longitudinal studies were done. During the 1960s and 1970s, and into the 1980s, tens of thousands of men left the industry with respiratory diseases each year. The cause always went down as smoking. Had those studies been done, they would have shown clearly that the dust was an issue. There had been great technological developments in mining, such as improvements to the cutting of coal, but they were not complemented by technological developments in dust suppression. Indeed, as a result of much of the technology there was more dust. We can now see the result: the Government are taking on the largest compensation claim that has ever been accepted anywhere—for chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, which will, it is estimated, cost the Government £7 billion. So it is important that research in the field of occupational health is continued.

Asbestos is another issue on which we need to ensure a universal approach to providing treatment. The latest study suggests that, between 2000 and 2050, there are likely to be 186,000 deaths as a result of cancers caused by exposure to asbestos. That is a terrible legacy, but one that we can do little about. There is something that we can do, which is ensure that the Department of Health provides a treatment and care strategy for those who have developed cancers because of exposure to asbestos. I hope that the Minister will take up that point with her colleagues at the Department of Health, because it is important that we put in place a strategy that will provide not only treatment but care for the victims of asbestos exposure. The legacy is inevitable—we will not be able to avoid it. However, a treatment and health strategy would be a great help to the victims.

In conclusion, the report identifies what, to my mind, is required to make the 30-year-old Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 more relevant to today's industry. The recommendations that it makes would robustly strengthen protection for workers.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): I also congratulate the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood) on his Committee's report, which is excellent. I will give one qualification to that, which picks up where my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) left off. It is that, in an excellent document of 100 pages, there are only 10 pages on occupational health. That shows the balance that, unfortunately, we always face on occupational health. However, the damage done to the health of our nation by preventable issues about health—as opposed to safety—in the workplace, means that there are enormous dividends to be gained by society in general and by individuals who would not have their health ruined by focusing on occupational health.

My hon. Friend is absolutely right to look back at the scandals of the past, such as asbestos. The asbestos industry knew very well what the dangers of that mineral were and what challenges it posed to those who work with it and their families and communities. The fact that the industry was so cavalier in its refusal to face up to its responsibilities is indicative of our potential asbestos inheritance—many thousands of people will be affected by asbestos in future and it will cost the public an enormous amount. The incredible thing is that almost all of that was easily preventable at the time.

It is worth dwelling on what is perhaps a past issue, although its consequences are still with us, in case we risk taking the same cavalier attitude to other aspects of the world of work. We are not carrying out longitudinal studies, as my hon. Friend urged, to examine for example the impact of the use of new chemicals and procedures in the workplace, which pose challenges to the health of those involved. We need a massively better and more sophisticated health régime in the world of work. One thing that we could give as a gift to the future, which would be comparable to the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 and the private Member's Bill proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Hepburn), would be a framework for occupational health to take us way beyond anything that we have considered before.

I strongly advise my right hon. Friend the Minister that the national health service should not be seen as a repository for occupational health. It is best to tackle that in the workplace rather than tackling its consequences in hospitals and surgeries. We have to move away from the idea of dealing with occupational illness and take a much more proactive view of occupational health. That costs money, and the HSE and others will need to be properly resourced to undertake the task.

Mr. Rendel: I hope to catch your eye, Mr Deputy Speaker, and talk in more detail later, but one of the risks that the hon. Gentleman may want to consider in talking about preventing long-term risks is smoking—not least passive smoking—at work.

Tony Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. The Committee makes strong reference to passive smoking and that debate will almost certainly move into the mainstream political agenda in the near future. Although there may be different views, there is a consensus on the increasing need for limitations on the automaticity of the right to smoke and therefore to pollute the environment of others. That is important because of the prevalence of smoking in society, but it is only an example of the activities that we must begin to re-examine in the modern world. The cavalier view taken in the past of individual or employer rights cannot be sustained, and we must re-examine it.

I now turn to the more traditional debate about the safety culture. Disappointingly, the advances that came from the 1974 Act, and the culture and regime that it established, have not delivered what they could have. That has been for a number of reasons including under-resourcing, which has been a feature over the years. The Committee was right to point out that the HSE is not yet adequately resourced to do the job that we want it to.

One thing that we can take as an axiomatic is that there should be no party politics in health and safety. Cutting costs around health and safety can never be legitimate. Many good employers deplore the fact that they end up in competition with employers who erode the cost base and effectively compete by putting the lives and safety of their employees at risk. That cannot be acceptable in modern Britain, so I hope that the debate on health and safety will be cross-party.

A number of my hon. Friends have already made the point that we ought to be saying that bad employers who are so cavalier are criminals—no other language provides a proper description. Those who put the safety of the work force at risk are criminals. When it is by neglect, it is criminal; when it is by knowledge and near-design, it is even more intolerable. That is why I strongly support the private Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow.

As hon. Members have said, the time is long overdue for the Government to introduce legislation. My right hon. Friend the Minister has not been in the post long enough to take responsibility for those delays, so I hope that she will take that criticism gently for herself, but as a legitimate criticism of the slow pace of Government.

It is regrettable that the Government have behaved in this way. I know that one reason given for the long time that it has taken to bring matters to a conclusion has been the lobbying by the permanent secretaries in different Ministries, who have been concerned that they would be liable to prosecution if Departments were found to be negligent in their own stewardship of health and safety. It is not acceptable to have special pleading from the mandarins, however dear to our hearts they are. They should end up in the dock just like any other employer, if they fail in their duties to their employees. As my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (David Hamilton) said, that should apply to Members of Parliament too, if necessary. If we are bad employers, individuals could suffer the consequences.

The importance of the Bill proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow is that it sets out a clear and simple way to determine liability and responsibility. It is not good enough to say that companies take on responsibility: named individuals must know what their rights and duties are. There is always a good defence in law. Many legal experts have told me over the years that it is easy to put into any Bill a legitimate defence that a director took proper and adequate steps to create a framework that provided proper and adequate safety for the work force. If accidents happen within that framework, the named directors have an adequate defence. But it is intolerable that, when things go terribly wrong, no one person ends up in court.

Over the years there have been terrible accidents of international fame in this country—the Herald of Free Enterprise, Piper Alpha and King's Cross. I could go through a whole list. Hundreds and hundreds of people have had their lives taken away by the casualness of others, but not one person has ever ended up in court, facing charges as an individual. If they had, it could have led to them being sent to prison and given the exemplary penalties that we would expect to see if someone drove recklessly in a motor car or behaved recklessly in any other way. How can we say that to cook the books is a serious criminal offence, but to kill a colleague or an employee is of much less consequence? That cannot be right in the type of society that we want.

I am conscious that others want to speak in the debate, so I shall conclude. I believe that the HSE does a good job but, as my right hon. Friend the Minister knows, from time to time I have criticised what it does. My criticisms are not of the quality of its work at the operational end, but I have concerns about the direction and strategy adopted by its most senior management. Some of those criticisms have been voiced in the report and some in today's debate.

One thing that we want to do in our society is make sure that every employer knows that the good employer is not put at risk by health and safety legislation, but the bad employer stands a good chance of being found out and will then suffer the consequences directly and immediately. We expect to find that exemplary system of penalties in every other walk of life; we should expect the same when it comes to the safety of people at work.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): Although I am not a member of the Work and Pensions Committee—one lives in hope—I am a proud member of the Transport and General Workers Union which, together with the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians—UCATT—has long campaigned for safety in the workplace and, more important, for responsibility in the boardroom. If we are to achieve those two goals, legally binding health and safety duties should be placed on company directors.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Hepburn) on his private Member's Bill on directors' duties, which lie at the heart of the Work and Pensions Committee report. He certainly was a tower of strength to me when he assisted with my Gangmasters (Licensing) Bill. I am deeply appreciative of that.

I am concerned not just about the Government's commitment to my hon. Friend's private Member's Bill, but about the commitment of the Opposition parties as well. I hope that they will demonstrate commitment to the Bill and ensure that it gets on to the legislative programme.

Another major area that I am concerned about is the announcement just this week that the trade union learning fund, which does a great deal to help shop stewards and health and safety representatives educate their members and colleagues in the workplace, will be cut should a Conservative Government come to power. I ask the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) to use his good influence with his party's Front Bench Members and ask them to reconsider their position.

As I said, my contribution will be about the role of company directors. I shall pose questions that I believe need answers and outline the current position.

Do company directors have a role to play in ensuring workplace health and safety? I have to say from the outset that no individuals in a company are more important to ensuring safety in the workplace than directors. Company directors have the power to decide the level of resources that the company puts into health and safety, the extent to which managers in their companies prioritise health and safety, whether their company is subject to proper health and safety audits, whether it is proactive in identifying unsafe practices, and how those practices can be changed.

Do company directors have explicit legally binding health and safety duties under the law as it stands? Unfortunately, they do not. Under current company law, directors have no explicit statutory duties to ensure that their company complies with health and safety law. Instead, all the principal duties under health and safety law are placed on employers—that is, on the companies.

Does placing health and safety duties on a company mean that those duties are placed on the company's directors? Again, regrettably, I have to say no. Placing legally binding duties on a company does not place legally binding duties on its directors. A company's legal identity is separate from the directors who manage it, and duties placed on the company do not require individual directors to take any particular action in respect of health and safety.

Are there legally binding health and safety duties on other individuals? Fortunately, there are. Although the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 places no explicit duties on directors, it does impose statutory health and safety obligations on the self-employed, on employees and even on members of the public under sections 3, 7 and 8 respectively.

Mr. Love: While my hon. Friend is on that issue, would he agree that the fines that can be imposed under the 1974 Act are, frankly, derisory and that there is no such thing as a custodial sentence? The flagrant lack of commitment to the obligations of the Act are undermining health and safety, which is not appropriate in this day and age.

Jim Sheridan: My hon. Friend makes a perfectly valid point, which goes to the heart of the problem. He also has a proud history as a member of the TGWU and as someone who has dealt with health and safety issues. He is absolutely right. The current fining system is derisory. It does nothing to help health and safety in the workplace. Perhaps if serious charges were brought against directors, it would concentrate the minds of those responsible for health and safety. That is long overdue.

Are other legally binding duties placed upon company directors? As has been mentioned, the law imposes statutory financial duties on company directors which, if breached, can result in jail terms of up to seven years. For example, directors have legal duties and can face criminal prosecution for failing to pay tax on time, VAT and national insurance.

Again the Work and Pensions Committee supports legally binding directors' duties on health and safety. In its July 2004 report, "The work of the Health and Safety Commission and Executive", the Committee called on the Government to introduce statutory health and safety duties on company directors. It concluded:

> "The imposition of legally binding duties on directors would increase the likelihood of directors taking ownership of health and safety problems, positively impact on the current levels of preventable work-place death and injury and create more of a level playing field between those directors who take their health and safety responsibilities seriously and those who do not."

That goes back to the point that my hon. Friend made earlier about responsibility for health and safety.

Do the Government support legally binding directors' duties on health and safety? To our shame the answer is no. In their October 2004 response to the Work and Pensions Select Committee report the government stated:

"The government believes that there is already an appropriate balance of legislative and voluntarist responsibilities on directors for occupational health and safety, and has no immediate plans to legislate as recommended."

The Government have now asked the Health and Safety Commission to undertake further evaluation to assess the effectiveness and progress of the current legislative and voluntary measures, and to report its findings and recommendations by December 2005.

Have the Government changed their position on legally binding directors' duties on health and safety? Yes. Their rejection of the Work and Pensions Select Committee recommendation that directors' duties be introduced marks a complete U-turn in Government policy. In their June 2000 strategy statement on health and safety, "Revitalising Health and Safety", the Government not only instructed the Health and Safety Commission to draw up voluntary guidance, but pledged themselves to introducing legally binding health and safety duties for company directors saying:

"It is the intention of Ministers when Parliamentary time allows, to introduce legislation on these matters."

I would welcome the Minister's response to that.

Is the voluntarist approach working? As some of my colleagues have already said, the answer unfortunately is no. Domestic and international research submitted to the Work and Pensions Select Committee clearly shows that companies identify statutory regulation, rather than voluntary codes, as the most important factor for motivating positive health and safety performance. Research commissioned by the HSE into the effectiveness of the HSC voluntary code has shown that since it was introduced the boards of directors of one third of large firms have not assumed any responsibility for ensuring their companies operate safely; two thirds of company boards have no specifically appointed health and safety director; and only 40 per cent. of boards discuss health and safety on a regular basis.

Will the Government's promised draft Bills on corporate manslaughter and company law introduce statutory directors' duties? Unfortunately, the answer is no. In the Queen's Speech, on 23 November 2004, the Government announced their intention to publish a draft Corporate Manslaughter Bill and a draft Company Law Reform Bill. However, they stated that neither Bill will introduce directors' duties on health and safety. I find that unacceptable.

Finally, is there an economic case for legally binding directors' duties? It has to be said, yes. Figures from the HSC for 2003–04 show that more than 3 million people suffered from work-related ill health and more than 38 million working days were lost due to workplace injuries and work-related ill health. Legally binding directors' duties would therefore ensure effective management of health and safety risk which in turn would help increase the productivity of the work force by reducing incidents of workplace illness and injury. It would also improve the company's reputation in the eyes of workers, customers, competitors, suppliers, other stakeholders and the wider community. In addition, it would minimise the likelihood of prosecution and consequent penalties and create a level playing field between the law-abiding companies which adhere to the current voluntary guidance and unscrupulous companies that ignore it.

In conclusion, if all parties in the House are keen to demonstrate that they want to improve health and safety, I genuinely believe that they have an ideal opportunity with a private Member's Bill which stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow. I would sincerely hope that not only the Government but all Opposition parties do everything that they can to support it.

4.11 pm

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): My first proper job was as a trade union official in the 1970s, in which I trained other trade union officials in health and safety, among other issues. I thereafter became a solicitor, specialising in cases of industrial accidents and working with victims on obtaining compensation. I have therefore been professionally involved in this area for some 30 years. I remain a consultant to my law firm although I am not taking any cases. Thirty years after the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 it seems to me appropriate that the Work and Pensions Committee should conduct a review of its operation and what has happened since.

There are so many issues raised in our report that it is very difficult to decide which ones to focus on. It is a matter only of regret that there are no Opposition Back Benchers, save for the Chairman of our Select Committee, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood), to participate in this debate and to hear the excellent contributions of Labour Members.

The world of work has changed dramatically since 1974 and the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act. There are now far fewer people in heavy industry and more working in offices. If one compares 2004 with 1978—the earliest figures that I could find—one finds that some 47 per cent. fewer people work in manufacturing and construction, but 44 per cent. more work in the service industries. More than 1 million people work from home and 2.2 million people use their home as a base. A job for life, which used to be the norm, has been replaced by agency, part-time and, increasingly, migrant workers. But those old hazards are still around.

We have heard graphically from my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (David Hamilton) about the problems in the construction industry. I draw attention to paragraph 137 of our report, where that point is brought home. There it is shown that, despite warnings given to employers on three separate occasions, a month, a fortnight and a day before inspections were to take place, when a blitz was carried out, 444 sites were visited, 259 improvement and prohibition notices were issued and there were 10 prosecutions. That shows how little interest there is in health and safety on most construction sites. However, having visited the site referred to by my hon. Friend, I know that it does not have to be that way.

Some old hazards are still very much ignored, and I shall refer later to the problems of road accidents, which are linked to work. We can now see the consequences of the then-emerging risks of 30 and 40 years ago—of asbestos and the terrible disease of mesothelioma about which we heard earlier; of noise deafness; of vibration white finger; and of various occupational cancers. Had those risks been taken into account 30 or 40 years ago, they might have been avoided and those terrible illnesses prevented. New hazards are now emerging, and I question whether we are liable to fail to address them, just as we failed when those of 30 or 40 years ago were storing trouble for the future.

Our report refers to passive smoking. Some 1,000 deaths a year are attributable to passive smoking and I am pleased that the Government seem now to be taking the issue seriously. However, there is very little progress on the question of stress. In 2003–04, nearly 13 million working days were lost through stress. For every 100,000 workers, there are 56,000 lost working days. During our inquiry we saw very little evidence that stress is taken seriously by the HSE, or by local authorities, whose job it is to enforce the law where stress is most likely to arise—in offices and in the national health service. We heard evidence that there had been only one prosecution ever for offences giving rise to stress. The setting of targets, to which the Chairman of the Committee referred at the start of the debate, shows that there has been very little progress, and it does not inspire confidence in the proposed change of approach.

Kevin Curran, the general secretary of my union, the GMB, told the Committee—in paragraph 110 of our report—that the HSE had been slow to respond to the question of migrant workers. He said:

> "The problem I have is if you look at the agency's policy document to 2010 it does not mention migrant workers, it has not got a policy for them. I find that quite incredible."

So do I, and so did the Committee.

Migrant workers face many barriers. There is a language barrier. Warning signs, particularly on construction sites, may be utterly incomprehensible to migrant workers, and health and safety instruction and training may be given only in English—a language that may not be understood by those on construction sites. There are cultural barriers, too. We heard that, for example, the crane hand-signals given on construction sites differ throughout Europe, and serious accidents could happen. We heard also that migrant workers fear what might happen to them if they make a complaint—that they might get the sack or not receive the protection that the law affords. We saw a lack of enforcement, and a lack of knowledge of the problems of migrant workers. Such problems lead to the circumstances of the cockle pickers in Morecambe bay. Even now, we have little idea of the scale of the problem of gangmasters—a problem that the Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) was designed to tackle.

As chairman of the all-party Chinese in Britain group, I have heard much evidence about how people from that community are exploited not only at Morecambe bay, but throughout the country. There is some good practice, but it has not been generalised, and there is an urgent need for research and a targeted strategy to deal with the problem. In paragraph 111 of our report, we call for urgent research to improve the understanding of the occupational health and safety risks to migrant workers, in order to work out a targeted strategy to manage those risks. I am pleased to say that the Government responded by stating that they share our concern, and that there was to be an interim report to the HSC in December last year. So far, however, as far as I am aware, it has not been made available to the Committee. I hope that the Minister can report on its progress.

Work-related road safety is an old hazard, but there is now much greater awareness of it. We have white van man speeding to meet unachievable delivery targets and having an accident, and the sales rep falling asleep at the wheel of his Mondeo, because of the impossible distances that his company has asked him to cover. The statistics, referred to in paragraph 218, are staggering. The HSE reckons that there are approximately 860 to 1,130 work-related fatal accidents a year on the roads, compared with only 226 accidents in the traditional workplace. It estimates the number of serious injuries due to work-related road traffic incidents to be between 8,980 and 11,870 a year—a staggering statistic.

Those figures are estimates, and we do not know the accurate figures, because it is not a HSE priority. It leaves the matter to the police, but the police look at an accident after it has happened to try to work out why it occurred. They look only at driver error or mechanical defects; rarely do they go back to the employer to decide whether the employer's system or maintenance programme was at fault. It all ultimately comes back to the driver. Similarly, far too many health and safety offences in the outside world come back to the individual employee. They are blamed when it is often the employer's fault.

The reason why we do not know the figures is that there is no obligation under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1995 to report such accidents to the HSE, which is the very least we should expect. I was pleased that when the Minister gave evidence to the Committee, she agreed to take that issue back to her Department. Perhaps she will tell us whether she now agrees that something should be done. The HSE must have the resources to do the job properly, and at-work road accidents must be treated as accidents at work, which is what they are. There should, at the very least, be an approved code of practice to help people to decide how such accidents should be considered and dealt with.

We have heard a lot today about inspection and enforcement, and I do not want to say a great deal about that, save that the Committee was far from convinced about the change of emphasis that the HSE proposes—moving away from inspection and enforcement as its primary tool. There is no doubt that the HSE needs more resources to do the job. Having said that, I did some research for today's debate, and it is fair to point out that compared with 1977 we have about 250—or thereabouts—more inspectors. I find that rather surprising, because we all think that there are fewer than in the old days. That is good, but it is clear from our report, particularly when considering occupational health, that inadequate resources are devoted to the HSE. I am pleased to say that, in their response, the Government recognised that the HSE is a front-line service, so I hope that it will escape the depredations of the Treasury when it looks for the cuts proposed in the Gershon review to the staffing of the DWP's resources.

What we say in paragraph 142 is absolutely correct:

"The evidence supports the view that it is inspection, backed by enforcement, that is most effective in motivating duty holders to comply with the responsibilities under health and safety law. We therefore recommend that the HSE should not proceed with the proposal to shift resources".

We have already heard quite a bit about inadequate penalties, and we refer to that in paragraph 179:

"The average fine per case fell from £11,141 in 2001/02 to £8,828 in 2002/03. in fact, there has been no substantial change in the general level of fines since the Court of Appeal said they were too low in November 1998."

The HSE points out that large company health and safety fines are only a 10th of the general level of financial services fines for larger companies. It is a disgrace that the courts and the law take fraud and financial services offences more seriously than offences that kill, injure and maim.

It is important to look at the question of innovative penalties. We heard some examples of that earlier. The chief executive of the HSE, Bill Callaghan, gave us some examples, and it is not beyond the wit of man to devise penalties that would fit the crime, as the Mikado would say, much more effectively than the arrangements currently available.

I am concerned about the lack of urgency in the Government's response. Private Members' Bills have been promoted, but they have not got anywhere because of objections and the fact that they were blocked by Conservative Members on—as usual—a Friday. That has happened on two separate occasions. The Government have said that they will introduce proposals, but we have seen very little sign of them so far. They were not in the Queen's Speech, and they will clearly not be introduced this side of the election. We were told that there would be a revised policy statement on enforcement, including innovative penalties, by September 2007. That is simply not good enough.

If the Government cannot find the money and resources or are not willing to put the effort into taking action, perhaps we should look at privatising health and safety. Who better for the privatisation than the trade unions? They have magnificent experience in the health and safety sphere through the system of safety representatives and committees. We are in a time of private finance initiatives and public-private partnerships, so perhaps the Government should contract out more of their health and safety activities to the trade union movement, which would do the job effectively. Of course, the biggest shift in health and safety was the creation of the health and safety representative system in 1977 and the committees in 1978. It may have been a sea change in the way in which health and safety was approached in the workplace, but almost 30 years later, the system has flaws in it that badly need to be addressed.

First and foremost is the fact that the regulations are simply not enforced by the HSE. In January 2000, we were told that HSE inspectors had served just one improvement notice under the 1977 regulations in 22 years. There were no prosecutions at all. There have been a few enforcement notices under the consultation regulations, and three under the safety committee regulations.

From my 30 years' experience of practising in this area, I would say that there are significant shortcomings, particularly concerning the question of the right of inspection of every workplace. I used to do work for the Fire Brigades Union, and it was not allowed to inspect places where exercises were to take place offsite, despite the fact that they would be made dangerous to catch the firefighters out. That is not a good way of embarking on training, and safety reps ought to have had the right to inspect. We wanted to challenge that; we were told that we were not allowed to take the matter to court because we needed the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions, which was not forthcoming. It has never been forthcoming on any request from the trade union movement to enforce the regulations.

Unions must have the power to inspect the workplace, wherever people are at work. There should also be a duty on employers to respond to recommendations from the safety representatives. At the moment, employers have no obligation to say what they believe, or whether they are likely to reject or agree to recommendations from safety reps, and they certainly have no obligation to give reasons. That cannot be right, but ultimately, if the Government are not going to enforce the law, the trade union reps ought to be able to do so.

In 1998 the Law Commission recommended that the requirement for the consent of the DPP to a private prosecution should be abolished. That has still not happened, but it must. Of course, there have to be protections so that if a prosecution brought on a private basis fails, the trade union should face the costs consequences. That would be a useful check and balance in the process. However, simply not to allow prosecutions at all, when the HSE manifestly fails to bring them, is wrong. On the same basis, there ought to be a right for safety reps to issue improvement and prohibition notices—again, subject to the right of appeal to the employment tribunal and, to costs sanctions in the event of that right being used improperly.

The Government do not agree with any of that. They say in their report that that would not lead to improved standards, or create the correct balance. In fact, they think that it would affect the balance of rights between the safety rep and his members, which I find extraordinary. They say that it would "undermine the relationship with employees"

—bizarre—and that it would have "an adverse impact with the employer."

Those are all fallacious arguments. If the safety representatives had more power, as they did in 1977, we would see a significant improvement in the relationship and in the increasing emphasis given to health and safety in that company.

Those arguments are the same as those put forward in the early 1970s when the question of giving safety reps powers arose in the first place, and they have been proved to be false since then by what has been achieved by the safety representative movement. If those arguments were false then, they remain false now, and we call for additional powers. If the Government will not do the job, let the unions do it.

We have heard a great deal about directors' duties and I agree with what has been said. We have to ensure that those who hold the purse strings are held to account for the failures of their companies, and that must include the Crown. As was pointed out earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris), the biggest offender in the area of health and safety is the NHS. It is bizarre that the Government will not hold themselves to account. The Government have previously given commitments that they will change the law to remove Crown immunity, but we see little prospect of change in that direction.

I conclude my remarks by coming to our most important recommendations, which refer to the need to reform the law on corporate manslaughter. I have been campaigning for that for almost 20 years, ever since I represented the victims and the families of those who were killed in the King's Cross fire. I sat through a 93-day public inquiry, and I was horrified by what I heard, and equally horrified that no action whatever was taken against anyone responsible for that terrible tragedy. Since that time I have dealt with many other bereaved families, and with those injured in small accidents at work, in appalling circumstances, and in big tragedies such as the Zeebrugge ferry disaster and many others, and on every occasion, no one was brought to book. That cannot be right.

We made a manifesto commitment to introduce such a law. I do not know how many times I have raised the matter in the House—in written questions, oral questions, a ten-minute Bill, and by tabling amendments to the Criminal Justice Bill. I have lost count of the number of assurances that the Government have given me that they will deal with the issue. Those assurances have come from the Prime Minister down; I raised the matter in Prime Minister's questions almost two years ago. So far, we have seen nothing. We were promised a Bill before Christmas the year before last, and before Christmas last year. Again, the Bill has been put on ice. Where is it? Will we see a draft Bill before the general election? Many of us doubt that.

We already know that the Bill will be watered down and that it will not hold individual directors to account. I find that bizarre. If individual directors can be held personally to account for serious offences under the Companies Act 1985, why can they not be held individually to account if their companies kill somebody? That has already been ruled out. I understand that the Government might be getting a bit concerned about Crown immunity again. If nobody individually—a Minister or a head of a Government agency—can be held to account, what is the problem?

It is not a question of the penalties in terms of fines. As part of the penalties, the courts ought to be able effectively to issue an improvement or prohibition notice, but backed, unlike in employment tribunals, with the sanction of contempt of court if it is not carried out. That would be a very tough sanction and it is something that we ought to consider.

I hope that the Minister can satisfy the Chamber that the Government are taking the issue seriously, and can give us a clear timetable for when this long overdue measure will be put before the House. It will almost certainly not be passed before the election, but let us at least see the colour of the Government's money. It is not as though there are any objections in principle throughout the country. The Confederation of British Industry agrees with the measure, the Institute of Directors agrees with it and the trade union movement agrees with it. The only people who do not seem to agree with it are one or two Ministers who are concerned that their Departments may end up with egg on their face if they kill somebody. Well, if they kill somebody, it is all the more important that they should be held to account. However, the law would not be about prosecuting people; its purpose would be prevention. It is intended to get companies, Government agencies and so on to take their responsibilities seriously.

Throughout, we found that a problem was that health and safety in this country is not taken anywhere nearly as seriously as it should be. That is the thrust of our report. The Government must respond positively with new laws and the resources that we need, and industry must respond positively in its approach. We must do much more to ensure that when people go to work, they come home safely in the evening.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury) (LD): I am delighted to have a chance to participate in the debate, although I am not and never have been a member of the Committee. I am aware that many of those who have spoken have a great deal more expertise, knowledge and experience than I possess in relation to this matter. It has been interesting and elucidating to listen to much of the debate and to hear many of the points made by those who have that level of experience.

I am here not least to welcome the report. Although it is probably more than my life is worth to say anything else given that my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood) is sitting beside me, I would have said that in any case because it contains a great many excellent recommendations. Perhaps one of the few sad things about the report is that the Government's reaction to it does not seem to be as favourable as it might have been. In particular, they do not seem keen to put in the resources that the report says may be necessary to meet all its recommendations, and that follows a year or two's lack of progress on health and safety.

The statistics seem, if anything, to be going backwards rather than forwards. It is, therefore, perhaps not a good moment for the Government to start considering taking resources away from the HSE, at least in real terms. That point is particularly valid following my hon. Friend's response to my intervention. He pointed out that there is probably a good case for saying that extra resources put into health and safety, and therefore perhaps into the HSE, could well be cost-effective in terms of the savings to society of the costs that would otherwise accrue as a result of further deaths and injuries in the workplace. It seems a short-sighted policy on the Government's part to consider cutting back resources rather than increasing them.

In general terms, one of the great problems with health and safety is the lack of awareness of it, which was alluded to a moment ago. It is well known in the Army that sentry duty is boring. One of the difficulties that the Army often has is trying to ensure that its sentries stay awake. Indeed, one of the greatest crimes that a soldier can commit is to fall asleep while on sentry duty. It is a similar situation for us. In a sense, we are all sentries while at work. We should all be on the lookout for that rare occurrence of real danger—that unexpected moment when an employee puts themselves or one of their colleagues in danger by either doing something or failing to do something. It is easy to take health and safety for granted and assume that, because things have been relatively stable in the recent past and there have not been any great excitements, that will always continue. It is therefore easy to forget to be on one's guard about health and safety issues all the time.

There are a number of ways in which the tedium and boredom of trying to make sure that one is always aware of health and safety issues can be overcome. One is positive incentives. Many years ago, I worked in the oil industry for some years. That industry must be very careful about health and safety because, as has been mentioned in a number of examples, when things go wrong in the oil industry, they can go catastrophically wrong. A large number of deaths can occur at once because of, for example, a refinery fire, a fire on board a North sea oil rig or a tanker going aground, as happened in my company while I was working for it, with disastrous ecological consequences. So it is an industry that is careful about health and safety.

One of the ways in which the company tried to make us aware of the issues was to give us positive incentives for a period in which there had been no time-loss injuries. I am happy to say that, as a result of that incentive, I still have a timer that means that the lights in my house go on at a certain hour if I am away on holiday. I hope that that prevents people from burgling me, because it means that they think that I am still at home. I value that timer. The incentives brought home the importance of health and safety to all employees in the company.

Tony Lloyd: I am curious about whether the hon. Gentleman thinks that it is a good idea to advertise the fact that he has his lights go on while he is on holiday?

Mr. Rendel: I am happy to advertise that nobody will know whether the light is going on because I am there or because I am not there. That is, of course, the point. However, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for taking such an interest in the good care of my property and my home.

The second way in which we can be sure that employees are aware of health and safety matters is by the use of inspectorates. That is where the HSE comes in. It can be of value in two ways. First, in considering whether the procedures are going wrong and need to be changed and, secondly, in looking for things that have not been noticed and have not gone wrong, but where there may be gaps on which further work could be done to avoid unconsidered future risks, which are often the ones that cause danger. Of course, inspections also spread good practice from one company to another. If we did not have a body such as the HSE that went round looking at all sorts of workplaces, there would be much less chance that good practice would spread from one workplace to another.

The third way of raising awareness of health and safety is through fear of prosecution. That has been talked about a lot in reference to the Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Hepburn). On behalf of my party, I am happy to say that we support the Bill and would like to see it in place. I cannot guarantee that all 55 members of my party will be there to support it in person. It would be nice to think that we could all make it on the relevant Friday, but sadly plenty of things are on at the moment, as hon. Members will be aware, and it may be difficult to get all of us there. However, I hope that some of us will be there to support it in person. It is welcome. It is a strange anomaly that the people who have ultimate responsibility for running our workplaces are freed from any danger of being prosecuted for doing something silly or for omitting to do something sensible, which is equally dangerous, in the place for which they have responsibility.

I want to mention two important aspects of the issue. The first concerns migrant workers. One or two hon. Members touched on that subject, but it deserves to be brought more prominently to the Chamber's attention. Migrant workers are likely to suffer extra difficulties, partly because they are a vulnerable group. Why are they vulnerable? First, they may have difficulty knowing what our health and safety laws are, and many of them, coming from abroad, may not be familiar with the language. That makes it more difficult for them to be sure that they can obtain their rights and that their workplaces are safe. Secondly, a number of them may not be here legally, which makes it difficult for them to complain if they see problems at their workplaces which may lead to extra danger. Thirdly, many of them are in comparatively low-paid work and in businesses where the profit margins are comparatively low. The people running them may not be willing to spend much extra money on ensuring that their employees are safe. I hope that the HSE will pay special attention to their needs. So I welcome in particular the Committee's call for more research to be done into the extra danger that they may face and the difficulty that they may have in ensuring that their workplaces are, as far as possible, free from risk.

The second issue, which I mentioned in an intervention, relates to passive smoking and the risk that it poses to those in work and the difficulty of avoiding it. Following the problem that British industry and its insurers have had with asbestos, and the amount of money that the insurers have had to pay out because of the problems suffered by those who have worked with asbestos, it is incredible that British industry is apparently so unwilling to see the risks to their employees caused by smoking.

If I were a director of a major British company and I knew what I know now about the dangers of passive smoking, which have been pretty widely publicised over the years—indeed, the dangers of smoking at all have been widely publicised, but companies have an obvious responsibility for the dangers of passive smoking—and I thought that a Bill like that of the hon. Member for Jarrow might be introduced which would make me responsible for failure to take account of the dangers to my employees and would make me potentially liable for that in 10 or 20 years' time, when people began to sue the company because they had suffered as a result of having passively smoked the smoke from the cigarettes of their fellow employees, I would be really worried that I could be sued for failing to take account of passive smoking and failing to exclude it from the workplace for which I was responsible.

[Mr. Rendel]

I hope that soon the insurers of British companies will ensure that company directors take that risk on board and stop it happening. If they do not, the insurers themselves will risk having to make huge payouts, much along the lines of the asbestos payouts. Not all companies have faced the problem of asbestos, although most of us will probably find asbestos somewhere in the building in which we have worked. I have no doubt that there is asbestos somewhere in this building, for that matter.

It is important for company directors to take that on board. The best way for our country to avoid the dangers of smoking and passive smoking is to prevent people from smoking in the first instance. My good friend Trevor Brown, who I have no doubt is known to my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, will not forgive me if I did not make that point, because there is no question that only one or two cigarettes can, in some cases, lead people to become addicted. The best way to stop people smoking is to stop them taking it up in the first place.

A ban on smoking in the workplace and in public places seems to be on its way and is bound to happen. I hope that the Government will introduce a ban on smoking in public places in the fairly near future, but certainly it is up to those in charge of workplaces to introduce such a ban as soon as possible. If they do not, they are letting themselves and their insurers in for a huge problem. A ban is one of the best and quickest ways to improve health and safety at work and to reduce the financial risk faced by companies and the people who run them. I hope that the Minister will give us some positive words on that.

4.45 pm

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I, too, very much welcome the Select Committee report, the magisterial way in which it was presented by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood) and the serious and well-informed contributions that have been made today. If some of us came to learn more, we will have done so on this occasion.

It would be proper for me to begin by declaring an interest. We all have interests as Members of Parliament as employers of parliamentary staff. It has been right to remind ourselves of that in the debate. I also have a small interest as an agricultural employer, and have spent a good bit of my own time in manual work alongside my own staff at various times. I have a relatively close knowledge of agri-chemicals and pesticides and have seen hugely beneficial developments in that industry over my lifetime. They are not simple products. It is easy to get, if not acute reactions, dermatitis or other occupational exposures. However, people are much more careful than they were. The protective equipment is better and universally used. The targeting of the dose in terms of third-party exposure is much better than it was. That is to be welcomed particularly as, along with the construction industry, agriculture is one of the most dangerous industries.

It is an example of a growing improvement—not always in a straight line and not always assured—in standards of health and safety over the years. For that, quite rightly, the HSC and the HSE can claim a good deal of the credit. They are in my view a force for good and not a force for evil. I should like to make that very clear and respond to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire that we should, as far as we can, make these issues non-partisan. I will return to that in one or two contexts later on.

To say that we are doing quite well is not in any sense to condone complacency. There are things that we could do better. Some occupational areas and geographical areas, as the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Ann McKechin) pointed out in her powerful contribution, are not doing as well as they should. We should therefore pay them proper attention. I have some personal interest in this matter over a number of years. I participated in the all-party group on occupational safety and health and I have taken an interest in the entirely fortunate relocation of the ministerial responsibilities for the HSC and the HSE under the Department for Work and Pensions. That is the right place to put them. I also make no secret of the fact that I have worked quite closely with the TUC as well as with people in industry on this issue. I have been happy to do that. I am involved in one of the specific initiatives that has been involved with latex allergy arising out of NHS exposures, in the main.

We should at least start from the basis of trying to ascertain what we can do together. I welcome many of the recommendations in the report, although not all of them. I probably find myself in the middle between the Select Committee and the Government. In certain cases I am not sure whether I am more sceptical than the Government. The HSE should develop its own strategy and strategic thinking. It has been generous with its time to brief me on what it is thinking. We need the right level of objectivity throughout and we need to consider what we can improve and what is practically helpful.

I can assure the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Hepburn) that we will consider the two pieces of proposed legislation objectively. We will give him a fair answer at the appropriate time as he makes his case.

As far as possible, I approach such issues by trying to align the moral case—we do not want people to be killed in the workplace, and nor do most employers, although the way in which they interpret their obligations will vary—with the business case, which is that it is foolish to damage one's work force and better to ensure business continuity and the use of employees' skills. I have a reservation about that. We tend to put employers into one of two polarised categories: the good and the bad. In the middle are many people who are not malicious but who are probably ignorant, careless and not sure what to do. Transferring them to the good category is at least as important as ensuring that the bad guys are punished. I am not suggesting that the bad guys should not be punished—of course they should.

It is clear from the tone of the Government's response to the Select Committee that they also have some reservations about the report, specifically—I share this reservation—the proposal to double the inspection effort on conventional lines. It would be attractive to do that, but it may be unrealistic at a time when all the parties are looking for economy in Government spending. It may well be that more expertise is needed in certain industrial sectors. Reference has already been made to the huge transformations in industry in recent years, and the report refers to the fact that there is still a strong concentration on high-risk industries—for example, chemicals or nuclear industries—which one can understand, but perhaps we need to be a little more sensitive now that more people are working in offices or at home.

I share the Government's wish for cost efficiency. We must try to get the greatest possible productivity out of people who have high expertise and who generally work effectively as health and safety inspectors or advisers.

I also wish to enter a slight reservation about the function of litigation. Not much has been said about civil litigation. I do not seek in any sense to attack law firms that are represented on the Government Benches or the individual who has a claim to make—of course they should make that claim. I believe that we have all had constituents with that experience, and occasionally we may have wanted to join in and help the process or deal with trade union-supporting solicitors. That is not the issue. Pursuing the individual case will not automatically drive a better commonweal. That may even be true about prosecutions, but I did not want to signal that we should take prosecution off the map—of course we should not.

From the tone of the discussion so far, I think that the Minister needs to explain and give a better flavour of how enforcement policy will develop. I am much at one with the Committee on that. We want an enforcement policy that will isolate and identify people who are behaving improperly and stop them from doing so.

Having said that, I have a good deal of sympathy with the HSE's wish to move towards a risk-based assessment for what it is doing, and we also need more of a partnership-based approach in trying to get people to do better. That should not be misinterpreted as what I believe the Americans would call producer-capture. This is about managing, reducing and minimising risks, and trying to iron them out of the system. That need not always mean huge extra expenses.

I was particularly sympathetic to the Select Committee's recommendation in respect of greater availability of material on the internet. At least companies would have easy access to that. It is a cheap way of communicating good practice, and it should be encouraged.

Turning to some specific points, I would like first to deal with asbestos, which is a subject that I raised with the executive. Although I am not suggesting that any asbestos is completely safe, it seems that the general public and the press are not aware that there is huge variation in types and circumstances. It is therefore important to get the advice clear and to ensure that contractors give the advice as straight as they can to what are possibly non-expert purchasers and others who are involved. The information should be given without distortion and on its merits. If substances are comparatively low risk, or there is no perceptible risk, they should be treated separately.

Mr. Dismore: I think that I have heard this argument about asbestos advanced from the Opposition Front Bench before—in a previous debate in this Chamber, in fact. Is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that there is a form of asbestos that is safe and should be used?

Mr. Boswell: I thought that I had made it clear that I do not in any sense wish to say that any asbestos is safe. What I did say, and what I will repeat, is that there may be different degrees of toxicity in relation to different substances. I think that that is incontestable. Of course, a great deal depends on the risk and the exposure in the particular circumstances. That is all that I am saying, and all I am calling for is an objective look at that and the appropriate advice. Following on from that, it would be helpful if the Minister could, either now or in due course, say something about Artex as a particular product.

I shall say a few words about workplace smoking, because the Government's document "Choosing Health: making healthier choices easier" may have exposed a potential illogicality that they will have to consider or explain. With regard to any proposals that exclude categories of establishment that serve only drink—bars—but include those serving food, I suggest that if the interest is primarily but not exclusively in protecting the work force, it is difficult to establish a logical distinction between those categories. The Minister may wish to comment on that.

Research has not featured as much it should do. The report could have done more in that respect. I hope that research will feature in the Minister's response. We need to know much more about the circumstances in which people become fatigued, the combination of long-run factors, and longitudinal studies, to which the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) referred. We must also make more use of the resources that we have through health and safety research and externally based experts, who can bring more expertise into this area.

There is an important role for training across the board in industry, but particularly in developing a wider approach to skills. There is a slight tendency for people to think in box-ticking terms and to say, "This is your personal safety equipment. Tick that you understand how it works." That is very much an attitudinal issue. In relation to construction, where we all have concerns about what happens, I would like the industry to move, as it is beginning to do through the Construction Industry Training Board, towards a certification scheme that is designed to cover at least all full-time employees, so that people are not allowed on sites unless they have their card saying that they have been trained to an acceptable standard.

Jim Sheridan: The hon. Gentleman mentions training. As I said in my contribution, his party has announced that it will stop funding the trade union learning fund, which goes a long way in terms of risk assessment and training safety representatives in the workplace. How does that announcement equate with what the hon. Gentleman has just said about training?

Mr. Boswell: I heard the hon. Gentleman's comments on that matter and I know a little about the trade union learning fund. It has done some good work. The question is one of priorities and whether that work can be allocated in another way, but I heard what the hon. Gentleman said.

[Mr. Boswell]

On vocational rehabilitation, there is a strategy, last promised for the autumn of this year. Those of us who are interested in this area have been waiting a long time for that.

I now cross seamlessly, I hope, to another Department and occupational health. That still comes under the Department of Health. The Minister will have heard a good deal about occupational health. I have considerable sympathy with what has been said on that. We have emphasised the acute situation—the safety situation—for good reasons. We now need to consider many of the long-term stresses that are building up in the work force. They are new stresses. It is not only a matter of people's lungs, dust and direct exposure to toxic chemicals, but of repetitive strain injury, the way that people sit at work stations, the nature of the job that they are asked to do and whether employers discharge a duty of care in managing and considering those factors. There is a large portfolio of work ahead, which will not be quite the same portfolio as in the past. That is not wrong, as long as we provide adequate resources; move them into areas of greatest need, and do not forget that there has to be an enforcement function.

We need to remember that, in the terms of this debate, health matters every bit as much as safety. That does not mean that safety does not matter, but that the two are both extremely important. Workplaces should avoid or minimise danger, but they should also be conducive to high occupational health standards. Underpinning that should be a common commitment on both sides of industry to high standards of good practice. That commitment should recognise the mutuality of interest of both the moral case for avoiding injury and the business case, which makes it more sensible for business to conduct itself to achieve high occupational standards. The HSE will not be the only player in this field. Much depends on engaging the active consent of responsible business opinion on both sides of the argument. However, we will proceed much better with the assistance of the executive and in light of the report.

5.2 pm

The Minister for Work (Jane Kennedy): I echo the words of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood) in complementing you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on the wise decision that you took last time we were due to meet because of noises off that would have, without doubt, distracted us from this important issue. It is a pleasure to be debating this subject under your chairmanship and to find you in such a mellow mood—a fact for which my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) has reason to be grateful.

I have listened to the debate with great interest. The Select Committee's report, to which we have responded, is wide-ranging and covers all of the work of the Health and Safety Commission and Executive. Before I plunge into a more detailed response, I welcome the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) to the debate and acknowledge the knowledge and experience of the agriculture industry that he brings to the subject. I am grateful for his comments on the location of the HSE under the ministerial sponsorship of the Department for Work and Pensions. I agree that that is the right place for the executive—it has come home. We take seriously our responsibilities to steward the HSC and HSE properly and to support their work.

I congratulate the Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, on receiving such a resounding accolade from members of that Committee here today. This is an important opportunity for us. We have had an appropriately long time to consider the serious issues that the report has raised. I welcome the report, although I am sure that hon. Members will appreciate that it was hard reading.

We considered the Committee's recommendations carefully before responding, and this debate allows me to put forward the Government's case and hear the concerns of the Committee and other hon. Members at first hand. The debate has given me considerable food for further thought, but has demonstrated a wide divergence in views on the direction being taken by the HSC and the HSE. We all seem to agree that they do invaluable work and need to be supported in their mission to ensure proper control of risks at work and make workplaces better, safer and healthier. We all share that aim, even if we part company on how best to achieve it.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire for reminding us of Britain's health and safety record; his comments were echoed by other hon. Members. It is one of the best records in Europe, indeed, in the world. Significant improvements have been made since the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 was passed all those years ago. That success is due to the work of organisations, inspectors, regulators, individual workers, employers and trade unions and the legislative framework underpinning the health and safety system. I pay tribute to all who have contributed to the improvement in health and safety.

As other hon. Members have said, the Government should not be complacent. We must reduce still further the numbers of accidents and cases of work-related disease. We recognise that the workplace is changing, as the Committee noted in its report. That brings new challenges to which we must adapt; the commission must respond to those challenges and the executive should reflect them.

The labour market has evolved to one where self-employment, agency-working and flexible patterns of work have become much more common. That is partly what makes it so dynamic and, dare I say it, so successful. However, we must ensure that our processes change with it. I agree with hon. Members who spoke in the debate that there should be much more emphasis on health at work.

In the past, health issues have not attracted the attention that they deserve. The Government are committed to taking that new route; although there have been improvements in health and safety generally, we are concerned that national safety performance has plateaued since the mid-1990s. We must build on the demonstrable successes of the past 30 years but I firmly believe that we cannot do more of what we have done in the past; we need a change of gear and emphasis. We need to take the agenda forward in new ways and to try out and test new ideas, learning about what works and what does not work so well.

The setting of national improvement targets was an important first step. The targets are essentially correct, notwithstanding the anxiety that has been expressed about achieving them. Although the process of setting the targets and considering them has highlighted some difficulties in terms of measurement and establishing a baseline, it served to cast a spotlight on outcomes, on just how well we are doing in preventing accidents and ill health. It is precisely that process that led the commission to recognise that the targets on their own would not be sufficient, and that they needed complementing with a more effective means of delivery. That is why the commission's strategy was developed.

I noted the concerns of members of the Committee and those of other hon. Members about targets. They were set in response to the plateau in performance, as part of revitalising the health and safety agenda. The targets are, rightly, challenging, and the Government, the commission and the executive realised that a new strategic approach was needed to deliver them. It is still too early to judge whether those targets will be met.

On occupational health in particular, there can be long latency between intervention in the workplace and a measurable outcome. We need time to monitor the impact of the intervention of the commission, the executive and others in occupational health. On stress and muscular-skeletal disorders, for example, there are early signs that the commission and the executive's multifaceted approach—partnership working, advice and so on, including enforcement where needed—is beginning to bear fruit.

The strategy has been endorsed by the Government, and I am firmly committed to supporting the commission and the executive in implementing it. I see it as providing the strategic direction needed to achieve the improvements that we all seek, and I want to see it fully implemented.

However, doing all that will not mean a softening of our approach on enforcement or a shift of resources from enforcement towards voluntary measures. Enforcement will still be a key part of the HSE's arsenal, and the strategy explicitly recognises that enforcement, or fear of it, is an important motivator. However, it rightly recognises that enforcement is simply one of a number of tools. I want to deal with one or two specific points that were made about inspectors and enforcement.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire stressed the role of inspectors in his report, and I draw attention to our response. Simply doing what the HSE has done before will not deliver the required improvements in health and safety performance. There is no evidence that simply doubling the number of inspectors will achieve significant improvements.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) referred to the vexed issue of building sites and the construction industry, which rightly remains, as he said, a key concern. He made other comments as well, to which I shall return. Inspectors cannot on their own drive up health and safety standards, and were never intended to do so. Joint working with the trade unions and employers is a prerequisite for improvements in health and safety on construction work sites. I agree with what has been said about procurement.

My hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (David Hamilton) presses the Government to use their powers as a major purchaser of building and construction work. His description of the Committee's site visit to his constituency was interesting and telling. The visit clearly made a big impact on the Committee. The Government are interested in grasping the opportunity to influence health and safety in the construction industry. In the health and safety taskforce which I chair, Government Setting an Example, which brings together Ministers from across Departments, including the Departments of Health and of Trade and Industry, we are examining what more the Government can do to use procurement to influence health and safety. Therefore, we fully accept that view. Indeed, the guidance from the Office of Government Commerce also supports that view. As I said, the taskforce is examining the issue as we speak.

The HSE is working not only to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of its interventions as inspectors; it is also making more time available for proactive activities, as well as completing reactive work more efficiently. We must remember that the HSE's primary aim is prevention. It is working to increase the balance of proactive to reactive work from 50:50 to 60:40, as I said in my response to the Committee.

We must also remember that many staff other than inspectors are employed in front-line activities and make an important contribution. Again, as I said in my response to the Committee, a set of initiatives is being implemented to broaden the range of such staff and increase operational productivity.

Jim Sheridan: Before my right hon. Friend leaves the question of procurement, will she take on board the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian? We must have regard not only to the major contractor, but to the way in which he or she offsets to the subcontractor. Many subcontractors engage migrant workers who are frightened to report accidents, because they would lose not only their job, but their accommodation as well.

Jane Kennedy: I am grateful for that intervention. I take on board what has been said, and I have listened carefully to the contributions of hon. Members, many of whom touched on that subject. It is remarkable how quickly half an hour disappears, but I will seek to respond to all the points raised.

This matter is so important that it is worth dwelling on. I said to the Committee that, in response to the concerns that have been expressed not only in the report, but today about what appear to be changes in the balance of the executive, we are satisfied that the HSE has no such proposals. We support the executive in maintaining a balanced approach. Getting that balance right will probably be an area for debate in the future.

Rob Marris: The Minister talks about the balance, and I understand that there is no evidence that more enforcement will lead to what we want—namely, prevention—but I put it to her that in the past two years we have seen less enforcement and that that has been followed by an increase in fatalities and accidents.

[Rob Marris]

Whether it is causally connected I do not know, but less enforcement does not seem to have resulted in what we want.

Jane Kennedy: I do not necessarily accept my hon. Friend's analysis, although I understand why he makes it. When we see the record, I will read the debate carefully. I have not seen the evidence to which he alludes. The plateauing in performance happened some time ago. It was a matter of concern to the Government, and as a result we set the targets. We have begun to measure performance only since then, and we must allow a bit of time—research has been mentioned as well—to study what is happening before we make the sort of judgments that my hon. Friend has sought to persuade me to make.

The Hampton report was referred to. It is a serious piece of work, deserving of a careful response from the Government after its full consideration. The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire will be aware that the review is still in its consultation phase. The Health and Safety Commission considers that the executive has got the balance between inspection and enforcement and information and advice just about right. The commission will also say that to the Hampton review, so I hope that that reassures the Committee.

Many of the Committee's recommendations require significant additional resources. We have stated that the HSC will be protected as a front-line service, but additional resources must be linked to delivery and an improvement in performance. As a front-line service, the HSC should be protected, but it cannot be exempted from improving as part of a drive for more effective and efficient ways of working. As the strategy is implemented and the evidence develops, resources will be prioritised and targeted at those areas where they will make a greater impact than in the past.

Tony Lloyd: On the question of getting the balance right, one of the long-term criticisms about the way in which the HSE operates is that it has always been reluctant to prosecute, because prosecution is resource-intense—it takes up a lot of staff time. The criticism has been that it has preferred to operate by way of advice rather than enforcement. Behind that are implications for resources, but there is also a balance to be struck: the HSE needs to be urged to prosecute when prosecution is better than advice.

Jane Kennedy: I do not disagree with a lot of what my hon. Friend has said, although one keeps resources constantly under review. The HSE and the commission form an independent organisation, which is well supported by industry and the trade unions. That requires us to keep under constant review the resources it has available, and I undertake to do that. As Ministers, we can always spend more on the services that are dear to our hearts, but the HSE, like many other public services, has to ensure that its processes and operations are as effective as they can be, given the budgets within which it has to work.

I shall quickly touch on occupational health, because that is a subject in which I have a particular interest. It is a complex area, and one in which the impact of interventions is seen over a much longer period. The most taxing issues on the occupational health agenda have now shifted from the effects of the harmful materials that we work with. Hon. Members referred to that, describing how in the past workers were left largely unprotected when working with harmful materials. Now, we need to concentrate more on our interaction with the working environment—on things such as the physical stress on our bodies that leads to musculo-skeletal disorders, and mental stress arising from the demands of modern working life.

The executive has been developing a series of pilot schemes to test models for delivering occupational health support. I want to move rapidly through what I have prepared to say; I shall skate over rehabilitation, although hon. Members will know how important that issue is to me, given my work elsewhere in helping people who have physical and medical conditions to return to work after a period out of work.

I want to touch on the legal framework, and also to respond specifically to some of the powerful speeches that hon. Members made. Our view is that the legal framework is largely complete. The challenge is to achieve better compliance rather than to introduce more legislation. However, there are exceptions to that. The outstanding issues regarding further legislation are the introduction of a new offence of corporate manslaughter; the removal of Crown immunity; and greater penalties for health and safety offences.

The Home Secretary has said that a draft Bill for corporate manslaughter will be published—it says here—this autumn. It will be published. I reassure hon. Members that we are also committed to introducing legislation on the removal of Crown immunity and on greater penalties, as parliamentary time allows. We stand by that commitment.

Mr. Hepburn: If the Government are not to include directors' responsibilities and duties in any future corporate manslaughter Bill, how will we create the culture of boardroom responsibility that is needed to stop deaths in the workplace?

Jane Kennedy: I will come to the question of boardroom responsibility, but at the moment I should like to deal with impending legislation.

I agree with the views that have been expressed. A new and effective offence of corporate manslaughter reserved for the most flagrant cases would improve proportionality in responding to work-related deaths. The new offence would also improve access to justice in distressing cases, and would increase the pressure to improve among the relatively few employers with wholly inadequate risk management in their workplaces. I concur with many of the supporting comments that have been made on the need for that legislation, and it is important that I take the opportunity to put that on the record.

David Hamilton: Regardless of any legislation that may be passed in the Westminster Parliament, the Minister will accept that Scottish legislation is somewhat different. Is it possible, or even likely, that the Scottish Parliament might take a different view, if such legislation continues to be delayed by Westminster, and pass its own legislation in Scotland?

Jane Kennedy: It is possible, although it would be unfortunate, and I would regret it if that course of action were taken. We are committed to bringing that Bill forward. The delay simply demonstrates how difficult it has proved, in a very complex area of law, to reach a point at which we can publish something, with a collective Government position, that can be discussed in public.

I share the frustration that has been expressed about the low levels of fines. I have discussed that matter before, but I reassure hon. Members that I am seeking an opportunity to change the penalty framework. There are actually very big penalties that the courts can use, but they do not apply them. That is the case in England and Wales, and in Scotland.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Ann McKechin) drew a critical comparison between the performance in Scotland and in the rest of the UK. She said that the plastics industry needs a strict regulatory environment, although there are complexities involved in that and I described them in my letter to her—I wanted her to receive it before this debate.

My hon. Friend also questioned us on the priorities set by the HSE and asked whether plastics should be one of those priorities. The number of reported incidents is one factor, but I will disappoint her when I say that I do not believe that the priority level of the plastics industry should be changed. However, before she intervenes to protest, I want to take the opportunity to explain why we reached that view. The executive recognises that there is some disparity in the statistics that cannot be explained by a different mix of industries. It is starting research to see whether an explanation can be found, and I look forward to receiving the findings of that research. The statistics were quoted and it is important to remember that the construction and the agriculture, forestry and fishing industries remain two of the key priorities for the Health and Safety Executive precisely because around half of the fatal injuries to workers occur in those industries. It would be folly to ignore that.

Equally, my hon. Friend asked why slipping and tripping are priorities when the plastics industry is not. Again, based on the statistics published by the HSE just last month, more than one third of all reported major injuries were caused by slipping and tripping. Even worse, the most common over-three-day injuries to employees continue to occur when handling, lifting or carrying, which are fairly simple working practices but can cause major injury. It is right that those should be key priorities for the HSE.

On non-unionised workplaces, the HSE assesses the health and safety conditions applying in those workplaces. It makes a judgment of the risk when determining the priorities on the basis of visits to such workplaces, events, including accidents, and early assessment. It has experience of the industries and believes that to use influencing factors such as trade union representation would make it more difficult to assess the priorities and keep them up to date.

My hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Hepburn) spoke about making employers' liability insurance compulsory, which has focused the minds of directors, as my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) recognised. There is evidence that, increasingly, health and safety is being taken seriously at board level. The Government recognised that we had to examine our own performance, which is why the health and safety taskforce is set at ministerial level. A survey in 2003 showed that the number of companies in which health and safety was being addressed at board level had increased from 58 per cent. to 66 per cent. We have taken the view that there is less need to regulate and we believe that the threat of legislation is sufficient at the moment. The U-turn that the Government were accused of was perhaps a slight turn, but not a complete U-turn.

This is not a party political point, but the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) made another spending commitment today when he referred to resources. I shall respond to that before we adjourn and I apologise for not responding to all the points that have been raised. Directors and managers are not free from all responsibility for health and safety at work. Breach of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act is a criminal offence and offenders are prosecuted. The Health and Safety Executive enforces the Act, but rightly recognises, that, increasingly, it will have to work to forge partnerships in industries where it may not have had good working partnerships previously.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Five o'clock.
